Our strength in the Pacific, in any war now foreseeable, is dependent not only on the Navy but on the bases from which the Navy functions. Therefore we are building bases as well as ships. The American defense line in the Pacific is being erected on these bases. When they are completed they will form a massive irregular triangle, from Alaska to Hawaii to the Panama Canal, and will effectively deny this part of the Pacific Ocean to any enemy force. Subsidiary to the three dominant points of this triangle are other bases, such as Midway and Wake Islands, which form a kind of protective apron in front of Hawaii, and the islets south of Hawaii—like Johnston, Palmyra, and Canton—which are potentially a screen covering the sea between Hawaii and the Canal Zone. Farther south is American Samoa, which is not yet a base, but could be made into one.

Modern conceptions of warfare, as revised by the lessons of the present war in Europe, demand active as well as passive systems of defense. Our chain of Pacific bases is, first of all, intended to be a great patrol line for the protection of the eastern Pacific and, if necessary, our own shores. It will be patrolled by the Navy's new scout bombers—powerful planes easily capable of the long jumps necessary in that area. The major portion of our fleet will center, of course, on Hawaii, the geographical and military keystone of the whole system. The smaller bases will be useful for protecting Hawaii and as headquarters for auxiliary ships and squadrons of bombing planes.

Let us begin with Alaska and the Aleutian area. Bases here are important because they guard the great circle route between Japan and the United States, which is by far the quickest path across the Pacific. In the Alaskan region our plans include a naval station at Dutch Harbor and bases for naval aircraft at Sitka and Kodiak Island. Kodiak (on Unalaska Island) is to be the Navy's main headquarters in Alaskan waters, and $8,570,000 has been appropriated for work there. The Army, too, is interested in Alaska and has airfields at Anchorage and Fairbanks. The War Department asked for $12,734,000 to improve the Anchorage base, but the House of Representatives refused to grant it.

Our military and naval program in Alaska is predicated on fear of a conflict with Japan. Nevertheless, it may also have a possible relevance to Soviet Russia. American and Russian territory almost meet, not only at the Bering Strait but also at the end of the Aleutian Archipelago. In fact, strange as it may seem, Russia is our nearest neighbor, Canada and Mexico excepted. Today few people anticipate war between the United States and the Soviet Union. American authorities nonetheless follow Russian activities near Alaska with close attention. The Soviets are understood to be fortifying two islands of the Komandorskie group,[4] which lie close to the Aleutians east of Kamchatka. A submarine base is said to be in construction on Bering Island, one of this group, and German experts are believed to have visited it and to have given technical advice. At present Soviet military activity in the Kamchatka region is almost certainly directed not against the United States but against Japan, with whose fisheries Russian submarines could play havoc. Nevertheless, such activity is not without indirect interest for us.

Proceeding southward from the Alaskan zone we come to Hawaii. Here, on the island of Oahu, we have built what is incontestibly the strongest fortified position in the world—Pearl Harbor. It has cost $700,000,000 thus far, and next to the Panama Canal is America's most important and ambitious military-strategic establishment. Pearl Harbor compares to the Alaskan bases as a mastodon compares to mice. It has a submarine base, a drydock, a navy yard, fuel and ammunition depots, a naval station big enough to handle the entire American fleet, a fleet air base, an important military garrison, and 50 days' supply of food. Nearby are other airfields, and $5,800,000 was recently appropriated to improve airdrome facilities at Kaneohe, also on Oahu Island. Kaneohe is to house five squadrons of long-range planes.

Screening Hawaii are Midway Island, 1,315 miles to the northwest, and Wake Island, 2,315 miles almost due west. Midway, which lies just within the one hundred and eightieth meridian, is definitely inside the American defense scheme; while Wake, just outside of it, is a bit beyond our theoretical limit for operation by capital ships. Midway was allotted $5,350,000 in the last appropriations; Wake, $2,000,000. Improvements are to consist of dredging channels and building better facilities for big planes. Later, submarine bases may be constructed. Both Wake and Midway are, it should be repeated, regular stops on Pan American's air route across the Pacific.

When we turn to the small islets hidden below Hawaii we reach virtual terri incognita. Naval plans call for the earliest completion of bases for aircraft at both Johnston and Palmyra Islands and later completion of similar bases at Canton Island and Rose Island (adjacent to Samoa). Johnston Island is approximately 800 miles southwest of Hawaii, and Palmyra and Canton are roughly 2,000 miles southeast of Wake. All are almost inconceivably remote and tiny. They are atolls barely rising above the surface of the sea, uninhabited for the most part and visited only occasionally by fishing vessels. The sum of $1,100,000 has been appropriated to improve Palmyra, which was privately owned by American citizens in Honolulu until acquired recently by the Navy. It consist of a chain of 52 islets, surrounding a lagoon that can be turned into a satisfactory seaplane station; the whole group measures only 5 miles by 1½. Canton was so inconspicuous that until last year no one knew clearly whether it belonged to Britain or to the United States. However, on April 6, 1939, an arrangement was made setting up a joint administrative control by both countries. The agreement runs for 50 years, and in it the United States promises to allow British aircraft to utilize the base we build.

Finally we come to the Panama Canal. Though a detailed description of that vital waterway is hardly within the province of this article, there are three details which we cannot overlook. First, most of our experts consider the Panama Canal to be almost immune to an attack from the Pacific due to the tremendous distances involved. Japan is almost 8,000 miles away, and any Japanese aircraft carrier which might attempt a bombing foray against the Canal would have to be protected so heavily that the venture would be almost out of the question. Second, the Senate has recently voted $15,000,000, plus $99,000,000 for future work, toward the immediate construction of a third series of locks in the Canal, not only independent of the present ones but wide enough so that ships with a beam greater than 110 feet can utilize them. At present our biggest aircraft carriers can only just scrape through. Third, there is considerable sentiment in American naval circles for the purchase of the Galapagos Islands from Ecuador and Cocos Island from Costa Rica. If fortified, these would serve as a protective curtain for the Pacific entrance of the Canal.

This program for improving and expanding our bases took concrete form in what is known as the Hepburn report, a document prepared by Rear Admiral Arthur J. Hepburn and his staff following authorization by the Naval Expansion Act of 1938. Admiral Hepburn and his advisers proposed that the United States create a defense chain of 41 bases—not all of them, however, new or in the Pacific. (Naval authorities have declared that we should maintain 400 long-range patrol planes—as against a present strength of 285—so that the bases may be properly and permanently linked.) So far Congress has appropriated $65,000,000 toward the realization of this program.

The Hepburn report further recommended the creation of an air and submarine base at Guam. This provoked the liveliest dispute that has taken place between Congress and the Navy in recent years. Congress has thus far refused to appropriate the $5,000,000 requested by the Navy for preliminary work at Guam. In January 1940, Admiral Stark, the Chief of Naval Operations, reopened one phase of the controversy by asserting to the House Naval Affairs Committee that the Navy might, if it wished, withdraw $4,000,000 from its budget for the Hawaiian district and apply it to Guam without specific authorization from Congress. Meantime, within the Navy itself, and among military experts generally, the Guam dispute continues to blaze fiercely.

So let us therefore turn to Guam. It admirably illustrates two rival theses in regard to American Pacific policy.

VI

An island 250 square miles in extent and populated by 21,000 natives known as Chomorros, Guam lies far beyond the one hundred and eightieth meridian, far outside the inner sphere of American Pacific interests. It is about 3,300 miles west of Honolulu, 1,500 miles east of Manila and about 1,350 miles from Yokohama. It is thus much closer to Japan than to the United States. Except for the Philippines, it is the most westerly of our possessions. Moreover, it is completely surrounded by a veritable shoal of Japan's mandated islands. The Japanese base at Saipan is only 100 miles away.

Until 1898, Guam was a nominal possession of Spain, but no Spaniards lived there and it was quite undefended. An American cruiser steaming toward Manila called at its main harbor, Apra, in 1898, and planted the American flag there without opposition. Then by the Treaty of Paris which concluded the Spanish-American War, we formally annexed it. We did not, however, take the other Marianas, an archipelago which Spain proceeded to sell to Germany. Germany held them until 1919, when they were mandated to Japan along with the Carolines and Marshalls. Guam has been administered by the United States Navy since 1899. We fortified it in a somewhat sketchy fashion, but these fortifications have since been dismantled and at present Guam has no defenses except a detachment of some 500 marines.

Some of our naval experts, doubtless influenced by Admiral Mahan's dictum that Guam should be made into a "Gibraltar of the Pacific," want to turn the island into an elaborate advance base, comprising both submarine and aerial units, and capable of being the spearhead of the American position in the Pacific. A more modest school of opinion asks merely that we spend perhaps $5,000,000 for dredging Apra harbor and building breakwaters and ramps for seaplanes. Guam is, at present, an essential link in Pan American's trans-Pacific air route and can hence service ordinary peacetime aerial traffic. The harbor, however, could be used for military purposes only after being considerably improved. Still other experts, the most modest of all in their demands, merely hope that the harbor will be improved for civil and commercial purposes, with the idea that eventually this improvement may serve a military end. They point out that Japan, in nearby islands, is carrying out a similar plan of development.

There are several reasons why opposition to the Guam project has been so fierce. First, Guam is in an exposed and isolated position in the very heart of an important Japanese-controlled area; therefore it will be extremely difficult to defend. Second, if Guam actually is to be developed into a first-class base—whether or not war with Japan ever comes—the cost will be tremendous. Reliable estimates put it at $200,000,000 at least. Coast defenses and antiaircraft guns will be necessary; so will beach defenses and at least three airfields; so will measures for the provisioning of the local population; so will a garrison of perhaps 20,000 men supported by at least 1,000 airplanes. Third, many experts say that creation of an important base at Guam is at complete variance with our traditional Pacific policy. If we fortify Guam, they assert, we shall be leaving the one hundred and eightieth meridian far behind, we shall be penetrating for the first time into purely Japanese waters with a base that has offensive as well as defensive potentialities. It might be justifiable, they hold, to make Guam merely a secondary base, useful perhaps as headquarters for a few submarines (which would, indubitably, be of great value if an attack were ever necessary on Japanese shipping in this area). But to make the island a primary base would, they maintain, be a needless and wanton affront to Japan, one that would be bitterly resented. Fourth and finally, some circles maintain that full-dress fortification of Guam is completely useless unless we are prepared to fight for and hold the Philippines. If so, Guam has cardinal importance. If not, it is an expensive nuisance.

VII

To recapitulate, our policy in the Pacific has consistently been defensive and peaceable. We have a tremendous Navy and we are in the process of creating an important triangle of defense from Alaska via Hawaii to the Panama Canal. So far we have been content—as have most countries—to allow our diplomatic frontier to remain ahead of our military frontier. We stand at the one hundred and eightieth meridian; no one can easily menace us behind this line; we have no wish to proceed beyond it. As reflected in the reacttion of Congress to the Guam proposal, this policy seems to be supported by most of the American people. It is a compromise policy. But it has worked so far.

It is a characteristic of liberal, democratic states—especially if they are world powers with far-flung interests—to compromise, to permit their interests and commitments to advance beyond their immediate capacity to defend them. Totalitarian states do not compromise; they adopt, by and large, a policy of active coalescence among geographic, diplomatic, military, and strategic considerations. They have only one frontier. But the United States, so far as we can now know, is in a peculiarly advantageous position in the Pacific. It is almost inconceivable that Japan alone could destroy us, whereas we alone could destroy Japan. However, should Germany win the war in Europe, we might then have to reckon with more than Japan.

Which brings us, as is inevitable, to considerations of higher international policy. Obviously, the present explosive state of Europe makes any reasoned calculation almost impossibly difficult. But one thing may be said with complete assurance: If the British and French should lose the war, our entire national-defense problem, in the Pacific as well as the Atlantic, will have to be sharply altered. We shall have to adjust to quite a different scale our attitude in regard to our frontiers and our means of defending them. The frontiers themselves may change. Suppose, for instance, that the British lose Singapore. This would all but wreck American conceptions of Pacific strategy, since we practically take it for granted that in a war with Japan we should have to borrow Singapore's facilities. Singapore under friendly British rule is almost as important as Pearl Harbor in our presumptive Pacific operations, should we have to carry them into Japanese waters.

Much loose talk exists about our need for a two-ocean navy. As a matter of fact we have a two-ocean navy now. Our Navy is perfectly capable of efficient operation in both the Atlantic and Pacific at the same time, and will continue to be as long as the Panama Canal remains intact. (To people impressed with the destructive power of modern saboteurs and "fifth columns" this may seem like a large "if.") When people talk about a two-ocean navy, what they usually mean is a two-fleet navy—that is, a navy big enough to maintain independent and unrelated operations in both the Atlantic and Pacific without regard to the Canal. To create and to maintain such a navy would cost a great deal—in money, effort, time, and national will. But if the Allies lose the war in Europe and if the British Fleet disappears, we might find that we needed a navy bigger than all the other navies in the world combined.

Not War, But World Revolution

ARTICLE BY DR. GEORGE MECKLENBURG

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Dr. George Mecklenburg:

NOT WAR, BUT WORLD REVOLUTION

(By George Mecklenburg)

We hear it on every hand. This is not a war, but a world revolution. What do we mean by that? Is revolution worse than war? Do you not feel that it is time now that we clarify these loose questions and phrases that we so glibly enunciate these days? A clarification of what we mean by war and revolution seems to be needed at the moment.

We have been during the past few weeks discussing the meaning of what is really going on. We have tried to point out that right before our eyes in quick and bold strokes four new empires are being carved out, emerging before us in less than a year's time. Brand new world alinements are coming into view. Just the way the map of the world has been twisted and chopped up and remade might be said to be revolutionary.

That the world is facing one of the supreme crises of history is indisputable. We undoubtedly live in one of those ages of profound transvaluations—an age like the Renaissance or the Reformation. All this is world-wide, amazing, unbelievable, and unprecedented in its dangers.

Now, we know what war is. We exhaust our language in describing the hell of war. It is Satan set loose on earth. But usually war was not revolution. The first world war was a war for power and property. But both sides in the conflict had the same ideology. Whichever side won, the world would go on as usual. That is not true of the second world war.

We in America are beginning, vaguely perhaps, to sense that we are about to enter an entirely new universe of life. It would seem that we are not very anxious to know all about it. We should be sitting up nights studying the revolution that we are right in now. How will it affect us? How much do we want to spend to resist it here in America? Are there any good points to this revolution? Is it inevitable and irresistible and the result of the sins of the past?

NEW UNIVERSE OF LIFE

We call it a Fascist revolution. What do we mean by that? Are we ready to go back and study the roots of fascism in the writings of Machiavelli, Fichte, Hegel, Nietzsche, Sorel, Pareto, and Spengler? Are we aware now that fascism is no longer a philosophy of these writers? That it is now a revolutionary war? Fascism today is 100-percent militaristic in character. Mr. Otto D. Tolischus interprets fascism as follows:

"In actual practice all Germans have quickly discovered that national socialism is no respecter, much less representative, of persons, classes, or class interests, that on the contrary, it is a semimilitary organism determined on totalitarian mobilization of the entire nation in order to enable Germany to make a new bid for a 'place in the sun,' and that in the service of that mobilization it has clamped an iron rule on all classes and interests, most especially labor and capital. * * * Business and private property thereby become not an instrument of private 'egoism' but 'functions of the people.' They remain private wherever and so long as they fulfill their 'functions.' Wherever and whenever they fall down, the state steps in and either forces them to fulfill the functions or takes them over entirely."

DEEP MALADY OF FASCISM

As I listen in to conversation in America today I get the impression that we have not begun to fathom the deep malady of fascism. We merely think ordinarily of fascism as being antidemocratic. Often we express fear for democracy. We point out how degenerate it is. How it was found wanting in France and had we not better adopt some totalitarian fascism here in America, too. Then we ask, Why do we not work for appeasement with Hitler and his revolutionary policy? Why fight this efficient new governmental organization? May it not be just what modern civilization needs?

Because of this inadequate conception of the terrible satanic darkness of fascism we need to look deeper. We must get behind the scenes. Fascism is a violent revolution against civilization; against intellectualism; against capitalism; against Christian life and love of humanity.

1. In the first place I would call totalitarian fascism a revolution today because it is a flight from reason. Our present civilization is founded on reason. The minds of millions of people have been so violently shaken that their whole manner of thinking has been disturbed. Under the circumstances men are bewildered and take flight from reason. Fascism is the embodiment of this tendency.

One writer says: "Fascism is real insurrection—an insurrection of feeling—a mutiny of men against the conditions of the modern world." From this naturally follow the regimentation of thought and the regimentation of all life. Those who know the nature of fascism are not surprised that the 100 top scientists and thinkers of Germany have been driven out of the land. Men must not think. They must blindly follow. Even science must be regarded as a means of promoting racialism and pride. There is no such thing any more as truth for truth's sake. Science becomes propaganda, too. The concept of scientific objectivity is entirely foreign to totalitarian thinking.

Dr. Ernest Krieck, professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, said in 1937, "We do not recognize truth for truth's sake, science for science's sake." My party in 1937 visited Heidelberg and heard a lecturer expound the new philosophy that education and thinking are subservient to politics. They said: "We renounce research for its own sake. We teach and learn history not to say how thinking actually happens, but to instruct the German people in what they ought to think. We teach science not to discover abstract laws but to sharpen the implements of the German people in competition with other peoples."

Now this certainly is serious and most revolutionary. Democracy is the product of the scientific spirit. It is truth itself and righteousness. Democracy is a heritage from Greece and Judea. Therefore, I feel that fascistic irrationalism is a revolutionary assault on the very foundations of democracy. The world cannot go on as a civilized world ignoring truth. The flight from reason is a flight into barbarism.

2. Then I feel that fascistic totalitarianism is a revolution in fundamental values. Democracy has always taken the Christian view that supreme values reside in persons. "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his soul?" On the basis of that kind of teaching a government is for people. It must minister to individuals. It can be made and unmade by the people. This democracy that we have enjoyed during the last 300 years might be said to be a combination of the Greek ideal of inquiry and the Christian ideal of kindliness. They believe in using the full resources of intellect for the welfare and happiness of mankind. Fascism exalts the strength of will and emotional bias and attacks free inquiry and international brotherhood. Fascism is revolutionary because it denies everything that the world has been standing for in values. It exalts the state as the only real value.

Prof. Otto Koellreutter, one of the Nazi theorists, says: "In every case, the fundamental principle in present-day world of states is that the national interests of individual states always precede international interests, that the nation comes before humanity."

Mussolini agrees to that same idea. "As in the well-ordered and powerful days of the First Empire, Rome must again become the marvel of the world."

Likewise Japan agrees to this same thought about the state. One of the Japanese writers says: "The center of the world is Japan. From this center we must expand the Great Spirit throughout the world. The expansion of Japan throughout the world is our urgent business."

Fascism is, of course, extreme nationalism and this is related to racial bias. Personally I can tell you a dark story of racial bias as I witnessed it in Vienna in the summer of 1938. I saw it in its horrible ghastliness. Human beings were being treated worse than animals. Just at the point in history when we thought and preached that God had made all nations of one blood this nasty racialism breaks out.

3. Totalitarian fascism is a revolution today because of its unblushing use of force. Heretofore all nations have used force. We have had wars and rumors of wars down through the ages, but during the last 100 years while we used war as a method we apologized for it. We dreamed of international peace. We prayed for peace. We worked hard for a warless world. We believe in world brotherhood. But fascism stands for just the opposite. It does not apologize for going to war. It glories in the cruelty of war. It does not believe in a warless world. It presses world conquest. It does not believe in world brotherhood.

It believes in a superrace that must govern the inferior races as slaves. Peace, to fascism, is an effeminate weakness. War is virtue. The cruelty of the strong is glorified. The doctrines of violence that now completely dominate Germany, Italy, Russia, and Japan can best be studied in the following statement by F. T. Marinetti who greatly influenced the thought of Benito Mussolini. "Who can deny that a strong man breathes much more freely, eats much better, and sleeps much more soundly after having slapped and knocked down an enemy? Who can deny that the word 'man' and the word 'fighter' are synonymous? Hence we conclude that when we speak of war it is the better part of our blood, the futurist part that speaks in us.

"Violence has today become the best condition of real health for a people. Order, pacifism, moderation, the diplomatic and reformist spirit, are they not perhaps arteriosclerosis, old age, and death? * * * For to the present esthetics of filthy lucre we oppose—and let it come, let it come—an esthetics of violence and blood."

Likewise Hitler has again and again in his speeches expressed his ambition to make Germany the supreme lord of the earth. Real peace, he announces, can only be achieved by the German conquest of the world.

I maintain that this new philosophy of force and the actual use of it to conquer weaker nations without even an excuse is revolution, to say the least. It would be more accurate to say that it is the emergence of black Satan on earth again.

4. The fascistic concept of the relation of the state and the race to the individual is completely revolutionary, it seems to me. Mussolini again and again speaks of the state as having a will and being self-conscious. Mr. Rocco has declared that the State is an organism distinct from the citizen's and has its own life and ends rather than those of individuals. But in Germany, while the state is glorified, it is thought of as having a racial basis. The Nazi state, it is declared, rests on ties of blood.

How different that is from the thought of democracy. For fascism, society is the end—individual, the means, and its whole life consists of using individuals as instruments for its social ends. In democracy the individual is the end and society the means.

Mussolini accepted from the beginning Spengler's philosophy as expressed in the Decline of the West: "Humanity is still and always an abstraction of time and space. Men are still not brothers; do not want to be and evidently cannot be. Peace is hence absurd, or, rather, it is a pause in war."

This same philosophy has entered into the controversy between the church and the state, especially in Germany. Bishop Muller, who was elected the state bishop of the Lutheran Church, in a sermon March 14, 1937, said, "Christ was by no means filled with love and pity, but with wild wrath against the Jews. He never thought of founding a church. A church is a foreign body against the German people. My aim is to promote general religiosity. I shall build a new German church with the help of those 80 percent of the German people who reject present-day Christianity."

Melvin Rader in his book, No Compromise, a perfectly fearless analysis of fascism, speaks in chapter 9, as follows:

"We are living in a mad age. The shock of crises has torn impulses loose from their moorings. The gloomy prophecy of Oswald Spengler is not unduly alarmist. A world revolution is on."

Not to be too unduly alarmed and not to be too discouraged it is well for us to read the literature that analyzes other ages. During the transition from the Middle Ages to the Rennaissance a French poet cried out:

"Time of mourning and of temptation, age of tears, of envy and of torment, time of languor and of damnation, age of decline nigh to the end, time full of horror which does all things falsely, lying age, full of pride and of envy, time without honor and without true judgment, age of sadness which shortens life."

However, it is without overdue pessimism that we now know that this is not a war of power politics between the nations of a grasping wicked Old World. It is by the proclamation of the National Socialists' regime a world revolution, in which are to be laid the new foundations for the next millennium.

Hitler has said in effect to the German people and is now saying to the world, "Surrender to me your liberty, your personality, your right to think for yourself, even to decide for yourself between right and wrong, and I will give, in return, security for your family as long as you serve me faithfully and blindly—food enough to keep you from starving, a place to live, work to do, and the satisfaction of being a part—however unimportant—in a great and successful machine."

Strong for New Deal

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter which was published recently in the Indianapolis Star:

STRONG FOR NEW DEAL

To the EDITOR OF THE INDIANAPOLIS STAR:

If the money that was worse than wasted in the last 20 years had been invested in some good life-insurance company, very few in this country would be needy. I "read" the tobacco bill is over $9,000,000,000, the booze bill $5,000,000,000, and the pleasure bill just between these two. Possibly all of this foolish money spent would pay our big debt in about 2 years. In 1932 when 10 cents was all I could sell my corn for we used this corn in cook stoves and in the furnace for fuel. Corn was less than $3 a ton. In February 1937, when we had our farm sale, 100 bushels would have more than paid the tax on same farm and personal property 1 year. Tax was down from $182.50 to $121.65, corn up from 10 cents to $1.25 a bushel.

In my township not far from our home 2,900 acres of land were lost in Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover administrations. Yes; I voted for all three of them. Not 1 acre of land in Richland township, Rush County, has been lost in the last 7 years. I think three life-insurance policies were what saved us. One $2,500 policy had a 10-year accumulated dividend.

Through the three administrations I had voted for Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, the best offer we could get on our 80 acres was $4,800. In August 1936, I priced it and in less than 2 hours it was sold for $9,235, $4,435 profit; should have asked $10,000. Why should I go back on the New Deal program?

Will Hitler Attack America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

SERMON BY DR. GEORGE MECKLENBURG

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following sermon by Dr. George Mecklenburg:

WILL HITLER ATTACK AMERICA?

(By Dr. George Mecklenburg)

"I will shake the heavens and the earth; and I will overthrow the thrones of kingdoms." Haggai 2:21, 22.

Again and again kingdoms have been overthrown. For two centuries Nineveh had been the capital of Assyria and the center of business, fashion, and religion for the surrounding country. It had acquired to itself the reputation as the center of world wisdom. Nahum comes along and denounces her militarism that creates no spiritual wealth. Today all there is left of Nineveh is dusty ruins, a mute symbol of the fate of all godless empires. Brute force has no permanence. The God of righteousness has decreed that right makes might.

I believe that we are again in times when we will turn to the Old Testament texts. We, ourselves, in America may soon be in a position to understand how the people felt in Old Testament times when they were attacked by brute forces.

Ambassador William Bullitt said the other day, "The United States will not go to war—war is coming toward the Americas."

Hendrik Willem van Loon, in a book, Our Battle, written in 1937, said:

"If you and I live another 10 years, I feel convinced that the British Government will experience what the Roman Government experienced in the fifth century when she was transferred from Rome to the city Ravenna. The London of the twentieth century is quite as vulnerable as the Rome of the fifth century. Only this time the danger will come from the air. Nazi flying machines will take the place of the horses of the Vandals.

"Therefore there will be no other way out but to remove the Government from the Thames to the banks of the St. Lawrence River as the Roman Government fled to the banks of the Tiber.

"Incidentally, this would put the United States face to face with a complicated situation. We can hardly welcome such close proximity to a city which will be the natural target for all German attacks. It will bring the European war disagreeably close to us."

Does not that seem like a prophecy?

PROPAGANDA TODAY

It is very difficult to discuss the question of tonight dispassionately. We have been bombarded with headlines and frenzied appeals have been made to our emotions. We are near hysteria. But that is all the more reason why the pulpit must deal with our times and the state of mind of the people. Modern propaganda is designed to influence public opinion and governmental policies. It utilizes every facility of communication and distribution—newspapers, magazines, radio, motion pictures, the theaters, churches, forums, clubs, business meetings, books, news letters, and conversations.

Since last April it has been pointed out by keen observers that 10 major appeals have been aimed at the American public: "All neutrals are in danger"; "the Allies are our first line of defense"; "increased preparedness in the United States"; "danger from a 'fifth column' "; "Greenland and Iceland"; "Tokyo and the Netherlands Indies"; "danger of invasion of Canada"; "United States cannot let Germany win"; "what shall we do if war comes?"; and "the United States is totally unprepared."

Now we should recognize definitely and clearly that all this is prepared propaganda; but that does not mean that we should not read it. We should carefully consider it. We have no means of knowing anything about the world except through propaganda channels. We cannot lean backward and refuse to believe anything. Norway did that. Norway pooh-poohed every warning of danger. Now she is a vassal to Germany. Our problem is to be intelligent enough to read propaganda and pick out the truth.

At last America is beginning to think seriously about her safety. Have we done anything to deserve our preferred position on the globe? May we not have to arouse ourselves and sacrifice something to hold that which we cherish? A very thoughtful layman said the other day:

"The point I am making is this; that in this modern, streamlined, close-knit, complicated world of ours, it may not perhaps be enough to guard one's own liberty, to clean one's own house, even generously to provide money and relief for the victims of aggression. Perhaps in this world of ours today with its blessings of material miracles in transportation and communication and all the rest, a wider vision is required of us, if we are to guard even our own liberty; a deeper sense of obligation. One wonders what the good Samaritan would have done, if he had come upon the man who fell among thieves while the thieves were still attacking him. If he had stood aside until the thieves had completed their foul work, and the victim was crushed, would that have been enough to protect him in his turn from the thieves? Would it have been noble pacifism, or blind cowardice? One wonders if international selfishness, like personal selfishness, is in the end even intelligent—if isolationism, personal or national, ever ends in any other result except to leave him who practices it completely isolated."

Justice Holmes said: "I think that, as life is action and is passion, it is required of a man that he should share the passion and the action of his time at the peril of being judged not to have lived."

CHURCH MUST WAKE UP

The story is told of a church in New York that has made the building soundproof against the outside world. Nothing gets into that church from the outside world. I am fearful that too many churches are soundproof. But it seems now that the world is fairly breaking into the soundproof, complacent church. The most terrible fact of our times is this new World War. No Christian has the right to shut that out. The prophets of God in past ages always interpreted the mind of God in time of crisis and war. These are times for great thinking on the part of Christian people.

A year ago this morning I woke early, 5 a. m., in my hotel in Paris. I had strange premonitions that something ominous would happen that day, so I could not sleep. I went down to the hotel desk of the Lutetia Hotel. There stood a dozen hotel men, "their wings drooping." "What has happened?" I asked. "Germany fired on Poland at 5 a. m. this morning. That means war. That means the end of our civilization."

I was then the guide of 26 Americans who had just come from Palestine and Egypt and had zigzagged and wigwagged across the Mediterranean Sea on an Egyptian ship. We were on a race to get to the Atlantic Ocean ship before the "blitzkrieg" would break and engulf us. I rushed out to the crowded streets of Paris. The people were rushing up and down, weeping and shouting. I ran one and a half miles without getting out of breath to the steamship office. A sign in big letters over this office read, "British ships to America canceled." I rushed to the American Embassy. One thousand Americans had preceded me. The Embassy workers stood on chairs shouting to the crowd, "Get out of Paris because the report is that we will be bombed tonight. Go to Le Havre. Take an American ship home."

Then comes weeks of waiting for an American ship. In the meantime we saw how a nation starts a war. We learned what war means to the common people. We experienced the screeching sirens and the gloom of blackouts and the chill of dugouts. We sensed the discouragement of the people and the unpreparedness of the French. We noted the incomprehensible dullness of the English who told us that the German people were on the verge of a revolution, that the engines in the German airplanes would fall out, and that there was not gas enough in Germany to carry on the war for 3 weeks. Now we know that much of this was German propaganda, skillfully dished out to England by "fifth columnists."

Yes; we saw two nations go to the front. Thousands of soldiers marched by our hotel in a constant tramp, tramp, tramp. By day and by night, week in and week out; it was the tramp of troops who felt that they were being led to the slaughter. There were no flags, no fanfare, no music.

A YEAR OF WAR

Now we have been crucified in 1 full year of war. Civilization is shocked to deeper depths than ever before. Prophecies of military experts are all disregarded and discredited. Maps of the world are remade. Eight nations are blotted out after selfishly clinging to neutrality, each for each. Hitler has risen up from a psychopathic myth to the greatest world conqueror of all times. Napoleon beside him is a child. The Axis arrangement of Germany, Italy, Russia, and Japan seems to hold strangely together, bound in an inglorious bond of gory blood and power.

The English Government is now struggling for its very existence. Nonbelligerents of the Western Hemisphere are fast coming to the conclusion that peace can only be maintained by selling our coats and buying a sword. At the beginning of this year our great concern was to keep America from going to war in Europe. Now our great concern is to keep Europe from coming to America.

And now I come before my congregation as a voice in the wilderness crying out the one question asked by all thinking Americans: "Will Hitler attack America?" This is the supreme question. This is the question that will determine not only our national affairs but our local and personal affairs for the coming years. Surely if anybody has even the beginning of an answer to this question, he ought to come forward with it. If he is not coming, then surely we have no right to appropriate $20,000,000,000 for defense and draft 4,000,000 men into the Army.

As it seems to me, this question involves three points: (1) The military strategy of it; (2) the statements of Hitler and his Nazis; (3) the revolutionary nature of nazi-ism and its ambition for world empire.

1. The military experience of the past year leads us to hesitate to utter the word "impossible." We do not know that anything is impossible any more. A thing might be possible without being probable. We know that Germany will not attack us unless England collapses. England has for a century and more been our first line of defense. When that defense is down, then what will happen? According to what the Nazis say, they are bent on blotting out the entire English Empire, root, branch and all.

Now, is it possible for Germany to successfully attack the United States? Some military experts say that if she can find a landing place in Newfoundland and on the Caribbean Sea, she cannot only attack us but she can conquer us if we are unprepared. Nazi-ism has only the utmost disgust for the race mixture called the American melting pot. We are classed as an inferior race and therefore should be subservient to Germany. When we went into hysteria last winter over a radio program on the end of the world, the Germans said: "Well, those imbeciles can easily be conquered." I would say that unless we become stronger than we are, it is not only possible for Germany to attack us, but it is very probable that she will, if England collapses.

2. The world has learned to pay a lot of attention to what the Nazis say. During the past year they have done just what they boasted they would do during the past years. They are not given to waving an empty gun like our administration at Washington often does. The Nazi guns are loaded. We will do well to pay attention to what they say. They are so fanatical and believe so much in their program of world empire that they boast of it night and day. Every one of the Hitler threats today reads like an understatement. Hitler said the other day: "There will be a Nationalist-Socialist civilization for the next 10 centuries, or there will be no civilization at all." If Germany is to be defeated, she will leave behind a world in ruins.

A few weeks ago when it was pointed out to Hitler that America was helping England, he said: "America had better keep her nose out of German affairs. For I have it in my power to plunge the United States into chaos and civil war by merely pressing a button on my desk."

3. The doctrine, the faith, or the religion of the Nazis is so revolutionary and so unlike what Christian civilization has been thinking about that it is difficult for us to realize that any man would seriously think of world dominion. Goebbels said the other day, "We have crucified Judea. Now we will scour the stink of Galilee from our souls."

What men will do under the urge of the pride of race and the hegemony over inferior races is beyond our comprehension today.

Europe has been overrun by a vibrant faith in race superiority. It has been conquering a Europe without faith, a cynical, pleasure-bent Europe could not stand out against Nazi faith. Decaying democracies have bowed to rejuvenated autocracy.

I am as sure as the sun will rise tomorrow that our only assurance of the continuance of a liberal, individualistic Christian democracy is to make our Christianity vital, believing, and sacrificial. We must again have the courage to sing, "Onward Christian Soldiers, Marching as to War." We will entirely succumb to barbarism or we are on the threshold of higher forms of civilization. I do pray the democratic countries will awaken from idle stupor and complacent steam-heat comforts to take up the rugged vigors necessary to maintain a free civilization.

And God is on our side. "He will shake the heavens and the earth." He is shaking the earth now; perhaps Hitler is one of His tools shaking the earth. The heavens will respond as soon as we do our part. It takes the cooperation of heaven and earth to maintain Christian civilization.

"Fifth Columns"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the Thirty-third Annual Convention of the Pennsylvania Electric Association, on September 6, 1940, at Bedford Springs, Pa.:

When the Great Giver of All Light summoned Thomas A. Edison to eternal rest a few years ago it was suggested that all electric current in the United States be turned off for 1 minute in final tribute to the great genius to whom this Nation owes so much.

The suggestion struck a responsive chord in the hearts and in the imagination of an appreciative people. Yet it was never carried out. For sober reflection brought overwhelming realization that so indispensable had electricity become in the ordinary routine of our everyday life that to be without it for even 1 brief minute would be to invite serious consequences.

So while many lights were dimmed throughout the Nation, power lines were kept in service that railroad trains might move; that the wheels of industry might revolve; that the hands of clocks might measure the time of day and night; that scientific laboratories might continue their research; and that the skillful hands of hundreds of surgeons might minister their healing touch to the maimed, the halt, and the blind.

To me that was an impressive and unforgettable lesson of the transcendent importance of the industry in which you men and women are engaged and which your genius for expansion has transformed from a luxury to a vital necessity of life.

It seems scarcely credible that any industry could have gone so far in so short a time. For February 4, 1882, is well within the memory of many living men. Yet that was the day when the first dynamo began to turn in the world's first central electric station, located on Pearl Street in New York City.

This first Edison central station had 59 customers. Last year the industry for which it broke the ground had 29,104,185. When that first station was started, it took 10 pounds of coal to generate 1 kilowatt-hour of electricity. By 1939 this had been cut to less than a pound and a half. In 1882 the average selling price of electricity for household use was 25 cents per kilowatt-hour. By 1939 it was only slightly more than 4 cents.

In these few simple figures, it seems to me, lies the clue to the amazing growth of the electric industry: increasing service at decreasing cost through scientific research.

But figures alone do not tell the whole story. Other forms of energy are deaf, dumb, and blind. But electricity has been made to hear, to feel, and to see. One of the Nation's newest strip mills is operated and controlled automatically by electricity. Ali Baba's "Open sesame!" swung wide a cavern door. But your photoelectric cell not only opens doors but sorts colors, detects flaws in merchandise, and even turns on the lights when darkness falls.

The actual achievements of your research engineers surpass the wildest flights of fancy of the Arabian Nights. They dwarf the creations of unleashed imagination in Greek mythology. Compared with electric power, the fabled might of the Titans is puny; Vulcan's forge a toy. Aladdin's lamp never conjured up enchanted vision half so wondrous as the coruscating panorama of light and color that is New York at night. Stand on an outlying hill of any American village as night creeps down the valley until finally only the white spire of the church stands out like a ghostly finger pointing skyward. And then behold the transformation into fairyland as the village lights blink on, one by one, like fireflies, quivering in clusters.

Again it was your industry that made it possible to fling a thought across a stretch of sky—

> "Some weighty message, or a yearning cry,
> It matters not; the elements rehearse
> Man's urgent utterance, and his words traverse
> The spacious heav'ns like homing birds."

It is your industry that has given us the magic carpet which takes us in a flash to the great capitals of the world to hear the momentous words of statesmen as they are spoken; takes us, too, far beyond the most distant outposts of civilization so that we may even hear Byrd's intrepid men in the darkness and the icy wastes of Antarctica.

For centuries men listened in vain for the music of the spheres. But from the unseen air above us your engineers have snatched the majestic symphonies of Beethoven, the thunderous counterpoint of Wagner, and the gossamer delicacy of Chopin to pour them in a torrent of harmony into our homes.

To you was passed the torch of Volta, Galvania, and Marconi; of Faraday and Davy; of Edison and Steinmetz. You have kept it burning bright. You have made easier the work of the housewife, lightened the burden of toil of the factory worker, and have put to shame false prophets of disaster who babble poisonously of vanished frontiers.

You and those who labor with you in your industry do not talk despairingly of vanished frontiers. Instead, you have opened up to this Nation vistas such as no man dreamed of only a few short years ago. You know that today's frontiers are not physical frontiers but mental frontiers—frontiers that know no limit save the bounds of the knowledge, the imagination, the daring, and the initiative of the human mind. And you know, too, that electricity can be the mother of countless industries as yet unborn.

How shallow and cowardly does talk of vanished frontiers sound when your engineers tell us that although two-thirds of our urban population live in homes wired for electricity, only in half of the homes so wired is electricity used for anything except for lights, for doorbells, and for flatirons; that although there are as many as 200 possible farm uses for electricity, the great majority of farms in the United States have no electric power available other than lighting plants.

And in these dark days of world chaos and upheaval, it is heartening to learn from C. W. Kellogg, president of the Edison Electric Institute, that no country in history has ever been so well equipped with power for the production of munitions as is our country today.

Mr. Kellogg tells us that at the end of 1939 installed generating capacity in the United States exceeded the sum of the noncoincident demand of our power stations by more than 40 percent. In the industrial areas where the munitions of war will be produced, the margin was 39 percent. Today the electric-power industry has three and a half times as much generating capacity and an annual output of electric energy four times as great as in 1917, the year in which we entered the World War. Moreover, I am told that it will add a total of 1,640,000 kilowatts of generating capacity this year and plans to add 1,250,000 more next year. That is a record of achievement and a program of expansion of which you and the entire Nation have every reason to be proud. I congratulate you.

Preparedness for national defense prompts me to present a live and vital subject to you tonight. It is "fifth columns." I use the plural advisedly. Not one, but many "fifth columns," are active in this country. And, strange as it may seem, it is not about the "fifth column" of which you hear most that I want to talk. You hear about that particular "column" almost every day over the radio; and you read about it in the newspapers. It is the "fifth column" of agents of foreign governments and their willing henchmen or unwitting dupes, whose instruments of subversion are sabotage and propaganda. It is the "fifth column" composed of such as Shakespeare calls—

> "Most smiling, smooth, detested parasites, > Courteous destroyers, affable wolves * * *"

I do not minimize the threat of danger from this particular "fifth column." But furtively as it operates, it is more easily recognized than others equally dangerous and damaging to national defense. And the more easily recognized, the more easily dealt with. Appropriate agencies of the Federal Government are giving it their attention. I believe they will do a good job.

The "fifth columns" with which I am concerned are the concepts and dogmas of alien and subversive philosophies, both political and economic, which have received widespread endorsement in recent years. Masked with such labels and catch phrases as "liberalism," "humanitarianism," and "social ideals," they have insidiously insinuated themselves into the minds of millions of our people and permeate to an alarming extent much of our national thinking. With millions of Americans they have gained not only respectability but credibility.

They have been embraced with enthusiasm by many of our most promising youth. They have been given an honored place in some of our great seats of learning. They have been accepted to a dangerous degree in official circles, not by evil-minded men but by well-meaning men. Indeed, some of these well-meaning men have come to regard them as a fundamental basis for building government policy. Therein lies their menace. Of that danger former Supreme Court Justice Brandeis warned us long ago when he said:

"Experience should teach us to be more on our guard to protect our liberties when the Government's purposes are beneficent. * * * The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachments by men of zeal, well-meaning but without understanding."

These "fifth column" pragmatic philosophies suggest that there are no eternal verities, no immutable principles of truth, and no established standards of morality. No longer do our time-honored traditions deserve our respect, but, on the contrary, they had better be cast aside in this new world order. Our form of representative self-government, with its system of checks and balances of three coordinate branches—executive, legislative, and judicial—according to these "fifth columnists," is outmoded, outworn, and that its usefulness has been outlived.

They tell us we require a stronger, a more centralized form of government, and that the need of the time is to concentrate more and more power in the Executive at the expense of the court and the legislature. They tell us our old frontiers have vanished, industry is slowing down, the age of invention is dead, and the doors of opportunity are closed forever; individualism must give way to collectivism, free enterprise to a regimented economy, self-reliance to dependability on government, resourcefulness and hope to defeatism and despair.

That philosophy is the negation of the American spirit, the denial of the American dream. As one deeply saturated in the American tradition, as one who believes that under our Constitution and our guaranteed liberties there lies ahead of this country a future even greater than its glorious past, I challenge that philosophy of fear and futility.

Inherent in these "fifth column" philosophies are the gravest dangers that have ever threatened self-government everywhere. The mere fact that laws may be made by the people, or their elected representatives, is not in itself sufficient guaranty for the preservation of free institutions. Our form of government is no exception to the rule that all forms of government possess and have frequently exercised the powers to destroy themselves. Nor can even a written constitution such as ours permanently insure the survival of free institutions. It can and does provide protection for the citizen against other citizens, a defense of the individual against the arbitrary oppression of the State, and, finally, it guarantees a period for free debate and discussion of any proposed legislation which is incompatible with fundamental law. But, in the last analysis, in any republic the people have the power to perpetuate their faith in their capacity for self-government or to poison the source from which that faith has sprung.

It is for this reason that intelligence, understanding, and observance of all the standards of decent conduct are vitally necessary to the successful operation of a system of government such as ours in which rules of conduct are made by the people through their responsible representatives. Our ablest political thinkers have long recognized this to be true. It is what Justice Brandeis meant when as far back as 1923 he said that our American political system "demands continued sacrifice by the individual and more exigent obedience to the moral law than any other form of government." It means for us today that the crying need of the hour is for the rededication of every citizen to the traditions and the ideals of our Republic.

After all, there are really only two kinds of government, despite their various forms and names. One or the other of the two encompasses republics, democracies, monarchies, socialism, communism, fascism, nazi-ism, and all others. The one based on coercion; the other on the free consent of the governed. The one represents a society controlled by the exercise of arbitrary power and the imposition of outward discipline; the other a society of free men entrusting their future to their own intelligence and their own conscience. The one stems from the ancient despotisms of the Near East and is as old as the pyramids; the other flows from the teachings of Christianity of the dignity and responsibility of the individual which came to political fruition in the revolutions in this country, in England, and in France in the eighteenth century.

The one rests on force; the other on the concept that every human being is, and of right, ought to be free. The one crushes individuality; the other exalts it. Under the first, the citizen exists for the state; under the second the state exists for the citizen. During recent years we have been edging closer and closer to the first concept by a wider and wider, if unconscious, acceptance of the unsound conclusions of the philosophy of Rousseau which holds that all wisdom lies in the mass mind, and argues therefrom that the most democratic of all governments is the one in which the mass mind, changeable as it is and much given to hero worship, finds freest expression and exercises unrestrained political control.

This, too, is a negation of the fundamental concepts on which our Government was built—liberty without license, authority without despotism. As we talk glibly of democracy, we often forget that our Government is not a pure democracy, but a republic; not a government in which the people themselves vote directly on every issue, but a representative government in which the people entrust to their chosen representatives a large share of the responsibility for conducting their affairs. Read the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention and you will find that no tyranny was more greatly feared by the founding fathers than the tyranny of the people themselves. For therein lie the seeds of destruction of all government; the warfare of class against class, which first brings confusion, then chaos, then anarchy, and finally totalitarianism.

We who remain firm in our belief in the wisdom of the founders of our country, we who cherish its traditions and respect its laws, we who believe with the colonists of Virginia in the first legislative assembly held in America, that all just powers are derived from the consent of the governed, must be on guard against the seductive philosophy, that under the cloak of exalting the rule of the people conceals the skull and cross bones of arbitrary government. It seems trite to repeat that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." The pity is that it needs repeating.

All of us here in Pennsylvania, and especially you of the electric industry, have special reasons for remembering Benjamin Franklin. And let me remind you that none better than Franklin appreciated the urgency of being eternally on guard against arbitrary government, although a lasting victory over despotism seemed to have been won. The record shows that he recognized with crystal clarity that science knows no vanishing frontiers and that a dynamic America knows no bounds to its possibilities. When Houdon modeled a bust of Franklin, Turgot wrote for it this inscription:

"He snatched the thunderbolt from heaven, the scepter from tyrants."

The grandiloquence of this phraseology amused the level-headed and practical-minded Franklin. With a rare sense of humor, Franklin wrote Nogaret:

"Notwithstanding my experiments with electricity, the thunderbolt continues to fall under our noses and beards; and as for the tyrant, there are a million of us still engaged in snatching away his scepter."

Let me tell you another story of the great philosopher and statesman to illustrate my point. It affords a needed lesson to anyone who may be faint of heart in these critical days and is a suitable rebuke to the prophets of the "fifth column" philosophy of defeatism. The incident occurred when the Constitutional Convention was closing its great work by the signing of the historic document which was to become the Constitution of the United States. On the back of the chair on which Washington sat was painted a half disk of the sun. Drawing the attention of his colleagues to it, Franklin said:

"I have often and often in the course of the sessions and the vicissitudes of my hopes and fears as to its issues, looked at that disk behind the President without being able to tell whether it was rising or setting. But now I have the happiness to know it is a rising and not a setting sun."

Have we become so weak and so soft; so blind to the eternal truths embodied in the traditions handed down to us by Washington and Jefferson; so insensitive to the priceless worth of our heritage of liberty that we have become allergic to "fifth column" philosophies of opportunism and to their deadly dogmas of stultifying sophistry? In a time of crisis are we to rush for cover in the storm cellars of defeatism? Or will we stand firm and weather the conflict? Does there live in us yet that calm courage and fearless outlook which enabled Franklin in the critical days when this Nation was born to see only a rising and not a setting sun? "O Lord of Hosts, be with us yet; lest we forget, lest we forget!"

I do not need to point out to you how false are those "fifth column" philosophies which scorn all tradition and deny the existence of fixed eternal truth. You know that the patient research workers in your industry derive their inspiration from the traditions of the great scientists and inventors who laid its foundations. And you know, too, that the pioneers in the field of electricity not only left behind a noble tradition but a set of facts, a body of truth so eternal, so changeless, so immutable that they are known as the laws of science. You can ignore them only at your peril.

These eternal truths have put no bounds upon your creative imagination; no limitations upon your urge to penetrate far and wide into unexplored fields. On the contrary, they have given you a firm base from which to start all of your many experiments; the rock-ribbed foundation on which your industry has built so well. Had you scorned them and sought to build on unproved hypotheses, had you sought to rear the great edifice of the electric industry on fantastic theory instead of time-tested fact, it would have come crashing down upon your heads.

As all progressive industry and enduring government must be founded on truth, so must the exercise of government authority be grounded in fair play and integrity. We look askance at a government which preaches the gospel of fair-trade practice and at the same time engages in unfair competition with private industry. You in the electrical industry know something about that.

You have a right to expect integrity in government, and there are many in your industry who have had some experience with that, too. I recall an incident which illustrates the point. It was about 5 years ago, before the Congress had passed the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. That, you know, is the utilities-regulation measure which contains the so-called death sentence for holding companies.

Investigators for a Federal agency were sent to the New York offices of a large utility corporation. Its name was Commonwealth & Southern. Its president at that time was a man named Wendell Willkie.

After the Federal investigators had spent several weeks in the company's offices making an exhaustive study of its books and business methods, one of them, in course of conversation with Mr. Willkie said:

"I want to congratulate you on the openness and the frankness with which your organization is giving us information, and also on the way your business is being conducted. The elimination of your intermediate holding companies was splendid. The methods of your supervision and your interest in the constructive help given your operating companies are matters for commendation."

Of course, Mr. Willkie was pleased. Who wouldn't be? Smiling, he asked the investigator why he couldn't put what he had just said in his report, to which the now somewhat flustered investigator replied:

"I should be severely criticized if I put anything favorable to a utility holding company in my report."

So, you see, I have not been guilty of overstatement in the emphasis I have been placing here on the importance of morality and integrity in our form of government. The preservation of basic liberties under a republic depends not alone upon the conscience and the intelligence of its citizens but upon the integrity and impartiality with which its laws are administered, or, as Justice Cardozo said "the conscience of the sovereign."

And now let us consider the "fifth column" philosophy which places economic security above liberty. If we examine it critically, we find that it offers no sure prescription for economic security. But it does distill a poison that might well be fatal to liberty. This "fifth column" philosophy is known as economic determinism and was first propounded by Karl Marx.

Its central theory is that every move a man makes from a social and political viewpoint is actuated by his economic self-interest. Hence, Marx concluded, a stable society is achieved primarily by satisfying the material appetites of man. Of course, there is an element of truth in this, as there is in all the other "fifth-column" philosophies. Did they not contain some truth, they would not be so dangerous and seductive. The grain of truth in this theory of economic determinism is that economic maladjustments stir political unrest.

The fallacies of this theory, as it appears among us today as a "fifth-column" philosophy, is that man has no hopes or aspirations above his material appetites; that it is the function of the government to satisfy these material appetites, and that once the government has done this, all will be well with the state. These are old fallacies. They were recognized and pointed out thousands of years before Marx enunciated his doctrine. Indeed, much that passes today as advanced thinking is nothing more than old concepts, recognized as false and discarded ages ago, which present-day "liberals" have dug out of the limbo of forgotten things, given new names, and dressed up in fancy furbelows of attractive verbiage.

The plain truth that man does not live by bread alone is as old as the Bible. Polybius, the Greek historian, told his contemporaries 2,000 years ago that "when there has been created among the masses an appetite for gifts and the habit of receiving them," democracy in its turn is abolished and changed into a rule of forces. Plutarch observed "that there is no doubt that the real destroyer of the liberty of any people is he who spreads among them bounties, donations, and largesses," and Plato warned that "democracy contains no long-range force which will check the constant tendency to put more and more on the public pay roll."

Do not mistake me. I am not contending that help should not be extended by government to all who are needy to the full measure of their need. What I do not contend is that the economic security of the individual is not a thing which can be sought as something which stands apart by itself; something that is to be found at the end of the rainbow. The economic well-being of the individual is dependent upon the sound economic condition of the political group of which the individual is a part. From the point of view of the individual it is, and must always be, not something that can exist alone, but a byproduct of general prosperity. At best the richest nation can provide only a bare subsistence for only a small proportion of its people.

Never in all history has state largess ever produced either plenty or freedom. Instead of enriching, it impoverishes. Instead of strengthening, it weakens. Instead of freedom, it brings dependency. It satisfies neither material ambitions nor spiritual longings. Only freedom produces plenty. Only under a system of free enterprise can a people satisfy their instinctive urge to worthwhile achievement and realize to the full the spiritual ideals of their dreams.

Already our system of free enterprise has been impaired by the undermining of "fifth column" philosophies. All of them have one idea in common—that the field of government activity must be extended; that the power of government must be increased. But you cannot extend the field of government activity without limiting the field of private enterprise. You cannot give more power to government without taking from the power of the people.

I am not one who believes that our rights of free speech, a free press, or freedom of worship are in immediate danger. Nor do I fear a possibility of personal dictatorship. The issue is not so simple as that.

For the first time in our history the number of individuals who make up that vast and complex machine which we know as the Federal Government has just passed the 1,000,000 mark. This great machine has grown so intricate that some of its functioning has become difficult to understand—even more difficult to check upon. And never before did it reach into so many nooks and crannies of our business and our private lives. It is a mighty instrument for good or for evil.

Among the more than a million who operate it are many disciples of the "fifth column" philosophies. Not only do many of them occupy key positions, but their counsel is a powerful influence in the shaping of far-reaching policies. Some of these "men of zeal without understanding" sincerely believe that our present form of government cannot survive. Nor do they care. In their evangelistic fervor, they would prefer to build another form of government on alien idealogies from the blueprints of Marx and others of his ilk.

If our traditional form of representative government is to survive, if we are to escape the fate that has overtaken so-called democracies abroad, our Government machine must be energized by men not only strong of faith in our institutions but by men who are equally devoted to the preservation of our cherished traditions.

You and I want those institutions and those ideals preserved. Ours is essentially a nation of what, for want of a better name, we call plain people—the kind of people Lincoln affectionately spoke of as "the common people." In proportion to our population, only a very few enjoy great riches; only a very few suffer the hardships of extreme poverty. Our national sport is baseball, not polo; our favorite form of entertainment is the movie, not grand opera; our national dish is ham and eggs, not caviar. Most of us read the newspapers and magazines, and few of us read Karl Marx, John Maynard Keynes, and other prophets of kindred ideologies. Most of us, like you and me, have to work for our living, try to balance our personal budgets, pay our debts, live in modest homes, and save a little against old age.

All of that bespeaks our national strength and virility. If there is one lesson that history teaches plainly it is that freedom has never come to a people through the efforts of men of great wealth or through the discontent of the impoverished. Wherever freedom has come in all the world through all the ages it has come through the efforts of the great body of average citizens. It was so in Athens before Pericles. It was so in Rome before Marius and Salla. It was so in Florence under the early Medici. It was so in the free cities of the Hanseatic League, in Switzerland and in Great Britain. It was so in France and Holland before the great tragedy of our day.

Upon you and upon me and upon the millions of others like us rests a great responsibility. It is not going to be an easy task to overcome internal corrosion from the "fifth column" philosophies and, at the same time, prepare to meet any danger that may threaten from without. It is a difficult situation but one that must be met fearlessly. It cannot be better put than it was by Wendell Willkie, who in accepting the Republican nomination for President said:

"When Winston Churchill became Prime Minister of England a few months ago he made no sugar-coated promises. 'I have nothing to offer,' he said, 'but blood, toil, tears, and sweat.' Those are harsh words; brave words; yet, if England lives, it will be because her people were told the truth and accepted it. Fortunately, in America we are not reduced to 'blood and tears.' But we shall not be able to avoid the 'toil and sweat.'

"In those months ahead of us every man who works in this country—whether he works with his hands or with his mind—will have to work a little harder. Every man and women will feel the burden of taxes. Every housewife will have to plan a little more carefully. I speak plainly because you must not be deceived about the difficulties of the future. You will have to be hard of muscle, clear of head, brave of heart."

Those are words which could only have been spoken in a time of crisis. But let me remind you that from the wisdom of centuries the Chinese devised a symbol for the word "crisis" that is composed of two characters. One of them signifies disaster; the other, opportunity. The implication is obvious; if in every crisis there is a possibility of disaster, there is an equal measure of opportunity.

Churchill spoke of "blood, toil, tears, and sweat." Those who built our Nation knew them all. They braved the perils of unknown seas, faced famine and pestilence on inhospitable shores, hewed their way through trackless forests and conquered a wilderness that there might be brought forth on this continent a new Nation conceived in liberty and dedicated to the principles of self-government.

They left footprints of blood in the snow of Valley Forge; they left us the memory of Nathan Hale, calm and unafraid on the gallows, speaking the brave words, "My only regret is that I have but one life to give for my country."

Greater devotion than this we cannot give. But we can so live that when this era shall have become only a chapter in a history book; when most of us shall long have been forgotten; when the difficult problems we face today will have been permanently solved; when a new and free Europe will have risen from the shambles of the old; when "fifth columns" will be things unknown in America—then may some generation as yet unborn have reason to give to our generation the same veneration we accord to those that have gone before, and, thinking of us, to feel as did Webster when he dedicated the shaft at Bunker Hill:

"Thank God, I—I also—am an American!"

Labor Union Endorses Destroyer Trade; Ask Provision Guaranteeing Jobs of Workers Called to Military Service Be Included in Conscription Bill

RESOLUTIONS OF CENTRAL TRADES AND LABOR UNION OF ST. LOUIS

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, out of the welter of discussion of the destroyer trade and the selective service act come two patriotic and lucid resolutions, succinctly stating the views of an intelligent governing body of St. Louis workers. It is with pleasure and concurrence that, by leave granted, I insert them in the RECORD of today's proceedings of the Congress.

Whereas President Franklin D. Roosevelt has transferred to the British Government 50 over-age destroyers in exchange for certain strategic naval and air bases which would be vital elements of defense should invasion of American shores be attempted by any foreign foe. Just as we lock our homes against night prowlers, so must our country make every possible preparation to defend herself while the clouds of distress and uncertainty engulf most of the world in the gravest crisis in the history of civilization. It would be too late to prepare after invaders were upon us. The lovers of human justice and peace must strengthen the hands of our great President as he labors to keep us out of war and at the same time to make our Nation safe from the threat of totalitarian madness and to perpetuate our great Republic as a nation in which all the children of men enjoy the blessings of liberty and democracy; and

Whereas it is now known that many of our large metropolitan daily papers, irrespective of their political background, and many of our leading statesmen representing all shades of political faith favor the President's program, with the exception of a very few who are lukewarm because they were not consulted: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Central Trades and Labor Union of St. Louis and vicinity, in regular session, this 8th day of September 1940 does hereby heartily endorse and commend President Franklin D. Roosevelt's transaction with the British Government as above outlined as an act of aggressively brilliant statesmanship, as a great forward step toward making our United States safe from attack; and be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, to our United States Senators and our Congressmen, and to the press, and that same be spread upon the official minutes of this meeting.

Whereas there is now pending before Congress legislation known as the Burke-Wadsworth bill, a law which if enacted, and which at this time from all appearances will be enacted, will provide for the conscription of men into the military service of the United States Government; and

Whereas this law contains a provision which guarantees to all workers called into the military service the security of their job upon their return from military service. The failure of any employer to reinstate such a man will subject him to prosecution under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, or as it is commonly known, the Wagner Labor Act; and

Whereas at this particular time it appears that the conscription bill will undoubtedly be passed by Congress and its provisions become effective shortly after its enactment into law; and

Whereas no doubt many members of our affiliated local unions will be called for military service, which will necessitate their leaving their positions: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Central Trades and Labor Union, in meeting assembled this 8th day of September 1940, goes on record demanding that all workers who must join the colors shall be restored to their former positions after being released by the Government; and be it further

Resolved, That the Central Trades and Labor Union urge its affiliated local unions to demand of their employers that their present contracts and agreements or future contracts and agreements be amended to contain a provision to protect their members who may be called into military service.

EXCERPTS FROM REPORT OF DAVID HIRSHFIELD

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include articles from the report of David Hirshfield relating to books by David Saville Muzzey, Ph. D., Barnard College, Columbia University; and Everett Barnes, A. M.

AN AMERICAN HISTORY—REVISED, 1920

Excerpts from report of David Hirshfield relating to book by David Saville Muzzey, Ph. D., Barnard College, Columbia University)

This history is subject to severe criticism from many sources and many viewpoints. The opening sentence of the preface is as follows:

"The present volume represents the newer tendencies in historical writing. Its aim is not to tell over once more the old story in the old way, but to give the emphasis to those factors in our national development which appeal to us as most vital from the standpoint of today."

It was contended by the critics who appeared before me, that "the newer tendencies in historical writing," proclaimed and followed by Professor Muzzey, are pro-British. Many passages were cited in this book to prove that the author has no abiding conviction in American fundamentals, or in the just causes of the Revolution, nor any wholesome veneration for the great men who founded our Republic.

On page 90 of his history, in treating of the American Revolution, Professor Muzzey says:

"This great event has too often been represented as the unanimous uprising of a downtrodden people to repel the deliberate, unprovoked attack of a tyrant upon their liberties; but when thousands of people in the Colonies could agree with a noted lawyer of Massachusetts that the Revolution was a 'causeless, wanton, wicked rebellion,' and thousands of people in England could applaud Pitt's denunciation of the war against America as 'barbarous, unjust, and diabolical,' it is evident that, at the time at least, there were two opinions as to colonial rights and British oppression."

Most adult Americans were brought up in the belief that the American Revolution was rather a glorious affair, that Burke's characterization of the "fierce spirit of liberty" that animated the forefathers of the Republic was no mere figure of speech, and that Abraham Lincoln spoke the truth when he described it as a "nation conceived in liberty." Our children, however, if permitted to gain their knowledge of the early history of their country from textbooks such as Muzzey's, will learn something quite different than did their parents.

In that "there were two opinions" the author is unquestionably correct, but in presenting the issues upon which opinion was divided, he teaches (p. 106):

"When we review, after a century and a half, the chain of events which changed the loyal British-Americans of 1763 into rebels in arms against their King in 1775, we see that the cause of the Revolution was a difference of opinion as to the nature of the British Empire."

Again, on page 115, he states that it was "a debatable question, namely, whether the abuses of the king's ministers justified armed resistance."

This attempt to turn into a "debatable question" the hitherto clear and incontestable truth that the colonists were right and their oppressor wrong, strikingly exemplifies "the newer tendencies in historical writing," against which patriotic protest is properly directed.

Objection is made to Professor Muzzey's characterization of those who engaged in demonstrations against the Stamp Act as "the mob" (p. 97), because to the minds of school children, or even of adults, this is either derogatory of the patriots or vindictive of mobs.

On page 102 Professor Muzzey refers to Hancock, Warren, Otis, and the Adamses as patriots, but ironically puts the word patriots in quotation marks.

In connection with the Revolution he wholly omits mention in his text of Nathan Hale, Generals Anthony Wayne, Putnam, Sumter, Pickens, Marion, Stark, Sullivan, Knox, Light Horse Harry Lee, Gansevoort, Commodore Barry, Sergeant Jasper, Mollie Pitcher, Betsy Ross, and the birth of the flag, the Battles of Bennington and Stony Point, and many other heroic characters and events that have thrilled and inspired the school boys and girls in the school history of the past.

The Battle of Lexington is inadequately and inaccurately presented.

The taking of Ticonderoga is related without detail or spirit.

The story of Bunker Hill is disposed of in 17 words.

All mention of Brandywine, Germantown, and Valley Forge is embraced in two sentences.

The glorious career of John Paul Jones is given one sentence.

In fact, the entire account of the military and naval actions of the Revolution is compressed into less than 10 pages, in a book of more than 500 pages.

It is true that Professor Muzzey twice in his book avows it to be his theory that "military history is useful only for the special student of the science of war." However, it is interesting to observe that in the same book the author gives a full page and a half of space, with a full-page map and a footnote, to a detailed military history of the "British victory" at Quebec in 1759.

According to Professor Muzzey those nations which gave aid or friendly recognition to the Americans in the Revolution were actuated by mean, selfish motives, and France assisted only after she saw that—

"The American revolt was a weapon strong enough to use in taking revenge on England. * * * Spain joined England's enemies with the hope of regaining the island of Jamaica and the stronghold of Gibraltar; Holland, England's old commercial rival, came into the league for the destruction of Britain's naval power and the overthrow of her colonial empire.

"Thus the American Revolution, after the victory at Saratoga, developed into a coalition of four powers against Great Britain; and the American continent became again, for the fifth time within a century, the ground on which France and England fought out their mighty duel" (pp. 118–119).

Complaint is also made that in Professor Muzzey's text American children are taught that in the negotiations for peace France sought to betray the interests of America, and that America actually did violate her compact and betray the interests of France. On pages 127–128 the following appears:

"It soon became evident to the American diplomats at Paris that France was planning to find consolation for her defeated ally, Spain, at the expense of her victorious ally, America.

"The commissioners, following Jay's advice, disobeyed Congress, violated the treaty of alliance with France, and concluded the peace with England alone, thereby securing the whole territory from the Atlantic to the Mississippi."

This has been a matter of long controversy. The best authorities have it that France asked nothing for herself, but did want concessions for her other ally, Spain. A provisional treaty, which was directly negotiated with Great Britain by the American Commissioners, was accepted by France as a signatory party.

"But," says Professor Muzzey, on page 128, "it took all the tact and shrewd suavity of Benjamin Franklin to make the French ministry accept the terms of the treaty with even tolerably good grace."

As a matter of truth, the attitude of France toward America throughout the Revolutionary period was friendly and her assistance was very helpful, and the good grace of the French ministry in agreeing to the treaty was shown by a new loan of 6,000,000 livres to the United States within a few days after the signing of the treaty.

Muzzey, in striving to discredit the whole inspiring story of French aid, tells with apparent pride (p. 130) that while all other nations were plotting and scheming for advantage in the peace terms, England alone was unselfish, upright and generous and that:

"Europe was amazed at England's generosity. * * * It was a complete if a tardy triumph of that feeling of sympathy for men of common blood, common language, traditions, and institutions, across the seas."

It is true that the French minister, Vergennes, wrote in elation: "The English buy the peace rather than make it. Their concessions as to boundaries, the fisheries, the Loyalists, exceed everything I had thought possible." The same joyous feeling prevailed in America. But the concessions were granted by England, not through sympathy and blood affection, but through stern necessity. Professor Muzzey in his account seems to be setting forth his own feeling, rather than historic fact.

Among the causes leading to the War of 1812, Professor Muzzey relates (p. 183):

"The next move of the (American) administration was an attempt to bribe England and France to bid against each other for our trade."

To my mind this is a most ungraceful form of a very doubtful statement. It is not true American history, but typical British propaganda.

As to the War of 1812, Professor Muzzey, on page 184, refers to it as:

"The unfortunate war between the sister nations of the English tongue."

The first sentence in Professor Muzzey's account of that war reads as follows (p. 180):

"The unholy ambition of one man kept the civilized world in a turmoil during the first 15 years of the nineteenth century and stirred war from the shores of Lake Erie to the steppes of Russia."

The plain import of this is that our "second war for independence" was a mere incident in European conflicts.

We, on the other hand, have been taught that the War of 1812 was an American struggle for freedom of the seas, for the protection of our seamen from English impressment, and for the defense of our frontiers against Indian allies of Great Britain, armed and urged on to murderous outrages. Every American believes that the War of the Revolution won American independence and that the War of 1812 confirmed that independence in the eyes of foreign nations and aroused in our own people a true national consciousness.

Many other inaccuracies, indicating inattention to real facts in American history, have been pointed out in the Muzzey text.

On page 110 of his book Professor Muzzey refers to Patrick Henry's liberty-or-death speech as having been delivered in the Virginia House of Burgesses (at Williamsburg), when, according to authentic records, it was delivered before the Virginia convention in a church at Richmond.

This author, page 117, speaks of Cornwallis, instead of Mawhood, as the British commander at Princeton.

On page 120, Ferguson's force at Kings Mountain is described as "some 1,200 Tory militiamen collected by Colonel Ferguson," when all early histories tell us that he had well-disciplined troops and 200 of them were British regulars.

The author says, on page 152: "Few Americans have been in the habit of following the daily business of Congress as Englishmen follow the debates of their Parliament." The liberal space given in our daily newspapers to the happenings in Congress is evidence of the very general interest taken by our people in congressional proceedings.

On page 188 is described the Battle of New Orleans "as one of the bloodiest battles ever fought on American soil." While it is true that the British loss was 700 killed and 1,400 wounded, the American loss in that battle was only 17, and it is absurd to speak of this battle as bloody in any such sense as Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, The Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Cold Harbor, and Chickamauga.

On page 323 the author says that Breckinridge was nominated for President in 1860 at Richmond, whereas the nomination was made at Baltimore.

With reference to the Presidential election of 1860, on page 325, Professor Muzzey writes that Douglas "would have easily won with the support of the united Democratic Party." As a matter of fact, Lincoln's vote exceeded that of the combined opposition in all of the States which he carried, except New Jersey, California, and Oregon.

It is not for the inaccuracies pointed out in the Muzzey text, but because of his apparent intentional misstatements with respect to the establishment of our great Republic and her early period, that Professor Muzzey's work is condemned as utterly unfit for use in the public schools of New York City.

It was expected that owing to the exposure and to the vigorous protest on the part of American patriots and American patriotic societies, Professor Muzzey would rewrite his 1923 edition and make it a history of America. The latest 1923 printing is out, and after reading it I regret to be compelled to state that it is unchanged in any important respect from the 1920 edition.

"A debatable question" has been modified to "a much-debated question." Quotation marks have been removed from the word "patriots," when referring to American Revolutionary leaders. Apparent unintentional inaccuracies regarding the place of Patrick Henry's liberty-or-death speech, the character of Ferguson's forces, the nomination of Douglas, and the vote for Lincoln have been corrected.

SHORT AMERICAN HISTORY BY GRADES (PTS. I AND II)—REVISED, 1920; REREVISED, 1922

AMERICAN HISTORY FOR GRAMMAR GRADES—REVISED, 1920; REREVISED, 1923

(Excerpts from report by David Hirshfield relating to book by Everett Barnes, A. M.)

Since the complaints against the Everett Barnes texts were filed with me at the first hearing, each of these texts has been rerevised by its author, and he seems to have shifted from the "modern historical scholarship" point of view to its direct opposite.

Both these texts have been so completely rewritten that in this rerevised edition most of the passages which were complained against are corrected or eliminated.

The additions which were severely criticized dealt with affairs as late as the Presidential election of 1920. The new edition of Short American History, though bearing later copyright date, stops at the same period. The only apparent purpose of the new edition, therefore, was to correct certain passages which had been complained of as anti-American and pro-British.

In the main the complaints against these texts were much the same as those against the other histories, and it must be pleasing to every American that this author and his publishers have confessed their guilt of having offended against America and everything American.

In his later texts it is no longer stated that "in all the unfairness that had been shown it was not England that oppressed the Colonies"; that "the disputes were not between the colonists and the English at home, but between the Tories and the Whigs on both sides of the sea, neighbor against neighbor"; and that "had there been no war this great country would probably still be a great branch of the British Empire"; but in the place of all that, patriotic recital of real facts are substituted.

In these rerevisions John Hancock is no longer "a smuggler," but once more a "sterling patriot."

The portrait of Lord Cornwallis has given way to a full-page portrait of Nathan Hale and an appreciative account of his martyrdom.

Of Lexington, Professor Barnes no longer teaches that—

"It was a fight of Briton against Briton; on one side Britons fighting for liberty, on the other Britons fighting because ordered to by their King." He now teaches in the same line, on the same page:

"Poorly armed, untrained American farmers could make the veteran British regulars run."

That "the worst traitor of the war was Charles Lee" is recanted in the re-revised book. This rank is now bestowed upon Benedict Arnold, and he is no longer the injured hero, "whom the Congress also had not treated fairly."

Faneuil Hall, "the cradle of liberty," which in the revised history had been consigned to oblivion, is now in the re-revised edition, restored with a picture and an account of great Revolutionary meetings there.

A year ago Professor Barnes, following "the newer tendencies in historical writing," announced by the revisionists, was teaching:

"What folly it was for the three-fourths of England in the British Isles to make war on the one-fourth of England in America."

He has changed this to:

"What folly it was for the people in the British Isles to make war on the colonists in America."

Phrases such as "English liberty," "Englishmen in America," and "Britons fighting for liberty," ceaselessly reiterated throughout the Anglicized volumes, have disappeared, and instead are phrases such as "new ideals of freedom," "the American colonists," and "patriots of the Revolution."

Professor Barnes' characterization of the Continental Congress in his 1920 edition has given way in the 1922 edition to an account quite different, as does appear from the following:

"It was hard for the colonists to learn that in union there is strength. From its beginning in doubt and fear to its ending in victory, all through the 6 years of its course, the Congress was a scene of petty bickerings and schemings, through which single Colonies sought to make gains for themselves. The little Colonies wanted to have as much power as the big ones and the big ones wanted to control the little ones. There was a scramble for honors and offices. In that Congress were selfish, unworthy, short-sighted, narrow-minded, office-seeking, and office-trading plotters, just as there have been in every Congress ever since.	"The colonists had now learned that in union there is strength. The Congress met soon after the commencement of the war, and for 6 years, until its close, the conduct of the war was guided by its action, under the leadership of such sterling patriots as John Hancock, Samuel Adams, Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, and others. It was an advisory body, working without the aid of any written constitution.
"So many petty wranglings stood in the way of wise measures to help the Army that it suffered much and the cause was set back for years. Such union as there was among the Colonies during the war came from the	"It was, however, the best means the colonists had at the time of bringing about cooperation. It afforded the opportunity for all the Colonies, instead of any single Colony, to be represented in its counsels. It, for the colonists, was a time of common danger from without, and this, together with a common interest and patriotic zeal to carry to a successful issue the great cause which the battles of Lexington and Concord stood outside pressure of a great common danger more than from a brotherly spirit within. They were united because they dared not be otherwise. For a time it was left for each Colony to do what it pleased in fighting the King, but at length Congress acted as though there were a union, and voted to raise an army of 20,000 men," etc.

for, united the colonists for the struggle upon which they were entering.

"While the Congress may not always have done those things which at times appeared to be advisable, yet the colonists never lost confidence in the wisdom, patriotism, and patience of its great leaders. This Congress voted to raise an army of 20,000 men," etc.

Since these events are nearly a hundred and fifty years in the past, and there are no new facts available concerning them, it is manifest that this alteration of version by Mr. Barnes in his 1920 text was due, apparently, solely to his change of viewpoint. He has learned that his viewpoint was wrong and unfair to America, and like a man has acknowledged his error.

Many heroic characters and events, unmentioned in the 1920 text, now crowd into the made-over pages of Barnes' 1922 history. He has learned, evidently, that in the writing of American school history for American children there can properly be none but the American attitude.

Leading merchants of the Colonies are no longer declared criminal smugglers, but instead, he asserts that this smuggling was open and patriotic defiance of tyrannous English laws which forbade the colonists to trade with the world, or even with one another, except in English ships.

James Otis is presented as a patriot instead of loyalist.

The battle of Stony Point reappears as an important event.

Anthony Wayne is resurrected.

John Stark comes in for credit.

Commodore John Barry is justly cited.

Francis Scott Key is referred to as the author of The Star-Spangled Banner.

The courage shown on both sides at Bunker Hill, but which Professor Barnes in his revised history had stressed entirely on the side of the British, is now properly stressed on the side of the thousand undrilled patriots who so gloriously resisted three times their number of the best-trained British regulars.

Here are the old and new accounts:

"The courage shown on both sides was wonderful. To march, as those British soldiers did up to the works, so near that each one felt that the man who was aiming at him could not miss, required a nerve as steady as was ever shown on battlefield since men began to kill each other."

1922

"The courage shown on both sides was wonderful. 'Don't fire until you see the whites of their eyes,' said the American commander, who knew that their supply of ammunition was small, and that his men did not have enough bayonets to be used successfully in meeting the charge of the British."

The typical British assertion that during the Revolution England was fighting single-handed against three nations has been removed.

The sympathetic account of the Tories and their Indian allies, whom the patriots "raided" and drove off to Canada, dwelt upon in the 1920 text, is not mentioned in the re-revised books.

Professor Barnes has also materially altered his account of John Paul Jones' glorious capture of the British ship Serapis.

In his 1920 edition he said:

"The Serapis had the better of the fight and would have won had not a sailor of The Richard happened to throw a hand grenade down a hatchway of the Serapis, where in exploding it fired a large lot of powder, which blew up the ship and killed many of her men."

In his 1922 edition he says:

"The Serapis had the better of the fight until a sailor of The Richard, fearlessly lashed in the rigging, far out over the deck, threw firebrands into the magazine hatchway of the Serapis and finally ignited the powder, which blew up the ship and killed many of her men."

The one account is substantially the one given by the British captain after Jones chivalrously had landed him in England; the other is the version given by John Paul Jones and his men. Jones' account has, however, always been the accepted American version, although for his valorous story telling the British captain was knighted and his version became emblazoned in British history.

In his 1920 text Historian Barnes was impugning the motives of France in aiding the colonists to secure independence, as follows:

"France had fought England, not so much from a generous wish to help the Colonies as from hatred of England, and at the end France wanted her share of the spoils."

In his 1922 text he has amended this to read:

"France had given generous help to the Colonies."

Professor Barnes' distortion of the causes of the War of 1812 had been severely condemned, and, heeding the voice of the American people, he has rewritten that, as will be seen from the following:

In his 1920 text he wrote:

"It was a mistake. It was a case in which righteous anger overcame judgment. Some hot-blooded young statesmen from the Southern States, among whom were Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, urged that war be declared, and they had their way. Much against his wish, Madison yielded, and the War of 1812 against England began. Had there been less haste it would have been better, for, no doubt, a peaceful settlement could have been made. Older men with cooler heads, though angry with England, felt that it would be wiser to wait, and were much in doubt as to the outcome."

In his 1922 text he writes:

"The impressment of our seamen by England interfered with our trade, as ships were searched upon the high seas, and Henry Clay, a statesman from Kentucky, who afterward went to the Netherlands to help make the treaty of peace, insisted that war must be declared to protect American commerce. He was supported by John C. Calhoun and statesmen from other sections of the country. It was also generally believed that the English in Canada were arming the Indians of the Northwest and encouraging, if not actually directing, the raids of Tecumseh and other Indian chieftains."

The 1920 account reads like British propaganda; the 1922 statement is American history.

The justification for the British in burning Washington, offered by Professor Barnes, in his 1920 books, was practically the same as given by several other pro-British American history revisers. The account of the destruction of public buildings and records has also been partially corrected in the re-revised history.

"Then they burned the President's house, the Treasury Building, and other Government buildings. They said that they destroyed these Government buildings to punish the Americans who had early in the war burned some public buildings in Canada."

"Then they burned the President's house, the Treasury Building, and other Government buildings. This was one of the great misfortunes of the whole war, since many records and collections of art were destroyed which could not be replaced."

Undoubtedly, due to strong complaint directed against Professor Barnes' 1920 version of the Battle of New Orleans, he has wholly rewritten that story, as shown in the two accounts:

"The war, as it went on, became more and more burdensome. The cost of carrying it on was very great. Many of the American people believed it to be a needless war, into which the country had been drawn by those who had not had the foresight to count the cost or judge of the outcome. Many who had been keen for a fight at first, had now tired of the strife, and there was a general desire for peace. * * *

"Very bad management, as a rule, had been shown by the leaders of the American Armies. Badly commanded, as they were, the American soldiers had been unable to hold their own against the troops of the enemy. In but one instance did the Americans win a glorious victory, and that was so late in the war that peace had been concluded before the battle was fought. It was the Battle of New Orleans. * * *

"All that it was necessary for the Americans to do to win a victory was to hold their ground. * * *

"The invaders came on like British soldiers, and like British soldiers they came, again and again, those that were not dead. For 3 hours they endured that deadly fire and offered up their lives for their King. Then they gave up the hopeless task, for they saw that to perform it was beyond the power of man. The British lost 2,500 men and many officers, among whom was the gallant General Pakenham, their commander. The American loss was very small.

"It was a wasted battle; it was a needless victory; it counted for nothing, for the war was over."

"The war as it went on became more burdensome. The cost of carrying it on was great and both sides became anxious for peace. * * * Andrew Jackson, a young lawyer, had settled at Nashville, Tenn., and was soon made a judge. He made himself famous by enforcing law and order in the wilderness country.

"The Creek Indians, under the leadership of Tecumseh, had captured Fort Mimms, about 50 miles from Mobile, and massacred about 500 men, women, and children. An army was raised with Jackson in command and marched against the Indians. A battle was fought at Horseshoe Bend, in which the Indians were completely defeated. The British, not knowing of this battle, came on to New Orleans, and Jackson was there to meet them. * * *

The invaders came on again and again, the front ranks carrying short ladders with which to scale the earthworks. These were the best-trained soldiers in the world, but Jackson's Kentucky and Tennessee riflemen were the best marksmen in the world, and in the 3-hour battle 2,500 men and officers, including the British commander, General Pakenham, were killed. The American loss was very small. Although at the time this battle was fought the treaty of peace had already been signed at Ghent, it was of utmost importance, as it had a marked effect in creating in Europe a great respect for the valor of the American Army."

The mobility of Professor Barnes' judgment is remarkable. Just so long as it appeared to his advantage to write in harmony with the "newer tendencies in historical writing" with "the methods of modern historical scholarship" and the "other influences from overseas" this author was apparently not adverse to misrepresenting and minimizing American characters and their achievements; but now that he has heard the rumblings of the storm of American patriotic protest he reverses his attitude and turns his facts roundabout.

An elemental complaint against these revisionists is that they are not faithful to the facts as facts, but have adjusted their attitude in submission to influence brought to bear upon them. Here is one of them who surely presents striking illustration of the justice of this complaint.

Professor Barnes, by restoring American teachings into his Short American History by Grades, issued in two volumes, and rerevising in 1923 his American History for Grammar Grades, issued in one volume, practically a replica of his Short American History by Grades, admits that he must have been led astray by someone. Barnes, however, is only a Brooklyn school principal and is not considered in scholastic circles of colleges and historical associations, like some of the other complained-of historians who have been seduced into a sycophantic acceptance of English authority on all things American.

It is remarked, however, that although the Barnes History for Grammar Grades had not been rerevised when the authorized 1923 list of textbooks used in the New York City schools came out, it was nevertheless on the authorized list.

Compulsory Military Service in Switzerland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 7, 1940

ARTICLE FROM AMERICANA

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, it certainly seems apposite to include in the many remarks on conscription the very successful procedure which has been followed in Switzerland. I am indebted to Americana for this article, which I think will be of interest to everyone.

The article follows:

[From the Americana, vol. 26]

SWITZERLAND—ARMY

Compulsory universal service has been the root-principle of Switzerland's military system for centuries. Since the reorganization completed in 1912, the army has been brought to a high state of efficiency. The striking force of the Swiss Army consists of about 300,000 men, divided into the Elite (20 to 32 years), the Landwehr (38 to 40), and the Landsturm (40 to 48), which number respectively, 117,530, 108,900, and 68,000 men. The supplementary services (men of from 20 to 48, who for various reasons are not entirely fit), number 205,000, and the grand total of the whole army is slightly under half a million or one-eighth of the entire population. There are few exemptions except for physical disability, and those excused or rejected pay certain taxes instead of rendering service. Liability extends from the 20th to completion of the 48th year; service is distributed as follows: Twelve years in the Elite or "Auszug," 8 years in the Landwehr, and 8 years in the Landsturm. The longest periods of training are the recruits' courses which every man goes through in his first year of service—65 days for the infantry, 75 for the artillery and 90 for the cavalry—besides which there are compulsory courses in shooting. The younger men (the first line) do 7 other annual trainings of 11 days each (14 days in the artillery) before passing into the Landwehr, when they are called out for 11 days every 4 years; the Landsturm are only called up in time of war. Men convicted of grave offenses are not allowed to join the army and officers and men whose private life is unworthy of their rank and standing are court-martialed and dismissed. In the strictest sense a democratic service, the Swiss Army is a model institution, unique in that every would-be officer starts as a private with the ordinary recruits' course, and promotion to the commissioned and noncommissioned ranks is by merit and not by seniority, except that it is conditional on 4 years' service in each rank.

Although officers naturally have to do more work and pass through longer courses of training than the privates, instances of shirking in order to escape promotion do not occur. On the contrary, all through the Army both officers and men do a large amount of extra voluntary work. In peacetime there are no generals; these are appointed only on mobilization or outbreak of war. The system of promotion from the ranks has the advantage that it obviates any danger of militarism, which always springs from antagonism between people and officers as a class; in Switzerland officers as well as men either belong or feel that they belong to the people and there is consequently no friction between them. The system also makes physical training obligatory, for it is preceded by compulsory gymnastic training in all the schools and supplemented by a large amount of voluntary gymnastics, drill, and shooting practice, which last is the principal cause of the high standard of marksmanship throughout the Swiss Army. But apart from target exercise (which is encouraged, while at the same time mobilization is accelerated by the fact that every soldier when he is not out training keeps his rifle and equipment in his own house) the institution of annual trainings tends to produce a high state of physical efficiency throughout the Nation.

The composition and organization are thoroughly modern and complete. The infantry (traditionally known as fusiliers and carabineers, but for practical purposes are divided into field and mountain infantry) is the main arm. The cavalry consists of dragoons and guides, the former being ranged in independent divisions under the direct orders of the commander in chief and the latter brigaded with those divisions. There are altogether 114 battalions, 84 field batteries, 12 howitzer batteries, 10 mountain batteries, 6 cavalry regiments, and 12 squadrons of guides, besides the usual accompaniment of engineers, cyclist, railway, and pontoon corps, telegraph section, etc.

The fortifications on the southern frontier for the defense of the St. Gothard Pass and the Rhone Valley are manned mainly by the landwehr, which is organized in 56 battalions and 36 squadrons. There are 6 divisions in the army, each of which belongs to one of the 6 divisional districts into which the country is divided and each can be worked as a separate army corps. The first consists entirely of French-speaking Swiss recruited from the Cantons of Geneva, Valais, Vaud, and Neuchatel. In the second section three-quarters of the men are French Swiss, from Fribourg, Neuchatel, and the French Jura. The third, fourth, and fifth divisions consist entirely of German-speaking Swiss from the Cantons of Bern, Lucerne, Soleure, Casel, Argovie, Saint Gall, Zurich, and Schaffhausen. The sixth division (Italians and Rumonsh) is recruited from Ticino, the Grisons, and Saint Gall. At the beginning of the European war all 6 divisions were mobilized so rapidly that in the first week of August 1914 Switzerland was able to post on its frontiers over 250,000 fighting men, well armed and well drilled. The infantry are armed with the Swiss repeating rifle. The field artillery is armed with a Q. F. shielded Krupp 7.5 cm. caliber. The "position" artillery has batteries of 8.4 and 12 cm. guns. The aviation service had 60 fighting and 120 scouting airplanes in 1930.

The national militia is partly under the Cantons, who have authority to promote officers up to the rank of captain. The higher appointments rest with the Federal Government, which has charge of all general matters of importance. The Swiss consider it an honor to serve in the army and a misfortune to be rejected. Considering its efficiency and the fact that it is raised by conscription, the Swiss Army is a comparatively cheap one. The expenditure is 21 francs ($1.05) per head of the population, while twice as much per head is spent on education. All men rejected on account of physical defects are exempted (as are teachers, clergymen, police, etc.) and pay a military tax according to income up to the age of 40. Service being the same for all, it is therefore a handicap for none. It interferes neither with personal liberty nor with the country's prosperity; it imposes little burden on the national treasury and no burden at all on the national content. In proportion to population Switzerland is one of the richest countries, although it has not an inch of territory beyond its borders. The yearly value of Switzerland's commerce amounts to about $350 per capita of the population, as compared with $290 in England, and the country not only bears the compulsory system but regards with pride and affection the army which is its result. Owing to its inland position Switzerland has no navy, and no need of one. Yet a "Swiss admiral" did once exist, an Englishman named Colonel Williams, who in 1799 was in the service of the Zurich government and commanded a small fleet on Lake Zurich, with which he was ordered to oppose the French Army. When the latter under Massena, routed the Austrians and Russians Williams calmly watched the battle from the lake. Then, enraged at his own inaction, he discharged his crews, scuttled his vessels, and took to flight.

W. P. A. Accomplishments in Spokane County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 1940

REPORT BY CARL W. SMITH, ACTING STATE W. P. A. ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am glad to make a part of the RECORD the history of the unusual accomplishments of the W. P. A. in the most populous county of my congressional district, to wit, Spokane County. The report follows:

A huge program of permanent Spokane County improvements, created through the diligent labor of hundreds of Work Projects Administration workers, has brought benefits to this county that it otherwise would have taken years to achieve, according to Carl W. Smith, acting State W. P. A. administrator.

Smith listed W. P. A. accomplishments in Spokane County yesterday as a part of a national survey covering W. P. A. projects from its inception 4½ years ago to January 1, and pointed out that employment of otherwise unemployed residents in the many useful W. P. A. undertakings has helped the county keep pace with the rapid growth of the inland empire.

During this period Spokane County has acquired through W. P. A. 550 miles of roads and new or greatly improved streets, 85 new or modernized public buildings, 27 miles of new or rehabilitated irrigation canals, flume or pipe line, watering over 25,000 acres; water and sewer systems, athletic fields, parks, playgrounds, and essential services such as surveys, research projects, and social, health, and educational assistance.

Each day almost every resident of the county enjoys some improvement effected by the extensive W. P. A. program.

The modernization and extension of the road system of the county consists of 460 miles of farm and mine-to-market roads. These roads were newly built or straightened, graded, drained, and gravel-surfaced to make them safe for passage in wet weather. Many dangerous curves were eliminated. The best-known road project was the relocation of the first 10 miles of the Palouse Highway running south from Spokane toward Latah. During operation of this job 2,000 degrees of curvature were eliminated. The road now has no curve over 6 degrees and no grade of more than 6 percent.

These improvements have included the laying of over 139 culverts, mostly metal, and the landscaping of more than 125 acres of roadside.

At present W. P. A. is operating a county-wide road-improvement project to realine highways, do away with narrow places and curves, and grade and gravel more than 140 miles. Of this distance approximately 42 miles will be oiled. The project is already over 80 percent complete.

In addition to road work nearly 90 miles of streets were graded and graveled under a series of W. P. A. projects, principally in the city of Spokane. Largest of these jobs called for 100 miles of street work and 6 miles of curbs in Spokane. Sixty miles of the undertaking have been completed. This project was suspended last May but recently reopened. In Deer Park and Medical Lake 2 miles of streets were improved. Nearly 6 miles of roads were constructed in parks near Spokane.

One of the most important fields of W. P. A. assistance in Spokane County has been irrigation rehabilitation. Prior to W. P. A., irrigation systems of the county had fallen into disrepair and few extensions had been made. To remedy this Federal funds were allocated to assist the various districts. In the W. P. A. of 4½ years 17 miles of new canals, pipe-lines, and flume have been constructed, watering 7,280 acres. More than 10 miles of existing ditch and canal systems, serving 16,850 acres, were rehabilitated and improved.

There were 5 W. P. A. irrigation-system projects in the Greenacres district. Flumes were built, canals lined, ditches cleared, wood pipe replaced with concrete, irrigation devices installed, and dikes constructed at Otis Orchard, East Farms, Carnhope, Trentwood, Dishman, Pasadena Park, Veradale, and Spokane Valley irrigation districts. At Lake Newman a mile and one-half of dike was built impounding a lake of 25,000 acre-feet. Outlet channels were cleared for the district totaling 6,000 feet.

At present there are eight W. P. A. projects in operation, bringing still further improvements to the various Spokane irrigation districts. These include canal and some pipe-line improvements for Otis Orchard, Spokane irrigation district, Greenacres, East Farms, West Farms, and Trentwood. Dishman and Pasadena Park have irrigation and domestic water projects.

Few cities have had more extensive rehabilitation by W. P. A. of water and sewer systems than Spokane. During the first 2 years of W. P. A. 42 miles of sewers were laid to meet an acute situation threatening civic development. At present two projects are in operation; one to provide lateral and the other intercepting sewers totaling 25 miles. Another similar project has been approved by W. P. A. for future operation. A total of 70 miles of sewers, 248 service connections, and 749 manholes and catch basins had been constructed up to January 1 in Spokane County. All of the work was done in Spokane and its suburbs, except a few miles in Cheney.

Water mains totaling 25 miles with 28 consumer connections were laid in the county. These projects likewise were all in Spokane, except for a few miles in Latah, various school districts, and irrigation domestic-water systems. Five miles of the mains were new construction.

In Spokane W. P. A. is now laying approximately 12 miles more of water mains. W. P. A. crews constructed an overflow basin of 4,750,000 gallons for the Spokane North Hill Reservoir to protect property lying below it and to permit efficient reservoir cleaning.

The city's pumping station was also improved.

Almost every child in Spokane County has benefited by the extensive school construction and rehabilitation work of W. P. A., supported by the various school districts. Two new schools were constructed and 52 repaired, painted, enlarged, or otherwise improved. Playgrounds, athletic fields, and other facilities were provided or enlarged.

New schools were erected by W. P. A. at Five Mile Prairie for 80 pupils and at Glenrose for 50 pupils. Neither district was able to afford the urgently needed new construction without Federal assistance.

Forty of the improved and rehabilitated schools are in the city of Spokane. These projects were sponsored by School District 81. The work consisted of refinishing, varnishing, painting, and calcimining interiors and equipment. For the majority the grounds were graded and improved. A survey project by W. P. A. for the school board completely mapped all school properties.

Other school-repair projects were for districts near Greenacres, and at Millwood, Elk, Milan, Chatteroy, Spangle, Colbert, Medical Lake, Opportunity, Deer Park, and Otis Orchards.

The work consisted mainly of remodeling, painting, constructing fences, digging wells, laying sewage and drainage facilities, and building foundations and gymnasiums. Under one project 8,000 desks were repaired and refinished in 8 districts. School books were repaired and indexed by W. P. A. workers in 15 districts. Additions were completed for the schools at Greenacres and Millwood and a teacher's cottage was erected for the school near Chester.

Eleven playfields were enlarged, graded, and improved for county schools. Two other school playfields were improved in Spokane. This work included repairing playfield equipment or placing new equipment.

Twenty-two new public buildings have been erected by the Work Projects Administration in Spokane County. W. P. A. crews have repaired, remodeled, and modernized 59 more buildings and enlarged 4. At Deer Park a new city hall was erected with quarters for the local municipal offices, library, and jail.

At Fort George Wright W. P. A. has furnished important aid in increasing Army facilities. A post exchange and a barn were erected. An athletic field was laid out and a new field house constructed. The interior of the fort hospital was renovated.

In Spokane the Grace Campbell Memorial Building was rehabilitated. New cabinets were constructed, floors renewed, fixtures modernized, and buildings painted and calcimined. W. P. A. clerical experts were brought in to rearrange and index the exhibits. At the Spokane armory W. P. A. crews completed general improvements for storage of machine-gun equipment and erected a small-bore target range.

Extensive W. P. A. construction work has materially improved the recreational facilities of the county. A new gymnasium was built at Waverly. Repairs were made to the gymnasium at Medical Lake. Two field houses were erected at Central Valley High School and at Greenacres. A new W. P. A. built community building now serves Milan, Elk, and Chatteroy districts. Community centers were reconstructed at Deer Park and Millwood.

At Indian Canyon the residents of Spokane were provided, through a recent W. P. A. project, with a complete park, including a bathhouse, field house, two shelter houses, and a garage.

Spokane was without an adequate recreational baseball park until W. P. A. constructed a diamond and covered grandstand at the fair grounds. The grandstand seats 4,500 persons and is equipped with dressing and shower rooms. General improvements were made on the 25-acre grounds. Another grandstand was erected at Millwood, seating 700.

W. P. A. expansion of Spokane County's recreational facilities includes 10 new athletic fields, 24 improved athletic fields, 5 new handball courts, 11 new tennis courts, and 1 new and 1 improved golf course.

New athletic fields were built at school district 409, Medical Lake, Millwood, Deer Park, Fairfield, the fair grounds, Spokane, and at Union High School near Mead. Football and baseball fields have just been completed with tennis courts and a water system at the high school near Mead. Twenty-two of the W. P. A. improved athletic fields are in Spokane. The others are at Millwood and Spangle.

A new public tourist park was created by W. P. A. at Deer Park. Park development was done at Camp Garden Springs, Spokane. Park improvements were made at Garland, Manito, Liberty, Indian Canyon, Down River, and Deer Parks, Spokane.

At the 235-acre Felts Field, W. P. A. made major improvements. Over 260,000 cubic yards of earth were handled by W. P. A. crews in completing two oil-surfaced runways. One measures 200 by 4,800 feet and the other 200 by 3,000 feet. W. P. A. crews also laid out five 200- by 200-foot oil-surfaced warming blocks. The service platform was enlarged and parking areas and general leveling completed.

Building construction by W. P. A. at Felts Field included a new 5-plane hangar and improvement of the 12-plane hangar of the Forty-first Aviation Division of the State National Guard. The headquarters building of the division was enlarged with a brick addition, providing space for a radio control tower and class rooms. W. P. A. crews also helped restore the partially destroyed administration building of the One Hundred and Sixteenth Observation Unit. Floodlights for the field were erected by W. P. A. and general improvements completed only a few months ago.

At Deer Park, W. P. A. cleared and leveled the 70-acre flying field, removed hazards and old orchards, and set up six field boundary markers.

Several W. P. A. projects operated at the Griffith Springs fish hatchery, a few miles north of Spokane. Under one project W. P. A. crews constructed nine large, circular, concrete rearing ponds. A second project resulted in extensive general improvements in facilities. The result is that now the hatchery has the huge annual output of 4,800,000 fingerling fish to maintain the interest of anglers all up and down the streams of eastern Washington and the inland empire. Three-car garages were also built for the United States Bureau of Fisheries and for the State department of game.

An essential improvement for flood and fire control at the game refuge was the 125-foot dam constructed by W. P. A. This dam impounds 10 acre-feet of water. It is equipped with spillways and gates. The project also included 1,400 feet of dike and ditch. Thirty acres were cleared and 50 fenced.

Other W. P. A. projects for the county included 182 acres of general landscaping for roads, schools, and public buildings, 2 miles of guard rails, 10 miles of fire breaks, and 485 sanitary units for the protection of health and prevention of stream pollution in rural areas without sewage facilities.

A skeet and target range was laid out north of Felts Field, and a refuge for ducks, geese, and other migratory birds was provided near Cheney.

All of these permanent accomplishments for Spokane County were effected by W. P. A. labor. Federal funds were allocated to cover the cost of labor and some materials. The county, city, or other governing body in the county provided all or almost all materials, equipment, and supervision.

Added to these physical accomplishments are the other services of W. P. A. Free hot lunches are being served by W. P. A. women to the children in 31 schools of Spokane County. Two W. P. A. sewing rooms in Spokane are manufacturing clothing to be distributed to needy families of the county and State.

The housekeeping aid project provides experienced, middle-aged W. P. A. women to assist in motherless homes or where the homemaker is temporarily incapacitated. At a W. P. A. household demonstration center in Spokane, W. P. A. trains girls in a 3-month course for efficient household employees.

W. P. A. survey projects have also been operated for the cities and county. The records of the sheriff's and prosecutor's offices were indexed. Photographs were filed and identification data coordinated. Hillyard's records were cataloged, as were also those of the county engineer and the county school superintendent.

To permit traffic improvement a W. P. A. check of origin and destination of vehicles was made. New building codes and zoning ordinances were coordinated with the past records of the department of public works, including all permits as far back as 1875. A Negro survey was made. Historical records were assembled and indexed. The Spokane City Library was assisted. Deer Park and Milan School files were brought up to date.

To determine the type and extent of the mineral resources of the county a W. P. A. survey with a field camp was operated. Experienced professional and clerical workers were used.

These achievements in Spokane County are a part of the national W. P. A. program under which the otherwise unemployed have been given an opportunity, through security employment, to create needed improvements and carry on important public services.

In the country as a whole W. P. A. workers have constructed 400,000 miles of roads and 50,000 miles of streets. They have constructed 23,000 new public buildings and rehabilitated 62,400 more. About 9,600 miles of water mains and 15,000 miles of new sanitary sewers have been laid in the Nation under this program. New W. P. A.-built airports total 197; improved airports, 337.

In the State of Washington these totals run 7,447 miles of roads and 1,496 miles of streets, 555 new public buildings, 880 rehabilitated public buildings, 478 miles of water mains, 264 miles of sewers, 5 new airports, and 7 improved airports.

All of these huge undertakings and many more, combined with the social, educational, health, research, and conservation services of W. P. A. make it one of the largest businesses ever undertaken, and effecting directly or indirectly every citizen of the United States.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED L. BULWINKLE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 11, 1940

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE EARL HORTON POST, NO. 122, OF THE AMERICAN LEGION, AT BURNSVILLE, N. C., ON AUGUST 27, 1940

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to insert the following resolution:

Whereas the greater part of the world is at war and the armed minions of a despotic government already have covered the face of continental Europe like a scourge; and

Whereas there remains but one nation striving in mortal combat to preserve the principles of democracy, of right and justice, and of individual freedom, and to save the world from domination by a totalitarian state; and

Whereas our President and Commander in Chief has declared that a limited emergency exists in our country and has created a national commission with extraordinary powers to direct the activities and industries of our Nation in its war-defense program, upon which Board he has chosen to place a citizen of our own State; and

Whereas it is timely and necessary that all organizations, groups, and individuals cooperate to the fullest extent in the furtherance of national preparedness: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That these organizations do earnestly commend and approve the actions and deeds taken and done for the protection of our Nation, our State, and our community, and for the everlasting preservation of our national prestige and integrity; and in recognition of the existence of a grave emergency, do hereby pledge and undertake to render to our Government our utmost help and assistance in the advancement of the cause, plans, and works of and for a speedy, adequate, and complete preparation for the defense of our home and country.

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR., OF WISCONSIN

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD a very eloquent address delivered by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] last evening, under the auspices of the America First Committee, on the subject of "Are We On The Road To War?"

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

One reason I feel so strongly about the course on which our country has embarked is that I have seen this tragedy before. I feel as though I had walked into a movie only to discover that I had seen the picture years ago, under a somewhat different name and with a different cast.

During 1916–17 I was one of my father's secretaries. As many of you remember, he fought to the last ditch to prevent the involvement of the land he loved in the European war of his generation. Fortunately for my education, I was close to the historic battle which raged in Washington. Its full, tragic meaning burned into me for life.

As I sit in the United States Senate today, the words that are spoken and the things that are done here in Washington have a tragic ring of familiarity. Some of the words and slogans are different. But in spite of new phrases cooked up by the best propagandists in the business, we are going, step by step, down that same road we took in 1916–17.

You and I love our country. The overwhelming majority of us want with every fiber of our being to do what is best for this Nation. We sense with that true instinct which God has given to people in times of great crisis that the decisions we make will be of world-shaping importance. This is the reason why we are more worried and our sculs are more harrowed than ever before in our lifetimes. We want above all else to choose the right course.

We have a fundamental and catastrophic decision to make, and we must make it now.

We must decide whether or not we are going to war in the Old World.

It is tragic that we cannot make the most important decision in the history of our country with clear heads and steady hearts. But our emotions are aroused because deep down inside of all of us, save for a few Bundists and Communists, there is a natural loathing and aversion for the brutality of the dictators, red, black, and brown. We detest their methods and their objectives. We are shocked by the horrible ruthlessness of total war.

Propaganda, in the movies, over the radio, in the press, and by word of mouth seeks to play upon our emotions and to shape our decision. For various reasons fear and hysteria are being fomented. Jitters are being cultivated in the hope the people will not be able to think straight.

These efforts we must resist, for they are designed to becloud our reason and if successful will end in disaster for our country. I appeal to the people who do not want our Nation plunged into the holocaust, not to be sucked along the road to war by easy stages and false reasoning.

The process of switching the signs on the road to war began a year ago when the people were told that repeal of the arms embargo would make our neutrality more secure, although the interventionists knew it could only have the opposite result.

Once the interventionists got the arms embargo repealed they were not satisfied with opening our munitions markets to the Allies. The next step in their program was to turn over arms, ammunition, planes, and implements of war from our own Army and Navy These included latest deliverable types of war equipment.

Their most recent move was the famous destroyer-base lease deal revealed when the administration generously notified the Congress that it had traded 50 American destroyers to Great Britain. And we could have had these bases in exchange for the old war debt.

The hocus-pocus under which American destroyers, equipped with the latest protection devices and armament, become obsolete and overage should not deceive us. Under the definition, 50 percent of the combat vessels in the United States Navy could be declared overage and yet we know that our Navy is our first line of defense.

Unless we stop in our tracks there will be no end to the policy of taking everything that Britain wants and labeling it surplus or overage and obsolete. The next step after overage destroyers will be middle-age battleships. Then it will be youngish cruisers. In the end, they will be calling for our right-aged sons.

You and I have been told for months that this Nation must strengthen its defenses, must build an impregnable military machine capable of protecting ourselves from any aggressor or combination of aggressors. And you and I have agreed wholeheartedly. In this session of Congress alone I have voted for more than $15,000,000,000 for the up-building of our national defense.

But all the while we are voting more money to prepare to defend this hemisphere against all comers, we are dissipating strength by sending huge quantities of guns, planes, and warships across the ocean. Now the interventionists are demanding that the latest type planes and tanks, our secret bomb sight, and other indispensable war material be sent abroad.

There are tragic lessons written over the ravaged soil of Europe—lessons which we must learn if we hope to escape the fate of the conquered democracies abroad. And the most powerful lesson of all is this: National defense does not consist alone of arms, munitions, and trained manpower. It requires just as much a nation and a people whose social, economic, and spiritual house is in order.

And ours is not.

We would do well to remember that communism, fascism, and nazi-ism did not rear their ugly heads in Europe because the people of Russia, Italy, and Germany wanted to live under barbaric despotisms. This trilogy of totalitarianism came and conquered because the people of those countries were desperate, poverty-stricken, hungry, and without hope. The germs of these parasitic "isms" thrive and multiply in the stagnant pools of unemployment, poverty, and hopelessness.

How can we best prepare to meet the menace of totalitarianism? We cannot do it, as we are now, by handing over desperately needed implements of defense to the British. We cannot meet the menace of dictatorship by coddling and appeasing the profiteering minority of industrialists into making guns and tanks and planes and ships for us only when they think the profits will be high enough.

The way to meet the challenge of brutalitarianism is to buckle down to the job of strengthening our own defenses, internal as well as external, social and economic as well as military.

Here in America agriculture is entering the third decade of depression. Ten million men remain unemployed. The needy aged struggle along with a pittance which denies self-respect, and youth, the Nation's most precious asset, has little to look forward to beyond enforced service in the Army.

A young man who earns $30 a week will have to take a 75-percent cut in pay during his year of compulsory military service, but some businessmen are demanding and getting a higher and higher ceiling for profits arising out of defense orders. Such a distorted method of dealing with two groups in society will play a powerful "fifth column" role in lowering our national morale and weakening our resistance to attack.

These are problems which confront America and confront us today and here. They are more real, more menacing to the future of democracy and our way of life than all the propaganda scares of imminent invasion.

Our patriotic course is clear. We must set ourselves resolutely to the task of building an impregnable America, with military might, economic security, and spiritual well-being.

But we cannot do these things if we allow ourselves to be whipped and buffeted about by hysteria. We cannot make ourselves strong internally by shutting our eyes to the problems at home. We cannot make ourselves strong militarily by stripping our own defense in order to support the interventionists' vague and shifting frontier in Europe. We cannot preserve our American freedom by participating in war because, as soon as we do, we will become a dictatorship, just like the dictatorships abroad, whose destruction would be our announced war objective.

A subtle, diabolically clever, and powerful effort to sneak up on our blind side has been going on for long weary months. We are told in forty-eleven different ways that we can have our cake and eat it, too. We are asked to believe that we can play with fire and not get burned. We are assured that there is a halfway house on the road to war. This is false doctrine. It violates every rule of straight thinking and it flies in the face of history. Unless the citizens of America wake up quickly and exert their influence to stop our progress toward war, it will come.

It is my unshakable conviction after weighing all the facts, that we must stay out of war in Europe and Asia, if government of the people, by the people, and for the people is not to perish from this earth.

The people of America can still win this fight for peace and freedom. They will win if they will notify their Senators and Representatives that they are no longer fooled by trick phrases like "steps short of war," that they are committed to preserving and strengthening democracy by building an impregnable military defense and a dynamic social and economic order.

The two old parties have evaded this momentous issue in their platforms. Their Presidential candidates see eye to eye on foreign policy. This deprives the people of an effective choice in the Presidential campaign on the supreme issue. But the people can express their will on the question of going to war in Europe or Asia by electing men to the House and Senate who will vote against a foreign overseas war.

If we succeed, we can make democracy function in the last great area where it still lives, and by our strength and our success assume a position from which we can offer hope and leadership to the war-weary peoples of the world.

I ask those who are interested in the fight to stay out of war in the Old World to write to the America First Committee, Chicago, Ill.

Activities of War Industries Board During World War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

LETTER BY BERNARD M. BARUCH

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which appeared in the New York Times on September 10, 1940, addressed to the Editor of that publication by Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, and referring to activities of the War Industries Board during the World War.

There being no objection the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

SEPTEMBER 9, 1940.

The EDITOR,
The New York Times, New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: Your editorial on Results of Plant Seizure quoting my testimony before the War Policies Commission in 1932, permits the conclusion that commandeering—the right to take materials or facilities—was "unnecessary in war. The method of dealing with the situation which you so generously praised, would have been impossible without it. Commandeering is a right that may be required to club into line a small group, always existent, which is seeking selfish gains in selfish ways. In the last war such recalcitrants knew there existed the power to commandeer plus the power of priority on transportation, coal, oil, materials, capital, etc. This knowledge kept them in line. That will be true today.

In war, the Government must have the right to conscript or commandeer (even to take over) any thing or facility necessary for its defense.

To get coordination, the President finally directed that no commandeering or taking over of materials or facilities should be done without the approval of the chairman of the War Industries Board.

Agreements were thus concluded with manufacturers for what the Government wanted, with price and deliveries included.

This, as you said in your editorial, is the best way.

In normal peacetime it would be abhorrent to give any such power to the Government. The results might well be as depicted in your quotation from something Senator Borah said.

Even admitting procrastination in amortization and expenditures, and the lack of vision in seeing the present situation brought about much of our present jam, we are now faced with the necessity of an enormous, hurried outlay.

But we are not now in ordinary peacetime. We have suddenly voted billions of dollars for defense. Increased taxes (although not enough) and the Selective Service Act are being passed.

Should Government in these circumstances be left powerless to enforce its orders and leave facilities for its defense in the hands of those who profit from nonwar business, by the very appropriations which the Government is forced to make?

Decidedly not. The commandeering of specific properties in the interests of national defense should be permitted, with proper compensatory provisions, the property to be returned to the owners at the end of the emergency.

In peacetime, radio, the press, and labor should be excluded from conscription or commandeering. Greatest care should be taken that this power is not abused, either in peace or in war, and that it should cease immediately after the emergency has passed.

We are facing momentous decisions already too long delayed. The shortage of machine tools causes a conflict between our defense, the British, and our own industrial needs. Our war needs come first. If the shortage is as stated, from what industries must we take the required tools; which ones must be denied new machines intended to produce new goods, when the old ones will do, if necessary, to help the national program? This is no game, but a preparation for our life and survival. This decision will go to the roots of our entire production capacity.

The Germans were asked whether they wanted butter or guns. We must decide if we want business as usual or armaments. The answer can only be the latter.

The necessity for sacrifices is before us and we must make them gladly and promptly.

I saw the temper of civilians, capital, and labor in the World War. Show them the reason and the way and we will prove again that "the highest form of efficiency is the voluntary cooperation of a free people."

Sincerely yours,

BERNARD M. BARUCH.

Sale of Destroyers to Great Britain

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of Saturday, September 7, 1940, entitled "A Demolishing Indictment," in regard to the recent raid on the United States Navy by the sale of 50 destroyers to a foreign power.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of September 7, 1940]

A DEMOLISHING INDICTMENT

How did the administration achieve "legality" for its dark-lantern destroyer deal? By "suppression of pertinent evidence, misrepresentation of facts, and distorted and strained interpretations." So wrote Dr. Herbert Whittaker Briggs, professor of government and specialist in international law at Cornell University, in a letter to Chairman WALSH, of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, August 17.

Dr. Briggs' judgment obviously was not based on the completed deal between Secretary Hull and Lord Lothian, for the transfer of the 50 destroyers for the naval-air bases was not announced by President Roosevelt until last Tuesday, September 3.

What he did base it on was the tortured opinion of four New York lawyers, which appeared in the New York Times, August 11—the opinion which Attorney General Jackson adopted in his amazing about face on the legality of the deal.

Before the deal or after, it is all the same so far as the question of the law is concerned. Everything which Dr. Briggs—an editor, incidentally, of the American Journal of International Law—said in condemnation of the transfer in advance of its consummation stands up now that it has occurred.

We quote directly from his memorandum for the force of his own utterance:

"It is shocking to find four distinguished members of the bar (Burlingham, Thacher, Rublee, and Acheson) preparing a brief to facilitate the sale of part of the United States Navy to a foreign power without congressional approval.

"They fail to prove that any law authorizes such a sale. Ostensibly they prove only that there is a loophole in the law through which the United States destroyers could be slipped to Britain. Their conclusion is reached:

"By suppression of pertinent information (par. 2, sec. 14, act of June 28, 1940, H. R. 9822); the full text of rule 1 of the Treaty of Washington of 1871; and the Hague Convention, XIII, section 6;

"By misrepresenting the purpose of section 14 of the act of June 28, 1940, and of section 7 of the Naval Act of July 9, 1940 (H. R. 10100);

"By obfuscating the legal issue through an irrelevant discussion of a ruling of the Attorney General of June 24, 1940; and

"By distorting the plain meaning of section 3 of title V of the act of June 15, 1917.

"Unfortunately for their efforts, no such alleged loophole exists, and the proposed sale would be illegal."

Expanding each of his indictments, Dr. Briggs showed how the obvious intent of section 14 of the act of June 28, 1940, was to restrain the Chief Executive from transferring our naval vessels to a foreign power. The administration, he points out, had been "caught red-handed in a scheme to release torpedo boats to Britain on the ground that the vessels were surplus or obsolete, although none of the boats had as yet been delivered." In the light of that situation, Congress decided to establish the safeguard of appropriate notice to the technical heads of the Army and Navy and provision for attendant publicity.

But that is only the first legal obstacle. Paragraph c of the same section, Dr. Briggs proceeds to demonstrate—and this paragraph was conveniently omitted from the letter of the four New York lawyers—provides that "nothing herein shall be construed to repeal or modify sections 3 and 6, title V, of the Act of June 15, 1917."

And this is the statute which not only says that "during a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, it shall be unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war," but goes on to make violation punishable by a fine up to $10,000 and imprisonment up to 5 years.

Dr. Briggs then takes up the hair-splitting distinction between vessels made for transfer to a warring foreign power and vessels already in existence before the transfer is proposed. Here he shows that the four lawyers and the Attorney General misread section 3 of the 1917 law.

For that section, based on the first rule of the Treaty of Washington of 1871, establishes "an obligation not only to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out for belligerent use, but also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessels having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within the jurisdiction, to warlike use."

Indicting the administration's lawyers for "suppressing this vital clause in order to prove its point," Dr. Briggs says, "There is no use for this sort of deception."

Finally, Dr. Briggs turns to international law, where he shows that the transfer is in direct violation of article 6 of the Hague Convention of 1907, which has been cited in the current war by the United States, Great Britain, Germany, Russia, and Norway as controlling international law. Pointing out that the lawyers' letter also failed to take notice of the Hague Convention, Dr. Briggs concludes his memorandum:

"In his public utterances, Secretary of State Cordell Hull has seldom failed to pledge the United States anew to the observance of international law. Even if acts of Congress are repealed, the destroyers cannot be transferred to Britain without violation of international law. Do we, in the United States, want our country to adopt Hitler's and Stalin's tactics of tearing up treaties like scraps of paper?"

The administration was not without benefit of this demolishing criticism of the reasoning—if so inappropriate a word may be used—on which it was to base the transfer. Chairman WALSH put the revealing letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 20 and there it may be found in its entirety on page 10560.

Dr. Briggs was right. This important issue was "not settled on its legal merits." But the legal argument did not go altogether by default. We honor him for his devotion to principles of law and order.

At the moment ours is a Government not of laws, but of men. When we return to the historic opposite in a saner day, the record will show that Cornell's professor of international law had the courage to stand up and tell the truth.

International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen, and Helpers Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered in Washington last evening by the President of the United States before the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen, and Helpers.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Tobin, members of the convention, during the past weeks, in several sections of the East, I have been inspecting the progress of our national defense. I have gone through navy yards and private yards to watch the building of destroyers, submarines, and aircraft carriers; I have visited aviation units to see our modern fighting planes; I have been in our great gun factories, where I have seen the most modern guns of all types swiftly being molded into shape; I have visited camps where young Americans are receiving training and instruction in the tactics of the warfare of today. Through it all there was the impressive conviction that America is rising to meet the ever-growing need for an adequate physical armed defense of the country.

Tonight in a very real sense I feel as I stand here that I am visiting another type of national defense, equally important in its own way in meeting the needs of the times. Enduring strength to a nation and staying power in an emergency definitely call for an efficient and determined labor force carrying on the processes of industry and trade. And when I speak of a "labor force" I very definitely include those who toil in their fields as well as those who toil in industry. Teamsters will be the first to assert that farmers labor too.

It is one of the characteristics of a free and democratic modern nation that it have free and independent labor unions. In country after country in other lands labor unions have disappeared as the iron hand of the dictator has taken command. Only in free lands have free labor unions survived. When union workers can assemble with freedom and independence in conventions like this, it is proof that American democracy has remained unimpaired—and it is symbolic of our determination to keep it free.

Yours is now one of the great international labor unions of America. You can remember, however, other days—days when labor unions were considered almost un-American by some individuals in our land. You can remember when it was rare indeed for an employer even to consider collective bargaining with his workers; when it was the common practice to discharge any worker who joined a union. You can remember when employers sought to meet threatened strikes by demanding that their Government—Federal or State—call out armed troops. You can remember when many large employers resorted to the un-American practice—still unfortunately followed in some sections of the country—of hiring labor spies and setting up private arsenals to ferret out members of a union.

The cause of labor has traveled forward since those days, over a road beset with difficulties, both from within its membership and from without. Your own organization is an outstanding example of the progress which has been made. By 1933 your membership had dropped to 70,000. Within the last 7 years you have grown to a membership of 500,000.

In those same 7 years organized labor as a whole has become stronger in membership, in influence, and in its capacity to serve the interests of the laboring man and woman and of society in general, than at any other time in our history. Much of this progress has been due to the one thing which this administration, from the very beginning, has insisted upon—the assurance to labor of the untrammeled right to organize and to bargain collectively with their employers. That principle has now become firmly imbedded in the law of the land; it must remain as the foundation of industrial relations for all times.

The principle has the support today not only of organized labor as a whole, but also of hundreds of thousands of decent, practical, forward-looking employers. A decade ago a minority of employers were willing to accept the principle of collective bargaining; today the majority of employers gladly adopt it.

And with that foundation, the last 7 years have seen a series of laws enacted to give to labor a fair share of the good life to which free men and women in a free nation are entitled as a matter of right. Fair minimum wages are being established for workers in industry; decent maximum hours and days of labor have been set, to bring about an American standard of living and recreation; child labor has been outlawed in practically all factories; a system of employment exchanges has been created; machinery has been set up and strengthened and successfully used for the mediation of labor disputes. Over them all has been created a shelter of social security—a foundation upon which is being built protection from the hazards of old age and unemployment.

This progress of the last 7 years has been difficult. It has been beset by obstruction and by bitter propaganda from certain minority groups in the community who had been accustomed for too many years to the exploitation of the great mass of people who worked for them. It was the same type of opposition to which I had become accustomed during my entire public career, dating back to my first election to the Senate of the State of New York 30 years ago this autumn, continuing through my service for nearly 8 years as Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and my service during 4 years as Governor of the largest labor-employing State in the Union.

You will remember that kind of opposition in the campaign of 4 years ago when certain employers, politicians, and newspapers—all of whom are now active in this campaign—in an effort to mislead and intimidate labor, went to the extent of putting untrue electioneering notices in pay envelopes in order to smash the new Social Security Act and force its repeal by electing its enemies.

That kind of opposition comes only too often from those who regularly for 3 years and 8 months block labor's welfare, and then for 4 months loudly proclaim that they are labor's true friends—from those who love the laboring man in November but forget him in January.

In spite of that opposition the vast majority of our small businessmen have now become convinced that the gains of labor are the gains of the entire interdependent community, and that the welfare of labor is indispensable to the welfare of all. They know now that their best customer is a satisfied, adequately paid worker with a feeling of security against unemployment and poverty in his old age.

We are still, however, quite distant from the objective which we seek—the security and the high standard of living for every man, woman, and child which the resources and manpower of America make possible.

Our advance has been accomplished with patience and deliberation. That is the democratic way; that is the road which leads to lasting results. Here in America we have kept our feet on the ground; our progress has been steady and sure; we have not been misled by illusory promises.

Events abroad have shown too late the result of the other kind of methods—promises of swift, revolutionary relief; seductive pictures of panaceas; short cuts to prosperity and plenty, pictured as simple and easy—all of these have led to the same cruel disappointment. For these promises people yielded up their liberties and all that made life dear. In exchange they have received only the rationing of their news, the rationing of their religion, the rationing of the clothes upon their backs, and the rationing of the bread upon their tables.

Our progress must continue to be a steady and deliberate one—we cannot stand still, we cannot slip back. We must look forward to certain definite things in the near future. For example, the benefits of social security should be broadened and extended; unemployment insurance should cover a larger number of workers. Our old age pension system must be improved and extended; the amount of the pension should be increased, and, above all, these pensions must be given in a manner which will respect the dignity of the life of service and labor which our aged citizens have given to the Nation.

It is my hope that soon the United States will have a national system under which no needy man or woman within our borders will lack a minimum old age pension which will provide adequate food, clothing, and lodging to the end of the road—without having to go to the poorhouse to get it. And I look forward to a system which, in addition to this bare minimum, will enable those who have faithfully toiled in any occupation to build up additional security for their old age which will allow them to live in comfort and happiness.

The people must decide whether to continue the type of government which has fostered the progress to date, or whether to turn it over to those who by their action, if not always by their word, have shown their fundamental opposition to the main objectives toward which we have worked in the past and to which we are definitely committed for the future.

There are some who would not only stop now the progress we are making in social and labor legislation, but would even repeal what has been enacted during the past 7 years—all on the plea that an adequate national defense requires it. They would seek unlimited hours of labor. They would seek lower wages. They would seek the cancelation of those safeguards for which we have all struggled so long.

I still believe, however, as I did when I said on May 26 last: "We must make sure in all that we do that there be no break-down or cancelation of any of the great social gains which we have made in these past years. * * * There is nothing in our present emergency to justify a retreat from any of our social objectives—conservation of resources, assistance to agriculture, housing, and help to the underprivileged."

Our mighty national-defense effort against all present and potential threats cannot be measured alone in terms of mathematical increase in the number of soldiers and sailors, or of guns or tanks or planes. Behind them all must stand a united people whose spiritual and moral strength has not been sapped through hunger or want or fear or insecurity. The morale of a people is an essential supplement to their guns and planes.

I am convinced that a break-down of existing labor and social legislation would weaken rather than increase our efforts for defense. Continuance of them means the preservation of the efficiency of labor. It means the return to work of several millions still unemployed.

The employment of additional workers and the provisions for overtime payments for overtime work will insure adequate working hours at decent wages to do all that is now necessary in physical defense. We will not overlook the lesson learned in Europe in past years.

At times, internal obstacles to the growth of labor unions have come in those rare instances where the occasional scoundrel has appeared in position of leadership. Labor unions are not the only organizations which have to suffer innocently for the crimes and misdeeds of one or two of their selfish and guilty members. The rule applies to all organizations, to all trades and professions alike.

I cannot add to the terms of condemnation which your President, my old friend Dan Tobin, included in his report to your convention in which he said:

"It is, indeed, pitiful and heartbreaking and seriously depressing to find that amongst our enormous membership, composed of clean men, fathers of families, Americans of the purest type—to find amongst this membership some creatures so bereft of decency and honor as to bring disgrace upon the international union."

Labor knows that there is no room in the labor movement for the racketeer or the strong-arm man. Government is determined to help labor unions clean their house of those few persons who have betrayed them.

In this great crisis has come proof that organized labor, as well as all other groups of our citizens, is aware of its own responsibilities. I have called on representatives of labor to serve, and have placed them in responsible positions to take part in, the defense work of their Government. From the very start representatives of labor, including your own distinguished president, have shared in formulating and administering the program.

I am particularly glad to be able to say that the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., and the railroad brotherhoods are all loyally cooperating in this effort with the National Defense Commission and with the Army and Navy. This cooperation in the task of national defense will, I hope, encourage closer and more friendly relations between these great labor organizations.

I know that America will never be disappointed in its expectation that labor will always continue to do its share of the job we now face, patriotically and unselfishly.

In our search for national unity as the basis of national defense, it is necessary and it is fair that every human being in the United States contribute his share. This applies both to those who train in the fighting forces and to the forces of workers behind the lines.

It is equally necessary and fair that every dollar of capital in America also contribute its share. Just so long as we continue to call upon men to train for combat, and for service behind the lines, will we also continue to call upon the industrial plants of the Nation for the service which they can give.

Capital and industry, as well as labor and agriculture, are responding, and I know will continue to respond.

The Nation, through its elected representatives, is now adopting the principle of selective universal training of its young men. On the same principle, no reasonable person can object to giving the Government the power to acquire the services of any plant or factory for adequate compensation if the owner refuses to make its services available to the defense needs of the Nation. This is nothing new in American life. The principle of eminent domain or eminent use is as old as democratic government itself. It merely permits government to acquire or to use, for a fair and reasonable price, any property which is necessary for its proper functioning.

The overwhelming majority of our munitions and other defense requirements are now manufactured by private enterprise under private management. We continue that process. It is only in the rare, isolated case that the owner of a plant will refuse to deal with his government in a fair way.

But if and when such case does arise, the Government cannot stand by helpless in its efforts to arm and defend itself. No business is above its government, and government should be empowered to deal adequately with any business which tries to rise above its government.

In all of these plans for national defense only those who seek to play upon the fears of the American people discover an attempt to lead us into war. The American people will reject that kind of propaganda of fear as they have rejected similar types which are occasionally spread at election time. They know that against the raging forces loose in the world the best defense is the strongest preparedness—fighting men and equipment in front and fighting industry and agriculture behind the lines.

Weakness in these days is a cordial invitation to attack. That is no longer theory; it is a proven fact—proved in the past year.

I hate war now more than ever. I have one supreme determination—to do all I can to keep war away from these shores for all time. I stand, with my party, upon the platform adopted in Chicago:

"We will not participate in foreign wars, and we will not send our Army, naval, or air forces to fight in foreign lands outside of the Americas, except in case of attack."

Let us have an end to the sort of appeasement which seeks to keep us helpless by playing on fear and by indirect sabotage of all the progress we are making. "Appeasement" is a polite word for misdirected partisanship.

In our efforts for national defense, fine teamwork has been developed—and you teamsters know what that word "teamwork" means.

The continuance of this teamwork, after the present emergency is over, will have consequences of lasting good to the Nation as a whole. It will enable us to enjoy an internal security transcending anything heretofore known.

Ours is a great heritage; we are determined with all our effort and might to keep it intact. The workers in the factories, the farmers on the land, and businessmen in plants and offices are awake to the perils which threaten America. No selfish interest, no personal ambition, no political campaign can sway the majority will of our people to make America strong—and to keep it free.

Senator Ashurst

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM CONNALLY

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS AND AN ARTICLE FROM THE CHATTANOOGA TIMES

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix an editorial appearing in the Washington (D. C.) News of Thursday, September 12, 1940, entitled "Mr. ASHURST Bows Out"; also an article written by William Pinkerton, published in the Chattanooga Times of Sunday, March 17, 1940, entitled " 'Moving Speech Will Never Die,' ASHURST Says; 'Microphone May Aid.' "

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Editorial From the Washington Daily News of September 12, 1940]

MR. ASHURST BOWS OUT

Gallant as ever, HENRY FOUNTAIN ASHURST stood on the floor of the Senate and paid tribute to the processes of democracy which have relegated him to retirement:

"A man only moderately versed in statesmanship, and with only a small degree of sportsmanship, is bound to admit that in a free republic, in a government such as ours, it is the undoubted right of the people to change their servants, and to remove one and displace him with another at any time they choose, for a good reason, for a bad reason, for no reason at all.

"It is the duty of the public servants not grumpily and sourly to accept the verdict of the majority, but joyously to accept the verdict of the majority if we are to have a free people. * * * I should be disingenuous if I failed to say that they (the people of Arizona) probably had some reasons for displacing me."

Toward those who had voted him out of office, he displayed not bitterness, but gratitude—gratitude because "they allowed me, during my entire service, to do as I pleased and to say what I pleased."

Thousands of editorial columns will be written of the eloquence, the erudition, the statecraft, the brilliance, the humor, the punctilicusness of the gentleman from Arizona. And in all those deserved tributes we wish to join.

But the one fine human characteristic of Senator ASHURST to which we would now address ourselves is this: He can take it.

In a country where today so many have grown soft and petulant, here is a man who meets vicissitude with high heart and gay smile. Where so many "small men of brief authority" are crying that they alone are fit to rule, HENRY ASHURST bows gracefully out of public life.

He served in the Senate 28 years. He served with distinction, and he won wide acclaim. But his shirt was never stuffed.

[From the Chattanooga Times of March 17, 1940]

"MOVING SPEECH WILL NEVER DIE," ASHURST SAYS; "MICROPHONE MAY AID"

WASHINGTON, March 16.—Oratory, says Senator HENRY FOUNTAIN ASHURST, an orator's orator, will never die.

The microphone—forever pushed in front of the modern Cicero by newsreel, radio, and public-address men—may even nourish the old art of moving speech, he says.

Senator ASHURST is the pride of every speaker in Congress.

"The microphone," he said today, "has transformed many men of sloppy, snippy, slovenly speech into superb speakers. In the past 15 years it has made scores of thousands of excellent speakers.

"The microphone has seemed to eliminate those great banes of public speaking—overtone and overstatement.

"Superlatives in speech are usually evidences of a weary man or sometimes of an indolent man who does not seek a more nearly exact medium of expression."

ASHURST, who rose on a ladder of wondrous prose from cowhand to a leader's role in the Senate, admitted today that he had delivered only six or eight orations in his 28 years of public service. But he has made 4,000 speeches.

The Arizona statesman confessed, with candor, that his style of speech may be passing.

"I've long cultivated flaming, brilliant, rotund, gorgeous sentences," he explained. "But I would advise speakers of this era to use short, lance-like sentences."

This new hard-hitting manner is called forth, he explained, by the demands of the microphone, the need for simply put speech.

ASHURST has "studied oratory" for 45 years, reading over and over the great speeches of the past—Pitt, Demosthenes, Cicero, Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Douglas, Lincoln.

"And mark this well," he said, "the eloquence of Demosthenes (an early Greek) stands unapproachable, and has so stood for 2,300 years."

Friends visiting him at night still find the Senator "studying oratory." But he has passed on his learning to others, giving free-of-charge lessons in radio speech to younger statesmen and ambitious youths of the Capital.

Oratory, says this connoisseur, is not a studied art, but a wonderful thing that happens when the man and the occasion meet.

"In certain circumstances, most any citizen may make an eloquent and moving speech," he explained. "A fisherman, a sailor, a flock master, a cowboy, a mechanic who communicates to someone else his views, may be making what would be called an oration.

"I have heard men deliver powerful orations in the Senate—men who were not polished speakers, but who were moved by deep emotion of the moment. And some of our most moving speeches have been so because of the speaker's contempt for 'art.'

"Eloquent speech is more or less an outburst of sincere thought or emotion.

"When Cicero spoke," the Senator declaimed, "everybody said, 'how well Cicero speaks.' When Demosthenes spoke, everybody said, 'let us go against Philip.' That is oratory—speech so sincere that it moves people to join the speaker's cause."

The flailing arms, the pounding fist, and waving forelock that most persons think of as the sign of oratory have no fascination for ASHURST. He often has stood calmly in the Senate Chamber, quietly tearing an issue apart with cadenced humor.

"It is unnecessary to use gestures to attain great oratory," he declared. "In fact, I tell the young men who come to me it is better not to.

"A mere recital," he went on, "be it never so beautiful and artful; if involving no vital thing—it might be art, be beautiful—but it could hardly be an oration.

"Above all things," he added, "it is most important to be absolutely fair—fair, truthful, with as near an approach to accuracy as may be possible.

"Any departure from this rule, and the audience loses confidence in the orator, which, of course, is fatal to any hope of moving anybody."

ASHURST was sent to the Senate by the first legislature of Arizona and has been there ever since. But his fame as a master of good-tempered yet effective speech rose in recent years.

His orations have ranged from praise of Woodrow Wilson and condemnation of Huey P. Long to discourse on "the care and feeding of politicians" and eye-watering eulogies of the American cowboy and the old Palace saloon in Prescott, Ariz.

To tone up his voice for a major speech, ASHURST often sings a few verses of that old ballad, Abdul Abulbul Ameer. He chooses Abdul because of its vowels.

"In speaking, you need not worry about your consonants," he says. "Sound your vowels clearly and your speech will be understood."

Temporary National Economic Committee Has Not Proposed Regulation of Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. BYRNES

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, OF WYOMING

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interesting and timely address delivered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], who is chairman of the Temporary National Economic Committee, to the Section of Insurance Law of the American Bar Association at Philadelphia, Pa., on September 11, 1940, and which definitely lays at rest unfounded reports with respect to the insurance industry.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Let me begin this morning by making clear that neither the Temporary National Economic Committee nor any agency connected with it has ever recommended or suggested any legislation providing for Federal regulation of insurance, and that in participating, at the invitation of the officers of the section of insurance law, in this symposium, I do not appear in any sense whatsoever as an advocate of Federal regulation.

It is necessary for me to make this disclaimer because the country has been filled with rumors and reports ever since the beginning of the study of insurance for the Temporary National Economic Committee by the Securities and Exchange Commission that the secret and hidden purpose of the whole proceeding was to lay the basis for some law or laws cutting down the present power and authority of the States. As Chairman of the Temporary National Economic Committee, I have been obliged for more than a year to make denial of such purpose or intent, but my voice has apparently never caught up with the rumors and I have no doubt that this symposium today is the result of the same current of misunderstanding which has attributed to this committee intentions which it has never entertained.

As long ago as November 14, 1939, I wrote a letter to be read at a meeting of the Massachusetts Insurance Society, in which I stated explicitly that "there isn't the slightest basis for the intimations appearing in certain insurance journals that the committee, or any member of its staff, is promoting any scheme for Government competition with the insurance industry."

On February 1, 1940, on the floor of the Senate, in answer to an inquiry directed to me by Senator BYRNES, of South Carolina, "as to whether or not the Committee intends to recommend to the Congress that legislation be enacted providing for Federal supervision of insurance or for some agency of the Government going into the insurance business," I stated explicitly:

"I can say without reservation or qualification of any kind that the Committee has never met to consider recommendations with respect to insurance and no member of the Committee has ever suggested to the chairman that either of the policies which the Senator has just mentioned should be adopted or that any recommendation of that character should be made."

T. N. E. C. HAS NOT RECOMMENDED REGULATION

These are only two of many similar statements which I have made, but because of the persistence of the reports, I venture once again to declare, in the clearest and most emphatic terms, that the Temporary National Economic Committee has never entertained any proposal and the Securities and Exchange Commission and none of its staff has ever presented to the Committee any suggestion for Federal regulation of insurance, for the institution of any plan of Government competition with any branch of insurance, for any law respecting the agency system of selling insurance, or for any program for acquiring insurance company assets. All such reports are fantastic and baseless.

The interest of the Temporary National Economic Committee in the insurance industry has not proceeded from any desire to expand the power or authority of the Federal Government, but has resulted solely from its pursuance of the instructions which were laid upon it by the joint resolution which brought it into existence, to make a full and complete study of the concentration of economic power in and financial control over production and distribution of goods and services in order to determine the causes of such concentration and their effect upon competition.

There never has been the slightest cause for any misunderstanding of this purpose because in the message of President Roosevelt presented to Congress on April 29, 1938, urging the economic study; in the joint resolution which set up the Committee, and in repeated statements by the chairman of the Committee, it has been made clear over and over again that the primary objective of the whole proceeding is the stimulation of our traditional system of free, private enterprise. Never was there greater need in the history of civilization than there is now for united action in defense of the system of private enterprise because it has never stood in greater danger than it does now. With the leaders of the totalitarian states declaring their purpose to destroy both democracy and capitalism in words that cannot be misunderstood and by actions that are even more convincing, with practically all of Europe already subjected to their theory of political and economic government and with Great Britain almost beaten to her knees, certainly it must be clear to us that we cannot permit ourselves to give way to emotional misunderstanding or, I might say, misrepresentation of the purposes of any agency of our Government with respect to the fundamentals of human freedom and private enterprise.

I take the liberty, therefore, in this distinguished company of lawyers, to point out the specific proof of my statement that in its conception and in its whole procedure the Temporary National Economic Committee has devoted itself to the defense of free enterprise because I want no one to go out of this meeting without knowledge of this most important and fundamental fact.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT DECLARES FOR PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

In his message to Congress on April 29, 1938, urging an investigation of the concentration of economic power, President Roosevelt left no doubt of his purpose:

"If you believe with me in private initiative," said he, "you must acknowledge the right of well managed small business to expect to make reasonable profits."

Again he said:

"But generally over the field of industry and finance we must revive and strengthen competition if we wish to preserve and make workable our traditional system of free, private enterprise."

I could quote many other extracts from this message, but will content myself with the following sentence from the President's description of the fundamental purpose of the study he was recommending:

"It is a program to preserve private enterprise for profit by keeping it free enough to be able to utilize all our resources of capital and labor at a profit."

As already indicated, the resolution which created the Committee placed special emphasis upon the necessity of maintaining competition or, in other words, private enterprise, and finally, as chairman of the Committee, I have never lost an opportunity to state over and over again my deep conviction that the solution of the economic troubles of our people and of the world does not lie along the road of expanding government activity or government control over private enterprise, but upon the reduction of such control to a minimum and upon the stimulation and encouragement of free enterprise on the part of the people.

How does it come, therefore, that there should be so widespread a misunderstanding both of the purposes of this Committee and of the problem that confronts the world? A discussion of insurance and insurance law affords a convenient opportunity for suggesting the answer and I welcome the opportunity to participate. There could be no more appropriate forum in which to develop the subject than this, because, curiously enough, while the Temporary National Economic Committee has never suggested Federal regulation of insurance, the American Bar Association Committee on Insurance Law has definitely done so, and in times past it has been at great pains to try to prove that the business of insurance is in fact a part of interstate commerce and should be regarded as within the regulatory powers of the Federal Congress.

AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION RECOMMENDED FEDERAL CONTROL

In 1905 the predecessors of the gentlemen who make up this "Section of Insurance Law of the American Bar Association" to whom I am now speaking, concluded a very exhaustive report with this clear declaration:

"Your committee (of the American Bar Association) therefore recommend:

"1. Legislation by Congress providing for the supervision of insurance.

"2. The repeal of all valued policy laws.

"3. A uniform fire policy, the terms of which shall be specifically defined.

"4. The repeal of all retaliatory tax laws.

"5. Stricter incorporation laws in the several States as they affect the creation of insurance companies; and a Federal statute prohibiting the use of the mails to all persons, associations, or corporations transacting the business of insurance in disregard of State or Federal regulations" (Reports of American Bar Association, 1905, vol. XXVIII, p. 516).

If this recommendation had proceeded from any member of the Securities and Exchange Commission or of the Temporary National Economic Committee instead of from the American Bar Association, I shudder to think of the charges that would have been leveled at our heads.

But your predecessors were not alone in this position. The truth is that every specific suggestion for the expansion of Federal power over the insurance business with which I am familiar has proceeded either from the Bar Association or from the insurance companies themselves. In the Insurance Blue Book, published in 1877 from the offices of the Insurance Monitor and the Insurance Law Journal at 176 Broadway, New York City, I find on page 32 this interesting bit of history:

"The natural result of Federal success (in the Civil War) was the centralization of governmental authority. * * * Not alone was the concentration of power at Washington shown in political acts, in the control of the conquered territory, and the management of the national finances, but in the jurisdiction assumed by the Federal courts, and the whole spirit of their decisions. * * * It is no wonder that, under such circumstances, the attention of the agency companies was turned to Washington for protection against the aggressive acts of hostile legislatures. Relief from this source was strongly agitated during 1865 and 1866. In November 1865 the companies appointed a committee to draft a suitable national law and secure its passage by Congress. * * * An act was prepared accordingly providing for the appointment of an insurance commissioner by the President and the establishment of a bureau at Washington, where all deposits, fees, and other expenses of agency companies were to be exclusively paid, and their returns made for all other than local business."

INSURANCE COMPANIES SOUGHT FEDERAL REGULATION

The proposed bill was not enacted, but the effort of insurance companies to secure Federal regulation of insurance did not end. In 1892 there was introduced into Congress another bill to provide for Federal supervision. This bill was drafted at the direction of John M. Pattison, president of the Union Central Life Insurance Co. Again, in 1897, United States Senator Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, a State which was the domicile then, as now, of some of the most important insurance companies in the country, introduced a Federal control bill substantially in conformity with the proposal of President Pattison, of the Union Central, and, curiously enough, the Supreme Court cases which are now cited by representatives of the insurance industry to deny the Federal power over insurance were brought at the instance of insurance companies for the express purpose of escaping State regulation and substituting Federal rule of insurance in its place.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding of my own position, I want to say at this juncture that I would not give my support to any legislative proposal which would have the effect of weakening the power of the States in the field of insurance law, and when I cite these instances of the activity of insurance companies to broaden the Federal power over insurance I do it for the purpose of making clear the unfortunate confusion of thought and purpose which beclouds our present-day approach to the modern economic problem.

From the very beginning of our history Americans have always sought to reduce Government interference with the activity of the citizen to a minimum. It is a normal and proper attitude of mind, and one with which I completely agree, for the supremacy of the natural person is fundamental to our way of life. As individuals we do not like to have the Government regulating or controlling what we do and as organizations of individuals we feel exactly the same way. But as organizations grow in power, the problem of government in its relation to them becomes increasingly more difficult, for organizations always tend to subordinate the individual. The history of our governmental establishment shows a clear parallel between the growth of the business organization and the growth of the Federal establishment in Washington. Precisely in the same degree that business organizations become national rather than local in their scope, the Federal law regulating business has been enlarged and this enlargement has proceeded at all periods, under all administrations, and without regard to mere political argumentation or aspiration.

HOW INSURANCE COMPANIES OPPOSED STATE REGULATION

I doubt if a more illuminating decision upon the problems of Government and business was ever written than that of Justice Field, in the case of Paul v. Virginia (8 Wall. 168), the first of the Supreme Court tests initiated by the insurance companies for the purpose of escaping further regulation and establishing the principle that Congress has the power, under the commerce clause, to regulate insurance. It is not necessary for me to tell this audience that the State of Virginia had passed a law requiring insurance companies incorporated in other States to make deposit with the treasurer of the State of certain bonds before a license to do business would be issued; that Paul, an agent for certain New York companies, made application for his license, refused to deposit the bonds and proceeded to engage in the business of selling insurance so as to provoke his arrest and throw the question into the courts. The brief filed on behalf of the insurance companies in their attack upon State regulation was based upon three contentions:

1. That a corporation created by the laws of a State is a citizen within the meaning of the Constitution.

2. That the constitutional power of Congress "to regulate commerce" does not exclude commerce carried on by corporations.

3. That the business of insurance is commerce, and that it is not within the power of a State to pass any law regulating insurance carried on among the States.

I need not here mention that Justice Field, in this case, ruled that a contract of insurance is a personal contract, and does not constitute that intercourse among the States which constitutes the commerce over which Congress has jurisdiction.

It is interesting to note, however, not only that this interpretation was rejected by the insurance companies, but that the committee on insurance of the American Bar Association in 1905 also argued that the business of insurance actually is interestate commerce, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding. The following quotation from the 1905 report of the American Bar Association committee on insurance law is of interest:

"In view of the fact that in England insurance is regulated by the Board of Trade; in France, by the Minister of Commerce; in Norway, by the Commercial Registrar; in Austria, by the Tribunal of Commerce; and in the German Empire, by the Central Government, it is fair to affirm that insurance is commerce and has from the beginning been treated as such except in the cases in which the question has been incidentally discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is, however, significant that the majority opinion in the lottery cases makes no reference whatever to the line of cases known as the insurance cases, and the reasonable deduction from this is that their authority has been weakened." (Reports of American Bar Association, 1905, vol. XXVIII, p. 507.)

Returning, however, to the case of Paul v. Virginia, we find the insurance companies arguing that in the interests of efficiency the Federal power should be supreme. "It cannot be supposed," says the brief, "that the Constitution—one of whose objects was to secure a more perfect Union—was intended to be less efficient in these respects than the Articles of Confederation had been. The defect in the Articles of Confederation was not that it imposed too great restrictions upon the powers of the States, but that it was wholly without the protection and support of a supreme Federal power."

This again was the tenor of the contention of the New York Life Insurance Co. in the case which it brought to decision in the October term of the Supreme Court in 1913 against Deer Lodge County, Mont. (231 U. S. 495). In that case counsel for the insurance company, which included Dean Roscoe Pound, of the Harvard Law School, went to great length to prove that a tax levied by the Montana county on certain assets of the company was "illegal, unlawful, and void, for that said defendant was without jurisdiction to levy or collect said tax, and the levy and collection thereof was and is a burden upon interstate commerce contrary to section 8, article I, of the Constitution of the United States." Seemingly, nothing was left unsaid to support the contention that the business of insurance, as carried on by the New York Life Insurance Co. in Montana, was interstate commerce. Special emphasis was laid upon the allegation that all decisions were rendered in New York, that the authority of the Montana representative was strictly limited, that applications were received solely for the purpose of transmission to the home office, and that the use of the United States mails was essential to practically every step in the transaction of the insurance business. It is appropriate to remark here that Justice Charles Evans Hughes, now Chief Justice, and Justice Van Devanter dissented from this decision.

In another case, New York Life Insurance Co. v. Cravens (178 U. S. 389), the company pointed out that it is a mutual company, and as such "was the administrator of a fund collected from its policyholders in different States and countries for their benefit," and it was pointed out not only that the modern business of life insurance had taken on a national and even an international character but that when Paul v. Virginia was decided insurance was "to a great extent local." The brief continued the argument, saying: "The great and commanding organizations of the present day had hardly begun the amazing development which has made them the greatest associations of administrative trusts in the business world." And for these reasons the insurance companies over a period extending from 1868 to 1913 have argued in the Federal courts for Federal supervision of insurance, while they have promoted until as late as the early years of the present century the introduction in both Houses of Congress of bills expanding the Federal power over the insurance business.

CORPORATIONS DO NOT HAVE RIGHTS OF CITIZENS

My purpose today is not to play upon the change of attitude by insurance companies but to survey these cases and these arguments in an effort to discern the nature of the economic problem with which we are contending. It is because, in my opinion, the case of Paul v. Virginia is explicit upon this point that I regard it to be of primary importance, not so much upon the question of whether insurance is or is not commerce within the meaning of the Federal Constitution but because this case clearly defines the difference between a citizen and a corporation. It was the contention of the insurance companies at a time when State regulation was felt by them to be too onerous that corporations were citizens under the Constitution and thus entitled, under section 2 of article IV, "to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." In rejecting this argument, Justice Field reasserted the principle the violation of which through the world has been the chief cause of the distress and disorder that afflicts our era, namely, that the citizen for whom the Declaration of Independence was written and for whom the Constitution was drafted is the natural citizen, and not the artificial person created by law to carry on commerce.

Every lawyer in America well grounded in the history of his Government and in the development of our institutions must know this to be the fact. I have been proud to find it written in the Constitution of the State of Wyoming, which declares, in article I, section 33, that:

"Corporations being creatures of the State, endowed for the public good with a portion of its sovereign powers, must be subject to its control."

We have lost sight of this distinction and have persisted in treating the corporation as though it were a natural person, and in extending to it the very privileges and immunities of citizenship which under the decision of the Supreme Court it does not possess. The result has been that with the constantly growing power of economic organizations which have spread their realms across State lines, across oceans and continents, the natural person in the economic field has found himself outmatched and overpowered.

I think the language of Justice Field in Paul against Virginia should be read over and over again by every lawyer and every legislator in America. Let me read it to you who have gathered here:

"Now a grant of corporate existence is a grant of special privileges to the corporators, enabling them to act for certain designated purposes as a single individual, and exempting them (unless otherwise specially provided) from individual liability. The corporation being the mere creation of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created. As said by this court in Bank of Augusta against Earle, 'it must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty.' The recognition of its existence even by other States, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of those States—a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers are prejudicial to their interests or repugnant to their policy. Having no absolute right of recognition in other States, but depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows, as a matter of course, that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those States may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely; they may restrict its business to particular localities; or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as in their judgment will best promote the public interest. The whole matter rests in their discretion.

"If, on the other hand, the provision of the Constitution could be construed to secure to citizens of each State in other States the peculiar privileges conferred by their laws, an extraterritorial operation would be given to local legislation utterly destructive of the independence and the harmony of the States. At the present day corporations are multiplied to an almost indefinite extent. There is scarcely a business pursued requiring the expenditure of large capital, or the union of large numbers, that is not carried on by corporations. It is not too much to say that the wealth and business of the country are to a great extent controlled by them. And if, when composed of citizens of one State, their corporate powers and franchises could be exercised in other States without restriction, it is easy to see that, with the advantages thus possessed, the most important business of those States would soon pass into their hands. The principal business of every State would, in fact, be controlled by corporations created by other States."

THE GROWTH OF ORGANIZED BUSINESS

This decision was prophetic. The condition Justice Field feared is now a reality. The principal business of every State in the Federal Union is today controlled by corporations created by other States not because of any change of principle and law but because modern business has taken on an increasingly national aspect. Nay, more than that, a large portion of the business of the world is now controlled by such corporations and, in my opinion, it was precisely because the statesmen and lawyers of Europe had completely lost touch with their inherited social wisdom that the present world crisis is upon us. Political freedom is being undermined because economic freedom has been lost. The economic state, outgrowing the geographical boundaries of the political state, has had effects upon the economic life of the people which the political states have not been able successfully to regulate in the public interest because economic organization and political organization are wholly out of adjustment. The consequence has been the growth of the totalitarian or socialist states and the attack upon both capitalism and democracy which now threatens civilization itself.

The rapid expansion of economic organization has been a world development to be noted here in America as well as in Europe. There is nothing hostile to the insurance industry or to those who are engaged in it in the fact that the studies of the Temporary National Economic Committee have demonstrated beyond cavil that a high degree of concentration of economic power and wealth exist in this industry. When this study began, Justice Douglas, then Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, asserted that no policyholder need be concerned that the facts to be brought out in the testimony would in any way jeopardize the protection which he counts upon, and when the hearing was drawing to its conclusion I made an opportunity to say that "I am personally satisfied that there is not a single responsible official of any of these companies who is not as sincerely interested in restoring and promoting economic prosperity in the United States as is any public official." With respect to certain testimony that was produced to show that in the huge mutual companies policyholders exercise no function in the selection of their officers, I was careful to say, "So far as any testimony produced before the committee is concerned, all of these companies are operated in full compliance with the laws of the State by which chartered and in which they operate."

Ours was not another Armstrong committee, such as was led by Chief Justice Hughes a generation or more ago, to ferret out wrongdoing by insurance executives or to pillory the insurance industry, individually or collectively. It was solely a study to determine the facts with respect to the effect upon our economic system of the concentration of assets which now are controlled in this business.

THE MAGNITUDE OF INSURANCE-COMPANY ASSETS

It is known, for example, to every inhabitant of this country who is alive to conditions that the problem of small business is one of the most serious with which we have to deal. Of almost two and one-half million business units in the United States, more than 90 percent have assets amounting to less than $250,000 each.

These units have difficulty in obtaining both credit and venture capital and the insurance companies to whom, through the payment of premiums, the savings of the people flow, can be of little help to them. The directors of insurance companies are trustees and when they invest the company assets they must place those assets in investments which they regard to be sound and in which the investment of insurance funds is permitted by law. They are not interested in providing venture capital and their size is so great that they are not interested in providing the small credit loans which small business requires. It is the securities of large industrial and commercial organizations or the securities of Government that appeal to the administrators of insurance-company assets, and our study showed that as of December 31, 1938, the 49 largest, legal, reserve life-insurance companies owned 11 percent of the direct and guaranteed debt of the United States Government; 9.9 percent of all State, city, and municipal and political subdivisional debt; 22.9 percent of all railroad bonds; 22 percent of the entire public-utility debt; 15 percent of the industrial debt; 11 percent of all farm mortgages; 14 percent of all city mortgages.

It is significant that of investments in which individuals are the borrowers, except in the case of policyholders borrowing on their own policies, only farm mortgages and city mortgages attracted insurance-company funds. In many instances city mortgages were taken out by large organizations, but in the case of both urban and rural mortgages, in which the natural person was a contracting party, the security was tangible real property.

The assets of insurance companies increased in the period between 1910 and 1938, less than 3 decades, from $3,867,000,000 to $27,755,000,000, or almost sevenfold, and the annual income of these companies now exceeds $5,000,000,000, thus approximating the annual receipts of the Government of the United States itself. To put it in another way the annual income of the companies today is greater than all the assets were 28 years ago. The striking fact is that the 5 largest life-insurance companies own more than half of all insurance-company assets. Of equal importance is the fact that 16 companies which are domiciled in New York, and in New England, hold 74.1 percent of all insurance-company assets. It is true that these assets are invested all over the country and premiums which are paid in by policyholders in every State, find their way back, in one way or another, into the individual States. Approximately 21 States receive in investments more than they contribute by way of premiums, but these investments, for the most part, are Government bonds, railroad bonds, utilities, and other industrial bonds and stocks of what we call big business, mortgages, real estate, and policy loans.

Thus do we find in the economic story of the insurance companies the reflection of our economic condition. This study is not an argument for any particular form of legislation. It is a part of the diagnosis of economic conditions or, in other words, the revelation of economic facts without which no sound judgment can be pronounced upon any program for the restoration of prosperity. There is nothing in this study, so far as I am aware, that is of any importance at all as turning upon the question of State control or Federal control of insurance or of any other industry. The significance goes much deeper. Indeed, it plumbs the depths of our modern dilemma for it has shown in a striking way the relation between the citizens as a natural person and the organizations which are created to serve the citizen and which ought to promote his individual and social welfare.

PROSPERITY OF PEOPLE COMES FIRST

If there is one thing clear to me as a result of this study, it is a very simple fact which no one will deny, but which we seldom take time to consider, namely, that the prosperity of any corporation or of any government depends first, last, and all the time upon the prosperity of the individual. The success of the insurance industry has been a result of the fact that the commodity which it has to sell is security and safety for the natural person. If the natural person is not safe and secure, if he is without property, if he is without employment, if he does not know where his next meal is coming from, he is a source of danger to both business and government and the salvation of democratic institutions depends entirely upon the degree to which economic and political organizations make it possible for natural persons to have jobs, to own property, and to pursue their happiness in peace and security.

There never has been a time in the history of our Government that this has not been the fundamental concept of our people, nor has there ever been a time since the Constitution was drafted that, as a Nation, we have failed to place the interests of people first. In both sectors of our dual Government, through the State legislatures and through the Federal Congress, we have pursued an undeviating course of legislation upon the principle that human rights come before property rights. We have tried to keep authority local because we believe in the freedom of the individual, but when local authority has proved to be inadequate for the protection of human rights, we have not hesitated to turn to Federal authority.

The Congress of the United States has been reluctant to use the commercial power to impose rigid regulation upon the business activity of the citizen, either as an individual or in groups, and laws have been enacted only when abuses became so great that they could no longer go without a remedy. In the courts, as well as in the legislatures, we have preferred to keep our governmental functions as close to the people as possible.

This explains decisions like Paul against Virginia and New York Life Insurance Co. against Deer Lodge. In each instance a State statute was being construed and the court was not oblivious of the fact that to invalidate the statute would mean to destroy a regulation in the public interest which the States had deemed it wise to impose in a field in which the Federal Government had not yet acted. The fact that the Federal Government does not exercise a power granted to it by the Constitution does not, of course, deprive the Federal Government of that power and the history of our business legislation demonstrates conclusively that as business becomes more and more concentrated, as it becomes more national and international in its scope, the inevitable result is the expansion of the Federal power.

We have seen the steady extension of this power since the Civil War keeping pace with the national growth of commerce and industry. We saw the National Bank Act in 1864 followed in due course by the Interstate Commerce Act, by the Federal Trade Commission Act, the Securities and Exchange Commission Act, the Radio Commission Act, and the like, each a direct result of a growing need for the protection of the individual in an increasingly complex economic world. Even today in the field of insurance there is, for example, no effective State power to regulate the sale of insurance by radio or the sale of insurance by mail. In these as in many other instances, the expansion of business has followed in the wake of scientific progress. This illustrates how the adjustment of State power and Federal power is constantly changing its forms and why it is difficult, if not impossible, to draw the line of demarcation anywhere in the field of commerce between State power and Federal power.

DEMOCRACY NEEDED BOTH IN BUSINESS AND GOVERNMENT

This distinction is not in fact of any great importance as long as the Government belongs to the people. The important distinction is the line which divides the rights of the individual from the collective power of groups of individuals, whether that collective power is exercised by business or Government organizations. When it is oppressively exercised by business organizations it takes on the vices of monopoly. When it is arbitrarily exercised by Government it assumes the vices of tyranny. The mistake which is being made in the totalitarian states of Europe is the belief that only arbitrary government can furnish an antidote for the failure of huge business organizations to provide social justice. Arbitrary government is not the remedy for arbitrary economic power. It is not necessary to substitute collectivism in government, run by political dictators, for collectivism in business, run by economic despots. It is only necessary to learn how to adjust the huge economic power represented in the modern corporation to the social needs of the natural person.

The whole purpose and function of the Temporary National Economic Committee has been to marshall the significant facts of our modern organized economy in order that the patriotic good sense of our leaders in business and in government may assert itself in such a way as to preserve democracy and the right of private property, to keep people free, and to keep business free, and to guarantee to the natural persons who compose the population of America the prosperity and happiness for the achievement of which we certainly have the resources if only we have the intelligence and the tolerance to use them for the benefit of all. Thus can we continue to make government in America an instrument of liberty.

Is Constitutional Government On Its Way Out?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt and his chief political spokesman, Henry Wallace, the candidate for Vice President, as well as other supporters of the New Deal administration, are striving their utmost to make it appear that Mr. Roosevelt is running against Adolf Hitler in the campaign.

Of course, the technique of the New Deal administration is unchanged. From the day it went into power the scheme of the New Deal has always been to kick up so much dust, to create so much fear and excitement, and to put so many issues before the people that they would be blinded to the fallacies and the failures of the administration.

It has now become perfectly obvious that the administration is entirely willing to use the war issue and to involve us in controversies with foreign nations in order to divert the attention of the people from the gross and insolent violation of the anti-third-term tradition; and from the failure of the administration to solve the unemployment problem, the farm problem, any problem that faced the Nation at the time the New Deal went into power.

It is, of course, understandable that the new dealers would thus attempt to divert the attention of the people from the real domestic issues of this campaign and from this constant drive toward a totalitarian government in this country. Nobody, from President Roosevelt down, dares go before the people on the issue of a third term, or on any issues of solving the domestic problems which are vastly more immediate and more dangerous to this Nation than is that of any invasion by a foreign foe.

If constitutional government goes down in the United States, and the liberties of our people are lost, it will be by assault from within and not by assault from without. If our economy disintegrates, it will be from failures of the administration, in the last 8 years, to solve those problems and to relieve those stresses which tend toward disintegration of our economic system, and not from any pressures from without.

If this Government fails, if this Nation loses its liberty, it will be because of an arrogant political bureaucracy built up by the New Deal; because of a national debt driven through the roof by the extravagances of this arrogant and all-powerful bureaucracy; because of the discontent of millions of Americans to whom the New Deal has offered the W. P. A. as a permanent way of life; because of the manufactured fears and the simulated panics, and the fictitious emergencies that have been brought up 67 or 68 times in the last 8 years, in order to frighten the people of this Nation into consenting to clothe Mr. Roosevelt with dictatorial powers.

Put the third-term issue alongside the method of trading off the 50 destroyers and see what sort of a prospect it gives this Nation under 4 years more of the New Deal. Mr. Roosevelt seized an occasion to present to the Congress and the people an accomplished fact—a fact established under the most un-American secrecy, and by the most un-American dictatorial means. If the gentleman gets 4 years more in the White House, there will follow inevitably a whole flock of faits accompli, achieved in exactly the same way—by secrecy and by dictatorial methods.

There are two great issues now confronting this Nation. One is Mr. Roosevelt's brazen demand for perpetuity in office. The Chicago convention did not draft Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Roosevelt drafted the Chicago convention. The second great issue is whether or not the people are to say whether their Navy is to be traded off, whether their tanks—obsolete though they be—and our best airplanes and guns essential to our national defense are to be secretly dickered away, and finally as to whether or not the President shall have the power sooner or later to declare our whole Army obsolete, and turn that over to some foreign ally.

And back behind that stands a third issue—the issue of solving our domestic problems which threaten the peace and security of this Nation. The people will have a chance to make their decision at the ballot boxes next November.

Aid by the United States to Great Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

RADIO DISCUSSIONS ON THE FORUM OF THE AIR

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two discussions which took place on the American Forum of the Air dealing with the subject of aid to Great Britain by the United States, one discussion taking place on August 25, 1940, the other on September 1, 1940. The first discussion dealt with the subject, Shall the United States Make Available to England Some of Its World War Destroyers, and the second discussion dealt with the subject How Far Shall the United States Aid Great Britain? Several Senators participated in the discussion.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The American Forum of the Air, August 25, 1940]

SHALL THE UNITED STATES MAKE AVAILABLE TO ENGLAND SOME OF ITS WORLD WAR DESTROYERS?

(Senator Claude Pepper, of Florida; Senator Gerald P. Nye, of North Dakota; Senator John A. Danaher, of Connecticut; Col. Henry Breckinridge, noted lawyer and formerly Assistant Secretary of War)

Announcer Stephen McCormick. Listeners from coast to coast are invited to hear the American Forum of the Air. We bring you another program presented by WOL in cooperation with WOR, emanating from the Willard Room of the Willard Hotel, in Washington, D. C.

Information on how to obtain a copy of tonight's proceedings will be given at the conclusion of the broadcast.

Tonight the American Forum of the Air will be presented in two parts. First you will hear prepared statements. This will be followed by an informal panel discussion.

This series of educational discussions now in its twelfth year is arranged and directed by Theodore Granik, founder and director of the American Forum of the Air and of the American Forum, a nationally syndicated newspaper feature. Mr. Granik presides as chairman and moderator.

Mr. Theodore Granik. Thank you, Mr. McCormick. As the world awaits the long-heralded battle of Great Britain, America is faced with a vital decision—upon which may depend the fate of the British Empire—and perhaps our own national defense and safety.

Some say that England has lost heavily in destroyers; and if she loses more, say military experts, she may lose control of her coastal seas, a vital blow to the heart of her empire.

In a dramatic radio broadcast to the Nation and to the world, General John J. Pershing, World War commander of the American forces, recently made a strong appeal for immediate action to aid the British Fleet. He urged the United States to help Great Britain by making available at least 50 of our overage destroyers left from the World War.

Similar appeal was made by William C. Bullitt, Ambassador to France, who urged the transfer of these destroyers to Britain on the grounds that Germany is certain to attack the United States if Britain is defeated.

These appeals have aroused widespread controversy. Supporters of these views describe Great Britain as the only nation left to defend democracy and liberty in Europe, and maintain that the way to defend the American heritage is to do everything within America's power to aid Great Britain.

Opponents, however, stress the need of doubling the size of our Navy, point to the appropriations that have passed Congress to make it so, and ask how much we can spare out of a navy that's only half big enough—especially if the emergency confronting the United States is as serious as some maintain?

And while William Allen White, noted Kansan editor and chairman of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, claims that if Britain falls, the United States is left overwhelmed in naval strength, standing alone and friendless in the world; others charge that such transfer makes mockery of our declared policy of neutrality and nonintervention and that it would be an act of belligerency and of war.

As the Nation ponders this vital question, the American Forum of the Air presents a discussion on the subject tonight.

We are privileged to have as our speakers Senators Claude Pepper, of Florida; Gerald P. Nye, of North Dakota; and John A. Danaher, of Connecticut; and Col. Henry Breckinridge, noted lawyer and formerly Assistant Secretary of War.

Following short prepared statements by each of our participants, they will engage in an informal, extemporaneous, round-table panel discussion.

We cordially invite our listening audience to send us their letters and comments on tonight's presentation.

And now our opening speaker, Senator PEPPER.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR CLAUDE PEPPER

"The time has come when we must rise up as a united people to make secure our country's independence and our great inheritance of constitutional liberty. If the destroyers will save the British Fleet, they may save us from the danger and hardship of another war." In those moving words, the greatest soldier of our time, General Pershing, to the American people appealed, as I am appealing tonight to send to Britain the aid which she needs and which we can spare.

We have 236 destroyers, more than 100 of which, built for the World War, were condemned as obsolete and selling for $5,000 apiece until the war broke out, when, under the state of limited emergency, the Secretary of the Navy undertook to recondition them. Upon Britain's much-reduced number of destroyers has fallen the heavy and crucial task of guarding the entire sea lanes that lead to England and convoying the ships that bring to England the food and the materials that enable her to continue the fight. Submarines, dive bombers, and now shore batteries have taken heavy toll of those destroyers. Today Great Britain may have no more than 100 destroyers in active service. The addition of 50 of ours, which can be in Britain's hands in 10 days, added to their present small force, may be the difference between victory and defeat.

Misguided men who argue we are endangering our safety by abandoning vessels necessary to our safety entirely misunderstand the role of the American Fleet. Destroyers, like all other warships, are not built to keep at home. They are built solely to keep the enemy from our shores. These 50 World War destroyers could be of no higher service to their country's safety than if by maintaining England's naval supremacy they can keep England's enemy and our own from the shores of the United States. The destruction of the British Navy would be the turning point of our Atlantic Maginot Line. As Admiral Stanley said, the Atlantic is our protection only so long as the control of that ocean rests with us or our friends. When the control passes to an enemy, this ocean becomes a broad highway by which the enemy can throttle and destroy us.

The destruction of the British Fleet even without its addition to that of the dictators would leave us faced in each ocean with a navy superior to our own or any that we can built in the next 5 years. With the British Fleet making common cause with us, ready to aid us in the defense of our country and our continent that might be attacked, there is no navy or combination of navies in the world which can put an enemy upon our soil.

As has been pointed out, we have not really had to defend the Monroe Doctrine with a navy of our own for over a hundred years, because no enemy could get through the British Navy to this hemisphere from the exits of Europe. The American Continent cannot be defended by one navy of less than colossal proportions, because, although you may not realize it, there are 43,000 miles of coastline around the Western Hemisphere from Iceland, by Cape Horn, to Alaska. It is only 1,600 miles from a great harbor on the west coast of South Africa which, with the British Fleet out of the way, will fall into German and Italian hands, to the bulge of the east coast of Brazil, while it is 3,300 miles from the United States to that point. It will not take two navies to defend this continent if the British Navy is out of the way, even considering it is not in German hands; it will take three navies, one to watch the Japanese in the Pacific, one to patrol this continent, and another to stop an enemy on the other side of the Atlantic. Of course, if the British Navy were to fall into German hands, as the French Navy did, as the German Navy fell into the hands of the Allies in 1918, we would be so overwhelmingly outclassed in naval strength that our enemies in combination could land an army upon this continent, if not upon this country, at any time they chose to do so.

Of course, at colossal expense, we are almost doubling the American Navy, and justly so; but it takes 4 years, even if our yards were not crowded, to build a battleship, 3 years to build a cruiser, 1 to 2 years to build a destroyer.

Hitler, in possession of all the shipyards of Europe from Norway to the Mediterranean, and certainly if he had the great shipyards of England, would be able to outbuild us at least three to one in naval construction. These are not fancies—they are facts which responsible leaders and statesmen must take into account in the formulation of national policy and national defense.

Listen to these words of Hitler: "Each country will imagine that it alone will escape. I shall not even need to destroy them one by one. Selfishness and lack of foresight will prevent each fighting until it is too late."

Day by day increased evidence comes to hand that the destruction of the United States is part of Hitler's plan. His book, Mein Kampf, makes it clear. Rauschning, once his lieutenant, has added that, "In the National Socialist view, the political situation in America is unstable and can be developed into an outright revolution; to do this is both a tactical aim of national socialism, in order to hold America aloof from Europe, and a political one in order to bring both North and South America into the new order. But it is tactics of universal menace national socialism is preparing to occupy the key possessions for colonial domination, for domination of the great sea routes, and for the domination of America and the Pacific.

When Hitler gathered his forces to strike at Czechoslovakia in the fateful summer of 1938, Chamberlain turned away speaking of Czechoslovakia as "a far-away country of which we know nothing."

Britain today is paying dearly for that mistake.

When Hitler gathered his forces to strike at France in the spring of 1940, the French people waited, secure in the belief that the Maginot Line was an impassable barrier.

France today is paying dearly for her mistake.

Today some people in America are still referring to Britain as "A far-away country of which we know nothing." Some people still see in the rapidly narrowing Atlantic Ocean an impassable barrier, as the French people saw the Maginot Line.

Tomorrow we may pay dearly for that mistake.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator PEPPER. Our next speaker, Senator JOHN A. DANAHER, of Connecticut. Senator DANAHER.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR JOHN A. DANAHER

Thank you, Mr. Granik. Good evening, friends, both seen and unseen.

The question before us for discussion is, Shall the United States make available to England some of its World War destroyers? The immediate answer is, Yes, if the United States wishes to engage in war. Let there be no mistake upon that point. If the United States as a Nation supplies war vessels to another nation at war, the United States will be in that war. England knows this, and that is why she really desires a political commitment from us, not our old destroyers.

In my 6 minutes tonight, I approach the question as one whose first duty is owed to the United States of America as a nation, and I regard our own national interests as paramount.

On June 15, 1917, President Woodrow Wilson approved the statute now on the books which reads, in part: "During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, it shall be unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war, or converted from a private vessel into a vessel of war, with any intent or under any agreement or contract, written or oral, that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent nation * * * after its departure from the jurisdiction of the United States." Obviously, then, at the outset any attempt by anyone to send out such war vessels to belligerents is unlawful by our own declaration.

When we passed the Defense Act 8 weeks ago, Congress said: "Nothing herein shall be construed to repeal or modify the statute" I just referred to. Only 1 month ago the Congress again said: "No vessel, ship, or boat now in the United States Navy or being built, or hereafter built therefor, shall be disposed of by sale or otherwise, or be chartered or scrapped, except as now provided by law." This is the law of the United States.

In the Hague Convention which we signed, we as a nation expressly agreed that the law among nations should read: "The supply, in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent power, of warships, ammunition, or war material of any kind whatever, is forbidden."

We have uniformly condemned those nations which have broken their treaties, and I believe our foreign policy should demand a longer view of world affairs than is to be found in advocating a breach by our United States of its own treaties and conventions.

During our Civil War Great Britain fitted out the Alabama and other war vessels for use against the North. After the war our claims against Great Britain led to a treaty concluded right here in Washington on May 8, 1881, by the terms of which the United States and Great Britain bound themselves, and they agreed—and I quote: "A neutral government is bound first to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war. * * * And the high contracting parties agree to observe these rules as between themselves in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime powers."

The United States of America collected from Great Britain $15,000,000 in gold as damages for England's part in the affair. Why, since the present war began our own Secretary of State called a conference at Panama in which on October 3, 1939, the foreign ministers of all the American republics in the Panama Convention resolved—and I quote, in part: "That with regard to their status as neutrals, there exist certain standards recognized by the American republics applicable in these circumstances, and that in accordance with them, they shall prevent the setting on foot of any military, naval, or aerial expedition in the interests of the belligerents, the fitting out or arming of any ship or vessel to be applied in the service of one of the belligerents, to cruise or commit hostilities against another belligerent."

We called that convention. It was the United States who stimulated this agreement by which our American republics condemned the arming or fitting out of ships or vessels to be employed in the service of one of the belligerents. That is our own language. Suppose Brazil or Argentina turned over their warships to Germany—one of the very things the convention conceivably was designed to prevent. What status or standing will our word and our position have among these nations if we are to violate what we ourselves said is the law?

No, my friends; in our own national interest the United States of America must regard principle even if she is the only Nation in the world doing so.

Supplying any destroyers to England is a recognized act of war, and the American people should fully realize it.

There is many another reason why we should not send our destroyers to England, but let me read the warning issued by Thomas Jefferson, who said: "I have ever deemed it fundamental for the United States never to take an active part in the quarrels of Europe. Their political interests are entirely distinct from ours. Their mutual jealousies, their balance of power, their complicated alliances, their forms and principles of government, are all foreign to us. They are nations of eternal war."

It doesn't make any difference how old the destroyers are. They are in commission. We have no allies, not even one. Nobody is fighting our war. But if we make available some of our destroyers for use in her war, which she declared without any conference with us, inevitably we enter that war. So I answer the question, absolutely no. I believe our Nation should stay out of that war.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator DANAHER. And as our third speaker we present Col. Henry Breckinridge, noted lawyer and former Assistant Secretary of War. Colonel Breckinridge.

ADDRESS BY HENRY BRECKINRIDGE

The United States should make available to England some of its World War destroyers.

An increasing number of Americans are coming to realize that they are not watching a thrilling movie but are in the midst of the greatest human crisis since Genghis Khan and his Mongol horde ravaged nearly all the known world and perilously threatened the utter destruction of western civilization. In treachery, terror, and tyranny, Hitler with his jackal Mussolini are the greatest threat ever made to civilized man in the annals of modern history.

For weal or woe, during a century, consciously or unconsciously, the peoples of the Western Hemisphere have builded their policy and their armament on the fact that the Atlantic is controlled by the British Fleet. Whether or not we like the English is beside the point. For the last quarter of a century the United States has maintained its fleet in the Pacific for the security of our defenses in that ocean. To build a gigantic navy adequate for our protection in both oceans, to munition it, to man it with trained personnel would take at least from 5 to 7 years, and cost prodigious sums, and then not give security even if we are not attacked before that time. For if Britain falls, Hitler comes into control of a shipbuilding capacity six to eight times our own.

Unless the Munich umbrella has become the immutable symbol of the dying democracies of the world, the United States will not permit the conquest of the British Isles without doing everything in its power to prevent it. It is my profound conviction that the conquest of Britain by the tyrants will spell the doom of American liberty, if not the actual destruction of its independence. In case of that catastrophe, survival alone can be obtained by America concentrating every dollar of its income over the bare cost of subsistence on creating an invincible armed camp.

Fifty destroyers to England today may be worth five hundred to us 5 weeks from now. They may turn the tide of battle against our declared enemies. If Rauschning can be believed, Hitler has already outlined to him in the past his plan for the destruction of America. Hitler's even less discreet jackal, Mussolini, in his very formal declaration of war, indicated the United States as one of his enemies.

Let us be realists and look the facts in the face. In the Pacific the only potential enemy with a great sea power is Japan. We have no intention of waging offensive war against Japan. Fifty World War destroyers turned over instantly to Great Britain will not affect seriously the defensive power of the United States against the Japanese Fleet. Our preponderant strength in capital ships, our heavy and light cruisers, our other destroyers and submarines are by wide margin sufficient to keep the Japanese Navy west of Hawaii. Fifty destroyers added to the British defense forces this moment may well avoid the necessity some day of sustaining united attack upon us by the German, Italian, and Japanese Navies, reinforced by the captured remnants of the British and French Navies.

Britain needs no more capital ships. They are virtually useless in the narrow waters where the vortex of the battle now rages. Large ships must have room for maneuver with advance elements, cruisers, destroyers, and submarines. Small craft are the vital necessity in the present stage of the battle in the English Channel.

Send the destroyers, and send them now. In conjunction with other elements of the British Fleet and the British air power, they will take their toll of the enemy of mankind. Let us not be deluded by the American counterpart of the men who brought to ruin every free nation of western Europe, and led a sleeping Britain to the verge of the abyss. Let us not leave to historians the task of analyzing the cause of our downfall, but let us take every practical step to avert it. The immediate essential is to send these destroyers to Britain in the hour of her need. No greater service to the security and interest of the United States ever can be rendered at so small a cost. Beyond the considerations of materialism and security we shall make a vital contribution to the freedom of mankind.

This is a war of annihilation. Starting with the blinding and enslavement of their own peoples, Hitler and Mussolini are on the march to destroy free civilization. Only their own destruction can accomplish the resurrection of the peoples who lie stunned and crushed under their iron heel. If America, confused by a Babel of tongues, divided by fallacy and sophistry, fails to act, it will court and suffer calamity.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Colonel Breckinridge. And as our concluding speaker we present Senator GERALD P. NYE, of North Dakota. Senator NYE.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR GERALD P. NYE

My answer to the question is most emphatically "No!"

To sell, lease, give, or trade destroyers belonging to the United States to Great Britain or any other party to the present wars would be to plant ourselves in the middle of war as an actual belligerent and to seriously weaken our own defense.

For the very first time in our life, as a Nation, we are being told that our very existence is dependent upon the British Navy and the British Empire, the only power that has ever openly threatened the Americas, the only European power that has ever brought aggression to the Americas.

This is but a continuation of that campaign of fear which can push us further into Europe's war.

What we are urged to fear is that the downfall of Britain will be followed by a Hitler conquest against America. Those who plant fear in the public heart about the inadequacy of our defense are quite the very same people who advocate dispensing with such defense as we already have in the name of helping the Allies with acts short of war, selling or giving them our guns, our destroyers, our planes, these things we need in our own defense.

These destroyers proposed for sale to England were built during the last war. This present emergency has caused them to be reconditioned and recommissioned. They now are ready as a mighty weapon in our hands in the event of attack from abroad, an essential part of our defense. If the worst that fear advocates fear is to come out of the present war against Britain, and Hitler is to be free to concentrate against us, that fleet of destroyers, not the British Navy, are going to be our grand friends and possessions.

We are told each day that our great danger lies in the surrender of the British Navy to Germany if and when Britain is defeated. Now then, what rhyme or reason is there in a program that makes available to Germany our own ships to use against us when she takes over the British Fleet? Are we going to repeat everlastingly that folly and policy that found France surrendering to Germany many American-made planes for use against England?

Grave fear is expressed lest a victorious Hitler would blow up the Panama Canal while a considerable part of our fleet was over in the Pacific. Such would leave us without sufficient naval resistance on the Atlantic coast, it is argued, largely by the same people who insist that we give England a substantial part of that naval strength we do have on the east coast—these destroyers. But these possibilities do give us an obligation. We must keep and afford an adequate preparedness. The last thing we can afford to do is to lose what we already have for use in such an event, these destroyers and more.

It is argued that we should send our destroyers to England to help her resist invasion, beat Hitler, and thus serve and insure our own national security.

Now then, if our own security and interest requires the sending of 50 or more of our destroyers to England, why not send enough to make certain that invasion is resisted, even though it might require our entire Naval Establishment with our men. Why, in the name of a national interest, send just old ships, why not send them the newest and the best that we have? If there is undertaking to honestly answer that question, the answer will be mine to the question: "Shall we make available to England some of our World War destroyers?" If it were true that we should aid England because she is fighting our war, we would do better to get into it with all we've got rather than a few destroyers. We'd be in a sorry state indeed if England not only lost the war but our destroyers too.

Suppose, now, that with our 50 or more destroyers England successfully resists invasion. Will these destroyers then be turned to another task and be used in a British invasion of Europe to accomplish the obliteration of that constant threat of totalitarian powers? Ah, think what more than destroyers will be necessary to accomplish this—tanks, material, planes, and landing forces. To insure this freedom, will we then follow through and furnish that more that is needed? Mr. Churchill says this war is only a continuation of the last, which it is indeed. Mr. Churchill, of course, would wish us to make common cause with Britain to the extent of furnishing the destroyers, at this time. But what besides destroyers when destroyers are not enough to finish in a full way this continuation of the last war?

We need not be foolish however blind we may be to the real purpose behind this British appeal for our destroyers. The military demonstrations abroad, the invitation-to-trouble conduct of our foreign policy by this administration, and plain common sense dictate our need for an improved defense. We have appropriated billions to provide additions to our existing defense. Our destroyers, all of them, new, old, and on order, are a part of that defense. Those in authority who dare speak, like Chairmen WALSH and SHEPPARD, of the Navy and Military Affairs Committees of the Senate, insist that we cannot spare one of these destroyers, that we need them ourselves.

To be sure, we can feel much more secure if Britain wins her continuation war against Hitler. Quite aside from that element of security for ourselves, we all want Britain to win. But we owe another consideration, a first consideration, one to ourselves, to our own country. We owe America the kind of defense that we can meet the worst that might result from Europe's war and the war in Asia, the most complete defense we can afford. We are certainly not going to be affording that by going on with a program that finds us dispossessing ourselves of that part of our defense which is ready at hand and placing our dependence alone upon the defense that is still "on order."

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator NYE.

And this concludes part one of tonight's American Forum of the Air presentation. And now as part two we present an informal, extemporaneous, round-table panel discussion.

Senator PEPPER, will you open the discussion?

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Granik, as I have listened to the discussion of these gentlemen who take the negative, I have been impressed by the fact that they seem to regard this struggle that is now going on in Europe as another world heavyweight champion fight, or perhaps a world series baseball game. They indicate they have some inclination to prefer one over another, but they don't seem to think that the issue of this war is going to have any more to do with their lives and their country's future and its destiny than perhaps a baseball game or a prize fight would.

On the contrary, this is one of those revolutionary movements which come along in an age of history and must either embrace or destroy everything that lives in the same world with it. This is not just a contest between two nations or groups of nations for territory in Europe. If it were, we really wouldn't care who won the war. That is a matter not of our concern. But if a nation and a group of people for 7 years before the whole world declare to the world that they are determined to make over that world and to destroy every democratic and religious and spiritual concept that world has, and they destroy in the course of a few months 7 nations of the civilized world, and announce from platforms that they are going to destroy the rest of it if they can, and then people talk about nice technicalities and about not venturing or hazarding to do this, that, or the other, you wonder whether or not people are dreaming or whether they are awake to what is going on in their world.

The whole point of the controversy is that the United States must either embrace Hitlerism, must agree to its possessing the earth, or it must put itself in front of its own shores and say, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther." What the United States wants to do, therefore, is with the least possible expenditure to do that. If we can do it by 50 destroyers, it means we don't have to spend the rest of this money; it means we don't have to add more billions to the taxpayers' burden; it means we don't have to conscript your boy to leave your home and go into the Army; it means that life in America doesn't have to be regimented, that it keeps on being the kind of a world we know.

Now, what is that worth paying?

Chairman GRANIK. Senator DANAHER.

Senator DANAHER. Of course, when my colleague implies to the listening audience that the conscription measure and its passage or its rejection by the Congress depends upon whether we do or don't send destroyers to England, you, I am sure, are sufficiently well advised to realize that that is wholly specious. There is no proposal before the Congress emanating from administration sources with reference to disposing of destroyers to England, but there is a bill providing for conscription of the American youth, and it is represented that the emergency confronting our country is so great that we must undertake hemispheric defense.

Indeed, Secretary Hull, who is Secretary of State, and who presumably has a fair idea of what he is undertaking to do, whether or not his objectives are publicly stated, this morning authorized the statement, the text of which points out—and I quote: "I feel constrained to reemphasize the view expressed upon my return from the Habana conference that the possibilities of danger to the American republics are real, that a threat to any important part of the Americas means a threat to each and all of the American nations. The conclusion is, therefore, inescapable that full and adequate preparations for hemispheric defense cannot be completed too soon."

But Mr. Churchill, addressing the Parliament a few days ago, pointed out that England entered this war, as he put it, "with its eyes wide open." He said, "We entered the war upon the national will." He said, "There seems to be every reason to believe that this new kind of war is well suited"—and I am quoting—"to the genius and resources of the British Nation and Empire, and that once we get properly equipped and properly started a war of this kind will be more favorable to us than the somber mass slaughters of the Somme and Passchendaele." And let me conclude with one other excerpt from the address to the Parliament: "We hope our friends across the ocean will send us a timely reinforcement to bridge the gap between the peace flotillas of 1939 and the war flotillas of 1941."

But Canada has sent only two squadrons of airplanes, and Canada adopted a conscription bill under the terms of which no Canadian can be sent except with his consent overseas, and my friend, the Senator from Florida, would make it appear that the conscription bill and the possibility of our American boys being taken to war, depend on whether we do or don't send destroyers. If we are going to send them at all, why not send them good ones, not a lot of old World War destroyers.

Chairman GRANIK. Colonel Breckinridge.

Colonel BRECKINRIDGE. I am extremely interested in the reasoning of the two distinguished Members of the Senate on the negative. I should be glad to debate conscription but I understand it not to be included in the question tonight. Now the burden of the argument of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut in his original presentation was as to the law of this matter. I don't think that that is vital, though it is important. We have the four great lawyers led by Mr. Charles Burlingham stating that it is legal to give these destroyers; others may say it is not. It is certainly within the province of the Congress of the United States to make it legal, and under the leadership of these and other such gentlemen, that can be done.

As to the distinguished Senator Nye and his argument, which is from as great a love of country and interest as mine or yours, it is a weighing of dangers, the dangers of giving these destroyers, the dangers of having them fall into the hands of the Germans after the capture of Britain and its destruction. You may take your choice. For me, I would prefer to run the risk of those 50 destroyers being added to the sea power of Britain and hoping that they would destroy the might of Hitler, than take the chances of the British Fleet going down without any interposition of those destroyers and facing eight times our sea power in the world.

Chairman GRANIK. Senator Nye.

Senator NYE. Colonel Breckinridge very forcefully expresses a view or a gamble, a wish if it is a gamble, that we might gamble by giving these 50 or more destroyers to Great Britain. For my own part, thinking primarily of the issue of national security, I am going to gamble on that side that dictates that we maintain a rigid—as rigid a state of defense as we know how.

My colleague from Florida, Senator Pepper, has suggested that some of us are looking upon this thing going on over in Europe today as a world series. Incidentally, it isn't going to be a world series until we get into it.

He speaks of it in that light. Might I suggest that if it isn't a world series or anything resembling it, then it is at least a return engagement of a performance that has been playing on the European stage for every generation since the beginning of time. It isn't particularly a new experience. It isn't altogether so revolutionary as some would have us believe it to be.

Just one more thought. I remember when we started breaking the way, a year ago this time, with the urging of the repeal of the arms embargo, when the argument was made again and again and again and again that if only we would repeal the arms embargo, that would constitute the difference between victory and defeat for the Allies. Then a little later they had to have airplanes, and if we would only furnish the planes for them, that would constitute the difference between victory and defeat for France and England. And now it is destroyers. What will it be next? Need any of us have any doubt as to what it will ultimately be, if only this process carries on far enough?

Senator DANAHER. Mr. Chairman, let me point out there is one possible fallacy in the statement just uttered by my colleague from North Dakota when he said next airplanes and then destroyers. The planes were and are being sold by private contractors and private manufacturers, and are not being transferred by the United States Government.

Senator NYE. Quite true.

Senator DANAHER. It is understood, in this question presented to us tonight, that this is a transfer by the United States Government, and there is a very real and essential difference which is covered both by the statutes I cited and the international law, and our treaties, let me add.

Senator PEPPER. Of course, at this time we can't go into the ramifications of the technical legal article. Suffice it to say that nothing will be done by the executive branch of the Government to consummate this transfer unless it is approved by the legal division of the Government, that is, the Department of Justice. I could go on and make a legal argument, which in my opinion is a complete answer to what has been said by the able Senator from Connecticut, but let's just accept it as a premise that it will not be done unless a legal opinion is given to the President of the United States which will stand up, in the opinion of the Department of Justice, in any court of law.

The second question: There are a good many gentlemen who speak of anything we may do in this contest as a voluntary participation on our part in this controversy. I wonder if they are forgetting that we signed, along with other nations, every nation that is now involved in this war, a pact called the Kellogg Pact, or the Pact of Paris, and by that pact every nation now included in this war, and particularly Germany, obligated itself not to make war upon other nations. We are a signatory power to that pact. That is a solemn treaty—if my friend wants to talk about keeping treaties and living up to our obligations. That is one we undertook. Now then, if a signatory power to the pact can, without justification or excuse, attack another signatory power the way Germany attacked Belgium and Holland and Denmark, and if I may include them, Great Britain and France, and the other signatory powers that are parties to it simply fold their hands or wash them, as Pontius Pilate did, and say, "I have nothing to do with this matter," then what becomes of law-abiding peoples? And what of our fulfillment of our treaty obligations in that case?

Now, that doesn't mean, of course, that we are obligated to take any affirmative part that will amount to a declaration of war. There isn't any prescription in that treaty of what the signatory powers must do in a case like that. It is up to their individual judgment and conscience, but if the power does nothing whatever, I submit that it is denying its obligation under that pact and its obligation in a decent world.

Senator NYE. Senator PEPPER, counting the existence of such a pact as you refer to now, are we doing a graver injustice to any civilization by withholding now any fulfillment of any obligation that might be ours under that treaty? Would we be in any worse fix, in any worse light than Great Britain was when she refused to go along with the United States when the United States wanted to enforce another pact in China some years ago?

Senator PEPPER. Well, the Senator is assuming, of course, that Great Britain did refuse to go along with the United States in that situation——

Senator NYE (interposing). I think it is considerably more than an assumption.

Senator PEPPER. About which there is a very great difference of opinion in fact, but I will say to the able Senator that if Great Britain had been listening to some of the debates in the United States as to what the legislative branch of this Government would let the Executive do, I don't much blame them for not wanting to get into partnership with us and enter upon any enterprise.

Senator DANAHER. Mr. Chairman, I woud like to ask the Senator from Florida to make clear one thing. He pointed out, and quite correctly, that there is no obligation on the part of the United States to go to war and to enforce the Kellogg Pact, which was a peace pact. He is quite right in that. Does the Senator think we ought to go to war?

Senator PEPPER. I do not. Neither do I think we should be foolish enough not to do what we can short of war to keep Hitler, a beast, from getting out of Europe.

Senator DANAHER. But, Mr. Chairman, may I point out to the Senator—and I am sure he will recognize it as so—that if we furnish naval vessels in contravention of all our treaties, it is an act of war. The Senator knows that.

Senator PEPPER. I deny that unequivocably, and it is based upon this. The Senators and those who cite international law, it will be recalled, don't cite any text writers or any authorities on that subject writing of a period since the Kellogg Pact came into existence. When they cite old authorities on international law they are talking about a time when a country was under no contractual obligation, as every country now is, not to make war upon its neighbors, so that nowadays you not only violate what might be called the criminal law of the world if you make war, but you violate your own solemn contract with other nations that you will not make war.

Now, then, in the protection of that immunity of signatory powers to that pact, under the Budapest interpretation of the Pact of Paris (100 or more of the most eminent international lawyers of Europe gathering together to make that declaration), under the Harvard research group's interpretation of the Kellogg Pact, I believe the most eminent authorities in the United States today on the subject of international law, like Quincy Wright, of Chicago, all concur that we do, without violating any treaty and without violating any law and without going to war, have the right to do what we desire to do defensively against the party that breaks the pact in that way.

Chairman GRANIK. We have a question from the floor.

Question. I just want to re-ask the same question that was asked by Senator NYE and which has not been answered, and I would like to do this to stress the question and so it will be answered. Senator NYE has pointed out that within the last year, by pretty smooth propaganda, we have gone from the point of absolute neutrality to the point where we want to commit an act of war. I would like to ask Senator NYE just how much further we will continue to go.

Chairman GRANIK. To whom do you address the question?

Question. To anyone who cares to answer.

Senator PEPPER. I will be glad to try to answer that. As to how far we go depends essentially, my friend, on how willing we are to let the beast get out of the cage of Europe. I prefer to save anything at the cheapest possible expense. If we can do it by 50 destroyers, I say do it that way, and try. If it would take 75 destroyers, being manned by British sailors and soldiers, I would be willing to let them have 75. Just think for a minute what the alternative is. You will recall we have appropriated some $15,000,000,000 in the last 2 months. We are about, if we can pass the bill over the protests of Senator NYE and some other Senators who are trying to keep us from passing it, to pass the conscription bill to defend America; and by the way, my able friend from the Dakotas has opposed every one of these acts, not just the sale of the destroyers. He is against conscription, he was against the modification of the Neutrality Act, he was against all of them, and so he just——

Senator NYE (interposing). And incidentally, Senator Pepper, when it comes, as I am so afraid it is coming, to a demand for a declaration of war, the Senator from North Dakota is going to continue a very consistent record and vote "No."

Senator PEPPER. There are people who always have voted "No" when their country was in danger.

Senator DANAHER. Mr. Chairman, I want just a moment to make a comment about the observations of the Senator from Florida with reference to the situation in Europe. Remember that even if England resists successfully the invasion now threatening her—and I certainly hope she does—are we, if we enter it to that extent, bound and will we be committed to maintain her status from now on? Will we permanently, in other words, after we have been drawing down all the gold in the world at $35 an ounce and forcing a barter system on nations, when we have done nothing to eliminate the overpopulation problems in many nations, when we find our own President only a year ago saying this to Hitler—let me read what he said. He said it and you all heard it over the air on April 14, 1939: "The Government of the United States would be prepared to take part in discussions looking toward the most practical manner of opening up avenues of international trade, to the end that every nation of the earth may be enabled to buy and sell on equal terms in the world market as well as to possess assurance of obtaining the materials and products of peaceful economic life." That is what our President offered to this same man only a year ago.

Chairman GRANIK. Excuse me, I see another question from the floor.

Miss MIDDLETON. I would like to have a paradox explained to me, Mr. Granik. First, we are told these are old ships, they are obsolete, they are not much good; then we are told by a speaker on the affirmative side that these ships may save England, they may turn the tide of war. Then we are also told that these 50 ships are not really needed by us here in America for our defense, and yet we are asked to rush forward a program for a two-ocean navy. If they are no good but they will save England, yet we don't need them but we must have a two-ocean navy, it doesn't seem clear to me. Will the affirmative explain it, please?

Colonel BRECKINRIDGE. I don't know that I can explain it to your satisfaction, but as we have been talked to in terms of paradox by the questioner, I think we may answer in terms of analogy. If the distinguished Senator NYE were attacked by Al Capone and Dutch Schultz and they were armed with hundreds of guns and I had 12, and I thought 2 of them would save Senator NYE's life. I would let him have them and take my chance on what I would do with Schultz and Capone afterward.

Senator DANAHER. Of course, the real point about it, let me say to Miss Middleton, is that they don't care whether we give them 50 old destroyers or not. The question before us tonight, and on which they are arguing in the affirmative, is, shall we send "some"? The reason is that if we send any, we are committed politically to that war, and they know it.

Miss MIDDLETON. That is what I was waiting for. I thought we would have to send more, and finally men. Thank you.

Senator PEPPER. Let me say this: If that good lady felt that some of us over there who are willing to send those destroyers wanted to keep ever from sending any men, perhaps she might be a little bit more sympathetic to it. But I will tell you this. We are at least going to have to do one of two things. We are either going to have to make it possible for Great Britain to keep Hitler in Europe or we are going to have to prepare to meet him over here or somewhere in this universe, and that means that your life is going to be changed from anything you have ever anticipated in all your career. It means that the burdens of taxes to be paid by the citizenry of this country, it means that the standing Army of this country, that the Navy of this country will be more colossal than you ever imagined in your life. It isn't a question of either taking sulfapyridine or not taking it. It is a question of taking sulfapyridine or having pneumonia and taking the chance on what pneumonia may be.

Mr. P. D. SCOTT. First, I want to mention I am not a "fifth columnist" because I am colored.

Chairman GRANIK. Please put it in the form of a question. We have only a few minutes left.

Mr. SCOTT. Is it not true that for the last year, factually, we have plenipotentiarily and diplomatically been unneutral, and therefore I agree with Senator PEPPER in all of his opinion that because of the fact——

Chairman GRANIK (interposing). Please put it in the form of a question.

Mr. SCOTT. That democracy is at stake—and the tribute to democracy is the fact that I am able to speak here now; and is it not a fact that since we have taken the step to be unneutral up to this point, why shouldn't we send everything possible over to England and protect, not England specifically, but democracy of the world and the civilization that democracy and white people have brought us today?

Senator PEPPER. I was interested awhile ago when Senator NYE spoke about this proposal being first made now. In the New York Times of today I read the following which was a statement made by James Madison in 1823, which is as follows: "With the British power and Navy combined with our own, we have nothing to fear from the rest of the world, and in the great struggle of the epoch between liberty and despotism we owe it to ourselves to sustain the former in this hemisphere at least"; and that was just a few years after the British had burned the Capitol while he was the President of the United States, and yet James Madison was urging that we cooperate with Great Britain in trying to preserve the peace of this hemisphere, and the premise of that cooperation was the maintenance and preservation of the British Navy.

Senator DANAHER. Mr. Chairman, let me point out that one of the chief difficulties confronting the people of the United States today—and heaven knows they are vitally interested in this and every other problem and every question raised here, and they are sincere and they are earnest, and I hope in fairness they will realize that we are, too; but the problem actually turns on this, that there has been no public definition of our objectives. What do we really seek? Where do our national interests lie? What are we going to do with reference to the situation in the Pacific? They talk about a two-ocean navy when we have it within our power to remove the need for a two-ocean navy by being friends with the only threat we have in the west. Where, in other words, are we going to go? Are we continuously to maintain an avenue for the lamps of China? Are we continuously going to maintain any and every barren island in the Western Hemisphere? Are we permanently to be committed to the maintenance of the British Isles as the gateway of Europe?

I don't know what the objectives of our diplomacy may be, and if we knew all that I am certain that American people would view every one of these problems in a more understanding way and be better able to appraise them. Right now they are afraid, and I don't blame them.

Colonel BRECKENRIDGE. It is not my function but that of others, including the Senate, to declare the foreign policy of the United States, but for a personal objective which I wish my Nation would have I would say everything it does at this time is to preserve the freedom of mankind in the world, and avert the menace of the conquest of the free peoples of the world by the tyrants.

Senator NYE. Even if it calls for going to war?

Colonel BRECKENRIDGE. Yes. Yes.

Senator NYE. Thank you. That clarifies many of the issues in this discussion tonight.

Colonel BRECKENRIDGE. For myself, for my own part, I think that Hitler, as he now goes day by day to the slaughter and murder of all the free nations of the world except this, bringing his death upon the defenseless women and children of the world, must satisfyingly have the laugh of a hyena when he listens to the niceties of legalistic discussion that goes on here, as with the pre-Munich minds of England and France which brought them to ruin.

Senator DANAHER. Mr. Granik, that is the real purpose of the force behind this movement.

[The American Forum of the Air, September 1, 1940]

HOW FAR SHALL THE UNITED STATES AID GREAT BRITAIN?

(Senator Josh Lee, of Oklahoma; Senator Edwin C. Johnson, of Colorado; Edgar Ansel Mowrer, correspondent of the Chicago Daily News; Frederick J. Libby, founder and head of the National Council for Prevention of War)

Announcer STEPHEN MCCORMACK. Listeners from coast to coast are invited to hear the American Forum of the Air. We bring you another program presented by WOL in cooperation with WOR, emanating from the Willard Room of the Hotel Willard in Washington, D. C.

In formation on how to obtain a copy of tonight's proceedings will be given at the conclusion of this broadcast.

Tonight the American Forum of the Air will be presented in two parts. First you will hear prepared statements by the participants. This will be followed by extemporaneous discussion of the subject at hand.

This series of educational discussions, now in its twelfth year, is arranged and directed by Theodore Granik, founder and director of the American Forum of the Air and of the American Forum, a nationally syndicated newspaper feature.

Mr. Granik presides as chairman and moderator.

Mr. THEODORE GRANIK. Thank you Mr. McCormick. One year ago today Europe was plunged into war. After 12 months of bloody conflict, with its bitter toll of lives and property, with its ruthless destruction of great civilized areas, a conquering nation has revised the map of Europe, as never before. Not since the conquests of Napoleon has one man been the master of so much of the continent.

But as the war moves into its second year, Great Britain bars the way to Germany's final victory—with other nations humbled and beaten, England alone stands in the Nazi path to complete European domination.

The world awaits the outcome of the great battle of Britain—a new phase—and perhaps the most decisive of World War No. 2. With the everchanging cycle of events, it is difficult to predict what will have passed in review by the next anniversary—in fact, what might happen within the next few weeks.

As America rushes its own gigantic national-defense program, we ponder how the fate of Great Britain will affect us. What, if anything, should America do in this grave crisis?

There are, of course, two opinions, well supported in this country, about the duty of the United States. While one group believes we should let Europe absolutely alone, and not become involved any further in foreign entanglements, the other opinion is that this is not just a war between Germany and England, but a revolutionary movement which challenges everything that Americans hold vital in civilization.

Some of these arguments were presented in last Sunday night's American Forum of the Air discussion on the question, Shall the United States Make Available to England Some of Its World War Destroyers?

We received thousands of letters and comments in response to this forum from listeners in all parts of the country, many requesting that the subject be explored further. And so tonight, complying with these requests, we present as our subject for discussion How Far Shall the United States Aid Great Britain?

Our speakers are: Senator Josh Lee of Oklahoma; Senator Edwin C. Johnson of Colorado; Edgar Ansel Mowrer, noted newspaper correspondent of the Chicago Daily News, and coauthor with Colonel Donovan of the recent newspaper series sponsored by Secretary Knox; and Dr. Frederick J. Libby, founder and head of the National Council for Prevention of War.

We cordially invite our listeners to send us their letters and comments on tonight's presentation.

And now our opening speaker, Senator LEE.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR JOSH LEE

It is my purpose to do everything within my power to preserve peace for America. But it will take more than wishful thinking to achieve that goal. We cannot preserve peace by merely denouncing war.

We cannot depend upon neutrality, because neutrality failed to protect the nations of Europe.

We cannot depend upon disarmament because weakness invites attack.

We cannot depend upon appeasement, because it is Hitler's most effective method of undermining the loyalty of a nation before he invades it.

Then from a hard-headed, practical standpoint what can we do that will most effectively decrease the danger which threatens America?

Before we answer this, let us decide what danger threatens America. There is but one answer—Hitler.

Why has Congress voted $14,000,000,000 for national defense? Because of Hitler.

Why is it necessary for the United States to have compulsory military training? Because of Hitler.

Why is it necessary for us to increase taxes for armament? Because of Hitler.

Therefore, if the Nazi war machine could be stopped in Europe tomorrow, we could repeal appropriations for armament, adjourn Congress, and return to normal, peacetime pursuits, but as long as Hitler is on the loose liberty itself is threatened.

The most practical method then by which we can safeguard American peace is to help England stop Hitler in Europe. England has not asked for men but she has begged for ships and planes. A few ships and planes now added to England's force would be worth many times that number if England falls.

Three years ago, President Roosevelt warned that the aggressor nations should be quarantined. Had the democracies of Europe heeded that warning and joined their forces to oppose Hitler, no doubt there would be peace in Europe today. But lulled to sleep by Nazi propaganda, they waited their turn to be destroyed.

There is no use to deceive ourselves. The war in Europe is more than a conflict for territory. It is a revolution. Democracy is at death grips with despotism.

The totalitarian powers are on the march. If England falls before their drive, America will then stand alone in their path.

Those who oppose material aid to England claim that it involves danger. Perhaps it does, but failure to give material aid to England involves greater danger.

This is not a situation where one decision leads to absolute peace and security and the other decision leads to involvement and war. There is danger either way. But to refuse aid to England involves greater danger than to give aid, because the longer England is able to hold out the more time we will have to arm. And if we get strong enough, soon enough, we shall escape war.

Therefore, I believe we should give England, not men, but every material aid possible within the law and not inconsistent with our own defenses.

The blood of American youth is so much more precious than the material wealth of the Nation that there should be no question about using that material wealth in order to prevent war from coming to America.

Last week we placed an amendment on the draft bill providing for the conscription of those industries which refused to cooperate for national defense. Immediately the spokesmen of wealth in America unleashed a violent attack on those of us who had sponsored and supported that amendment.

These same spokesmen of Wall Street were loud in their declarations for drafting men but when we extended the same power to property they said that we were trying to set up a dictatorship and destroy the liberties of America. They have even tried to make it appear that we would destroy freedom of the press, free speech, and private ownership of property simply because we have urged a speedy mobilization of industry as well as manpower.

It is because I cherish the freedom of the press, the freedom of speech, and all of the other glorious liberties guaranteed in the Bill of Rights that I want to safeguard these liberties from the Gestapo of a Nazi world.

These spokesmen of wealth were perfectly willing that Congress should draft the young men of America and, if need be, send them to their death in battle for the defense of America. But, when we undertook to require the same cooperation and patriotism from industry, they felt that property was too sacred for compulsory mobilization.

I believe that our very liberty is in danger and that danger will be greatly increased if England falls before the Nazis. Hitler's mass bombing of England, which is taking place at this very hour, is but the terrible prelude of a determined effort to land troops on the island.

The transfer of 50 or more destroyers from the United States to England might make it possible for England to prevent that invasion and thereby stop Hitler in Europe. Thus, by helping England, we would help America more.

Announcer McCORMICK. Thank you, Senator LEE.

You are listening to the American Forum of the Air, presenting a discussion on "How Far Should the United States Aid Great Britain?" You have just heard Senator JOSH LEE, of Oklahoma.

And now we are pleased to present Senator EDWIN C. JOHNSON of Colorado. Senator JOHNSON.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR EDWIN C. JOHNSON

Ever since the War between the States, the United States has been a most helpful and cooperative friend to the British Empire. At times Old England has leaned upon us heavily, but we have always responded magnificently. She has a vast empire and is constantly in trouble. The powerful nations of the Old World have turned against her and today she is begging for more and more of our assistance. We spared her from a military debacle with our finances and our men 23 years ago. Last year we changed our laws to become her arsenal. All of our private munition-making industry is now at her disposal. Her current needs are very great, and her demands upon our generosity are for more, and more, and more.

How far shall we go? I am strongly of the opinion that we have already gone as far as prudence and good judgment will permit, and that we owe it to humanity to remain neutral and hold ourselves in readiness to minister unto a stricken world when hostilities finally cease.

American manufactured munitions going to England are increasing rapidly month by month. During the last 7 months these shipments totalled $63,500,000 and consisted of powder, shells, rifles, machine guns, cannon, engines, airplanes, and other war material; 236 planes will go forward in August and the number will increase until we reach the goal set of 3,000 a month. Truly we are England's best neighbor. All of this is being done in accordance with our law.

The extraordinary proposal to transfer 50 or 60 United States destroyers to the war zone does have a strong emotional appeal to warm-hearted Americans, but the proposition is neither legal, logical, nor safe. It is not good military strategy; it is very poor military strategy. Not only would it constitute an outright act of war, but it would constitute a piece-meal disintegration of an indispensable arm of the United States Navy—the light fighting craft arm, already woefully weak. The replacement cost of the 50 or 60 destroyers is approximately $300,000,000, not a serious financial problem, but a most serious replacement problem is involved nevertheless. We must keep in mind that 2 years are required to build a destroyer and, since every shipbuilding facility in the United States has orders sufficient to keep it fully occupied during the next 5 years, the actual replacement of these vital ships cannot be undertaken until 1946.

It has been the wise practice of the Navy to convert, as they are replaced, the older destroyers into badly needed fast mine layers, aircraft tenders, and antiaircraft vessels. The 60 destroyers under consideration are all now in vital service, some being in neutrality patrol service, while others are used for training purposes. Not one of them is in drydock, not one of them is surplus, and not one of them is obsolete in the sense that it is useless. Many of them are over-aged, but they cannot safely be spared until they are replaced. On July 5 of this year we had 61 destroyers under construction, and the 2-ocean Navy program now getting under way calls for the construction of over 150 additional destroyers. Would these facts not prove conclusively that we are extremely short on such craft?

The term "obsolete" in connection with combat ships is confusing. A ship can be obsolete and at the same time vital and that paradox precisely states the situation relative to our need for these old destroyers. On March 1 last the United States had 301 combatant vessels in commission and out of that total 150 were over-age or obsolete, yet all of them were in vital service. The very fact that obsolete ships are being retained in the service proves their indispensability beyond any argument. If they were obsolete and not needed, they would be decommissioned, but not one of the 60 destroyers under discussion is decommissioned.

England, in the dark hour of her efforts to hold her Empire together, needs every ship which we have afloat, and she needs the men to man those ships; she needs every war plane in the United States, and every pilot and groundman that we have to operate those planes. In fact, she actually needs skilled pilots now more than she needs additional planes. In the battle of Britain her dauntless and inspired pilots are giving a good account of themselves. Such daring, dogged fighting has never been surpassed in all of the world's military history. Against superior numbers, they are more than holding their own, but right now every one of her pilots is fighting twice as many hours as he should be fighting. England's need for more pilots is very grave indeed, the 50 destroyers which she is now seeking will not be more than a "token offering to British aid." No one understands better than England that the proposed transfer is tantamount to a declaration of war against her enemies. I do not blame English statesmen for wanting us in the war. I admire them for their boldness and their cunning. I do not blame clever English statesmen for coaxing us in the back door, step by step, if we hesitate to come in the front door. It will be a great thing for the British Empire the day we enter the war, but it will be a day of sorrow for the American people.

Mr. GRANIK. Thank you, Senator JOHNSON.

You have just heard Senator EDWIN C. JOHNSON of Colorado in tonight's American Forum of the Air discussion, "How Far Should United States Aid Great Britain?"

Our next speaker is Edgar Ansel Mowrer, noted newspaper correspondent, who spent many years in Italy, Germany, and France, and whose recent newspaper series with Colonel Donovan has attracted international attention. Mr. Mowrer.

ADDRESS BY EDGAR ANSEL MOWRER

After a great many years as a foreign correspondent, I have just returned from European battlefields.

Events of the last few years in Europe have no sense except as horrible examples of what happens to peace-loving countries which refuse to believe ill of predatory neighbors and which refuse to help each other against aggression when it starts.

Denmark, Norway, Belgium, the Netherlands trusted to their neutrality to protect them. And where are they? France refused to help Czechoslovakia—and later succumbed. Britain, as punishment for its hesitancy, is today defending itself alone against a coalition monstrous in power and intent.

It has been my job to watch all this. Moreover, Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini were at one time among my personal acquaintances. So I am well vaccinated against any twaddle about their "friendship for America." I know that they will go for us—when they dare. Directly or indirectly. But surely.

For they, with the Japs, are already at war with us spiritually. They hate our guts. They are seeking to break down our morale and lull us to sleep. Yet actually nothing stands today between the United States and open attack but the British Navy and the British Air Force. This is not "scaremongering." It is an understatement of a simple fact.

Now whether we admire the British or hate their guts they will never attack us and we ought to assist them were they a nation of cannibal Hottentots. They are not. Indeed, we share with them a common set of values. If they go down we remain alone.

Today they may easily go down. They counted on France and France cracked. Almost complete loss of material in Flanders left them temporarily very weak.

The defeat of Britain would leave an appalling situation—for us. Hitler becomes a leader of a world alliance. Through Japan he rules the Far East; through Soviet Russia the vast Asiatic steppes; India falls to him as a matter of course; Africa he divides with Italy and conceivably with Spain.

Nothing remains between him and the world power he covets but the Western Hemisphere—which means for fighting purposes the United States. With the passive cooperation of the British Fleet this task would remain possible for us. Without that cooperation it is almost surely impossible. Good as our own fleet is, it will for a long time remain a one-ocean fleet up against a two-ocean coalition. With Britain subjugated the way is clear in any case for the totalitarian economic and political offensive in this hemisphere. To prevent actual attack, we should, with Britain knocked out, be forced to adopt intensive militarism. If we do, our living standard will slump terrifically; our economic life will undergo real regimentation; our easy-going ways will give way to an almost iron discipline. Yet we shall have to—or submit. By this effort, we shall, if the dictators wait, eventually build up an adequate two-ocean air and water and land defense, and become immune to attack. Before that Britain's defeat is mortal danger for us. If Hitler, in addition, manages to seize all or even most of the British Fleet, then immediate attack on this hemisphere becomes a practical proposition. Not against the United States proper—not immediately. More likely against our outposts—Greenland, Nova Scotia, Bermuda, the Caribbean Islands, and South America. Possession of a couple of these makes preparation for a real offensive against our territory comparatively easy.

It isn't a pretty situation. It leaves a pretty choice: Either we help the British sufficiently to prevent their defeat now—or we watch in relative impotence while our avowed enemies destroy our own conceivable friend.

Admittedly the British are not beaten yet—thank God. For each day they hold finds us a little better prepared. Recently I talked with Churchill and Halifax and Earnest Bevin. Their spirit seemed unconquerable. It is their army that is weak, largely owing to the material lost in Flanders. At best, military students give Britain only a 50-percent chance of holding out. If Britain succumbs, the victors have a very good chance of seizing the British Fleet for use against us.

What therefore is wisdom—to sit apart in the illusion of isolation and allow the totalitarian world conquest to proceed piecemeal until it reaches us, or, by an infinitely smaller effort than the one we should ultimately make, save ourselves now by saving Britain. As a witness of Hitler's might and malevolence, I am aghast at the extent to which many of our best citizens ignore or underestimate the danger.

Many argue that giving decisive aid to Britain involves the risk of war. But if we are already on the aggressors' list as the next victim, where is the greater danger? Will we take a slight war risk now beside a still powerfully ally, or face certain conflict a few months hence, still far from rearmed and utterly alone?

Hitler counts on our doing nothing. He counts on his friends here, on the natural desire of a commercial nation to do business with him, on the natural pacifism of a prosperous and free people. Can it be that he is right? I cannot believe it. For if through shirking our responsibilities today we turned out to have opened the door on national disaster a year from now, the very sons we thought by our inaction to save, would curse us.

The right course is: All necessary aid to Britain—now.

Announcer McCORMACK. Thank you, Mr. Mowrer.

And now as our concluding speaker in tonight's American Forum of the Air, we present Frederick J. Libby, founder and head of the National Council for Prevention of War. Mr. Libby.

ADDRESS BY DR. FREDERICK J. LIBBY

How far should the United States aid Great Britain?

My answer is this:

"All the material aid at our command, consistent with law and not inconsistent with the interests of our own national defense."

I have followed the wording of the Democratic platform, but the Republican plank is almost the same:

"Such aid as shall not be in violation of international law or inconsistent with the requirements of our own national defense."

The preceding planks of both platforms are equally a part of my answer:

"The Republican Party is firmly opposed to involving this Nation in foreign wars."

The Democratic plank is more specific:

"We will not participate in foreign wars, and we will not send our Army, naval and air forces to fight in foreign lands outside of the Americas, except in case of attack."

These planks are what 1,000 or more delegates at each convention believed their neighbors and friends want done. Even if the Presidential candidates should repudiate their platform and the platforms should be forgotten after election, the fact remains crystal clear that the similarity of the platforms shows two things: First, that the country is determined to stay out of the wars of Europe and Asia; and second, regardless of our sympathies, our aid to Great Britain should be held within legal limits and the requirements of our own national defense. This position seems to me sound.

I shall not be able in 6 minutes to do more than show what the legal limitations are which forbid the sale of destroyers and other current proposals. I hope that Senator JOHNSON will discuss the requirements of our national defense.

Our statutes so clearly forbid the transfer of armed vessels to Great Britain that the Law Journal, a leading American law publication, in an editorial which appeared on August 7, spoke categorically as follows:

"The provisions of the statute of June 15, 1917, would equally prevent both transactions (that is, the transfer of the mosquito fleet and the transfer of destroyers). The prohibitory provisions follow: 'During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, it shall be unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war, or converted from a private vessel into a vessel of war, with any intent or under any agreement or contract, written or oral, that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent nation, or to an agent, officer, or citizen of such nation, or with reasonable cause to believe that the said vessel shall or will be employed in the service of any such belligerent nation after its departure from the jurisdiction of the United States.'"

Could the law be clearer or more unequivocal? It is unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States, any vessel of war with any intent that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent, or to an agent or citizen of such nation, or with reasonable cause to believe that the said vessel will be employed in the service of such belligerent nation after its departure from our jurisdiction. As long as that law is on our statute books, and our neutrality law remains in effect, those destroyers cannot be transferred legally to Great Britain. The law further provides that whoever "authorizes" the taking of any such vessel out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States shall be subject to $10,000 fine or 10 years' imprisonment, or both.

Our Government is not going to resort to the tricks of shyster lawyers to get around its own laws.

Now, then, suppose this statute should be repealed by Congress. What then? Then you find yourself confronted with an equally clear and unequivocal prohibition under international law. The Hague Convention of 1907, of which the United States and Germany are signatories, reads thus:

"The supply in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent of warships, ammunition, or war material of any kind is forbidden."

Secretary Hull as late as last Wednesday took his stand again on the sanctity of international law. Regardless of what other nations do, we all support Secretary Hull in refusing to make us lawbreakers.

But there is another reason why we must be scrupulous in this matter. We study in our school textbooks the famous case of the Alabama claims when we were awarded $15,500,000 in gold because of the depredations committed by a British armed vessel, the Alabama, and two other ships. We won that case of the basis of three principles for the government of neutrals. The first of them bears directly on the point of issue:

"A neutral government is bound to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace, and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use."

These destroyers have without question been armed and equipped within our jurisdiction. If transferred to Great Britain, there is certainly reasonable ground to believe that they will carry on war against a power with which we are at peace. Therefore, again, by our own principles, for which we have stood for 70 years and on which we won the Alabama claims, we are forbidden to make this transfer. As long as our neutrality law remains on our books our statutes and international law alike prohibit the unneutral action now proposed.

So we come to the question of neutrality itself. Shall we retain our neutrality law? Or shall we declare war on Germany? Do the American people want to declare war? To raise this question is to answer it. Both party platforms have so interpreted the public will. The Gallup poll likewise shows an overwhelming majority opposed to such rash folly.

Therefore we believe we represent the considered judgment of the American people in supporting neutrality as against a declaration of war or the illegal waging of war, and in limiting aid to Great Britain to that which can legally be extended.

Announcer McCORMICK. Thank you, Dr. Libby.

And this concludes part 1 of tonight's American Forum of the Air presentation.

Mr. GRANIK. This concludes the first part of our radio presentation.

Announcer STEPHEN McCORMICK. Immediately following station identification we shall continue with the extemporaneous discussion. This is the Mutual Broadcasting System.

This is the American Forum of the Air, emanating from the Willard room of the Hotel Willard in Washington, D. C., and presented over the Mutual Broadcasting System by WOL in cooperation with WOR.

We return you to the chairman, Mr. Granik.

Mr. GRANIK. And now as part 2 of tonight's American Forum of the Air presentation, How Far Should the United States Aid Great Britain? we present an informal round-table panel discussion by our speakers, whose opening remarks you have just heard. They are:

Senator Josh Lee, of Oklahoma; Senator Edwin C. Johnson, of Colorado; Edgar Ansel Mowrer, noted newspaper correspondent; and Dr. Frederick J. Libby, founder and head of the National Council for Prevention of War.

Senator LEE, will you open the discussion?

PANEL DISCUSSION, AMERICAN FORUM OF THE AIR, SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1940, 7 P. M.

Members of the panel: Senator Josh Lee, Oklahoma; Senator Edwin C. Johnson, Colorado; Edgar Ansel Mowrer, newspaper correspondent; Dr. Frederick J. Libby, National Council for Prevention of War.

Senator LEE. Mr. Granik, if you will allow me a little longer than the usual question just now, I will give more time to the others later, but I wish to put this hypothetical question: Suppose you were Hitler. Suppose, like Hitler, you were ambitious to dominate the world. Suppose you had under your control all of the food, manpower, factories, shipyards, tanks, guns, planes, and other war materials of Italy, Ethiopia, Albania, Austria, Hungary, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, Luxemburg, France, and Germany. Then suppose you defeated England and thereby added to your power all of the resources of the British Isles, Australia, and India, and also the British Navy; and suppose that the Nazis, with the usual German thoroughness, already had complete blueprints and charts of every British man-o'-war and had trained crews ready to take over and operate these battleships without delay; you would then have the combined sea power of the British, French, Italian, German, and all other dominated nations' navies, which would be several times greater than the United States.

Then, suppose the actions of Japan made it necessary for the United States to keep most of its fleet in the Pacific Ocean; and suppose you realized, as Hitler has already stated, that the Panama Canal is a vulnerable thing and one well-located bomb would render the Canal useless; then suppose you had thousands of Nazi agents in all the Latin American countries and for a few million dollars you could start revolutions in several of those explosive countries; and suppose, as in the case of Spain, you aided one side and by aiding one side you could gain control of the governments of those countries; then suppose you were crowded from behind by a nation on the march, and tempted from in front by the treasures of the western world, and you realized the United States is inadequately prepared for war now, but you knew that she was getting under way with a powerful defense program. I say, under circumstances like these, if you were Hitler, flushed with victory, strengthened by acquisition, and mad for power, what would you do? Would you wait and give the United States time to arm, or would you move at once?

Senator JOHNSON. Is that question—or speech—directed to me, Senator?

Senator LEE. To anyone.

Senator JOHNSON. If I were up against a proposition like that, Senator, I would certainly keep all my defenses at home, and I would build them just as fast as I could. I wouldn't be peddling them to England or anybody else. I would keep them right here in the United States and get ready for an emergency as serious as that. I don't think I would sleep nights. I would keep on working day and night.

Mr. MOWRER. Certainly we ought to keep right on working day and night, but if, as many of us believe, the British willy-nilly are fighting our war, by the same argument, the Senator would not risk our war material once it is made. If he considers by risking any of our war material in our defense somewhere, let us say in the English Channel, we should be doing our country a disservice, then by risking the same ships off the South American coast we probably would be injuring the country just the same way. The result would be we would work day and night and create a powerful fleet, a powerful air fleet, and a marvelous Army with all the new gadgets and tanks, and so on, but never risk any of it for fear if the thing went on we should be caught without adequate defense.

Senator JOHNSON. Mr. Mowrer, I would like to have you make it clear to all of us just what aid you would give Britain. Do you want to go to war? Is that the thing you are talking about? Do you want to violate our laws, or do you want to live within our laws and give such aid as we can within our laws? Your first statement was very confusing. You wound up with a gesture here. You said, "All necessary aid to Britain now." What do you mean by that—going to war? What do you mean?

Mr. MOWRER. I wouldn't violate any of our laws. I would like to see them changed so we can make the necessary sacrifices to give the aid to Great Britain as soon as possible. By saying "now," I mean we should start about it now.

Senator LEE. England has never asked for men, has she?

Mr. MOWRER. No; and I don't think she would.

Senator JOHNSON. England needs men more than anything else, skilled men, pilots.

Mr. MOWRER. They need a few skilled pilots, or as many as they can get. When we say "men," we primarily mean infantry divisions, the sending of an expeditionary force to Europe. As you, Senator, well know, there are now a great many American pilots—I say a great many; several hundreds—flying for Great Britain. Would you recall them?

Senator JOHNSON. They are violating our laws if they are flying for Great Britain. Naturally, I don't think that that enters into the matter at all. But you may be talking about our Nation's breaking our own laws. That is what I would like to know. I would like to have you be a little more explicit about the aid that you are going to give to Great Britain.

Senator LEE. I don't want to take any more time, if Dr. Libby will speak, but the gentlemen have made two points. One is that the transfer of these destroyers, for instance, would weaken our own defense, and second, that it would be a violation of law. In the first place, I don't believe it would weaken our defense because used with England it would be stronger. What we have alone isn't enough, just like what each of the countries of Europe that was overrun had alone was not enough; but if they had pooled their strength and military equipment that would have been enough to stop them, and that is why a few destroyers now in England's hands would be worth many more for us later if we were facing the Nazis alone.

Dr. LIBBY. Senator, what about this question? You said you did not want to go to war. If we start lending or sending or giving illegally, contrary to our own laws and to international law, our destroyers, why do you want to stop there, and how can you stop there? Is that like the American people to go into a war half way and then say, "I don't like this, I'm going home"?

Senator LEE. We are the first and only country that has voluntarily gotten off the high seas and placed a neutrality law over ourselves. Other countries have taken the attitude of a non-belligerent and left them free to furnish all the food and fighting materials they wanted to. So far as the law is concerned, I believe we can still transfer the destroyers within the law. Four good lawyers from New York came out in support of that and wrote a letter to that effect. I certainly am not one, when a thing allows of two interpretations, to take the interpretation which is against our own interests.

Dr. LIBBY. Mr. Senator, I saw that letter, and I saw the comment that you will find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the next day from a lawyer at Cornell who said that they had left out pertinent facts, that they had left out part of the laws, and that their statement was shocking, and there has been no one come forward in the Senate to reply to that letter.

Chairman GRANIK. May I interrupt for a moment? I see a question from the floor.

Mrs. NORRIS. Mr. Granik, gentlemen of the panel: Will the illustrious war correspondent who has just spoken of the intestinal fortitude of the British, which I think isn't superior to that of the United States, please tell us why you call this our war?

Mr. MOWRER. I called it our war because I believe that the British are standing between us and an attack on the part of Germany, with such confederates as it can muster. It was not our war in inception. It became our war when it became clear to those of us who had any contact with the people across the water that what the man in Berlin was after was world empire, that he particularly disliked us and hated us as a democracy, and that he intended to clean us up if he could. As long as the European powers have been capable of looking after this war, I certainly would have been in favor of our doing nothing about it; now that it becomes evident that they may not be capable of doing it, now that at least half of those nations upon which we thought we could count have gone down, are under Hitler's boot, it seems to me we ought to look up and, if our laws stand in the way of doing what we ought to do, we ought to change the laws That is what we have Senators and Congressmen for.

Senator LEE. I want to make another comment on the legality of the situation. Of course, it could be held that it is unlawful, but it has not been stated, that I have seen, that it would be unlawful for the United States to sell or transfer these destroyers to a private company or corporation and they in turn then sell them to England. Now that is within the law, and here we are splitting hairs on technicalities in order to hide behind a law and lose an opportunity to save America from war. If Hitler comes over here, what good would it do us to stand on the coast and say, "It is against international law for you to do this"?

Chairman GRANIK. We have another question from the floor.

Miss FRANCES O'DONNELL. A question to Senator Johnson, or a request for a comment by Senator LEE: Please explain why it would take 2 years to replace one of these over-age destroyers when it could be constructed and put into service within 3 months during the World War, 41½ days having been the record launching time, as I was told at the Navy Department. Why would it take 2 years to replace a vessel that could be built originally in 3 months?

Senator JOHNSON. The Navy Department must be putting out conflicting information. According to the information that the Senate Naval Affairs Committee have—and they received it from the Navy Department—it takes exactly 2 years to build one of these destroyers. Now it is a fact that during the World War they built some sort of a small launch-like boat; I don't know very much about the boat, but they did build them very rapidly, but these destroyers are not a small boat. They are 1,100 tons, they are good-sized boats and it takes 2 years to construct them. They are not the kind of vessel that you think they are at all.

Miss RABORI. Was it only when England stood a 50-percent chance of losing that it became our war?

Mr. MOWRER. It becomes our war when the result of England's losing it is going to affect us. I have been taking, like the rest of the people in this country, a rather selfish view of this war, hoping that we could stay out of it and that other people would fight our battle. If it becomes apparent that they cannot fight our battle, then I think we should do something about it.

Senator LEE. In other words, it is our war once removed; the next step will be the United States.

Senator JOHNSON. I am trying to get Mr. Mowrer to tell what he would do that we are not already doing. I have already stated to him, and he hasn't disputed the fact——

Senator LEE (interposing). Transfer the destroyers.

Senator JOHNSON. That our munitions industries are at the disposal of England, that we are making everything they want as rapidly as we can make it, and we are neglecting our own orders in order to supply England with the munitions of war. Our private industry is doing that, and what else is it that you want to do? I want you to make an explicit statement of what you want us to do.

Mr. MOWRER. I would be delighted to answer the Senator's question as soon as he answers mine as to what he would do, if he could, toward the American pilots now flying for England and breaking our law.

Senator JOHNSON. There isn't anything we can do. They are violating our law. They are not under our control. What do you want us to do, try to go after them and extradite them and bring them back here and try them? They have given up their citizenship.

Senator LEE. Listen, Senator JOHNSON, why do you think we couldn't transfer those destroyers now? Couldn't we sell them to a private individual and let him sell them to England?

Senator JOHNSON. Oh, we could beat the devil around the bush, but that doesn't make it legal.

Senator LEE. We will have the devil to beat if England is defeated.

Senator JOHNSON. That is no way for a nation to act. Folks can do that, maybe, and get away with it privately, but great nations that are trying to build up respect for law——

Senator LEE (interposing). You are trying to play a game with two sets of rules, decency on one side, and on the other the violation of law, of the sanctity of human beings, the murder of human beings, the invasion of territories and the violation of every law that ever existed, man and God, and we are trying to split hairs over the technicalities of a law when we could do it within the law of our own country and aid them materially without violating our law.

Dr. LIBBY. Senator LEE, I don't believe emotion is going to enable us to evade the plain law. I read the law. It is not legalistic. The question is whether, as our colleague here, Mr. Mowrer, suggests, the law shall be repealed or not. The law is there and this idea that you have is incorrect. We cannot sell those destroyers to a private individual and sell them to some other country. That would still be a violation of the law, and the Attorney General takes the same position.

Senator LEE. He hasn't so stated with respect to the destroyers. With respect to the "mosquito" fleet, yes; but they were built since the law was passed. The destroyers were built before the law and the law says they must not have been built with the intent of transferring them to some belligerent. Certainly no one could say that the destroyers built back at the time of the World War were built with that intent.

Senator JOHNSON. They have recently been reconditioned and rebuilt.

Senator LEE. But the law doesn't say anything about reconditioning and rebuilding.

Mr. FREDERICK C. KRUG. I want to know what assurance we have that if we loan planes to England now, and England should lose, that England won't use them against us and we would be in worse shape.

Senator LEE. That same argument could be applied that we shouldn't use our ships against anybody because they might be captured. If England were fighting only half-heartedly that might be true, but they are fighting like grim death.

Senator JOHNSON. But you said a while ago Germany was going to get all of England's ships. If they are fighting so strenuously, I don't think Germany——

Senator LEE (interposing). I said if they did. I didn't say they were going to. I said "if."

Senator JOHNSON. I am glad you said "if."

Senator LEE. The ships would be used against the same power that threatens America and the same power against which we are arming, and to say we shouldn't transfer them because they might be captured would be to say we shouldn't send our own men out with them because they might be captured.

Senator JOHNSON. I want to ask Senator LEE one question. He made a very courageous statement in his opening remarks. I thought he was going to be courageous all the way, but when he got right down to the point, he said, "Oh, I wouldn't send men. I wouldn't send men. I wouldn't declare war. I wouldn't do anything like that"—and the facts are that Great Britain right now needs skilled men, and the only place in the world that there are any skilled men that she can get is right in the United States of America. If you are going to help England, why not do it honorably and out in the open? If you want to fight Hitler, why don't you do it, not on the floor in debate, but why don't you to war with him, if that is the way you feel?

Senator LEE. I don't want to fight him; that is the reason I want England to whip him.

Mr. OWENS. I would like to ask Mr. Mowrer a question. You state if the Germans attempt to get possession of the British Fleet, the danger of invasion is very great over here. When the British have possession of the British Fleet and they are not able to get to Norway, France, or Holland, how do you think the Germans can get over here with it?

Mr. MOWRER. The French had possession of the French Fleet and the British had a promise from the French that the ships would never be put in a position where they could conceivably fall into the hands of Adolf Hitler. Nevertheless, there is a great chance today that a large proportion of the French Fleet will fall into the hands of Hitler. Why? Because a government that preaches resistance, that carries on resistance to the last moment, that has no intention of allowing the fleet to come into the hands of the the enemy falls. Winston Churchill fights to the last and he is thrown out and his successor, conceivably, let's say, Oswald Mosley, the head of the British Order of Fascists, orders the fleet to submit to Hitler. Conceivably the British Fleet does.

Mr. OWENS. That doesn't answer the question.

Senator LEE. Let me have a crack at that question. In the first place, in England the war is concentrated in a very limited area, and it is much less difficult there, where they know where the attack will come, where they will try to land and they can concentrate their forces and fewer men can give greater resistance on a smaller area than they could with the whole coast, the Atlantic coast of America, particularly with our fleet in the Pacific, where it must stay on account of conditions over there, and with a bomb in the Panama Canal it would take a long time for the fleet to go around into the Atlantic. Besides, if Hitler had the British Fleet, he would have the Italian, German, and several times larger fleet and a coastline from the North Pole to the South Pole on which he could land.

Dr. LIBBY. Senator LEE, you have evaded the question, it seems to me; still I am not satisfied at all with your evasion of the legal question, both from the standpoint of our law and the standpoint of international law. You are suggesting that we apply some subterfuge which is still illegal, and then what do you do about international law? Do you really want us to follow the example of Hitler, or do you want to stand by Secretary Hull's defense of the integrity of law? Now, I would like a "yes" or "no" answer.

Senator LEE. Yes. [Laughter.]

Dr. LIBBY. That is precisely what you have been saying.

Senator JOHNSON. I am still anxious to find out what we are going to do for England that we are not already doing. These 50 destroyers are only a gesture, after all. Suppose that we do gamble with them and furnish them to England, and then suppose that Hitler overcomes England, anyway. Are either of you gentlemen certain that the transfer of these 50 destroyers will save England? And if they will not save England, what do you propose to do next? What is your next step?

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. Mowrer, do you want to take that?

Mr. MOWRER. Yes; I will take that. Senator JOHNSON asks two questions. He says what are we going to do for England that we are not doing now. The Senator is in the Senate, and he ought to know a great deal better than I do. I hope most of us will agree he ought to get on doing something as soon as possible.

Senator JOHNSON. You want to know what we are doing. In May our private industries sold England 23 airplanes, war planes; and in this last month the number was close to 300. Just as fast as our production picks up we are letting England have our war planes—war planes that our own Army and Navy ought to have—but that is all being done within the law. What else do you want to do?

Mr. MOWRER. The Senator asked whether I thought the 50 destroyers would conceivably or surely save Great Britain. Conceivably, they would save Great Britain. Surely no one can say. But, in any case, if they serve to prolong that struggle by a few months, they will have served us in very good stead, because those few months of rearmament may make a very great difference in the defenses of this country.

Senator JOHNSON. Do you know England wants those destroyers to carry the blockade to innocent women and children of Europe?

Mr. MOWRER. Yes, sir.

Senator JOHNSON. That is what she wants those 50 destroyers for—to carry out her blockade of starvation.

Mr. MOWRER. Precisely—and I wish her blockade of starvation could be made effective from tonight.

Senator JOHNSON. That is a pretty heartless way to look at it.

Senator LEE. It is much more heartless to go against the democracy that is fighting over there for the principle in which we believe. If we go over there and feed Hitler's victims, why, we just are helping break England's only weapon, the blockade, and I think that is wrong.

Dr. LIBBY. Senator, there was a time when we were interested in France. Now you want to starve France.

Senator LEE. France gave up because she was undermined inside by the "fifth columnists" and preachers of appeasement.

Dr. LIBBY. But do you still want to starve her?

Senator LEE. I don't want to starve France, but I don't want to feed her and release the other food to go to Germany over there, so Germany's morale will be kept up.

Mr. MOWRER. Isn't it a little vicious to say "want to starve France"? I don't think anybody wants to starve anybody.

Senator LEE. I don't want to starve anybody.

Senator JOHNSON. If you let them have the destroyers, that is what they are going to do, and they would do it with our vessels.

Senator LEE. But it will help stop Hitler, and so help save us.

Senator JOHNSON. There are lots of things you can do to stop Hitler besides starving innocent women and children.

Mr. MOWRER. I wish you would suggest those things. You will have plenty of opportunity on the floor of the Senate this coming week, and if you do it and it is accepted, you can be sure of my admiration and support, and I think that of most Americans.

Mr. GRANIK. Thank you, gentlemen.

You have been listening to the American Forum of the Air presentation, How Far Should United States Aid Great Britain?

Our speakers were Senator JOSH LEE of Oklahoma, Senator EDWIN C. JOHNSON of Colorado, Edgar Ansel Mowrer, noted newspaper correspondent and coauthor with Col. William J. Donovan of the recent newspaper series sponsored by Secretary Knox, and Dr. Frederick J. Libby, founder and head of the National Council for Prevention of War.

Announcer STEPHEN MCCORMICK. Thus, we conclude another broadcast in this series of the American Forum of the Air, presented by WOL in cooperation with WOR.

This series is arranged and directed by Theodore Granik, founder of the American Forum of the Air and of the American Forum, nationally syndicated newspaper feature. In the interest of education there are printed and distributed free of charge, the entire proceedings of these broadcasts which are recorded by stenotype.

A History of Disaster; the Roosevelt Administration Has Failed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS D. CULKIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANCIS D. CULKIN, OF NEW YORK

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the permission heretofore granted in the House, I am placing in the RECORD a speech delivered by me at the Hotel Pontiac, Oswego, N. Y., before the Republican County Committee of Oswego County.

Mr. Chairman, the chairman desired me to speak to you today in regard to the national issues. I fully realize that most of you, in common with all citizens, were glued to the radio during the convention at Philadelphia and that you heard the able, carefully prepared speeches of ex-President Hoover, Joe Martin, and Governor Stassen, of Minnesota. These speeches summarized the failure of Democratic leadership at Washington and the crying need for a change in our Government. It is impossible to add to the effectiveness of these several indictments. However, if you indulge me for a brief period, I will endeavor to show to you in my own way the complete poverty of the Roosevelt administration in the field of national achievement.

I have, of course, been in close touch with the affairs at Washington during the 7 years of the present administration, and as time passes, I become more and more alarmed at what Webster called "the state of the Nation." Our national economics fall roughly into four subdivisions: First, labor; second, agriculture; third, capital; and fourth, administration. With your permission, I will discuss them briefly in that order.

LABOR AND THE ADMINISTRATION

The present hour finds labor demoralized, with 12,000,000 citizens, who desire to work, unable to find employment. The principle of collective bargaining, which to my mind is the Magna Carta of labor, has been used to destroy one branch of labor and to build up another. The National Labor Relations Board, which had a magnificent opportunity for service to labor, has gone out of its way to foment strikes and to destroy labor solidarity. These left-wingers, all of whom hate the profit motive, took over this Board in toto. The controlling influence in the Board is Dr. Saposs, whose writings indicate that if he is not a Communist, he has much affection for their principles

The leader of the C. I. O., John Lewis, condemned the administration's labor policies vigorously at Philadelphia last week. William Green, the head of the Federation of Labor, has likewise been severe in his expressions of disapproval. The attempt of the administration to make labor and all of its branches an arm of the administration has brought disaster to labor, industry, and the country at large. The administration, instead of solving the problems of labor, has only added to its difficulties and those of the Nation.

AGRICULTURE DISTRESSED

The administration sought to Tammanyize and take over national agriculture. The fact is that agriculture is no nearer parity than it was in 1933, despite an expenditure of some $5,000,000,000 to that end. The doctrine of scarcity, which to my mind is a sin against God, has been one of its features. The administration has ignored the right of the American farmer to the American market. In writing the trade agreements, the administration has placed the agriculture on the altar of foreign trade. Under the soil conservation plan, it has retired 40,000,000 acres of land from production, and at the same time these trade agreements have let in the products of 40,000,000 foreign acres. The President and the State Department were going in one direction and the Agriculture Department in another. The fact is indisputable, and the Democratic leadership of the House virtually admit that agriculture, due to these contradictory policies, is worse off than it was in 1933.

CAPITAL IN HIDING

We are living under the capitalistic system. That, to my mind, when coupled with a sane, progressive liberalism and free institutions, is the best system yet devised by man. Today capital, an essential branch of our economy and industry, is in hiding, not daring to show its head. The President has subjected it to demagogery without end; he has arrayed class against class and has dried up the sources of capital by his endless demagoging. The scolding fish wives of the administration, Ickes and his like, have baited and maligned the industrialists, who have had a large part in making America the great country it is. In every branch of the Government are left wingers, Communists, and near Communists, who are continuously endeavoring to tear down the present system and substitute in its place something akin to the Russian ideology. This miserable performance in Washington will go on until this group of radicals are hurled from high places.

ONE-MAN GOVERNMENT

The spectacle presented by the executive branch of the Government is a most extraordinary one. It is one-man government and that goes largely by hunch and personal predilection. Theodore Roosevelt, when he was President, surrounded himself with such men as Charles Evans Hughes and Elihu Root. The present occupant of the White House has surrounded himself by a race of coffee coolers and courtiers, not one of whom has an idea to market, and if he did have one, he would not dare express it in the august presence of the boss. I make an exception of Hull, who is an able, sincere man, but he has done tremendous damage to agriculture, industry, and labor by his attempt to put these American groups on the same plane as those in other countries living under substandard conditions and receiving not more than one-tenth of the pay the American worker gets. The policy of the administration is confused and changes from day to day. From whatever angle the executive branch of the Government is viewed it spells disaster to the American people.

NATIONAL DEBT

During the tragic years since the present administration took office twenty-eight billion has been added to the national debt. It has been a period of endless waste and extravagance, when at least $10,000,000,000 was poured down political rat holes. I cite the case of the Grand Coulee project, in the State of Washington, where half a billion dollars is being spent for the purpose of bringing one and one-half million acres of land into production and to artificially create a horsepower five times greater than the American side at Niagara Falls. This despite the fact that there is no market for this power except the rattlesnakes and the coyotes, who are not outstanding consumers of electricity. Political dams, costing many millions of dollars, have been built in areas where the evaporation exceeds the rainfall and the rivers flow upside down. The administration has raided the Public Treasury repeatedly on behalf of its favorites. This, to my mind, is the most shameful performance of all and reminds one of the last days of the Roman Republic.

It is a matter of record that $25,000,000 of public money was spent to nominate Senator BARKLEY in the State of Kentucky, $25,000,000 of public money was spent to purge Senator TYDINGS in Maryland, and a similar sum was allocated to defeat Senator GEORGE in Georgia. Every close congressional district in the county was loaded up with useless projects costing hundreds of millions of dollars for the purpose of putting over the Democratic candidate. To my mind, unless this performance is stopped, we might as well half-mast the flag and bid adieu to free institutions. The administration has added 600,000 political proteges to the public pay roll and now has an army of political shock troops numbering over a million. While all this has been going on, the unemployed on relief have been refused a decent living and have been manhandled by a stupid arrogant bureaucracy.

ONE-MAN POWER AND BANKRUPTCY

For 7 years, lulled by the golden voice sounding off through the medium of ghost-written demogagic utterances, we have been drifting into one-man power and national bankruptcy. These two, history tells us, are the parents of fascism. The impartial student of history will record that the administration has, from every viewpoint, been a complete failure in the field of domestic economy.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Fumbling and hopelessly inept in internal affairs, the distinguished occupant of the White House has now turned to the foreign scene, where the most tragic events of all history are happening. I speak but the truth when I say that the President is using the sad condition of France and the dire predicament of democratic England for the purpose of distracting the American people from their own bankrupt and unhappy condition. In the Presidential press conferences spouting whales become submarines, and a rock at low tide in the Caribbean or the Bay of Fundy become alien battleships.

He and his coffee-cooler columnists and radio stooges, most of them on the public pay roll, are proclaiming a holy war to be fought with a bankrupt Treasury and at a time when we have few planes and fewer tanks, which, under modern tactics, are the chief weapons of offensive or defensive warfare. It should be remembered that those Presidential satellites, Hopkins and Ickes, have thrown to the winds and wasted at least $10,000,000,000 in the past 7 years. During that period, in common with some of my Democratic and Republican colleagues, I endeavored to get some of this money for military housing and defensive purposes. It was all in vain, for these gentlemen, and all the other "left wingers" who constituted the Presidential staff, refused to allocate money for this purpose. They built marble dog pounds and similar structures without limit, but national defense was not in their cosmos. The President was in sympathy with this attitude and out of this vast spending made no provision for the emergencies that are already present by reason of the German and Russian conquests.

During the same period the President, by his international fumbling, has repeatedly brought us to the verge of war. He now proposes to spend nine and probably eleven billion dollars ostensibly for planes, ships, and other equipment under the joint auspices of himself and Harry Hopkins. Mr. Hopkins, who is the greatest spender of all history, was seriously ill, but the thought of seven billions to spend has brought him back from the grave and he has now taken up his residence at the White House. Hand in hand with Hopkins comes Leon Henderson, a wild-eyed hater of the profit motive. Also comes one Sidney Hillman, who under the Presidential ukase, is to have charge of the training of the boys and girls of America.

A brief word about Mr. Hillman. This gentleman has been famed for his assistance to the aspirations of Soviet Russia, and his organization loaned a million dollars to that country. He is in deep sympathy with the Russian scheme of things. The President knows his record and despite that fact has placed him in charge of the organization of the youth of America. This, to my mind, means the spread of communism in America during the years to come. He is the type that bores from within and is more dangerous than Earl Browder. The fathers and mothers of the country should know that this is the type of man who is to train their children. It is all typical of the inner workings of the administration in Washington. The naked fact is that the President of the United States is either in sympathy with this crowd, or is afraid of them.

It will be claimed that the National Defense Board will be under the direction of those great industrialists, Knudsen and Stettinius. We at Washington know that the duties assigned to Knudsen and Stettinius give them but small influence in this situation. It is a fair inference at this time that the President intends to run for a third term and to use this vast sum allocated for national defense for the purpose of breaking the sacred third-term precedent and promoting his own election and the election of a Democratic Congress. It is also a fair inference that this money will be used between now and election in doubtful States for the purpose of electing his hand-picked Democratic nominee for the Presidency. This is the President's program, and based on past experience, everyone knows that the case of national defense will go hand in hand with political advantage.

I am strong for national preparedness, but I am not for the shedding of American blood on European soil. A canvass of the House of Representatives showed that 400 Members were opposed to an entry in the war, but 1 Member of the House favored it. So you can put your mind at ease on that issue. Practically every Member of the House favors aid to England within the scope of international law. Practically every Member of the House is completely out of sympathy with the President's postering bellicose attitude toward other countries. It comes to me with good authority that the President unofficially gave word to France and England that we would intervene. The record shows that our playboy representative at Paris, Mr. Bullitt, discouraged peace and advised the continuance of the war. Mr. Bullitt was in daily telephonic communication with the President and he was the President's spokesman.

May I say in this phase of my discussion that every man on both the Republican and Democratic sides of the aisle believes that the United States must be made impregnable on the land, on the sea and in the air. All of us believe that we must keep the western continent, including Canada, free from the control of Communist or Fascist influence.

I have endeavored to sum up the situation nationally and at Washington. I do not believe that it is time to speak softly. I do believe that by proclaiming from the housetops the facts about the debacle at Washington, that we will rally all good Americans, regardless of party, to the Republican standard in November.

REPUBLICAN CONVENTION AT PHILADELPHIA

When you honored me last April by electing me a delegate to the National Republican Convention, it was my fixed belief that the vast majority of the Republicans of the district favored Tom Dewey for the Presidency. In common with all Americans, I greatly admired Dewey's magnificient service to decency in government. I greatly admired the gallant, effective canvass he made for the nomination. His speeches throughout the country carried conviction to the people that the New Deal has failed, and that we were in the midst of a grave emergency. Then came those tragic happenings in Europe in which one free people after another were ground under the brutal heel of Hitler. Then came the conviction to the American people that war had changed its rules; that it was no longer a matter of individual courage and initiative, but rather a war of machines on sea and land, and in the air. It became apparent that we would have to be ready to defend not only the United States but all of the Americas. It became apparent that there was needed at the head of the Government a business and industrial genius; a man imbued with purely patriotic, nonpolitical purposes, to lead the country out of the economic wilderness in which we have been wandering for 7 years.

One man seemed to answer this complete purpose. His fine personality, his great ability, his outstanding achievements in the business field, seemed to be the answer to the prayer of a country bogged down in the slough of despair. That man, by the grace of God, became the Republican nominee at Philadelphia. His name is Wendell Willkie and he will be the next President of the United States. Like Lincoln, he comes from the plain people and fought his way up through the school of hard knocks, working his way through college. As I size him up, he is an ardent believer in the destiny and worth of the man who toils, whether he is on a farm or in a factory.

I met him three times while I was at Philadelphia and was much impressed by his personal charm. We have been under the control of charm and the golden voice during the past 7 years, and it would not be well to underrate it. Willkie, however, has more than charm. Let me give you a brief verbal picture of him. He stands over 6 feet tall, with a strong body, and a magnificient head rising from powerful shoulders. He has a manly face, every line of which shows sincerity and power. He is frank and open in speech, and is a born orator of the realistic school.

The morning after I arrived at Philadelphia I met a friend of mine, a veteran newspaper man, who had just come from a press conference given by Willkie. He told me that over 100 reporters fired questions at Willkie for over half an hour, and that some of these questions were not too friendly. There is no type of man living who can detect fraud or the commonplace quicker than a newspaper man, and it is remarkable to state that at the conclusion of the press conference the reporters gave Willkie three rousing cheers.

Wendell Willkie, to my mind, is an extraordinary composite of Jackson and Theodore Roosevelt. He had campaigned for but 45 days and his only disbursements were for traveling expenses. In the convention he had the disfavor and opposition of the old-time bosses. His nomination was pursuant to a strong popular demand that America should get away from organized politics and nominate a man who could carry the burden of government and the salvation of popular institutions to a real consummation.

Willkie will give force and validity to collective bargaining for labor. I met William Green, the president of the American Federation of Labor, after he had appeared before the Resolutions Committee at Philadelphia. I asked him what Willkie's standing was with labor. He said that Willkie's 40,000 employees were all organized either in the Federation or C. I. O., and that they were among the most contented and the best-paid labor groups in America.

Willkie will give the American market back to the American farmer. He was brought up on a farm and now actively engages in farming himself. His recent reception in the West was most remarkable. He took the farmers by storm.

Willkie's election will set the wheels moving all over America. He will clear out the left wingers, who are boring from within the Government, and under his auspices, America will go full steam ahead. There will be a job, at living wage, for every man willing to work. He will provide for the rearmament of America along nonpolitical lines. He stands for the enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine and keeping the American Continent free from foreign influence. He is a noninterventionist, and does not believe that American blood should be shed on foreign soil. He stands for aid to England in its present situation, so long as that does not actually embroil us in the conflict.

He is for a sane, rational system of old-age security. He will salvage the savings of labor and the contributions of industry to this program. It is now being used by the administration as current assets, and in the event of national bankruptcy, which now seems to impend, these savings of the people will be lost.

He stands for vigorous enforcement of the antitrust act. His sympathies are as broad as those of Lincoln and he believes that this great country should give adequate and proper relief to the unemployed.

In conclusion let me sound a warning. This campaign is going to be a real battle. This committee and similar committees all over the country must carry the fight to the people. If that is done, victory is certain. America is now at the crossroads of destiny. To continue the present administration in power would mean the destruction of popular government in America and certain bankruptcy. The election of Willkie means the preservation of democracy and will insure that the blessings of liberty, both economic and spiritual, guaranteed by the Constitution, will be handed down to our children and children's children to the latest generation.

The National Labor Relations Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 12 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix to the RECORD an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. It is a very great pleasure to find this great antiadministration daily on the right side of a political question.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of September 2, 1940]

THE FUTURE OF J. WARREN MADDEN

The term of J. Warren Madden as Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board expired last week. So far there has been no intimation from President Roosevelt that he is to be reappointed or that a successor is to be named. This is, of course, a thorny matter, involving, as it does, the whole dispute over the Wagner Act and the Board.

Therefore it should be said now that Mr. Madden has done a good job under the most difficult circumstances. The strength of his record—and its weaknesses, too—stem from his views of the Board's function. To him this has been primarily legal. In passing the Wagner Act Congress outlined a broad policy. It was the duty of the Board, in Mr. Madden's belief, to implement that policy, to create a body of ruling labor law. With the Board's chief counsel, Charles Fahy, this has been done beyond all expectation. No matter how old, there is not a single Federal agency that can boast of as victorious a record before the Supreme Court.

Naturally, this has been an ivory tower job of crossing every "t" and dotting every "i." It was and is necessary in cases that go to trial examiners and the courts. But these represent less than 10 percent of the complaints filed with the Board. It is in the other cases—whether they are withdrawn, dismissed or end in mutual agreement of union and employer—that a more flexible touch is needed. If a regional director has settled a nasty matter—probably at the cost of plenty of sweat—only irritation is caused if the agreement is sent back from Washington because it is not quite in the exact form desired by a punctilious lawyer. A different example of this lack of realism was the Board's effort to keep Government contracts from violators of the law.

Such situations call for the hearty "let's get together, boys" attitude of the Board's newest member, Mr. Leiserson. He may be an old school fire-eater, but he knows what corners can be cut.

The obvious answer is that both attitudes must be represented on the Board—that of the lawyer and that of the conciliator. It would be difficult to find a man who can represent the former as well as Mr. Madden. It is impossible to find another man with his experience. Further, he labored in the vineyard when the work was at its hardest and the sun at its hottest. His record does not deserve dismissal.

Senator Ernest Lundeen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN J. MAAS

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 9, 1940

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to believe that one who was so strong and vigorous yesterday is gone today. The sudden departure of a colleague with whom you have associated and worked closely is, indeed, a sad and mournful occasion. Friendships are life's greatest rewards. Their loss is irreplaceable.

The tragic and shocking death of Senator LUNDEEN has taken from public affairs an unusual political figure.

Senator LUNDEEN above all else was always a crusader. He was most generally found on the unpopular side of public questions and fought vigorously for his convictions. He was one of the first public officials in the country to advocate the acquisition by the United States of naval bases in the European-owned islands off the Atlantic shores of the Western Hemisphere.

Senator LUNDEEN was himself a veteran of the Spanish-American War. Because he was opposed to our involvement in foreign wars, he was considered an isolationist. Perhaps he was. A common error has arisen that all isolationists are pacifists. This mistake probably arises due to the fact that frequently isolationists found pacifists advocating the same course.

However, Senator LUNDEEN was no pacifist. He was an active advocate of a powerful national defense. He supported naval expansion and all our moves to increase the air forces of the United States. He was an active member of the Senate Military Affairs Committee.

Senator LUNDEEN was a great enthusiast of aviation. He not only supported the development of aviation in the Congress but he himself was one of the most prominent and frequent users of air travel. He had flown to Europe and back, and to and from the Hawaiian Islands, as well as all over this country. The more he flew the more his enthusiasm for flying grew.

Senator LUNDEEN was a vigorous public figure, and he was a devoted husband and father. While his death is an irreparable loss to his family, it is also a real loss to the Nation, as he had a distinct place and great usefulness in our democratic system.

Vindication of Carl Byoir

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. McGRANERY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1940

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES ON THE INVESTIGATION OF CARL BYOIR

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report of the Committee on Un-American Activities on charges made against Carl Byoir released for publication on Tuesday, September 10.

Carl Byoir, president of Carl Byoir and Associates, public relations counsel, of New York City, was accused on the floor of the House on May 27 and June 4 of being chief of the Nazi spy ring in this country, of having had something to do with the disappearance of M-day plans from the War Department, which were later supposed to have showed up in the possession of the German Government, and was further accused of being engaged in the business of infiltrating German spies into large business organizations which Mr. Byoir represents.

It will be noted that the Dies committee report refers to an investigation made by the McCormack committee of a certain contract entered into by Mr. Byoir with the German Federal Railroads in 1933 for the promotion of trade and travel and canceled by him in 1935. The vice chairman of the committee, Hon. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN, when he reported to the House, stated that Mr. Byoir was to be commended for his patriotic attitude on the matter. I congratlulate Mr. Byoir on his vindication and further congratulate the Committee on Un-American Activities on this demonstration of its ability to clear the innocent as well as turn up the guilty.

REPORT OF THE FULL COMMITTEE OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES, CONGRESSMAN JOE STARNES PRESIDING, ON THE CARL BYOIR MATTER

On June 6 last this committee initiated an investigation with respect to allegations of un-American activity which had been made against Carl Byoir, president of Carl Byoir and Associates, by WRIGHT PATMAN, a Member of Congress, on the floor of the House of Representatives.

The chairman of the committee, Mr. DIES, appointed Mr. DEMPSEY, of New Mexico, Mr. CASEY, of Massachusetts, and Mr. MASON, of Illinois, as a subcommittee to investigate the matter. Competent investigators of this committee were assigned to make a thorough investigation of all of the charges. At the same time the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice undertook a separate and independent investigation. On July 16, 1940, the Department of Justice issued the following statement:

"The investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation concerning allegations against Carl Byoir disclosed no evidence whatsoever that he has engaged in any un-American activity. No basis for departmental action has been found, and the case is regarded as closed."

The subcommittee also had for consideration all of the evidence presented before the McCormack committee with respect to a contract made by Mr. Byoir with the German Federal Railroads for the promotion of trade and travel in 1933, which was canceled by him in 1935. The committee does not believe that it is within its province to go behind the findings of fact nor the recommendations of the McCormack committee in this matter. The committee, therefore, has confined itself to events subsequent therto. It might be mentioned in this connection that the evidence shows that the contract was entered into for the promotion of trade and travel at a time when our Government was doing everything possible to promote trade relations with Germany.

On July 15, 1940, the subcommittee, after a study of all of the evidence, unanimously submitted to the chairman the following report:

"The subcommittee you appointed to investigate the charges of un-American activities made against Carl Byoir after carefully going over the report by Mr. Stedman and also after consulting the files of F. B. I. in the case find nothing to justify the charges made, nor any evidence that could possibly form a basis for such charges. We therefore find satisfaction in clearing Mr. Carl Byoir of the charges made against him and recommend that a resolution covering a complete exoneration of Mr. Byoir be voted by the full committee as soon as possible, such resolution to be based upon the subcommittee's report. We also believe in fairness to Mr. Byoir immediate publicity should be given to the subcommittee's findings."

Subsequently, Mr. PATMAN registered a complaint on the floor of the House to the effect that he had not been heard by the subcommittee, although his charges had been set forth in three addresses on the floor of the House, all available to the subcommittee. Accordingly Mr. PATMAN was given an opportunity to be heard before a meeting of the full committee held on Thursday, August 29. He made a complete statement of his position in this matter. Mr. PATMAN presented no new material evidence. Mr. Byoir appeared and was examined concerning the charges made against him.

The full committee adopts the report of its subcommittee fully exonerating Mr. Byoir of any charges reflecting on his Americanism or loyalty to the Government of the United States.

The Courage of Henry

OF
HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1940

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, as the days of my youth were spent in part on a Warren County, Iowa, farm, the following editorial, The Courage of Henry, is particularly interesting, coming as it does right from the home grounds. My friend the editor certainly is kind to killer of the little pigs. Think what a story he could make of it if he just took his hair down and went to town with the protagonist for the ever-normal granary, as Henry so blithely denominates the 450,000,000 bushels of stored corn hanging over the bumper crop Iowa now has coming on. I would set up straw man Hitler and knock the tar out of him also if I were in Henry's uncomfortable shoes. Time to call this stored threat "Agriculture's part in our preparedness for war."

A review of the last century under Democratic Presidents does bear out the prophecy of Bruce Barton's letter from the cook:

Every time we gets a Democrat, we gets a war.

As my memory serves me, there were six of them and only one had placid sailing in his foreign relations.

Polk, the first of them, took us into the war with Mexico.

Pierce, the second, had a tranquil term as to wars, but he led us into the most disastrous financial panic of our history.

James Buchanan left us with Fort Sumter fired upon and the War between the States in progress.

Grover Cleveland, the strongest and soundest of them all, was fortunate in his just quarrel with England over Venezuela and avoided a war.

Woodrow Wilson kept us out of war in 1916 until after election and we hope the present one can give us a like respite before we are called upon to make good on our present British alliance with Canada.

Does rather seem we ought to O. K. her wars before we are called upon to fight them, does it not?

[From the Indianola (Iowa) Record]

THE COURAGE OF HENRY

The acceptance speech of Henry Wallace is not to be taken lightly. When an old acquaintance, who used to be noted for his carefully weighed sentences, resorts to strained comparisons to get effects, it is time for his friends to stop and think.

Those who have maintained their confidence in Mr. Wallace despite political differences will note with sadness that he seems to have degenerated from an economist into a demagogue. If the Republican Party can be criticized on no more points than the far-fetched subjects for which Henry took it to task, then it is a better party than the Record thought it was. If there is nothing wrong with it except that it is a party of "appeasement" (an utterly silly accusation), and that its national chairman has not voted for all the farm legislation (fortunately for Henry's attempt at argument the Democratic chairman is not on record), then this show is about over.

Everybody understands, of course, that Henry was nominated by farm leaders. There is Farmer Flynn, Tammany boss of New York and now Democratic national chairman, and Farmer Hague, boss of Jeresey City, and Farmer Kelly, mayor of Chicago, whose political record would stink a dog off a gut wagon and drive a skunk to the open for air, not to mention Leased Farmer Hopkins, who wants his mare mules in foal, and, over and above all, Farmer Roosevelt, who was sailing yachts when Wendell Willkie was shocking wheat and herding sheep.

Keep in mind that Henry was not nominated by the free choice of the Chicago convention, but by the two-gun methods of the above-named "damfarmers."

Seriously, the Record, hardboiled Republican as it is accused of being, has in the past pointed out more genuine serious flaws in the Republican Party than Mr. Wallace could find to kick about. Under the prodding the party has had from Alf Landon for the past 4 years, and the present inspiring leadership of Wendell Willkie, the Record sees republicanism rising above its most serious past errors and becoming a reborn force for American ideals; but we didn't suppose, until last Thursday night, that it was so good the cheer leader of the new dealers would have to fake charges on which to condemn it.

Well Henry, old neighbor, here's hoping you succeed in arousing the people to an adequate hatred of Hitler. By gosh, it took guts to stand up in public as you did and denounce Hitler right there in Des Moines where everybody loves him so much—so much. If you had only attacked the Mohammendan religion and exposed polygamy in the island of Sulu, the evening would have been complete.

Seriously and confidentially, Henry, it did take a peculiar brand of courage—or something (were it not for your superb reputation for clean living we would say five fingers of gin)—at any rate some extraordinary daring for you to tell the world that anybody who would replace Mr. Roosevelt "would cause Hitler to rejoice."

The whole world knows that Wendell Willkie was in the front-line trenches fighting Hitler and his ilk while your man was safe in a marble office in Washington. Perhaps your man was doing his full part; but it hardly seems your part now to level the charge of disloyalty against the man who was doing the more hazardous job then.

After all, your man is running against a man who fought Hitler first. You seemed to think you could make the people believe your man is running against Hitler now.

You are in a tough spot, Henry, put up to give respectability to a cause that badly needs it. If your acceptance speech is all that you can say for the gang of political bosses with which you are associated, then you had better walk out on them to save your own reputation and the grand good name of your family. Moley walked out. Johnson walked out. Douglas walked out. Stanley High walked out. Garner as good as walked out, and Farley was pushed out. A grandson of Uncle Henry and a son of Henry C. is left in strange and polygot company.

Surely, Henry, you didn't write that speech. You could have done better. Honestly, now, wasn't it handed to you by the boys higher up who are using you as "bait for the farmers?"

The Need for Corn and Livestock Feed in Nebraska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL T. CURTIS
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1940

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I have had presented to me a petition which is as follows:

Whereas the ravages of drought have swept over a large portion of Nebraska for what is, in many cases, the seventh successive year, destroying our crops to such an extent as to eliminate not only all hope of selling grains for cash, but also destroying all vegetation to the point where, in many cases, we do not have food of any kind for our hogs, cattle, poultry, or other livestock and, therefore, making it necessary for us to dispose of these animals which are our only hope of gaining enough to sustain us during the winter and, inasmuch as in most cases we have exhausted our credit through the regular channels and also through the governmental channels, and whereas our plight has reached such a point that further borrowing of money is merely adding to the weight that pulls us under, therefore

We urgently plead that the Congress take such action as is necessary to provide, out of the huge stocks held by the Government, for farmers in the drought area, 10 bushels of corn for every acre of corn planted during this growing season with provision that it be repaid any time within the next 5 years, in kind, with no other charges to be assessed to the recipients.

The situation in Nebraska is a study in striking contrast. Part of the State bears promise of bountiful crops but in our section the situation is desperate and action is needed to keep farmers on their farms and to enable them to carry through their livestock and poultry with the resulting products which are absolutely necessary to keep enough activity in our small towns to sustain the merchants and townspeople who are directly dependent upon the products of the farmers for their living.

Mr. Speaker, the above petition has been signed by 3,350 residents of my congressional district. Due to a drought lasting 7 years the situation is most tragic. I hope the Members of Congress will assist me in having the Department of Agriculture do something about this very perplexing problem.

If the Government would release corn into that area now owned by the Government it would mean a great deal. At the same time the Federal Government would save about 10 cents a bushel per year storage charges and these distressed farmers could return bushel per bushel at a later time.

Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN J. MAAS
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to peacetime conscription; and to begin with I could not see the necessity for the Burke-Wadsworth bill. However, I am now convinced that these are no longer normal peacetimes. Recent events, particularly in the last few weeks, have shown that our danger of involvement in a world war is very real. Our only hope of avoiding involvement is to immediately become so strong that no one will risk a war against us. I have always been an ardent advocate of full preparedness. I have always hoped that this could be accomplished without the conscription of either men or industry.

Events are moving with such lightning-like rapidity now, however, that in these abnormal times we must take drastic measures to insure at once our total defense.

While it is regrettable that conscription is necessary in this country, it is folly to longer ignore the necessity of immediately building up the most powerful defenses possible for this country. Whether right or wrong, we have chosen up sides in the European war, which may easily become a world-wide war at any moment.

It can hardly be expected that our aid to one belligerent will not ultimately involve us in either the war itself directly or an attempt at reprisals by the other belligerents when the present European war is over. If we are to be drawn into the war, regardless of what draws us into it, we must be prepared to successfully defend ourselves. This requires the marshalling of industry and the mobilizing of our manpower in advance. It is too late to do these things once you are at war.

If we are to avoid attempts being made to take reprisals against us, if they can be avoided, it will be only because we have made ourselves so powerful that no other nation will dare challenge our strength. If reprisals are actually attempted, we must be so well prepared that we can successfully counter those reprisals.

While it is true that we do not have all of the military equipment necessary at the present time to fully equip an army of two or three million men, it is still necessary that we start the training of those men at once.

Equally important with the training of soldiers in the use of modern military weapons is the necessity of giving civilian soldiers a "hardening up" process of months of rigid training in military discipline and army routine. The best mechanic in the world, for instance, cannot stand up under battle conditions without having gone through this process of toughening and hardening up, no matter how well he understands the mechanical operation of a tank or an armored truck. Once a battle starts, it may be days before there is a moment's let up. Men, as well as machines, must be able to stand up under such conditions. Only rigid camp life and military routine can give this training, which is fully equal to the technical training in its importance. With the example of unprepared France and England before us, it would be foolhardy for us, in the light of present world conditions and developments, to longer remain less than totally prepared ourselves.

If war can be avoided, it will be avoided only because we are so strong and so well prepared that no one will dare make war upon us. The Congress has authorized and appropriated billions of dollars for the procurement of a vast armada on the sea, in the air, and on land. These airplanes, ships, tanks, and guns must have trained human beings to man them. It would seem the height of folly to spend these billions and procure all these defense weapons without training the men in their use. An airplane on the ground, a troop truck in a garage, a gun in its shed, are of no value in resisting attacks.

In mobilizing a large army, the most orderly, efficient, and fair way is by selective service. This insures that the Nation will be defended by the rich and poor alike, by equal representation according to population from all communities and sections of the country.

We do not permit volunteering in the paying of our taxes to provide for the cost of the defenses of the Nation. We no longer even permit volunteering in business and industry in the producing of the weapons and supplies necessary for our defense. There is no more reason why we should depend entirely upon volunteering for the men to defend this country. Any man who is willing to accept the benefits and opportunities of this country should be willing when necessity arises to defend the country that makes those benefits possible.

All Americans have an equal opportunity in this country, and they should all be willing to share equally in the obligation of defending this Nation.

Congress To Abdicate?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 10, 1940

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the people of this Nation are greatly worried over the European situation, and justly so. There has been much discussion throughout the length and breadth of our land respecting the duty of the Congress in the face of the war in Europe, and the vast majority of the people, from every section, are clamoring that Congress remain in session throughout this very unsettled condition. The people of my congressional district are insisting that the Congress stay here and continue in session throughout this critical period in order to aid in safeguarding the peace and security of our Nation. May I say that I am in full accord with the wishes of the people of my district, and I am ready and willing to remain in Washington during this entire critical period in order to assist in every possible way to keep our country out of this war.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, and to include therein a very illuminating editorial which appeared in the Washington News, on the subject Congress To Abdicate? The editorial follows:

CONGRESS TO ABDICATE?

It was on June 4 that President Roosevelt expressed his opinion that Congress might as well adjourn in a couple of weeks. National defense, he said, would not require the presence of the lawmakers in Washington. Nor, he said, could they serve any purpose except, perhaps, the laudable one of making speeches.

Since the date of that smart crack, Congress has passed 12 appropriation bills, totaling fourteen and one-half billions of taxpayer money and credit. It has authorized construction of a two-ocean Navy and has given the President authority to call the National Guard into service. It has enacted the alien registration law, the second Hatch Act, a law to regulate investment trusts, and has adopted a bristling restatement of the Monroe Doctrine. It has confirmed the appointments of a new Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy, and has before it for confirmation the appointments of a new Secretary of Commerce and a new Postmaster General. It has passed a billion-dollar defense tax bill, and is at work on a new excess-profits tax. And, most important of all, it is completing action on a bill to conscript manpower.

Mr. Roosevelt, notwithstanding his "indispensable" foresight, could not foresee the necessity for these far-reaching measures back on that June day when he blithely bade Congress pack its grip and leave the Nation's defense problem with the executive department.

All this is reviewed because talk of adjournment again is in the air—most of it, as usual, coming from administration sources. Administration Leader SAM RAYBURN proposed that Congress adjourn sine die at the end of this month, which would mean that there would be no Congress in Washington in October, November, and December—not until the new Congress convenes in January.

Minority Leader JOE MARTIN says he favors 3-day recesses, but not adjournment.

A recess longer than Mr. MARTIN proposes—say for as much as a month, covering the last part of the campaign season and giving the lawmakers a chance to get in personal touch with their constituents—might be all to the good. But for Congress to adjourn—to walk out on what gives every indication of being the most vital quarter of a year in the Nation's history—is, we think, too preposterous even to be seriously considered.

To leave to the Executive at a time like this the responsibility for such action as the fast-moving and tragic events may call for would be just another and a very spectacular evidence that we, like France, have gone soft; that purely political considerations have submerged and smothered our sense of duty; that the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November has become der Tag with our so-called statesmen, and to hell with what may happen otherwise.

It is herewith recommended that Congress remember that it is hired by the year; and, further, that every Senator and Representative dust off and read the Constitution under which they serve; that they reorient themselves to the realization that our system of Government involves three equal and coordinate branches, of which they add up to one-third.

Particularly we would suggest that they read (under the heading "Powers of Congress") those constitutional passages which have to do with declaring war, the raising and supporting of armies, the providing and maintaining of navies, the suppression of insurrections and the repelling of invasions, the arming and disciplining of the militia, and the borrowing of money on the credit of the United States.

Also, that they realize that we are drifting rapidly toward war, though the purpose of our vast defense program, including conscription of our young men, is to keep out of, not to get into, war—and that Congress, with its oftentimes irritating speechmaking, is by its very nature the great restraining influence against war, as distinct from the executive department which, by its very nature, is the department of action.

Lastly, as the preachers say, we throw in this thought—that if Congress should adjourn it is very probable that the folks back home, come election day, will decide to keep at home permanently those who vote to abdicate.

Congress To Abdicate?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT K. GOODWIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1940

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, I call to the attention of the House the following editorial appearing in the Washington Daily News of September 11, 1940, which is entitled "Congress to Abdicate?"

Gentlemen of the House, if there ever was a statement of fact that goes directly to the heart of a situation and lays it out cold in plain everyday language, a language we all can understand, this editorial is such a statement. It speaks directly for the people and their interests.

I include this editorial with the full permission and knowledge of Mr. John T. O'Rourke, executive editor of the News:

It was on June 4 that President Roosevelt expressed his opinion that Congress might as well adjourn in a couple of weeks. National defense, he said, would not require the presence of the lawmakers in Washington. Nor, he said, could they serve any purpose except, perhaps, the laudable one of making speeches.

Proof of Authenticity of the British Secret Document—Part III

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 3, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, my object in having inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD evidence to prove the authenticity of the British secret document, or the letter which was sent to Lloyd George, is solely for informative purposes.

The substance matter which I have inserted in the RECORD is to identify this letter as a true report sent by a British official to the Prime Minister of England. Everyone who has the interest of our country at heart, should demand that this letter be republished in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for it is Exhibit 126 of the Senate hearings on the alleged activities of the Geneva Conference. No objection should be raised in having this document printed, unless the suppression of it is for the purpose of protecting officials in the British Government.

The letter, as I have already said, is contemptible, as it treats all Americans as inferiors to self-anointed upper strata in English society. It follows, therefore, that if the withholding of publicity on this document is of value to Great Britain, the cost of reproducing it is of much greater value to the people of the United States.

I shall now quote excerpts from the British secret document, so that they may be compared with the articles I have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on September 10 and 11, entitled "Proof of Authenticity of the British Secret Document" and "British Propaganda and Subversion of Textbooks in American Public Schools."

EDUCATION

For many years we had trained the inhabitants to view native culture with disdain and disgust. Real culture was produced only "on the other side." Americans such as Henry James, Whistler, Sargent, and Edwin Abbey were conceded domestic recognition only after they had received our imprimatur. Before the war we had created a considerable demand for British-born and trained men to fill positions of intellectual control here. During the war we added thousands to the number of these men by substituting them for hostile natives, teachers, preachers, professors, and lecturers who were dismissed for our sake by patriotic authority. We organized our thought controllers into British schools and universities' clubs; and we are now nearing the point where, through their concerted efforts, we shall control from the cradle to the grave whatever mind this Nation possesses.

HOSTILE NATIVE TENDENCIES

On the Irish-American situation here, Sir Horace Plunkett has lately reported. There is no German-American situation; it is considered near treason to use German silver, to hear German music, or to have German measles. German we have managed to bar from so many schools that we need no longer fear either intellectual or commercial competition from Germany in America, or commercial competition from this country in Germany. And we are rewriting the school history books in order to make King George III, of glorious memory, a German king so that our late enemies may be penalized for the wrongs which the Colonists fancy they received at his royal hands and ours.

PUERICULTURE

We are at present engaged in a campaign to Americanize the schools, to make obedient loyal little Britons out of the undisciplined native young. School books now refer to the 1776 revolt as an unfortunate and senseless family quarrel, which has been given regrettable publicity by the vulgar and scandalous. With votive wreaths we laid the ghosts of the foolish fathers. The Child's Book of Knowledge and similar works, which we have tactfully introduced, enable the young to anglicize their parents. There is a growing tendency on the part of the wealthy to seek exclusively English schools, such as St. Bernard's in New York City, for the education of their children. This tendency should be fostered by Foreign Office subsidy, if necessary.

We are replacing with the song America the scurrilous Star-Spangled Banner, which, after expurgating, we socially ostracized. America, which has the same air as God Save the King, is usually played and not sung; so in effect, we are conferring on this colony the imperial anthem.

These excerpts from the British secret document are self-explanatory, and the claims made are confirmed by the articles to which I have referred.

Was the author of the letter to the Honorable Lloyd George correct when he asserted that attempts would be made to remove The Star-Spangled Banner as our national anthem? The answer is "Yes," as the articles I now quote will reveal:

The spiritual union of England and America—and there is no other union—is God-made. Its attempted disruption through the insistence on the perpetuation of The Star-Spangled Banner is German propaganda, and it must and shall cease. It had not occurred to me that this was German propaganda to keep up a former animosity which existed between England and America, or Ephraim and Manasseh, until it was told me by those highest in authority.

The Star-Spangled Banner is not our official anthem, and therefore is not a national institution. It is an excrescence—an illegitimate branch that has been engrafted on the holy roots of our national consciousness. It is a blot on our escutcheon and in no way represents us in this momentous hour. A supreme power has evidently prevented the authorization of a hymn which does not express American democracy.

Lloyd George emphasized the same sentiment in the press today (September 12, 1918): "This must be the last war. * * * There is no compromise between freedom and tyranny, no compromise between light and darkness. I know that it is better to sacrifice one generation than to sacrifice liberty forever. That is what we are fighting for, and Heaven grant that we fight through to the end."

It would interest you to know, no doubt, that I am in receipt of a letter from Queen Mary of England, in which she states that she has read my pamphlet, Words and Music of The Star-Spangled Banner Oppose the Spirit of Democracy, Which the Declaration of Independence Embodies, and assures me of her interest in it, and also her interest in the words of the new national anthem, Our America.

This is the standard around which I am rallying my spiritual, mental forces. The insistence upon perpetuating darkness and schism, which The Star-Spangled Banner represents, is, I have been told by some in the highest authority, nothing more nor less than German propaganda, working to keep alive the spirit of animosity between England and America. It must and shall cease. True Americans are demanding and taking possession of their spiritual birthright of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness and will share eventually this birthright with their Anglo-Saxon brothers, who, with them, will lead all nations out of the misery and darkness of hatred and animality into the light of life and love, the source and supply of man's real spiritual individuality.

These excerpts are from a book entitled "Words and Music of The Star-Spangled Banner Oppose the Spirit of Democracy Which the Declaration of Independence Embodies." A protest, by Kitty Cheatham, which was copyrighted in 1918.

I now quote from the New York Times, August 5, 1925:

The Star-Spangled Banner, with its words breathing hatred of our Anglo-Saxon brother, Britain, and its music borrowed from a foul English drinking song, To Anacreon in Heaven, can never become our national anthem. Never has Congress and never will Congress legalize Francis Scott Key's ballad, which voices "bombs bursting in air," "blood," "the terror of flight and the gloom of the grave," "foul footsteps' pollution," and refers to our Anglo-Saxon brother, Britain, as "the foe's haughty host."

New York City, August 1, 1925.

Mrs. AUGUSTA E. STETSON,
7 West Ninety-sixth Street, New York City.

DEAR MRS. STETSON: I have just been reading your book, Sermons Which Spiritually Interpret the Scriptures, published by G. P. Putnam's Sons. The article which engaged my attention at this time is entitled "The Star-Spangled Banner Can Never Become Our National Anthem," which you first published in the press of New York, Washington, and Baltimore, in June 1922. In this article you protest against the song, both words and music, which you characterize as being un-American, unauthorized by Congress, and which you prophesy will be erased from America's historic record by fiat of God.

For years I have been aware of the subtle, un-Christian influence of this song, The Star-Spangled Banner, and of the very evident use which is made of it to stir up sentiments inimical and hurtful to every ideal which Americans cherish. The fact is that each time a bill has been introduced in Congress seeking to legalize The Star-Spangled Banner as our national anthem Congress has refused to give its sanction.

Allow me to relate two incidents which occurred in my experience recently. At a large public gathering, held near New York City early last month, The Star-Spangled Banner was played by the band as a prelude to the addresses and exercises of the evening. I was seated in my car, but I did not remove my hat, as this would have been equivalent to my acquiescence in the vicious sentiments and ribald music of this song, which I repudiate, as well as an acknowledgment of its legality, contrary to Congress' attitude.

A man came running toward me, excitedly waving his arms, and demanding that I remove my hat, but I paid no attention to him, and the music ceased before he reached my car.

On a similar occasion, a few days later, the band again played The Star-Spangled Banner. This time I was one of the throng about the platform, which was brilliantly lighted; but I again kept my hat upon my head. A lady, a member of a group standing near, said, "Take off your hat to our national anthem." I replied, "Madam, The Star-Spangled Banner is not the national anthem of America, for it has never been authorized by Congress." She expressed surprise. At that moment a gentleman approached me from behind, tapped me on the shoulder, and said, "Excuse me, sir, you have forgotten your hat." I said, "No, sir; I have not forgotten my hat. This song is not our national anthem."

I longed to tell these people, who were the ignorant mouthpieces for vicious, un-American sentiments, the truth about this song and its foreign, ribald musical setting, but the time was not opportune. Therefore, dear Mrs. Stetson, I feel that your article on this subject, if reprinted in the press at this time, will do a great work in enlightening the people of America as to a phase of the hidden, secret, alien warfare which is today being fiercely waged against our beloved country, America, as well as against the God-ordained and predestined unity of the two great Anglo-Saxon peoples, America and Britain, under the rulership of Christ. Will you republish your valuable article now? With much respect,

Sincerely yours,

J. P. BLAIR.

I have taken the liberty of quoting these excerpts, in order to show that the author of the British secret document was not given to idle speculation. He knew that our schools, colleges, and churches were undermined with British-Israel and Anglo-Saxon federation propaganda, and that an attempt would be made to exchange The Star-Spangled Banner for a song, entitled, "Our America," a verse of which I now quote:

America, America, in thee is found
Manasseh's tribe, to Ephraim bound.
By Israel's vow,
Whose destiny is heaven-sealed:
Far-spreading vine in fruitful field.
God's planting, thou!

From Words and Music of The Star-Spangled Banner Oppose the Spirit of Democracy Which the Declaration of Independence Embodies; a protest, by Kitty Cheatham, which shows the hand of the British-Israel World Federation.

In contrast to this, it is to the everlasting credit of the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Sixty-eighth Congress, which came valiantly to the defense of The Star-Spangled Banner, as our national anthem. Much credit for this must be given to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] and to former Representative Linthicum from Maryland, whom I now quote:

STATEMENT OF HON. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM, MEMBER OF CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MARYLAND

Mr. LINTHICUM. I introduced a similar bill to the one under discussion today, No. 6429, on the 1st of April 1919, and on the 2d of April 1921.

We feel that though the Army and Navy have issued rules and regulations for the adoption of Key's anthem, The Star-Spangled Banner, it should have recognition by Congress itself. We feel that the Congress, with the approval of the Executive, should promulgate this as the national anthem of our country, just as many other countries have adopted and approved national anthems for their respective countries.

There are many songs which are perhaps easier sung and some people who think that perhaps The Star-Spangled Banner is a little hard to sing that therefore it should not be the national anthem. But while there are many songs, there has never been in the history of this country a song which sprung from the hearts of the people as did The Star-Spangled Banner, and at a time when the destiny of the country weighed in the balance.

I do not want to go too far into history, because with this committee it is like carrying coals to Newcastle.

But we can readily realize the condition of our country when in August 1814, the National Capitol had been destroyed, the White House in this city had been destroyed, and British vessels with 7,000 troops under their control were leaving it in this devastated condition, having in a great measure dispensed practically the National Government and were then proceeding on to Baltimore.

It was the intention, as stated in the London Times on that occasion that troops should come down from Canada, that troops should proceed from Washington on to Baltimore, then to Philadelphia and New York, and there to meet the troops from Canada and thereby capture the entire eastern coast of our country, which was practically the whole of our country.

It was the indomitable courage of the men of America at North Point and at Fort McHenry who met General Ross and his troops on that memorable day on the 12th of September, at North Point, which defeated him, though the American troops were less than 3,000 only 1,700 of which went into action, while the British troops numbered somewhere around 7,000, trained and picked men from the battlefields of Europe, men who had fought Napoleon under the great General Wellington, and had now been released because Napoleon had been sent to the island to Elba, the war having practically ceased in Europe.

Those were the men who were sent to capture America and those were the men whom the patriotic Americans defeated at North Point and Fort McHenry.

That was the condition of this country, the Capitol and buildings destroyed, the White House destroyed, the Nation's Capital under the heel of the British. They were leaving this section, going from Upper Marlboro. Dr. Beanes, who had protested against their actions in his little town, had been captured, had been put aboard one of the British boats and carried to Baltimore, where the British were to attack Fort McHenry.

Francis Scott Key, who lived in this city, right here where you have established and built the great Key Bridge—in a small house recently razed, just this side of that—a member of the bar, born in Frederick, Md., proceeded to Baltimore with orders from the President, asking to have his friend, Dr. Beanes, released.

He was taken aboard the ship Minden, where he went to consult with the British commander and, owing to the attack which was to be made, he was kept on that ship all night pending the attack on Fort McHenry.

There, during the night, he witnessed these bombs flying from the British ships to the fort, 400 of which are said to have reached the fort. From that comes that immortal line, "Bombs bursting in air."

So, in suspense, he remained there that entire night, listening to the bombardment of a city where his friends lived, where his relatives lived, listening to the bombardment of a city which, if it fell, he knew meant the proceeding of the British on to Philadelphia, New York, and perhaps the capture of the entire country.

There, in great suspense, was born this great anthem, The Star-Spangled Banner. In the early dawn we can imagine him looking to that little fort to see if The Star-Spangled Banner yet waved. I can imagine him almost trying to pierce the darkness to discover whether the little fort had fallen or not. Seeing that "Star-Spangled Banner yet waved," he took a pencil and jotted down this immortal anthem, which has stood as the great anthem of the people for more than a hundred years.

And today, we come to ask the Congress to recognize, in its official capacity, something which should have been done more than a hundred years ago. It was not only the birth of this anthem, the sentiment surrounding it, but what it meant to the people. At that time our people were somewhat divided. The war had not been prosecuted with the vim and courage with which the recent war was conducted by our country. People were doubtful whether we ought to have declared war. People were doubtful about whether it had been the proper policy and they were somewhat divided on the issue. The war therefore was not pressed as it should have been pressed.

But, when that national anthem burst forth and the people began to sing throughout our land, it was worth more than 100,000 bayonets, because it united our people in one solid phalanx for the prosecution of the war.

Not only that, but the battle at North Point and Fort McHenry was the decisive battle of the War of 1812. We have histories which describe the great decisive battles just as much as the great Battle of Waterloo or the Battle of Gettysburg.

It is true that there were not so many troops here, but the troops who were there won that battle and that discontinued the war and the Treaty of Ghent soon followed.

General Ross, who did not believe the American patriots would come forward to meet his invincible forces, rode ahead and met his death at the Battle of North Point and was carried from there to Quebec to be buried. There stands a monument in Baltimore to the boys who fired the fatal shots, Wells and McComas.

From that time on there were no battles which influenced the writing of the treaty. We have the Battle of New Orleans, of course, and a great battle it was, but the fact is that battle was fought after the treaty had been signed.

News traveled slowly in those days and Jackson fought his battle and won it—the great Battle of New Orleans—after the Treaty of Ghent (hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, 68th Cong., March 20, 1924).

I shall now quote another excerpt from the British secret document, in which reference is made to British control of the Boy and Girl Scouts:

EXTRASCHOLASTIC EDUCATIONAL BODIES

We have spread everywhere the Boy Scout movement and placed the 1,000,000 American Boy Scouts under the headship of Gen. Sir Baden-Powell. Through the good offices of a British subject, Mrs. Juliette Low, and of Mrs. Arthur Choate we have enrolled 60,000 in the Girl Scout movement under the headship of Lady Baden-Powell. And the Chief Scouts now propose a periodic interchange of Scouts between England and America at the expense of some American millionaire. We have, moreover, linked the Scout movement with the varied patriotic organizations for maidens and for youths, and with the school system through the loyalty of Dean Russell, of Columbia University. In his case a degree from one of our universities is already overdue.

For the young over Scout age we have the Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., and kindred organizations, financed by our auxiliaries, and directed by gentlemen such as the Reverend Drs. Mott and Speer, who hold degrees from the University of Edinburgh, and who are imbued with our culture. These organizations have directorates interlocking with the Scout movement and are affiliated with the organizations of the same name in England. As the style here has it, they are internationalized. We are arranging further to link up all these extrascholastic bodies and to correlate them through Teachers College, Columbia University, with the school system, so that we may remove the mind of the young from prejudicial family influences and peculiarities to the custody of a series of organizations which will exert a continuous standardizing influence during the formative years. Quantity production of thought-proof, disciplined, evangelical, uniformed colonists is thus insured to the Empire. I cannot too highly commend the financial support which Messrs. Dodge, Pratt, Macy, and Rockefeller, together with Messrs. Warburg, Schiff, Morgenthau, and Rothschild have given to this standardizing campaign. President and Mrs. Wilson have graciously bestowed their patronage upon it; Miss Wilson has aided it with song; the Presidential sons-in-law, less tuneful, have been no less helpful; and all the official family, male and female, have been zealous even where they have proved expensive.

The statements made by the author of the document are substantiated by many newspaper articles, from one of which I now quote:

[From the New York American of November 20, 1932]

LEAGUE OF NATIONS IN DRIVE TO LURE CHILDREN FROM UNITED STATES IDEALS SEES INTERNATIONALISM BEING IMPLANTED WITH JUNIOR RED CROSS AND GIRL SCOUTS

This is a story about forced friendships—the kind that is manufactured on a large scale and pumped into the bosoms of gentle, unsuspecting natures. It is a little insight into a powerfully organized European love call that has been heard in America of late with increasing volume and soulfulness.

I stated in the last article that the League of Nations is the hope of the distracted Old World merchants, but that its mercantile designs are cleverly masked behind an ingenious pother about loving the peoples of the world—loving them so well that nationalistic boundaries, governments, tariffs, immigration bars seem un-Christianlike and absurd.

In the center of the spider's web are the astute trade interests of Europe led by international bankers waiting patiently for the feast when the evangelism of good will has betrayed our resources into the hands of a world league controlled by European powers. Such is the chief ballot box bait of League City—Geneva.

So the League makes a terrible fuss over little children—ballot-casters in the making. It adores tots—from the cradle to the polling booth. American children are particularly esteemed, for these children will some day come into a great inheritance—the United States, with its enormous natural wealth.

It is all-important that these future owners of America be properly trained in sound international sympathies, the soundest one of which is to make them so humanity-conscious that they will entrust their inheritance to the legislative care of the League.

Observe how the Junior Red Cross hotfoots is after our kids for the league. This is a British initiated organization. In an incredibly short space of time it has established a tutelary influence over 12,000,000 children. George Milsom, the director of the society, writing in the Educational Survey (league publication) for January 1931, leaves no doubt that this organization is an auxiliary of League City. He says:

"It does seem fairly reasonable to hope that children who, during their years of mental development have learned to sympathize with their fellows will, when they have reached manhood, be determined to fight for the removal of every obstacle separating them from their fellows in far-off lands. This is the goal toward which we strive."

Interpreted this means that children properly trained will on maturity hate nationalism and vote fervently for league control of America. The juveniles of the Junior Red Cross are put through an excellent course in sobbing. They are trained to correspond with foreign children, to write them kiddie notes of consolation over any misfortune they have experienced. Thirty-eight publications (see Educational Survey, January 1931) keep up an incessant campaign aimed at internationalism. Their mental outlook is saturated with the misery of children in far-away lands. And Mr. Milsom kindly informs us that the material is carefully "selected." Thus the hearts of our children are being skillfully cultivated to produce crops of league votes.

"First, the Girl Scouts were founded under British auspices. At the offices of the Manhattan Girl Scouts I was told that Sir Baden Powell often talks to Girl Scouts on scouting and international problems.

"Baden Powell is the founding father of the organization and a rabid leaguer. Then I discovered that the American Girl Scouts had been internationalized in the last 10 years, and that in 1930 at Foxlease, England, a world flag was adopted. * * *

"After the French good-bye song each delegate took from the fire a half-burned brand—a symbol of world sisterhood.

"Now I read through 6 years of the American Girl, George Washington's Birthday is commemorated with an editorial that calls him a good man—but his role as a patriot, his philosophy of American-mindedness, his warnings about European wiles and cunning were carefully omitted.

"This is all very strange deletion, considering that each Girl Scout taken an oath to 'do my duty to God and my country.'

"How can this be done without any mention of patriotism or American-mindedness it is difficult to conceive. Of course, the truth is that that oath has lost its original meaning since league doctrinaires got busy with our foremost juvenile orders."

I have taken the liberty of quoting excerpts from the press, in order to show that the author of the British secret document knew what he set down in that report, and in the knowledge of that, he shows beyond question of doubt that the British propaganda machine was in control of the Boy and Girl Scout movement in America. This is what the author claimed, and the inserted matter proves that he was correct in his supposition.

Keynote Address Before the Young Democratic Clubs of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HAROLD FLANNERY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 12, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the keynote address of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Congressman FRANCIS J. MYERS, before the Young Democratic Clubs of Pennsylvania, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., August 23, 1940, as follows:

It is a great privilege to join and participate with the Young Democratic Clubs of Pennsylvania in their fourth biennial convention in this historic community of Wilkes-Barre. But to be invited to address such a splendid gathering of young men and young women who represent the youth of our Pennsylvania Democracy is, indeed, a high honor, and an unmerited privilege, which carries with it a solemn responsibility and a heavy duty.

In the titanic struggle in which we have been engaged for the past 7½ years, to save the Nation from moral depravity and economic bankruptcy, there has been a real need for trained public servants; young men and young women, who by their training, education, and moral concepts are capable of applying correct ethical principles to the affairs of government; men and women who know the truth and are ever willing to preach it.

Trained, eager, and enlightened men and women, stalwart men, devoted women, young men and young women such as you, are the hope of the America of today and tomorrow. Public service should be looked upon as a career, just as medicine or law or engineering, but, unfortunately, it is not so regarded, despite the efforts of our President to make it so.

In the fateful struggle which has already enveloped all of Europe, in which the destiny of civilization will probably be determined, courageous, fearless, intrepid youth is the great force which can overcome the intolerance, the hatred, the deceit, and hypocrisy which the godless dictators of Europe have fostered and written into their way of life.

In the gigantic task which is before us in America to preserve and protect our cherished liberties, we must have, we depend upon, young men and women such as you, of valor and quenchless enthusiasm, who work and serve, not from cupidity, or greed, or for the foolish prizes of a material world for which some of the office seekers of today are wasting their effort and their energies.

This young generation of today is working, and will work for finer things and from nobler motives, they will labor for a free and greater America.

When the present Democratic administration assumed office in 1933, all classes of society, and all the people of America, including the youth of the Nation, were sorely distressed in body and mind.

Local charity and relief had collapsed; countless numbers of American citizens had become apple vendors and beggars; soup kitchens had become part of the American way of life and the bread lines were the daily rendezvous of the youth and the aged and the unemployed of this land.

The entire economic system was in a tailspin.

Every bank was closed; 15,000,000 unemployed were staring into a black and empty future, hopeless and helpless; homes and farms were being snatched from our citizens and the sheriff's hammer was like the crack of doom for those who had made America great; the life savings of millions of Americans had melted away under the prosperity of the last Republican administration; their economic independence had slipped away and they were sinking under the flood of worthless securities, including many utility securities.

Our frenzied financial system which Herbert Hoover lauded, the system which he claimed had destroyed poverty for all time, collapsed like a house of cards and spread misery and suffering through the land.

Youth was prostrate; someone had to do something, and do it quickly. The giant minds of America offered no solution. The great engineer who occupied the White House gave us the comforting expression, "Let no man tell you it could not be worse."

Bankers and brokers, utility lawyers and lobbyists, businessmen and industrial executives, had no program nor plan. Everything had failed, and they ran to the Federal Government for help. The whole structure was tottering, and those who today hiss the President in the moving-picture houses of the Nation, who are bellowing about liberty and taxes, dictatorship and class hatreds, were silent and afraid.

These were the conditions which faced the youth of our country a few short years ago; this was the wreckage of a proud people and a great nation after 12 years of Republican administration which they willingly and gladly delivered into the hands of President Roosevelt, who had promised to use the power of government to lead us out of the deep pit into which we had fallen.

He threw himself into the fray. Active leadership replaced the "around the corner" peeping and the "tombstone sitting" of the Hoover regime. The engine began to move forward again, and there was little protest from anyone. Gradually Americanism returned to America.

Fear and hunger were banished from the land. Hope reappeared on the horizon, and confidence arose in the hearts of those who had known only black night and grief and sorrow.

And what of the youth?

From the bread lines and the soup kitchens, from the poolrooms, from the dark, bleak alleys, and dreary prairies, from freight cars and boxcars, from transient camps and hobo cities, from the street corners, came disillusioned young men, unemployed, undernourished, and discouraged; yes, they marched in all the nakedness of their wasted lives into the vision of their President, and before his first day in office was over he took the initial step to lead them back to the America which they had forgotten and which had forgotten them.

Eighteen days later he requested Congress to assist and help these young men and Congress immediately vested him with authority to bring them security, to rehabilitate them by giving them an opportunity to learn how to work so that they might take care of themselves.

This was the Civilian Conservation Corps and in the past 7½ years this Federal agency has brought comfort and happiness to more than 2,200,000 young men and some 200,000 war veterans.

I wonder if Mr. Willkie ever heard of this great work when he had the brazen effrontery in his acceptance speech to point "to the millions of our young men and women who have been deliberately disillusioned by the political influences I now oppose; to the millions who no longer believe in the future of their land."

Who is he to indict the youth of America, how dare he blacken the vision, warp the soul, and question the very patriotism of millions of Americans?

Is the C. C. C. some of the "candystick" government which he condemns?

Where was this trapeze-swinging liberal who prates so much about the unfortunate plight of the youth of today when the National Youth Administration was established in 1935?

This agency has since given employment to more than 500,000 young men and young women each year and expects to employ 500,000 students and 273,000 out-of-school youth in the present fiscal year, nearly two-thirds of whom are under 21 years of age. This is the agency which in 1938–39 made it possible for nearly 400,000 young people from 16 to 24 years of age to continue their school, college, and university education, students who came from low-income families, the average being less than $1,200.

What does the Republican candidate know or care about low-income groups? Did he ever hear of the N. Y. A.; does he pay it lip service or give it heart service; does he look upon it as "candystick" government; does he dare to announce that it has "deliberately disillusioned" the youth of today who "no longer believe in the future of their land"?

The Roosevelt haters have forgotten the storms and turmoil of yesterday because the ship of state is now safely back in port.

The haters and would-be dictators who hurried to Washington in the days of their distress with a dog, a tin cup, and a pair of black glasses, and begged for help and salvation are now striving to recapture your Government and return it to the captains of industry and the sound-money bankers who all but destroyed it a few short years ago.

They hate Roosevelt because he actually went ahead and did something. This is the unpardonable sin. He really took them seriously.

Neither they nor their glamor-boy candidate dare oppose the great social reforms of the Roosevelt administration, so they endorse them in principle, and the sole contribution of their knight errant is "We will administer them more efficiently."

But we know that behind the scenes, in its heart of hearts, in its unwritten platform, the Republican high command, its financial angels, and Mr. Willkie do oppose the social reforms of the last 7½ years, they are all "candysticks" to them.

It is still a party of raucous, grumbling noises, sunflowers, and pious generalities, a party which wraps its avarice in the mantle of the Constitution, a party which has striven to emasculate, sabotage, and destroy the social legislation which the Republican candidate haltingly endorsed last Saturday afternoon.

The Republican candidate brings to mind an old song which suggests the parody, Waltz Me Around Again Willkie.

I surely trust that he will not have the opportunity to waltz the American people down the road to ruin and despair where we were led by the last Republican President.

Mr. Willkie believes in governmental "efficiency" that does not give "sticks of candy." Does he believe in his implied criticism of the New Deal, that it has been a "candystick" government?

If so, what are precisely the "candysticks" given by the Democratic Party which he would not have given?

Does he regard W. P. A. as a "candystick" that his type of "government efficiency" would not tolerate? Or does he agree with the Democratic Party that jobless and helpless citizens are entitled to aid from the Government, no matter how efficient it may be? It would be good to know just how Mr. Willkie stands on that point. He never mentioned W. P. A. on Saturday last.

And how about the S. E. C.? Is that, too, just a "candystick" doled out to an interesting public which has been cheated and deceived at every turn of the road?

How about Federal Housing—U. S. H. A. and F. H. A.? Just a "candystick" donated to the thousands of dispossessed home owners and millions of tenement dwellers to "keep them quiet"? Is that how Mr. Willkie regards this type of Government endeavor?

What about Social Security? Another "candystick," another sop to millions of wage earners who ask only a modicum of security? Or would Mr. Willkie's type of "efficiency" disregard it?

What about Federal Deposit Insurance? Just another indication of "weakness" in the New Deal's concept of government?

Would Mr. Willkie be tough and efficient on the matter of the F. S. C. C.'s food-stamp plan? True, he has publicly endorsed Secretary Wallace's farm program, but isn't the food-stamp plan just another sop—a "candystick" to the underprivileged? Mr. Willkie wouldn't be so soft-hearted an efficiency expert as to retain that, would he?

The record is too long, although it might be noted in passing that this sunflower from Wall Street deliberately and painstakingly avoided making labor any commitment or guaranty against employer interference in collective bargaining.

The poor fellow was bought at an auction in Philadelphia and doesn't know it. Even Mr. Hoover told that Republican Convention to hold an election and not an auction.

Nor does he appear to realize that he is the cat's-paw of those who were energetically engaged in seeking refuge in the storm cellars in 1932, the party that fed mules but refused food to human beings, a fact that he hopes a great many people may have forgotten.

Certainly nothing constructive has been advanced by this Horatio Alger who devoted one-fourth of his acceptance speech to an autobiography, whose whole campaign centers today on the hurling of abuse and false and foolish charges.

Mr. Willkie charges we have become stagnant, much of our industrial machine has become obsolete and the national standard of living has declined. This is the same old tripe Landon tried to sell the American public and at that, I think he made a better attempt than did the gentleman whom Governor James called Willie Winkie.

He might be somewhat enlightened if he would read an article by Robert P. Vanderpoel, financial editor of the Chicago American of August 5, 1940, which contains factual material giving the lie to the foul charge of economic disintegration and is irrefutable proof that the administration of President Roosevelt has assisted rather than injured business and industry.

Mr. Vanderpoel points out that the leading industrial corporations in the Nation, totaling 334, comprising more than one-fourth of the total industrial wealth of the Nation, earned an average return on net worth of 11.4 percent during the first half of 1940. The same corporation in the first half of 1939 earned an average net return of 7.2 percent.

It would seem that we could stand a bit more of this kind of economic distintegration.

Particularly is this so when one recalls that in the good old days before Mr. Roosevelt assumed office industrial production had declined 53 percent and the wheels of productive industry almost came to a complete standstill.

The Republican Party of 1940 offers the unfortunate reliefer, whom Mr. Willkie called the forgotten man, the privilege "to take part in our great American adventure."

I wonder if a bingo set will also be included to comfort him along the adventurous highway?

Now, by all that is right and holy, can you imagine such a demagogue being President?

Why, until the Republican Party was chased out of office, millions went hungry in this country while their bellies were full of watered stock and bright, red apples at a nickel a throw.

"The great American adventure" came under Roosevelt, a period in which we met the threat of disaster, stagnation, and moral disintegration by giving a helping hand to the jobless, maintaining a parity for farm prices, saving the homes of our people, rebuilding our banking structure and securing its deposits against failure, establishing a floor for wages and a ceiling for hours of work, protecting the investing public against thieves, bucket-shop operators, and corporate manipulators.

But the opposition would not consider that adventure. No, they regard it as dictatorship, or Communism, or an attack on the American way.

The gallant knight also joined with the forces of reaction who accuse the President of stirring up class hatred. But, my friends, if there is any class warfare, class hatred, or class unity in this country, it will be found in the circles of the prosperous and the wealthy, and not in the homes of the unfortunate. It is stylish to hate the President and it is a deep, bitter, insane, personal hate.

"He is a dictator, he is godless, he is a 'red,' he is a demagog, he is a Communist, he is un-American, he is a tyrant, he has destroyed our liberties and robbed us of our government."

Maniacal and vicious abuse, old shoes and decayed vegetables are hurled from most of the largest homes and by some of the "first families" in America.

Yes, it is fashionable to accuse the President of stirring up class hatred, but no class, no group of our people are so united as are the Roosevelt haters. Such actions are not causing class hatred, they constitute class hatred.

Abuse has frequently been one's reward for service to the Nation; Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Wilson, all suffered from it, but it always came from small men and small minds.

But don't mistake me. Many others have joined the Willkie parade; groups which thrive and exist on prejudice, hatred, and intolerance have rallied to his support.

His standards are being carried today by the Ku Klux Klan, the German-American Bund, by every Fascist and Nazi group, and crackpot organization in America, and I have yet to hear him disavow their support. These groups hate Roosevelt just as much, and probably more, than the contented rich, and I also understand that the Communists hope for appeasement under a Republican administration.

What a motley crew to be gathered under one tent; what tender hope they offer to the youth of today and tomorrow.

I believe it is high time to throw off the cloak of complacency, forego our smug security, and cease minimizing the dangers of hatred, intolerance, and appeasement on this side of the Atlantic.

Why? Because there is a very real danger, a living, actual menace.

Don't disregard the vivid lessons taught by recent European history. Don't say, "It can't happen here." It can.

In Europe, democracy, the kind of democracy so sacred to us in America, is dead as a doornail—gone with the wind.

If Britain falls, America is democracy's last fortress, its final safeguard.

The foreign policy adopted by the Democratic administration has been predicated upon such premises.

We desire, and we hope to maintain, peace in this Western Hemisphere and we have not been blind to the forces of war and destruction that have been let loose upon the world. We are building our defenses strong and impregnable so that we will be secure from any attack. And let no political charlatan tell you that we have not prepared, that we wasted time and money.

Our Navy today is the strongest it has ever been in times of peace, both in ships, equipment, and personnel.

During the last 3 years of the Hoover administration not one keel for a vessel of war was laid down.

During President Roosevelt's term of office there have been laid down 8 new battleships, 12 new cruisers, 2 new aircraft carriers, 65 new destroyers, and 36 new submarines.

The same is true of our land forces.

In 1932 the authorized strength of our standing Army had declined to 118,000 men.

Under President Roosevelt it has been increased to 375,000 men and the National Guard 251,000.

In the air, we have likewise gone forward and are striving at present for a goal of 50,000 planes.

All this has been accomplished despite terrific opposition from the Republicans.

Today all the armed forces of the United States are being strengthened and builded to outstrip the mighty legions of Europe.

President Roosevelt has become the world's hope that democracy will continue to live and breathe and flourish; he is the spokesman for liberty and religion and right, as against tyranny and might and intolerance; his is the voice which carries comfort and faith to peoples all over the earth who still cherish and believe in the democratic way of life.

One of the characters in Henry Martin's Song of Years, standing by the plow, on hearing of Lincoln's death, says:

"There was never anybody like him. He was different from all other men. I tell you something set him apart. I don't know what. I doubt if anybody knows, or ever will—they's something about him that sets him apart. Next year won't make any difference—10 years—50—a hundred maybe—don't make no difference how many * * * Abraham Lincoln."

That, my friends, is how countless millions look upon Franklin D. Roosevelt today.

The Republican candidate follows the President on matters of principle, in the field of foreign affairs as he does on domestic issues, because he knows the President is right and there is nothing to debate. Witness his stand on selective military training and aid to Great Britain.

However, he must have been behind the door when they were passing out tickets to those wishing to aid in the national-defense program where he follows the lead of his adopted party, since all he can think of to say now is that President Roosevelt is trying to get us into war.

He began the campaign by stating at Elwood, Ind., he would not fight on the basis of "hate, jealousy, or personalities."

He then got into his speech, and we get these references to President Roosevelt:

"He has dabbled in inflammatory and manufactured panics."

"He has secretly meddled in the affairs of Europe."

"Shouted insults."

"Unscrupulously urged others to hope for more help than we are able to give."

In my vocabulary such statements are scurrilous and abusive; but how thin-skinned is the Republican candidate when anyone dares point out his own shortcomings.

Willkie seems to be obsessed with the idea of picking up votes, and he doesn't hesitate to reach into a garbage pail to further his political ambitions.

He did not dare to be specific, and no one yet knows what speeches he refers to in his harangue.

However, to catch votes both ways, he challenges Hitler to a contest in this year of 1940 at a time when he himself states we are woefully weak and unprepared.

I am afraid of such a man, afraid he would lead us back to 1932, afraid he will plunge us into war merely to keep the date he made with Adolf.

Long after the name of Willkie has faded and been erased from the minds of men, when history no longer records his deeds or even his existence, the name and accomplishments of Franklin Roosevelt will be imperishably inscribed in the hearts of mankind.

The President has been laboring to avert a tragedy in the western world and the Republican Party engages in a phony battle.

Again and again the President endeavored to warn the American people of the smoldering fires abroad and of the need for adequate defense, only to have the Republican Party accuse him of warmongering.

If they should win next November, Congressman HAMILTON FISH, of New York, would become chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. Listen to his utterance in a radio address on January 19, 1939, 9 months before the war, in which he had the following to say about war and America's defense.

"The New Deal warmongers, hysterical internationalists, war profiteers, superpatriots, and Communists—are all hell bent on arming the United States to the teeth for the purpose of acting as a policeman for the entire world—the contention that the country is in danger of foreign attack is sheer political bunk—it is nothing but a smoke screen to obscure the depression."

Then Mr. FISH said he was opposed to the air-expansion program—that we did not need even 6,000 planes.

To hear him today, to hear Mr. Willkie and the Republican Party today, one would believe they had been valiantly fighting for a huge defense program during the last 7 years.

The President told his friends in Georgia early last year he would be back if there was no war. Never was the "freedom of the press" more disgracefully abused than in its denunciation of that statement.

He asked for a revision of the neutrality law last year, before the war, but the Republican expert on foreign affairs said there would be no war and Congress adjourned without acting on his recommendation.

War came, Congress was called into special session, and after a terrific fight finally accepted the President's views and passed legislation to keep our ships out of all belligerent waters.

This bill has kept us out of war and at the same time enabled the democracies to purchase supplies in this country, on a cash-and-carry basis, to withstand the terrific onslaught of the Nazi hordes.

But, mark you this, 141 Republicans voted against the legislation while only 18 voted in the affirmative. With the Republican dissenters marched the Bund, the Communists, every Fascist, and un-American group; yes, every "fifth columnist," too.

When the French Government was secretly investigating new airplanes last year with a view to buying here, how the Republicans screamed and raved that the President had committed the United States to an ironclad military alliance with Great Britain and France.

When the President was erroneously reported to have said our frontier was on the Rhine he was accused of meddling, of dabbling in inflammatory statements.

Would to God it were still on the Rhine today.

When he asked for a 25-percent increase in the Navy he was refused and the recommendation was termed gross extravagance. Later Congress admitted he was right and we have now authorized a 100-percent increase.

When he appointed two outstanding Republicans to head the defense forces of the Nation, the chairman of the Republican National Committee excommunicated them, as traitors to their party. I am wondering who are the real traitors to our country today.

The people will soon have an opportunity to express their judgment. Could it be the candidate's own friends who are holding up the defense program by refusing to sign contracts unless they be permitted to determine their own profits and name their own price, who are engaging in a sit-down strike in a national emergency for their own gain, who are willing to conscript the youth of our country but boldly refuse to give up any profit, in the race to preserve and defend America?

With what joy Hitler must witness such attacks on the leader of the world's greatest democracy for speaking the cause of decency, religious freedom, and natural rights.

What large comfort Mr. Willkie's derogatory and abusive attacks upon the President must be giving Hitler, for it plays right into his hand.

Hitler doesn't want Roosevelt, and neither does the Republican Party. Hitler joins with them in the struggle to purge President Roosevelt and soften America.

Yes; the President's enemies here and in foreign lands have prepared a swastika of hatred for his crucifixion. May the young Democrats of Pennsylvania, may the youth of the Nation, and all lovers of freedom rally to him.

May God give him strength and courage to carry on; may his ringing voice continue to sound the clarion call to the pure of heart of all lands; may he be spared to keep us at peace and lead us all out of this maze of world confusion, this valley of death and tears, into the bright sunlight of hope, faith, and contentment.

My friends, I am quite confident that Democracy is on the march to victory, for I can see countless millions of patriotic Americans holding high the flying banners of faith and loyalty and courage, sure of the nobility of their cause, sincere in their devotion to principle, who have willingly joined hands, who are standing shoulder to shoulder in this glorious crusade for the preservation of our beloved country under their gallant and courageous captain and leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Listen, my friends, listen, and you can hear the thunder of their steps.

Government Publicity Bureau

OF

HON. ROBERT F. JONES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1940

Mr. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to a statement attributed to Dr. Archibald MacLeish, Librarian of Congress, which distresses me very much. He is reported in the Charlotte Observer and the Washington Post as saying that the Federal Government should have a publicity bureau similar to those maintained by the totalitarian countries.

Dr. MacLeish is in one of the most strategic positions in our Federal Government. The Congressional Library is used by more people than any other library in the world. Dr. MacLeish should champion the cause of unbiased information as his sacred obligation to the public. Obviously a propaganda machine of any administration would attempt to sway the public toward the belief in the indispensability of the party in power. Paid publicity experts of any administration would dramatize the worth of the party in power, tell half truths of its virtue, black-out criticism and blaspheme the constructive critic.

Propaganda machines in every totalitarian country have preceded the loss of the liberties of their people.

There is something wrong with the thinking of Archibald MacLeish that runs counter to the free institutions of America. To my mind this statement betrays a mental quirk that makes Archibald MacLeish unfit for the high position he holds.

DOZENS OF THEM

Archibald MacLeish, Librarian of Congress, advances the proposition that the Federal Government should have a propaganda bureau similar to those maintained by the totalitarian countries.

The gentleman is away behind the times if he does not recognize the fact that the Federal Government not only has one propaganda agency, but dozens of them—in fact, practically one for every bureau that exists in Washington.

Whether the public is aware of the existence of such agencies, the newspapers of the country are every day brought face to face with the reality by having to pitch bundles of the stuff into the wastebaskets which the janitors haul out almost by the truckload.

St. Lawrence Seaway Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1940

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, world developments happen with great rapidity. On August 23, 1940, the newspapers carried a story to the effect that on the day before, the President had named six men to represent the United States on the Canadian-American Defense Board which had been created 5 days previously.

Prior to the creation of the Board, no one expected any progress at this time in efforts to have Canada and the United States deepen the St. Lawrence River so that ocean-going vessels could travel this river and the Great Lakes to Duluth, Minn.

On September 11, 1940, the Evening Star carried a story that the President had conferred with Assistant Secretary of State Adolph Berle and Leland Olds, member of the Federal Power Commission. It was indicated that this conference had something to do with the St. Lawrence waterway project.

Today in the Washington Post, September 12, 1940, there is an account of the meeting of the Joint Canadian-American Defense Board in Washington, and Board members admitted that they had discussed the St. Lawrence waterway project.

Friends of the waterway, which is a great transportation and power contribution, will rejoice to know of these developments.

On August 26, 1940, I addressed a letter to the President urging that this St. Lawrence waterway question be taken up by the Joint Canadian-American Defense Board, and I pointed out the reasons for such procedure, and the advantages of the seaway.

The letter follows:

The Honorable FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: This letter refers to your action jointly with Prime Minister Mackenzie King of Canada in establishing a permanent Joint Board of Defense for the United States and Canada.

This action is of direct and compelling interest to the people of Duluth and the entire Eighth Congressional District which, as you know, borders Canada along more than half the northern boundary of Minnesota.

The people of this congressional district have shared richly in the benefits accruing to the American people and the Canadian people for a century and a quarter because of peaceful relations between the two nations.

It is to our mutual interest that prompt and effective steps be taken to safeguard both nations against danger from any other power. I believe the people along the entire northern boundary of the United States appreciate the possible future usefulness of the step which has been taken.

I wish to inform you, however, that in my judgment the people in my congressional district, in common with all others in the northern tiers of States, will be deeply interested not only in a general plan but in the taking of specific and significant steps to carry out the plan of joint defense between Canada and the United States.

I have devoted the closest scrutiny to all reports in the public press concerning the definite projects which the Joint Defense Board may take up. I noted one suggestion, for example, of hastening the construction of a highway linking the United States and Alaska.

I hope you will agree with me that large-scaled projects for improvement of transportation, particularly of bulk commodities which are vital to national defense, rank among the first in importance among the possibilities for improving the defenses and the strategic power of two nations.

I wish to point out with all the emphasis of which I am capable that the greatest of all pending projects in this category is the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway project. This project is of the greatest interest to 40,000,000 people in the landlocked inland empire flanking the Great Lakes in the United States and the millions of people in Canada, as well. As you know so well, the Great Lakes comprise the largest and most navigable inland body of fresh water in the world. It is almost incredible that after they have been found perfectly feasible from an engineering point of view, and when their enormous value to navigation and power production is established, that this seaway connecting the St. Lawrence with the Great Lakes has not yet been built. In fact, this project has been hanging fire through three national administrations, including two of your own.

I wish to urge you to take immediate steps to bring this matter promptly to the attention of the new Permanent Joint Defense Board to the end that construction of this project can begin without any further delay, since construction after it begins is a matter of a few years, it seems to me that we can not afford to delay any longer plans to build this project when the national defense is at stake.

Can you please inform me by letter, Mr. President, whether you agree with my point of view.

Sincerely yours,

W. A. PITTENGER.

Under date of September 5, 1940, the President wrote me acknowledging receipt of my communication and expressing the view that the Joint Defense Board should consider the matter.

His reply is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 5, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter regarding the improvement of transportation, and in particular the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway project.

I have given this the most serious consideration and agree with you that the matter should at the proper time be considered by the newly appointed Joint Defense Board. I want to assure you of my appreciation of your thoughtful letter.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

We voice the gratification of several millions of people in the great Midwest in these developments. The need of the waterway so that vessels may travel from the Atlantic Ocean to our inland cities on the Great Lakes is now realized by the officials of the two countries, if their national-defense program is to be fully carried out. We express the hope that negotiations may soon be carried to a successful conclusion.

LETTER FROM NEW BEDFORD CHAPTER, AMERICAN GOLD STAR MOTHERS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the New Bedford Chapter of American Gold Star Mothers:

NEW BEDFORD CHAPTER, AMERICAN GOLD STAR MOTHERS,
New Bedford, Mass., September 9, 1940.

Mrs. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MRS. ROGERS: At the regular meeting of New Bedford Chapter, American Gold Star Mothers, the resolution approving the conscription bill was unanimously adopted.

Our former president, Mrs. G. Walter Williams, has ably presented her views in this matter before the committee, and we fully concur in all that she has said. We know that this bill has already passed the Senate, but we have written to Senator PEPPER, advising him of our action, as we wished the committee to understand our position in this matter. We also wrote to Congressman ANDREW J. MAY, urging its immediate passage in the House.

We Gold Star Mothers, realizing the seriousness of the menace confronting our country, in order to safeguard the sons of other mothers, urge the immediate passage of this bill, so that this country may be fully prepared to meet any emergency that may arise.

Very sincerely,

LYDIA T. BAYLIES,
Corresponding Secretary.

THE FIRST DAVID BROOKS ANGLO-AMERICAN PRIZE ESSAY

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the first David Brooks Anglo-American prize essay.

These essays hold Great Britain up as a benefactor and the United States as a recipient of favor from Great Britain. This is the method used in all British propaganda; always belittling the United States and always boring in, trying to obtain greater and greater British influence over the destiny of America. This, as I have shown, has already reached in our schools, colleges, and churches; and is just about on the verge of undermining the principles upon which this Government came into being. It is this we must fight, in order to restore the patriotism we have lost because of indifference to our own traditions.

THE FIRST DAVID BROOKS ANGLO-AMERICAN PRIZE ESSAY

(Written by Oliver Burgess Meredith, age 16, of Hoosac School, with a foreword by Paul Van Dyke. Issued by Florence Brooks Aten, 59 East Fifty-sixth Street, New York City, United States of America, June 1924)

NOTE: Herewith is the first David Brooks Anglo-American prize essay. This essay contest is confined to secondary schools. Its object is to impress upon the minds of the youth of the English-speaking world the desirability of a close and intimate understanding between the British Empire and the United States of America. Its scope and purpose are fully described in the foreword and afterword.

The founder of this movement, Mrs. Brooks Aten, 59 East Fifty-sixth Street, New York City, would appreciate having those into whose hands this phamphlet may fall, and who care to do so, communicate with her expressing their opinions. Also she would be glad to have any suggestions as to its future development or any criticisms that may seem pertinent.

THE DAVID BROOKS CUP

The David Brooks Anglo-American Prize Essay Cup presented in perpetuity to Lawrenceville School by Florence Brooks Aten in memory of her great great-grandfather, David Brooks, W. E., a clergyman and a soldier of the Revolution born at Brooksvale, Cheshire, Conn., 1744, died at Brooksvale December 22, 1801, graduated from Yale College in the class of 1768. To be awarded annually to that scholar who shall write the best essay on the subject, The Benefit to Christian Civilization From a Complete Understanding and a Friendly Relationship Between the United States of America and the British Empire.

Any scholar in the four upper forms may compete. The name of the winner shall be engraved each year on the cup and a small silver cup, properly engraved, shall be given to the winner, which he may retain.

The essays shall, subject to the discretion of the head master, consist of not less than 1,500 nor more than 3,000 words.

The merits of the essays shall be determined by such person or persons as the head master may appoint.

The name of the winner shall be announced at the Washington's Birthday ceremonies each year.

FOREWORD

The original David Brooks cup was made by a London silversmith in 1801 and was presented to Hoosac School. It gets its name from David Brooks, a clergyman and a soldier in the armies of the American Revolutionary War. Six models of this cup have been made by Crichton and presented to six other leading schools of the United States, Hill, Kent, Lawrenceville, Mercersburg, Pomfret, and St. Paul's, Concord, N. H.

In each of these schools a contest is to be held every winter to determine which of the pupils can write the best essay on the following subject: The Benefit to Christian Civilization From a Complete Understanding and Friendly Relationship Between the United States of America and the British Empire. The name of the winner of the contest in each school is to be engraved on the school cup and he is to receive a smaller copy of it. The award in these scholastic contests will be made on Washington's Birthday. An interscholastic prize is also to be presented to the best essay among the winners of each year. This latter prize is to be awarded to the boy winning it at the prize-day exercises of his school.

The people who have made this beginning of getting American schoolboys to think seriously of the advantages to the world of "complete understanding and friendly relationship" between the two great English-speaking nations, are broad-minded friends of world peace. They have no intention of trying to further any narrow or exclusive friendship from which any other nation should be shut out. On the contrary, they wish to do a little to further a broad and generous friendship whose circle is open to all other peoples who may wish to enter it. There is in their minds no touch of the arrogant idea of so-called Anglo-Saxon supremacy. On the principle of "the little leaven that leaventh the whole lump" they simply wish to suggest to the minds of a certain number of our educated young men in the early days of their education, the solid and enduring reasons for unbroken good feeling between us and the mother country, as an expression of a friendship full of good will toward all the world and always ready to be active in the cause of peace.

We Americans are a very mixed race. Some of the blood of most of the peoples of the world is now mingled in our national stock, and among our early settlers were Dutch, Palatinate Germans, French Huguenots, Swedes, English, Scotch, and Irish. But the dominant speech marks the dominant blood. Our colonial institutions grew on the roots of English political experience, and when the fathers formed our young Republic the prevalent political ideas in their minds were the ideas of Locke. Other peoples have contributed in many ways to our growth and development. Our debt to France is very great. Without her help we could never have won that war for independence which gave us the right to manage our own life, and without that liberty our growth would have been warped and stunted. But all origins have, after all, permanently conditioned our character. We are and must always remain a great branch of the British race.

The War of Independence was a civil war. Those who began it were hailed in the British Parliament as champions of liberty. English historians in sympathy with modern English institutions consider that it did great service to the development of the British Constitution by checking the successful absolutist reaction of George III. For generations its result has been accepted as beneficent to both Nations. To dwell upon it as a reason for an unfriendly attitude toward our mother country is to surrender to a narrow prejudice and to cherish a malice that ought to have been buried years ago. The two great English-speaking peoples are called to a deep friendship fruitful for themselves and for the world.

DAVID BROOKS' ANGLO-AMERICAN PRIZE ESSAY

Subject: The Benefit to Christian Civilization From a Complete Understanding, and Friendly Relationship Between the United States of America and the British Empire.

When about to write a composition on such a tremendously important subject as this, the first thought that enters the author's mind, is how pathetically puny his efforts are. Many books have been published concerning this topic, without avail. People have acquired the habit of reading the matter over, and other than feebly agreeing that this complete understanding ought to exist, do nothing to bring it about. It is indeed a crisis when the world arrives at such a lax stage as this. It reminds one ominously of Rome before its fall.

Still we are not all so indifferent. Surely there are some of us who realize how critical the situation now is. We must in part realize that unless we do something constructive to find a solution, and that soon, we, even we of this generation, will live to see such a catastrophe as will surpass the late World War to an unconceivable degree of horror and butchery. Nor is this a pessimistic prophecy, it is the inevitable. We have all heard of the cunningly fashioned man-destroying machines which nearly every government is developing. I need not delve into the discussion of those newly discovered chemicals which when dropped from a plane can completely annihilate a fair-sized city. This is not what Christianity stands for, and Christian civilization if there remains a spark of life in it, ought to rebel at the thought, and look for a solution. But where? A most plausible is "friendly relationship and complete understanding between the United States and England."

Right here, however, the question arises as to what right have I, or anyone else, to assume this. How can such an understanding stop the inevitable. That, of course, is the subject of this theme, but first let us briefly investigate the possibilities of such a relationship and understanding. Is it possible, or will material jealousies down any attempt to bring it about? A most simple answer is to read the parallel histories of the two countries. For some 35 years they have, when occasion demanded, "come together" in a most praiseworthy manner. Nor does this seem strange. Both have practically the same language and customs. There is no reason why this friendship and complete understanding should not be brought about quite beyond all expectations. If it were but so, the benefits to Christian civilization would be innumerable.

The very first benefit would be that people would forget such material greediness and jealousy as at present hinders this understanding between the two countries. A great amount of the present bickering between the merchant and industrial classes would stop. This would be a benefit to all of us. With the merchants of England and America pulling together, clothing, imported food, and other commodities would of necessity decrease in price and increase in abundance, a change very much needed at the present time.

Another obvious, yet important, advantage would be in the missionary field One of Christianity's biggest tasks is her extensive missionary work. Our missionaries, however, are continually complaining that those Buddhists, Mohammedans, or whomsoever they try to convert, cannot understand why the two largest Christian nations of the world are in such a state of misunderstanding and inimicality. This is an impossible question to answer.

Now if the nations were brought into friendly contact and understanding, then, truly, could our missionaries answer: "Look, the two most influential nations of the world, working in unison for the same cause."

Greece, after the Great War, was granted a certain territory in Asia Minor. Dissatisfied, however, with this and believing that Turkey was weak in that spot where the allotment of territory ended, she began to encroach rapidly on Turkish territory. We all know what happened in the needless contest which ensued. Thousands of Christians were massacred, innumerable homes were burned, and the flower of Greece annihilated.

When the two great Christian nations of the world saw this calamity approaching, they did nothing to prevent it. Looking helplessly at one another, they sat by while their Christian brothers of Greece marched to the massacre. And why? Because each feared that in her present divided condition, she was not strong enough to run the risk of another war by attempting to stop the "petty affair." "Besides," Britain argued, "Why doesn't the United States do it; she has the money." The United States sheepishly pointed to the Monroe Doctrine and to England's naval force.

In fact, during the past 30 years, this sort of thing has been going on. Innumerable and needless wars have been fought. Nations have crushed nations. Atrocities that we think were only committed in the age of barbarism, have been executed in a most heinous manner. Indeed, the most alarming fact of all is, that these crimes are not only of the past 30 years. They are being actualized in all their horror now, and are becoming worse every moment. Things have come to a head, a head which if it bursts will mean the complete desecration of Christianity's teaching. Again we look for a solution. Again we can find a possible one in this hoped-for relationship between England and the United States.

If only there were some great influential power to set things in shape. If only there were some powerful, and if need be, mailed fist, that could stop with ease the bloody wars that are now threatening and reddening the earth. But where could one find such a power? One looks instantly to the two richest and strongest nations of the world.

This power would have to be neither tyrannical nor altogether martial. However, there are bound to be times when another nation will try to stir this power from its stronghold and disobey those Christian ideals for which it stands. When this happens, then that nation who attempts to disturb the peace will see, to its dismay, a mobilized force of several million men ready to fight to the end for the just cause of Christianity. The very thought of such a force will discourage any attempt to defy it. Moreover, it will cause nations to see how much farther peace could get them than war. It would ultimately bring about world peace by encouraging peace and setting a good example. World peace, this benefit alone, could justify its existence.

It has been said that this age is tremendously lacking in its production of classical artists. The classics or arts of the last 50 years are not to be compared with those of the ancient and medieval world. The perfecting of esthetics is one of man's noblest deeds, and should be continued.

It is true that in science we have made some remarkable advances, but history proves that artistic achievements show more clearly than scientific how advanced a civilization is morally. Therefore it would seem that we have slumped considerably in our morals, a condition which sharply contradicts every phase of Christian teaching.

To trace the "slump," we find it is because the world has become too materialistic and as a result has become involved in greed, jealousy, and war. Let us assume, reasonable, that this friendly relationship between England and the United States would bring about at least some degree of tranquillity in the world. In that case we could turn our efforts toward practicing the Christian religion. We would have more time to untie the entanglements now strangling the world. Then would be seen how quickly the morals of the people would rise, and simultaneously esthetics would be revived.

Yet another critical situation in the world at present is the crime wave which has engulfed every country. For the last half century the statistics show that crimes have increased shamefully. Moreover, smuggling of dope, the most dreaded atrocity of all, has become quite a profitable and flourishing business in the underworld. The police magistrates themselves are beginning to admit that "the whole crime affair" is getting quite beyond them. When a police magistrate admits this, it means that things are very serious, indeed.

Until a year or so ago the prohibition agents had no right to stop even a small rowboat from paddling out to the 3-mile limit and there being stocked with liquor from a British schooner. As a result, the attempt to enforce prohibition was a farce. In desperation the United States sought aid from England, who, in acquiescence to our plea, extended the international 3-mile limit to 12 miles.

Thus, by simply coming to an understanding with Great Britain, the United States is able to cope more easily with the prohibition problem. This is only an example of what could be done to prevent the smuggling of dope and to forestall other crimes. A complete understanding between the two nations could bring about more efficient and concerted action against lawbreakers of both countries.

So, as I stated before, innumerable volumes have and could be written about these benefits without avail. The few more important benefits that I have outlined are only a minority to still more and scarcely less notable ones. But what good does it do as long as the majority of people do not respond? It remains for those of us who realize the situation more clearly to help the majority to understand.

Let me end with a little episode which happened about the time of the Spanish-American War. This little story explains how a needless war between the United States and Germany was forestalled, because of an understanding with Great Britain.

This is the story as nearly as I can recall it.

Not many years ago during the Spanish-American War it happened that the United States, Great Britain, and Germany each had a fleet of warships stationed near the Philippine Islands. Due to the fact that the American admiral defied some command of the Germans, the latter threatened to fire on the United States fleet unless she did as she was bid. The admiral, realizing what a shot from either fleet would mean, quickly telegraphed to the British flagship and explained the situation. Britain quickly took action by informing the German admiral that if Germany fired but one shot on the American fleet she could consider herself firing on Great Britain. The German commander could do nothing but sail away.

HOOSAC SCHOOL, WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY, 1924.

AFTERWORD BY WAY OF EXPLANATION

It is always interesting to know of the ideas and moving causes that lead to the beginning of any movement of note or merit and it is the enthusiastic reception with which the David Brooks Anglo-American prize essay contest has been received by the leading educators and other prominent men of this country and Great Britain that prompts this word of explanation.

Indeed, so genuine and spontaneous has been the welcome given it, far beyond the greatest expectations of its founder, that it promises to become an international movement spreading over the entire English-speaking world.

Mrs. Brooks Aten, having had a son in the Great War and having worked unremittingly for the alleviation of the suffering of the soldiers, could not dispel from her mind the horror of it all nor eliminate the idea of its stupidity and foolishness.

She, therefore, wished to contribute, even in the smallest way, what she could to prevent the recurrence of such a cataclysm. Her mind being practical, she had no quiet and alluring dreams of a world of peace being held together in amity and friendship by the power of love alone. That is a wonderful desideratum, but in the present stage of human development she knew that there must be power and sanction to enforce any law or edict. Her vision reached still further and she saw in the great English-speaking nations not only the necessary power but the natural friendship and understanding that should exist between them. If this could be brought about, much would be done toward stabilizing the peace of the world. Whether they wish it or not, destiny has placed in their hands the safekeeping of Christian civilization, and they will be held to strict accountability for the way they administer this trust. While the English-speaking peoples live in all quarters of the globe, in various environments, and their day-to-day lives may differ, fundamentally the same current runs through them. They derive their laws, their customs, and their traditions from the same source. The same ideals govern their actions.

Having arrived at this conclusion, Mrs. Brooks Aten, with counsel and advice, looked carefully into the various movements tending in this direction and found them all worthy and excellent, but there existed a most lamentable deficiency. In our youth is our hope and the foundation of our future greatness, and they were left without a proper guiding hand. All the movements appealed only to the adult mind, and the youthful mind, before its complexes had been formed and in its prejudices deeply rooted, must reach its conclusions in many cases from incorrect and distorted histories. She is, therefore, confining her efforts to this neglected and fertile field.

The first cup was presented to Hoosac School in December 1923, and the essay herewith published was awarded the prize at that school on Washington's Birthday, 1924.

In addition to the cups that have been presented as mentioned in the foreword, voluntary applications for cups have been received from a number of other schools. These applications are being examined to ascertain whether or not the applicants appreciate fully the true significance of the cup. The cup itself is only the symbol of a great ideal.

David Brooks, the donor's great, great grandfather, in whose memory these cups are being given, is a particularly happy selection, as his life and works lend themselves most admirably to the carrying out of the idea. He was a straight-thinking, high-minded, clean-living country gentleman, and one of the first to espouse the cause of the Colonies against the unjust oppression of George the Third and some of his Ministers. As Dr. Van Dyke has so aptly said in his foreword, the American Revolution was really a civil war and did much to curb the absolutism of the then reigning British monarch. The best thought of that day both in England and in America was in favor of the Colonies.

David Brooks was born on his ancestral estate of Brooksvale, Cheshire, Conn., in 1744, his grandfather having settled there after his arrival in this country from Cheshire, England. He was graduated from Yale College in 1768, and shortly afterward studied for the ministry and was licensed to preach. He never had a permanent charge, but preached at various churches in his vicinity, and his services were much in demand, as he was known as a preacher of great power. Two of his sermons were particularly well known and had wide circulation at the time. One of them was The Religion of the Revolution and the other was on Wealth Without Character.

Whenever there was fighting to be done this staunch old patriot did not seek glory or acclaim, but, although a college graduate and a man of standing in his community, simply put his musket over his shoulder and went into the ranks to fight the foe. There are records of his enlisting and reenlisting. Whenever the enemy proved troublesome David Brooks was there to help quell the disturbance. He was in the battles of White Plains, Fishkill, Crown Point, and Fort Montgomery. He was also a member of the Connecticut Legislature which ratified the Constitution of the United States.

After this David Brooks retired to his estate where he followed the peaceful pursuits of farming and preaching until he died December 22, 1801. His son, Micah Brooks, was a major general in the War of 1812, and was a Congressman from New York State from 1815 to 1817.

Mrs. Brooks Aten is deeply appreciative of the interest and cooperation shown by Prof. Paul Van Dyke, of Princeton University; Prof. Bliss Perry, of Harvard University; Andrew Keogh, Esq., the librarian of Yale University; and Clarence Blair Mitchell, Esq., of New York City. She wishes also to thank the various speakers who have officiated at the formal presentations of cups. They are the Honorable Robert Underwood Johnson, former Ambassador to Italy; Percy Sutherland Bullen, Esq., of the Daily Telegraph (London); Prof. J. Tucker Murray, of Harvard; Prof. George van Santvoord, of Yale; Bishop Lloyd, of New York; and Angus Fletcher, Esq., of the British Consul General's Office in New York City.

In expressing her appreciation she is not unmindful of the services rendered by Messrs. Crichton & Co., Ltd. Not only does she appreciate the exquisite workmanship with which they executed the reproductions of the cup and the engrossing of the scrolls, but their wholehearted cooperation and courtesy at all times evinced far more than a mere business interest in the project.

Japan Near Sea Parity With the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 12, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Herald Tribune of September 3, 1940:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of September 3, 1940]

JAPAN NEAR SEA PARITY WITH UNITED STATES; EXTENDS POWER IN FAR PACIFIC BY FORTIFYING MANDATED ISLANDS—TOKYO SECRETLY BUILDS NAVAL, SUBMARINE, AND AIR BASES ON ROUTES TO PHILIPPINES, INDIES, AND CHINA; GUAM'S VALUE TO AMERICA STRESSED

(By Henry H. Douglas)

At the present writing Japanese naval strength closely approximates that of the United States in some categories.

Since 1934 Japan has had a policy of strict secrecy with regard to her naval construction, and so far has been unusually successful in keeping her building a secret. Her shipyards are cities of silence, surrounded by high walls and charged wire, from which no workman ever emerges, into which no foreigner ever goes.

In spite of this secrecy it has been recently ascertained from reliable sources that in the 3½ years since the beginning of 1937 Japan has commissioned:

Three 10,000-ton cruisers.
Two 7,500-ton cruisers.
Twenty-two 1,600-ton destroyers.
Twelve 1,600-ton submarines.

These additions to Japan's Navy, since the end of the Washington naval treaty at the close of 1936 because of the denunciation of the treaty by Japan, place the comparative st.ength of the two fleets as follows (United States figures are from the Navy Department):

	Number		Tonnage
	Japan	United States	Japan	United States
Aircraft carriers	11	6	146,520	134,800
Battleships	10	15	301,400	464,300
Cruisers, heavy	20	18	183,000	171,000
Cruisers, light	24	19	144,515	157,775
Destroyers	141	201	190,148	260,600
Destroyers, converted		46		52,620
Total	280	407	1,067,646	1,343,155

This table brings out the fact that while we exceed Japan in number of submarines the submarine tonnages are almost exactly equal. Also, to be added to the Japanese submarine tonnage is their fleet of midget submarines, not included in the present figures, and concerning which a brief report recently appeared in the press. Our destroyer tonnage is considerably greater than that of Japan, while Japan has 44 cruisers to our 37, with the tonnage practically equal.

EIGHT BATTLESHIPS BUILDING

The above figures include only vessels actually completed and commissioned for service. No information is available on the number of Japanese vessels building and appropriated for, except as to battleships. Two 35,000-ton battleships will be launched in June of 1941, while two 45,000-ton ships will be launched in November of 1941. Four more 45,000-ton battleships are due for completion by the middle of 1945. This makes a total of eight vessels and 540,000 tons. The number of submarines and auxiliary vessels now under construction by Japan is doubtless greater than at any other time in her history, but whether there is any possibility of Japan's matching the building program of the United States is an open question, and a question about which there may well be considerable doubt.

The United States naval program is as follows:

	Building		Goal of the 70 percent increase, 1945 or 1946
	Number	Tonnage	Number	Tonnage
Battleships	10	390,000	35	1,281,800
Aircraft carriers	5	125,800	20	460,600
Cruisers	21	206,000	88	956,374
Destroyers	57	105,070	378	617,060
Total	133	885,920	701	3,547,700

Japan's present position, taking all strategic factors into account, gives her a possible superiority. The possession of a navy roughly approaching the size and strength of that of the United States gives Japan a common upper limit of power, inestimably greater than our own. In a Pacific war a United States cruiser with a range of 2,000 miles might be useless, while the same cruiser in the hands of the Japanese, operating close to home, would be a very effective weapon. Parity with the United States would place Japan in the position of having a fleet capable of dominating the entire western Pacific, with practically complete assurance that she could not be interfered with in anything she might choose to do in these waters. Our part in supplying Japan with unlimited materials with which to construct this navy has been tragically shortsighted. This development is also the final blow to all previous concepts of relative naval strengths and their influence upon world politics. The situation is not only new but it is revolutionary. Fortunately the United States now seems to have her eyes open to the danger.

It is reported that in November of this year Japan's largest floating drydock will be towed to Saipan. This is the island in Japan's Pacific Mandate where early this year the Japanese Government refused to allow her own shipwrecked seamen to be landed when rescued by an American vessel.

HARBORS DEVELOPED

Japan has denied fortifying any of these islands but has admitted that considerable money has been spent on the development of harbor works on two of the mandated islands, Saipan and Palau. Work on the harbor of Tanapak (on Saipan) was started in 1926 and completed in 1932. In 1936 "the construction of the port of Palau, extending over 6 years and costing altogether 2,675,500 yen," was begun, the piers and channels of the port being built to accommodate warships. A large modern airport has also been constructed. These two islands are directly east of the Philippines and on opposite sides of Guam. About the time that Congress voted down the strengthening of the Guam defenses Japan announced the establishment of a "commercial" air service to Saipan.

The administration of the mandated islands was placed in the hands of the Japanese by the League of Nations at the close of the World War. These islands, lying directly across the sea routes from the American mainland and Hawaii to the Philippine Islands, the East Indies, and China, and adjoining the British colonies and mandated areas in the South Seas, constitute the most important area, from a strategic standpoint, in the entire west and south Pacific.

The terms of the mandate provide that no military or naval bases or fortifications are to be established in the mandated territory, but this provision has been completely ignored by Japan, and she has no notion of ever relinquishing control over this area. Japan has, under cover of the utmost secrecy, been fortifying all the more important of the 2,550 islands. Naval, submarine, and air bases have been constructed wherever it has been physically possible to do so. It has been definitely established that Japan has a strong submarine base in the Marshalls, only 1,800 miles from Hawaii, and the construction of a huge fuel-storage reservoir and an airdrome has also been completed.

The mandated islands provide the Japanese Navy with a stationary fleet of natural aircraft carriers. The lagoons and protected waterways of many of the islands are perfect hiding places for warships, submarines, and seaplanes, not to mention the land bases for scouts and bombers.

GUAM'S VALUE EMPHASIZED

Saipan, but a short distance to the north and east of Guam, evidently is to be the stronghold and jumping-off place of Japan's power in this part of the Pacific. The value to the United States of Guam as a base is now not even a matter for conjecture. The refusal of Congress to begin fortifying the island a year ago was but another form of the fatal appeasement disease.

Japan has a fishing fleet of 62,000 registered motor vessels, of which about 9,000 are capable of deep-sea work in any part of the Pacific. Many of these vessels are all steel and range in length from 90 to 200 feet. A number of them are reconditioned British coast-patrol vessels. During March and April of this year, 150 powerful new sampans were added to the "fishing" fleet in the Marshall Islands, in addition to 26 submarines being ordered to the mandated islands on May 1.

Within the last 4 or 5 months, according to Kenkichi Kumagai, director of the Japanese Cabinet Information Bureau, 9,500 former residents of the Hawaiian Islands have been sent to the islands of the Japanese mandate. He said that among them were 3,800 American citizens of Japanese ancestry, born and reared in Hawaii. These people, in any future conflict, familiar with the ins and outs of both the Hawaiian Islands and those of the mandate, will be of inestimable value in carrying out Japanese plans.

It has also been reliably ascertained that the Japanese Navy is rushing the installation of a device known as the photoscope, or, as it is known to Japanese naval men, the Sasinscope. It is said that this phototelescopelike device has been perfected to enable naval men to look through a smoke screen. It has been known to exist in the Japanese Navy for some time, but only in January 1940 was it finally perfected. It passed the naval board tests in April.

A number of high-ranking Japanese naval men have confidentially stated that the Japanese Navy has carried out successful experiments with a radio ray. This device is said to have proved to the satisfaction of all connected with it that when it is directed at a given object it will disrupt the functioning of any and all electrical apparatus within 10 miles.

The effect of this radio ray in recent naval operations in the South Seas, installed in two of the latest submarines and four new destroyers, astounded Japanese naval men. It is said that the navy has decided to install this device in all its destroyers and submarines as rapidly as possible. One official, with great elation and confidence, told a colleague that "within a year a third of our navy will be equipped with the Sasinscope and radio ray."

The impact of the successful operation of these devices upon the entire field of air, naval, and land operations will doubtless have a revolutionary effect upon the whole science of making war. How this may affect naval operations and our own position in the Pacific remains to be seen.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HOMER D. ANGELL, OF OREGON

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address made by me over the Mutual Broadcasting System national hook-up, September 12, 1940:

Ladies and gentlemen, a bottleneck in national defense is the inability to secure adequate supplies of stategic and critical materials which now come to us from abroad. To overcome this, we must develop sources of these essentials or their substitutes within our own borders so far as possible. The native sources of these strategic and critical minerals are largely in the Western United States. A few days ago an announcement received the attention of the Nation's press. It related to the contributions which the Pacific Northwest can make toward a solution of this national-defense problem. This announcement covered the release of a comprehensive report by the Bonneville Power Administration to the Department of the Interior on Industries Important to the National Defense, Feasible of Establishment in the Pacific Northwest. This report was transmitted by Secretary Ickes to the National Defense Commission.

It is interesting to note an editorial on this report in the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star of August 27. I quote from this editorial:

"In a report submitted to the National Defense Commission by Secretary Ickes, sound arguments are presented for establishing certain essential war industries in the Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast areas. The far West is a large producer of copper, mercury, zinc, tungsten, and other essential defense materials. These must now be transported to the East for processing and fabrication. Through the use of the vast hydroelectric power resources developed by Government projects, these materials, the report points out, could be manufactured into munitions in the far West, if facilities were available, thus securing a wider geographical distribution to our defense industries, this is a desirable objective."

This report expands and details the principles stated in remarks I made in the House of Representatives May 8, 1940, while discussing the subject. It gives a catalog of Northwestern resources available for contribution to the national-defense program. This report gives detailed consideration in the use of the Government's developments on the Columbia River for processing native materials and natural resources which are feasible of commercial development and are necessary for our national welfare. Our basic national defenses outside of manpower, depend largely upon mechanical equipment. To provide this, we must have vast quantities of strategic, critical and other minerals, and materials together with a continuous supply of low-cost electro-energy for manufacturing purposes. These materials and power must be brought together. I wish to lay before you some facts as to what the Pacific Northwest offers to the Nation's defense program in helping supply these needs. We want to be of service in this time of national emergency.

PRESENT CONTRIBUTIONS TO NATIONAL WELFARE

Many of you may not be aware of the vast storehouse of natural resources found in what was formerly called the Oregon Country, now known as the Pacific Northwest, in our great forests, our clear streams abounding in salmon and other fish life, our rolling wheat plains, our vast uplands producing livestock and wool and our rugged mountains with their wealth of mineral treasures. I call to your attention the extent to which this pioneer country—now embracing four States—Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana, one-eighth of the land area of the continental United States, provides the Nation with power resources and essential products necessary in peace and war.

In agriculture, the four Pacific Northwest States in 1938 produced one-tenth of the Nation's potatoes, one-fifth of the wheat. The Pacific coast and Alaska furnished over one-third of the fish caught for food in the United States.

Our forest products—from our tremendous timber resources—provide 40 percent of the Nation's lumber production, one-third of the wood veneer, and almost one-fourth of the wood pulp. We still have 55 percent of the volume of standing saw timber of the Nation.

In minerals the emphasis of the past has been on the precious metals—gold and silver. However, in recent years mineral production has been increasing, and there are many who believe that we have not yet begun to realize the potentialities of the region's mineral resources. The 11 Western States contribute, in terms of national production, 100 percent of the magnesia for refractories, 98 percent of the potash, 93 percent of the copper, 86 percent of the mercury, 55 percent of the lead, and almost as much of the cadmium and 31 percent of the zinc. Some of these items are minor parts of our national consumption, due to the size of imports, but their importance cannot be minimized.

The Pacific Northwest States themselves, in spite of the relative infancy of their mining industry, contribute over two-thirds of the Nation's production of antimony, one-seventh of the copper, one-third of the lead, one-seventh of the zinc, one-fourth of the mercury, almost half of the manganese ore, and one-seventh of the tungsten concentrates.

COLUMBIA RIVER HYDROELECTRIC POWER

There is, however, one resource in which the Northwest stands above all other regions of the Nation—hydroelectric power. Our mountain peaks, clothed in eternal snow and ice and extensive forests, are the sources of mighty rivers, tributaries to the Columbia River, whose steady flow descends from Canadian headwaters and cleaves the Cascade Range before pouring into the blue Pacific. This, Jefferson's Columbia, and its tributaries, contain the Nation's greatest source of water power, about 44 percent of the potential hydroelectric power of all the streams of the continental United States.

If we were to translate the potential annual output of the Columbia River Basin in terms of use, we would obtain the fabulous figure of 90,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours, an amount equal to the output of the entire electric utility industry of the United States in 1929. This is a wealth which, unlike many resources, cannot be depleted, and which will serve the Nation for ages to come.

Our Northwest population is not large—one-thirtieth of the Nation's total—but it has been increasing at a greater rate than the Nation as a whole. The rich soil, the abundant rainfall, the alluring promises of the Northwest are drawing many earnest families from less bountiful sections of our country seeking fresh opportunities in the land of great distances and great vistas. The opportunities they seek are not to be denied them because this is still a pioneering nation. Our physical frontiers may not be as boundless as they were 50 years ago, but human ingenuity and the desire to wrest security, happiness, and an honest livelihood from our natural resources knows no boundaries. These western citizens will furnish the manpower for the development of these vast natural resources of the Northwest.

DEFENSE ASPECTS OF PACIFIC NORTHWEST RESOURCES

I will analyze briefly some specific phases of Pacific Northwest resource utilization which are of primary importance to our national-defense program, restricting my remarks to power and minerals and their interrelationship.

ELECTRO INDUSTRIES

It has been pointed out frequently that modern civilization owes much of its material progress to the industries whose basic processes are entirely dependent on electric power. For example, our light metals, abundantly distributed in the earth's crust, would be unavailable to us were it not for the so-called electrolytic cell. Similarly, the hard metals, without which the automobile and the airplane could not give us the remarkable services they offer, are products of the electric furnace. The magic force, resident in electric power, wrests from the lowly rock the metals and the nonmetals which permit man to annihilate space, to multiply his strength, to carry his voice and thought over hill and dale, to make the synthetic materials that are the basis for so many household articles.

Important as electro industries may be to our normal everyday life, they become indispensable to a defense program. If it were not for the many ferro alloys and the alloy steels, our guns would bark a few times and then remain silent—worn out, incapable of guiding the shell of destruction to its appointed mark. Our battleships would be cardboard, our tanks could not resist the fire of the antitank artillery. Our airplanes would essay the hopeful but short-lived flight of the barnyard fowl.

Similarly, in the manufacture of munitions the product of the electro industries ranks high. Brass for shell casings, the nitrates for explosives, the chlorines for gases are all derived from the electric furnace and the electrolytic cell.

I need not emphasize or describe further because it is fact today that electric power, guided by the genius of the scientist and the engineer is one of the most important items in our national-defense industries. I would like to point out, however, that these electro industries require very large blocks of continuous and cheap electric power. They cannot use power whose unit price is much in excess of 3 mills per kilowatt-hour nor whose availability is limited to portions of the year or of the day. These industries need power uninterruptedly throughout the year and throughout the day.

POWER FOR DEFENSE INDUSTRIES

There are not many places in our great Nation where such power is available or can be made available in time to meet our present crisis. Rivers like the Columbia, of the type that insure continuous flow, are rare. That is why the development of the Columbia River offers paramount advantages to electro industries. With Bonneville's generators producing thousands of kilowatts, Grand Coulee about to make its share available, and T. V. A. in operation, the Nation need not fear the acute power shortages experienced during the last World War.

The facilities in the Tennessee Valley are being expanded and will be ready in some 2 or 3 years. Today the Columbia River offers plentiful power for industries whose products are needed now in our defense program. This fact must not be overlooked by industry and our defense agencies. Let me specify. The Bonneville project will have 100,000 kilowatts of firm power available at the beginning of next year, above and over the amounts now committed and needed for reserves. In August of next year 200,000 kilowatts will be available from Bonneville and Grand Coulee, and in January 1942, 400,000 kilowatts. These quantities result from the wisdom of Congress in providing the funds and authorizations to advance generating facilities at these projects.

The Aluminum Co. of America's western plant on the Columbia River is now in operation and will make 30,000 tons of pig aluminum a year; 60,000,000 pounds for our airplanes, our transport facilities, and other national uses of the light metal. Other important industries can be established in the Pacific Northwest for operation within a year to 18 months which will provide for shipbuilding and repair; for our west-coast aircraft industry, which represents 60 percent of the dollar volume business of the national industry; for ordnance and munitions to be used in the defense of the west coast and our Pacific outposts. They would obviate choking eastern industry and would provide not only desirable decentralization but would also diversify our sources of supplies in times of emergency. By locating these industries in this area where raw products and power are already available or obtainable we would also be adhering to another principle in national defense, namely, locating essential defense industries away from coast areas and thus less vulnerable to attack.

These industries could produce 155,000 tons of basic materials important not only to the normal economic life of the Pacific Northwest but to our national defense:

Produce	Power requirement	Annual production
	Kilowatts
Aluminum	65,000	30,000 tons of metal.
High-grade iron and steel	25,000	50,000 tons of metal.
Ferrochrome	30,000	20,000 tons of alloy.
Electrolytic zinc	15,000	35,000 tons of metal.
Nitrates	60,000	30,000 tons fixed nitrogen
Calcium carbide	10,000	20,000 tons of chemical.
Total (less Alcoa plant)	140,000	155,000 tons of products.

We cannot allow this great reservoir of power to remain without the necessary outlets to market.

PACIFIC NORTHWEST MINERALS AND THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

I have discussed so far the benefits of which this Nation can take immediate advantage in the huge power resources of the Pacific Northwest. I would like now to examine briefly our mineral situation.

Strategic and critical minerals are found in the West. The deposits of chrome, of manganese, antimony, and tungsten have not been fully charted, and the Pacific Northwest has not as yet been examined with the care that it deserves. Some of the minerals now known in the Oregon country are of low grade, but are particularly susceptible to treatment by electric power. Metallic chrome and manganese can be obtained from Northwest ores, and magnesium—that increasingly important light metal—can be produced from Northwest magnesite and magnesitic dolomites by the electric furnace, and apparently at a price level lower than that now available. Aluminum can be made from alunite, a western ore. As far as possible we should use our own raw materials for the production of aluminum instead of depending on foreign supplies of bauxite, or on our rapidly shrinking domestic bauxite deposits. And so the list could be expanded. This development and use of our own natural deposits depends on the efforts of the scientist in his laboratory and in the pilot plant, of the geologist and mining man, of the engineer who can translate these investigations into successful commercial operations.

The Pacific Northwest can contribute immeasurably in this emergency toward national defense through the use of its deposits of strategic and critical minerals and other materials, and through the development of the electro industries in the Columbia River area. In this area there are immense deposits of raw materials much of them wholly undeveloped. They will replace essential products now being imported and which may be blacked out at any time. Nowhere else in the Nation is there comparable potential and existing supplies of low-cost power. The Pacific Northwest asks that these powerful resources be enlisted in strengthening our national defense and in providing for our country's welfare in time of peace, in time of emergency, and in time of war which, pray God, may never come.

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM PHILADELPHIA EVENING BULLETIN

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of September 9, 1940, entitled "Strong Leadership Wanted."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of September 9, 1940]

STRONG LEADERSHIP WANTED

When Wendell Willkie was nominated for the Presidency by the Philadelphia convention there was a general feeling in Republican ranks that a wise choice had been made.

It seemed that professional politicians had been rebuffed and their dictatorial power taken over by the progressive rank and file of the party. For Mr. Willkie had not been groomed by the old-line leaders. He was the popular candidate. It was a heartening sign that the Republicans who do the voting rather than the political engineers who try to direct it had been able to take charge and select the nominee.

Mr. Willkie owed his popularity not alone to his pleasing personality. His premonition utterances had exhibited a rich vein of common sense. His was not a reactionary view. He was willing to accept and pursue the best of the New Deal objectives. He was not going to attempt to turn back the hands of the clock. He proposed to improve on the methods rather than the aims of the march toward social progress.

Besides, there was a big business job ahead of the country—the gigantic job of military preparedness. The idea in the minds of the people who got behind Willkie was to choose a President who could be expected, by virtue of his executive record in the handling of large affairs, to carry through the preparedness program with a minimum of waste and a maximum of efficiency in the shortest possible time. Wendell Willkie has a background of achievement that fits him for that task.

But Mr. Willkie's course since his nomination has not been wholly satisfactory to those of his supporters who have in mind the country's welfare rather than partisan advantage. There is too much evidence that he holds the small things so close to his eye as to obscure his vision of the large things.

Here one suspects the influence, and probably the unwise counsel, of the professional politicians.

They are on the hunt for grounds of criticism, and in the search they overstrain themselves.

The coming election is not going to be decided on the basis of the number of flies to be found in the ointment of general welfare as applied by the New Deal administration, but on the ground of its general effectiveness as a medicament.

The country is interested in broad policy; not in side issues or minor details. Mr. Willkie, for instance, will not get anywhere with independent voters, whose support he needs, by criticisms which suggest that if he were President in the existing emergency he would refrain from using his utmost power to strengthen the national defenses quickly, but would rather let Congress debate the question whether or not he should resort to such Executive authority.

Intimations that he thinks delicate negotiations with foreign powers should be conducted through a megaphone, so that the public may listen in on them at every stage, do not appeal to common sense. That is not the way he managed the affairs of Commonwealth & Southern. And the people want business methods applied, so far as they are appropriate, to affairs of government.

The people like political fronkness and courage. They want strong and competent leadership. Their support at the polls will go to the candidate who convinces them that he understands our foreign and domestic problems and is prepared not only to offer but to execute a sound program for meeting them.

Taxation of Excess Profits

REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein a memorandum prepared by Mr. James F. Stiles, Jr., vice president and treasurer of Abbott Laboratories, North Chicago, Ill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, this memorandum embodies a simple formula for determining excess profits for the purpose of taxation. Mr. Stiles is a leading citizen of my district and a personal friend of mine of long standing. I understand that he has submitted the same memorandum I am inserting in the RECORD to every Member of the House and the Senate. I am taking this time in order to call your special attention to it.

You will note that the formula he presents for the purpose of excess profits is a simple one, and that in itself should commend it to us. It has had the endorsement of every tax specialist who has had occasion to examine it. You will note that it stimulates, rather than penalizes, pay-roll expansion and increased employment.

Last week end Mr. Stiles and I conferred with certain members of the Senate Finance Committee in the hope that this particular formula may be incorporated in the legislation now pending in the Senate. If the Senate takes that step, and I hope it will, I urge that the House concur in that action.

The tax bill which passed the House will tend to operate to the disadvantage of small corporations, and it is these very corporations which are the backbone of our industrial system. It behooves us not to enact any legislation which would tend to operate to their disadvantage. If we must have excess-profits-tax legislation, then let us take the time to see that it is soundly devised.

The following simple formula is submitted as a third alternative for corporations in determining what amount is to be taxed as excess profits.

Determine the average ratio during the base period of pay roll (subject to social-security taxes) to net profit (net income after deduction of normal tax); for example:

	Total pay roll	Net profit
1936	$1,000,000	$800,000
1937	1,500,000	1,100,000
1938	1,400,000	1,000,000
1939	2,100,000	1,600,000
Total	6,000,000	4,500,000

Net profit=75 percent of total pay roll.
1941 pay roll: $3,000,000—75 percent=$2,250,000 normal net profits:

Net profit after normal tax	$2,500,000
Allowed as normal profit	2,250,000
Subject to excess-profits tax	250,000

The advantages of this method are:

A. Stimulates rather than penalizes pay-roll expansion and increased employment.

B. Recognizes that industrial profits come primarily from productive activity.

C. Encourages normal business progress and normal business profits.

D. Simplicity of arriving at determining factors and tax—namely, social-security pay roll—net income after normal tax.

This formula should answer the objections to the pending excess-profits tax bill of growing corporations which have ample capital for expansion and those which during the base period had an increasing trend of profit not arising from the national-defense program, as well as those which are in a position finally to realize profits during the years which might be subject to excess-profits tax, which profits result from previous research and development work.

Because of the fact that during any base period selected, whether for 4 or 5 years, the average corporation experiences an abnormal year of unprofitable accomplishment, it would be preferable to let such corporation select 4 out of the past 5 years (1935–39) or 3 out of the past 4 years (1936–39).

This option, of course, should not be available to that part of any taxpayer's business which is subject to the newly proposed tax on armament contracts, nor should it be available to any corporation for any taxable year if its net profits exceed its pay roll.

Conscription

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER A. LYNCH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 7, 1940

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, a number of my constituents have written to me opposing conscription at this time. Some opposed it as a forerunner to the sending of an army to aid Great Britain, others opposed it as undemocratic and leading to dictatorship. To them I answered that I could not state my position until the bill was in its final form and debate had been had thereon. I further stated that I felt that conscription should not be had except as a last resort.

I have voted for conscription, convinced that it was for the best interests of our country. Events have moved quickly, so quickly that I would rather make the mistake of being overprepared than unprepared.

That we need an efficient and capable Army no one can deny. That we must protect our homes is beyond question. Declarations of war are not made today. Norway, Holland, Denmark, and Belgium were at peace and went to sleep. The next day found the invaders in their country. France, with one of the bravest armies in the world, but betrayed by Communists and "fifth columnists" behind the lines, lies defeated before a military machine. England, with her mighty navy, has her back to the wall, while from the skies bombs are dropping upon her, destroying not only military objectives but the homes of people as well; killing not only soldiers but women and children as well. Can I, as the Representative of my district, close my eyes to those facts and say, "It cannot happen here"?

The bulk of our fleet is on the alert in the Pacific, guarding our western coast and island possessions. A thin line of warships is protecting our Atlantic coast; our air force is insufficient; our Regular Army on August 16 last numbered only 289,000 men, scattered over the United States, Alaska, Panama, Hawaii, and the Philippines. Our National Guard is 240,000, which, it is estimated, will be reduced some 20,000 by discharges for dependency and physical disability. The Chief of Staff of the Army states we need 1,200,000 adequately trained men under arms to protect our country. Approximately 40,000 men enlisted in the Army last month. At that rate we would not recruit a sufficient number for 20 months—almost 2 years. Call for volunteers! I thought so once, but not now. Some say we are at peace. Make no mistake, the threat of war is imminent. There can be no real peace in the shadow of war. We are preparing our defenses. We want peace, but are we going to have it? Because we want peace, are we going to be unprepared for war?

If we are at peace and there is no danger of war, why should we be spending billions of dollars for equipment for defense? If we are at peace and there is no danger of war, why is it that our people are unanimous in building a two-ocean Navy, which cannot be accomplished for at least 7 years? If we are at peace and there is no danger of war, why has the National Guard been called into service? If we are at peace and there is no danger of war, why do we need 1,200,000 men under arms?

Conscription in time of war, we all agree, is the only fair system. Conscription in time of peace is said to be undemocratic. I believe that to be true as a general principle, but somewhere in those dark hours before war strikes, preparation must be made in the hope that such preparation will cause the war lords of Europe to halt in their mad march and yet with the thought that they will strike.

Call for volunteers and who would answer? It would be the boys who come from God-fearing families, brought up with the thought of service to God and country, imbued with a love for American ideals and American institutions, while those who willingly enjoy the benefits of living in a free country, but are unwilling to accept the responsibility of defending that country, would take the jobs of the boys who had volunteered. And if there were a war, who would be the first to be called? The boys who in time of peace, but in the shadows of war, had volunteered and had been trained for service.

What will happen when the time of training for the National Guard and the first contingent of 800,000 men is over? Are we to have another call for a million volunteers to take their places? Would it not be the same type of boy who volunteered and would it not be the same type who would again take their jobs?

It has been no easy task to come to this conclusion. It is no easy task to take boys away from their homes. It is no easy task for me to vote to send my own boy away, but, after listening long hours to the debate, after reading the testimony before the Military Affairs Committees of the Senate and House, I, alone with my conscience, came to the conclusion that, with the heavy clouds of war lowering over our country, no course was left open to me but to vote for immediate conscription.

The Bonneville Project

OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 13, 1940

STATEMENT OF HON. HOMER D. ANGELL, OF OREGON, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the Subcommittee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, September 10, 1940:

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, members of the Deficiency Appropriation Committee, I am advised that the President and the Bureau of the Budget have transmitted a Bonneville supplemental estimate of $3,850,000, which is divided as follows:

Item 1. Grand Coulee-Covington transmission line, initial materials, right-of-way, and clearing	$1,500,000
Item 2. Covington-Seattle line	200,000
Item 3. Substation additions	1,600,000
Item 4. Feeder connections	500,000
Item 5. Tools and equipment	50,000

In view of the President's Executive order the first two items are necessary to start work on outlets to permit the sale of Coulee power. No direct Coulee outlets have been authorized to date, and it is obvious that they are necessary. Grand Coulee will bring in three generators totaling 324,000 kilowatts within the next year. This is 50 percent more firm power than was assured by the $65,000,000 T. V. A. appropriation request which by the terms of that appropriation bill will not be fully available within 3 years. I might mention in this connection that Bonneville Dam is completed and Coulee will be within a year. All that is needed hereafter at both sites to acquire any amount additional capacity is the installation of machines—water turbines and generators with a roof above. For the capacity included in the T. V. A. appropriation, these Bonneville or Coulee machines could have been secured for about one-sixth of the amount necessary for a full hydro development with steam auxiliaries. I have been advised that the three Coulee machines I mention cost less than $10,000,000. Columbia power does not require a steam support.

I might also state that additional Bonneville or Coulee capacity can be secured for one-half of the cost of any steam plant, and thereafter there would be no fuel costs involved. Bare fuel operating costs on the basis of T. V. A. reports range from about 1.6 to 3.0 mills per kilowatt-hour, depending on the distance from the fuel source. In the Northwest, Columbia power costs, including all charges, interest, and amortization, are less than the bare fuel cost.

The remaining items of this estimate come within the scope of my investigations, and I desire to comment on the strategic metal and defense contribution that the Northwest can make. The last three items of the submission can fit directly into such a program in my State. The submission is flexible enough to permit the use of these funds, wherever defense industrial requirements arise. Bonneville and Grand Coulee will within the next year have over 500,000 kilowatts of available low-cost power. The Advisory Commission in their appearance before your committee, on the T. V. A. matter, stated in effect that there was a shortage of power capacity required for defense, and that there was no private company in the United States capable of supplying even 200,000 kilowatts. I could add to this statement by saying that there are no power sources in America that can approach the Columbia River plants in low cost.

POWER COSTS AND ELECTROLYTIC PROCESSES

Inquiry and investigation develop the following over-all power facts. The hydro power that the Aluminum Co. is purchasing at the T. V. A. costs about 50 percent more than Bonneville-delivered power. The T. V. A. steam power, with low coal prices, will cost over two times as much as Bonneville power. The Holston Reservoir hydro power will cost, if fully amortized, like the estimate before you, nearly 1.9 times as much as Columbia power. Niagara industrial power sells for 50 percent more than Bonneville power. Eastern and midwestern steam power will cost nearly 3 times as much. All of these comparisons are made on a kilowatt-hour basis for the purpose of pointing out the base economics behind the electrolytic processes, on which the defense program must rest. Electrolytic metal processes cannot economically stand power costs above 3 mills per kilowatt-hour unless there is Federal subsidy in the metal price paid. This economic fact precludes steam power from consideration from such process use. Columbia power derives its advantage from the gifts of nature, in the form of high average river flows, steadiness of flow, high waterfalls, low-cost reservoir sites, and advantageous dam sites with solid floors. As a power producer, the Columbia tops the list of high-class power streams like the Niagara, St. Lawrence, and Colorado.

THE DEFENSE PROBLEM

Modern warfare is one of machines. Machines require metals and modern machines electrolytic metals. I have stated before that the Detroit automobile industry would not have been possible without the superior electrolytic metals produced by Niagara 3-mill current. The two bottlenecks of the last war were power and strategic metals. As time goes on we will see these bottlenecks develop unless remedial measures are early adopted. The Northwest has both. All that is needed is to harness them together. I appear to urge your full consideration of this subject. It is apparent that we cannot afford to isolate such a block of power capacity at this time.

STRATEGIC METALS

On May 8 last, before the present Defense Advisory Committee was created, I addressed the House on the metal and power situation. Originally, I started this investigation as an aid to unemployment, and in the course of this investigation I discovered our great national-defense weakness from the standpoint of vital metals and power. I found that we are importing nearly $200,000,000 annually in vital metals. This importation represents an employment displacement nearly equal to the total metal-mining employment in the United States. To feel absolutely secure, we must declare our independence from foreign material sources. For example, our steel industry would be helpless if the foreign supply of manganese were to be cut off. Large deposits of manganese ores exist in the West, notably in the Olympic Peninsula in Washington. Our western ores are more complex than the ores of other sections, but these can be reduced by electric processes. The Bureau of Mines has developed an electric process for the reduction of western manganese ores. The same situation exists as to magnesium, aluminum from western alunite, chrome, tungsten, antimony, mica, and mercury.

DEFENSE INDUSTRIES

Civilization today would grind to an abrupt stop if the products of the electric furnace and the electrolytic cell should cease to be available. Our automobiles require the high-grade steel and steel alloys made in the electric furnace. The modern transport and military planes of today would be nonexistent if it were not for aluminum and magnesium metal products of the electrolytic cell. The examples can be multiplied as to cover every phase of modern industrial life—and, consequently, the importance of electric power become self-evident, especially if we note that these electro products require huge quantities of cheap power.

It is not easy to find cheap sources of dependable power in the Nation. Present plants are fast becoming loaded up to maximum capacity. We must not be subject to the almost disastrous power shortages of the last World War; and, gentlemen, we need not—the Columbia River projects at Bonneville and Grand Coulee are ready now to furnish ever-increasing quantities of the lowest-cost electric power in the United States. But great as this availability may be, we need the transmission lines to carry the energy from the power plants to the sites where industry will locate.

Ripe fruit can rot and fall to the ground unless we provide the baskets with which to collect the bounties of the fruit tree and transportation facilities to carry it to the markets.

Bonneville is ready to deliver 65,000 kilowatts to the Aluminum Co. of America's plant at Vancouver, Wash., which began operation September 3 of this year for the production of 30,000 tons a year of aluminum which we need in the production of sheets, rods, and structural shapes for our airplane program.

Bonneville is ready to deliver power to the Pacific Carbide & Alloys Co. in Portland for the production of calcium carbide, a chemical important in peace and war.

And Bonneville is in active contact with manufacturers and industrial groups contemplating northwestern production of high-grade steel and steel alloys, ferrochrome—so important for armor plate—electrolytic zinc and manganese, aluminum from western raw materials, chromite, and chlorates. All these are electro industries whose power demands will aggregate many tens of thousands of kilowatts.

I might call your attention to a timely report, just made public, prepared by the Bonneville Power Administration on industries important to national defense feasible of establishment in the Pacific Northwest. This report analyzes the specific contributions which the Northwest can well make to the national-defense program. It lists industries a basic requirement of which is cheap and large blocks of power industries whose products can provide some of the sinews for the defense of the west coast of our Pacific outposts, industries that are needed in the normal economic development of the Oregon country. I am told that if all these interested industries were to be established in the Northwest, their total initial power requirements would be in excess of 250,000 kilowatts. Where else in this Nation can such power be provided, especially in an area where most of the necessary raw materials can be found or readily made available from contiguous areas?

SELF-LIQUIDATION

Under the terms of the Bonneville Act this estimate will be fully recovered. The act is mandatory in this requirement, and the rates to insure repayment are subject to periodical revision and check by the Power Commission before becoming effective. Manifestly, the estimate before you is strictly a business proposition, and also a worth-while contribution to our defense program.

Republican Efforts to Hoodwink the Public

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

Friday, September 13, 1940

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein an intriguing clipping from the ultraconservative Detroit Free Press, printed on the front page of its issue of September 9, 1940.

I might refer to the article as did the Latins of old, "Res ipsa loquitur" (the thing speaks for itself). However, it might be added parenthetically that, according to this newspaper story, the Republicans of southern Michigan are so desperate they have resorted to very questionable methods in attempting to perpetrate upon an often too gullible public the impression that Willkie continues in undiminishing popularity. Personally, I have always felt the Willkie popularity was synthetic and was carefully planted as a seed, then transplanted, nourished under glass, and nurtured to a budding fruition of incipient persuasiveness by the loving hands of the scions of special privilege and the stooges of monopolies. I suggest that the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD study the article carefully. Let Republicans read it and weep. If certain polls, ostensibly indicating that public-utility magnate Willkie was in the lead, resort to anything like the methods so graphically described in this article from a Republican newspaper, one can readily comprehend why it is that the people are rapidly losing faith in so-called opinion polls.

[From the Detroit Free Press of September 9, 1940]

G. O. P. LEARNS IT CAN'T KEEP ROOSEVELT DOWN AT THE FAIR

The State Fair Board of Managers, being Republican almost to a man, was loyal to the Grand Old Party to the end of the fair Sunday night, even though they may not have been entirely ethical in the way they tried to keep the G. O. P. in the ascendancy.

That, at least, was the way it looked to Mr. and Mrs. Henry Rauch, of 59 Seward, who paid 95 good New Deal dollars to rent a concession at the fair where they sold Roosevelt and Willkie stickers and buttons and kept a public scoreboard to show how the sales were going.

All was well with their concession until last Wednesday when, for the first time, the number of Roosevelt buttons sold exceeded the number of Willkie buttons. The scoreboard in front of their concession proclaimed that the President was in the lead in the Rauch straw voting.

"Soon after the scoreboard showed Roosevelt ahead," Rauch said Sunday with a note of bitterness, "Schrader came over and told us to contrive to make Willkie lead the vote or else take the board down."

"Schrader" is Lester R. Schrader, of Centerville, a member of the board of managers who is in charge of renting concession space.

"He told us to start counting twice as much for a Willkie sale as for a Roosevelt sale," Mrs. Rauch chimed in.

Rauch had been counting five votes for each candidate with every button sale. After Schrader had issued his ultimatum he counted 10 votes for every Willkie sale, Rauch said.

Things went along more smoothly until Sunday night, when, despite the 2-to-1 handicap, Roosevelt again forged into the lead.

"Within 2 minutes," Rauch said, "Schrader was over here, and he took our scoreboard away."

WILLKIE TRAILS AGAIN

Rauch borrowed another makeshift scoreboard at about 8:30 p. m. Sunday and chalked up the correct score. It stood: Roosevelt, 5,260; Willkie, 2,940.

"That's the right score, and we are going to keep it right for the rest of the evening—if we can," said Rauch.

Schrader was "out to dinner" when the new scoreboard went up. At a late hour, however, the board was still there.

Aliens and Unemployment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ARTICLE BY HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article written by me for the National Republic magazine, issue of September 1940, published in Washington, D. C., entitled "Aliens Keep Ten Millions Idle."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the National Republic magazine of September 1940]

ALIENS KEEP TEN MILLIONS IDLE

(By Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, of North Carolina)

Some months ago I addressed the Senate on the need of additional immigration restricted and alien deportation legislation, and in opposition to the then highly publicized and propagandized Wagner-Rogers so-called refugee resolution, which would increase the present enormous German quota by 20,000 children, no one of whom would have to be a refugee. At that time some statistical questions were asked me about the number of aliens entering the United States and already in the country, which I was not then prepared to answer. The Senate was then given the impression by my questioners that emigration exceeded immigration, and that there was really no need of any additional immigration legislation, because the Senate was erroneously given to understand no aliens are coming into our country.

Since then I have had prepared from the official Government statistics a table which conclusively and decisively shows that emigration is not exceeding immigration, and that net immigration is, and has been for several years, rapidly increasing.

The official statistics show that another immigration wave of about one-half a million aliens annually, such as came a decade ago, immediately after the enactment of the present 1924 Quota Restriction Act, has set in, as a result of the Hoover public charge administrative restriction of September 8, 1930, being partially relaxed in 1937, and as a result of Congress not having put that administrative restriction on the basis of substantiative law, as urged by President Hoover repeatedly in his messages, and as was attempted by the House passing, by a record yea-and-nay vote of 298 to 88, a bill reducing quota immigration 90 percent in the precise language of my bill (S. 407), on which extensive hearings were held several months ago by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Immigration, which has unanimously reported to the full committee a substitute bill that would accomplish the purposes, not only of Senate bill 407 but of several other bills I have introduced.

The nearly half a million aliens who came for almost a decade after the enactment of the present quota legislation are shown conclusively to have been reduced by the Hoover so-called executive order of 1930 to about 150,000 aliens, or 23,068 so-called immigrant aliens, only to be increased by the failure of Congress to enact additional restrictive legislation, and by the relaxation of the present administrative discretion in 1937 to 252,697 aliens last year. The effect of the administrative relaxation in 1937 is even reflected in the number of destitute aliens removed in 1938, when they increased over 1,000 over 1937, and their removal cost Uncle Sam over $100,000 more in 1938 than the corresponding cost in 1937.

I also asked that another statistical table prepared by the Department of Labor, and submitted to the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations on January 26, 1938, be printed as a part of my remarks.

The tables and statement are as follows:

"The quota law of 1924 divides all classes of aliens into immigrants and nonimmigrant aliens. The nonimmigrant as defined in section 3 of the 1925 quota law are merely: (1) government officials, such as ambassadors, consuls, and the like, their families, suites, etc.; (2) temporary visitors for business; (3) temporary visitors for pleasure; (4) aliens intransitu both through the United States and from one part of the United States to another through foreign territory; (5) treaty traders. In 1937, fiscal year ending June 30, there were 128,557 nonimmigrants out of 231,884 aliens of all classes; that is, 103,327 immigrants.

"All classes of aliens admitted in 1935 totaled 179,721; 1936, 190,-899; 1937, 231,884 (21.5 percent increase over 1936). Total, 7 years (1931–37), 1,372,686; total, 13 years (1925–37), 4,290,651" (House Appropriations Committee Hearings, Labor, January 26, 1938, pp. 240–241).

Reading the second table we note there were in 1937, 27,762 section 5 immigrants, nine-tenths having no near relatives here, and who were new-seed immigrants; and during the past 7 years there were 151,448; and during the last 13 years, i. e., since the enactment of the quota-restriction law of 1924, 1,054,567, nine-tenths of whom had no near relatives here, every one of the nine-tenths being a job hunter or relief seeker, or dependent upon someone who is. These should have been excluded.

The bill I have sponsored (S. 3201) would exclude practically nine-tenths of the 27,762 section 5 immigrant aliens that entered in 1937, nine-tenths of the 151,448 that have entered during the 7 years 1931–37, and nine-tenths of the 1,054,567 aliens that have entered since 1924, and who ought not have been admitted to further increase our unemployment and relief burdens, directly or indirectly.

From September 8, 1930, to January 1, 1937, consuls drastically restricted immigration admissibility by refusing immigration visas to aliens they believe are "likely to become public charges" after admission here. Before September 8, 1930, there was no such administrative restriction. The effect of this administrative restriction is reflected in the number of section 5 admissions before and after 1930, there being 903,119 such admissions during the 6 years before 1930, as compared with 151,448 during the 7 years since 1930.

On January 1, 1937, the President had the Secretary of State instruct consuls to relax in certain instances this administrative restriction inaugurated by Herbert Hoover on September 8, 1930, and to no longer regard increased unemployment here (there are now about 10,600,000 unemployed), lack of funds, and no near relatives here legally liable for their maintenance and support as the reasons they have been using since 1930 for refusing visas because the alien is likely to become a public charge, particularly as to aliens from Germany and Austria, on account of political conditions there. Since this change there has been a noticeable increase in aliens unemployed and aliens demanding relief and charity. The 100 percent increase in section 5, new-seed or quota immigrants for 1937 over 1936, is due largely to this administrative relaxation and shows the urgent need of putting such administrative restriction on a more substantial basis of law by Congress passing some such bill as S. 3202 that would exclude mere section 5 nonpreference aliens, practically every one of whom is necessarily a job hunter or relief seeker and who has no near relative here.

The immigration bill S. 3201 has a 10-percent exception for certain near relatives (preference quota) and for skilled labor and specialists that might be needed for new industries. With the exception of a few specialists and a few preference-quota relatives, the bill, if it had been enacted, would have kept out during the years 1925–37, nine-tenths of the 1,054,567 aliens that came and are job hunters or relief seekers, and thereby reduced greatly our terrific unemployment and relief burdens. Of course, legal alien entrants are only part of the problem. We know the legal entrants, but do not know, and have had no way of finding out, the number of total aliens in the country in the absence of alien registration in the past.

There is also the emigration factor. Emigration statistics are not official in the sense that immigration statistics are. The Government only really checks or counts aliens coming into the country legally. Nobody knows how many aliens enter illegally, but experts have estimated, and it seems a fair guess, that as many enter illegally as enter legally for permanent residence. Annually our inadequate immigration patrol apprehends hundreds of high-powered automobiles, a large number of speedboats, and even airplanes smuggling aliens into our country.

In 1937, 163 smugglers of aliens, 13,054 aliens entering illegally, and 608 other law violators were arrested, and the autos, trucks, airplanes, and boats seized ran into thousands of dollars. When Department of Labor officials appear before the Appropriations Committee they urge a 50-percent increase in the immigration personnel, much larger appropriations, and tell—I quote from the House hearings on the 1938 appropriation bill—"how quite serious this situation is, with 46,152,918 alien border crossings, 795,333 alien seamen examined, and a shortage of help—meaning immigration law enforcement officers—in practically every district." That is the picture painted by the Department of Labor officials as to aliens before the House Subcommittee on Appropriations, but when the same officials appear before committees of Congress charged with reporting immigration and deportation legislation they say the alien has "vanished" from our midst; and even estimate that, although the official statistics from the census of 1930 reveal the largest foreign population in our history, over 14,000,000 foreign born, and between six and seven million aliens, and over 40,000,000 "foreign-stock persons," that we have now no aliens, because they have either emigrated, died off, or got naturalized; and when pressed about alien registration, the Secretary of Labor, after telling the House Subcommittee on Appropriations that the alien is vanishing and is no longer a problem, then expressed her deep opposition to registering aliens, because she said they (the aliens) "do not want to be fingerprinted" (p. 224), and it would "complicate the Americanization of these people."

The Government does not check aliens out, as it checks and counts the aliens in. So-called emigration is merely the report of departure tickets sold by the steamship and transportation companies. In 1937, which is typical, transportation companies reported 26,736 alien emigrants departed or aliens emigrated from the United States as compared with 35,817 the previous year. Department of Labor officials also told the House Appropriations Subcommittee in 1937 that 50,244 of the 231,884 aliens that entered during the 1937 fiscal year were immigrants, showing immigration was twice emigration, even according to Department of Labor officials' interpretation and classification of the statistics. Even those Department of Labor classified immigration statistics show in 1937 and again in 1938 a 25-percent decrease in emigration and that immigration is at least twice emigration when we have about 10,600,000 unemployed, are having to appropriate a quarter billion dollars for expanding relief rolls, and crime as a result of unemployment is on the rampage.

There is no excuse for allowing a single additional alien job hunter or relief seeker to enter our country. Nine-tenths of the section 5, 27,762 quota aliens that entered in 1937 and over 30,000 in 1938 have no near relatives here, were nonpreference or quota immigrants, and should not have been admitted. No other country of consequence permits it. Each country should care for its own deficient, dependent, and unemployed. Our first thought should be for our own. Charity should begin at home. Immigration should be further restricted at least by passing S. 3201, which would merely exclude the thousands of aliens now being admitted under section 5, no one of whom has a near relative here and every one of whom comes to take a job away from someone already here or to go on relief or become dependent on someone who has to have a job to support him. First things should be first. We should not decide our American affairs or legislate the way aliens here and abroad "want us to" legislate, but for America and Americans, and as Americans.

Water-Borne Commerce in America's Citadel of Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. MANSFIELD

OF TEXAS

Friday, September 13, 1940

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in these times when there is so much public interest in national defense, those of us who for a long time have devoted our time and energy to planning and improving the navigable rivers and harbors of the United States are gratified at the state of preparedness of the Nation's waterways in the present emergency. We take pride in the fact that the plans have been made with the best interests of the Nation ever in view and that the works have been authorized and constructed from a national viewpoint free from partisan and selfish motives. As a result this country, beginning to prepare for defense, finds its waterways better able than ever before to transport bulk freight and take care of the heavy traffic which the railroads were unable to handle in the first World War and are never able to transport when this country is sufficiently prosperous to produce and put into interstate commerce the heavy tonnages derived from its abundant natural resources, of grain, oil, metal, ores, coal, and manufactured products.

COASTAL AND LAKE REGIONS

The harbors, canals, and navigable rivers of our coastal and lake regions are deeper and better maintained than ever before. The planning has been characterized by thoroughness and vision, and authorized projects have been accomplished in synchronism with the growth and demands of the country. Without referring to all of the important accomplishments, I invite attention to the essential benefits to national defense of the coastal harbors which permit the efficient handling of oil and gasoline, and to the defense value of the harbors of the Great Lakes, which make feasible the transportation of the Lake Superior iron ore to the manufacturing centers of steel and iron. Without these waterway improvements our national defense would indeed be in a bad way.

THE MISSISSIPPI BASIN

In the great central region of the United States, between the Appalachian and Rocky Mountains, as elsewhere, the planning for water-borne transportation has been forehanded, and has been performed with vision. We in Congress have not erred by being too conservative but have authorized improvements in a truly liberal and modern spirit. Our actions have been governed by national motives, and as a result navigable waterways are ready when so many other essentials for defense are unprepared. Let me mention some of the waterway facilities in the Great Mississippi Basin.

LOWER MISSISSIPPI RIVER

From Cairo, Ill., to Baton Rouge, La., we have a barge-line channel 300 feet wide and 9 feet deep, which is maintained in first-class shape, and through which heavily laden barge tows are continually passing up and down the river. Oil and gasoline are hauled by water from refineries at Baton Rouge to St. Louis, Mo., to Kansas City, Mo., to St. Paul and Minneapolis, to Chicago, to Louisville, to Cincinnati, to Pittsburgh, to Nashville, and to innumerable other cities and towns. This oil and gasoline cannot be distributed by any other form of transportation with the same efficiency. Of course, grain, coal, steel products, and cotton are also transported by barge on the Lower Mississippi River.

MISSOURI RIVER

On the Missouri River, from St. Louis to Kansas City, there is a 6-foot channel, and its continuation to Sioux City is about 75 percent completed. The plan is to develop the 6-foot channel into a 9-foot project from St. Louis to Sioux City. At present there are large in-bound shipments to Kansas City of building materials, fuel oil, machinery, and chemicals, and out-bound shipments of wheat, flour, ores, lumber products, and sand.

UPPER MISSISSIPPI AND ILLINOIS RIVERS

Barge-line traffic is affording regular service from the lower Mississippi below Cairo up the Mississippi to St. Louis and to Minneapolis, and up the Illinois River to Chicago. These channels, 9 feet in depth, permit the hauling of coal from the Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and West Virginia coal fields to the cities and towns located on and near these rivers.

OHIO RIVER

The 9-foot navigation project for the Ohio River authorized in 1910 has been completed and it makes possible the economical and efficient manufacture of iron and steel products in the Pittsburgh and Chicago steel-manufacturing areas, by reason of the fact that water transportation makes coal cheap everywhere that the barge lines carry coal. Without abundant iron and plentiful coal due to water-borne transportation, national defense would be in a sad plight. Much has been accomplished, but there remain other connecting waterways in the Ohio Basin that could advantageously be improved.

WATERWAY IMPROVEMENTS ARE A DIRECT AID TO DEFENSE

In summary let me say that but for the comprehensive planning that has been accomplished with thoroughness and vision by the Army engineers of the War Department and but for the broad-minded statesmanship exercised by the Congress in authorizing waterway projects we might not be so well prepared now for the emergency we face. It should always be remembered that transportation of heavy bulk produce can never be handled by any form of transportation with the same efficiency and economy that is possible with waterway transportation. In fact no other form of transportation can fulfill this need in a national emergency. Waterway improvements are a direct and essential aid to national defense and this is particularly true for the great central portion of the Mississippi Basin which is protected naturally by mountain ranges from hostile attack. This region produces grain, cotton, oil, iron, zinc, lead, and other minerals in abundance. Already many plants for processing foodstuffs and factories for the manufacture of the necessities of life are located in it. There is a naval-ordnance arsenal near Charleston, W. Va., the manufacture of explosives is being started near Memphis, there are airplane factories in Kansas and at Nashville, Tenn., and arms are produced at Rock Island. Undoubtedly other establishments for the production of war materials under the defense program will be located in this region. We must not neglect any of our waterways, but especially must the navigable rivers and channels in the central Mississippi Basin be maintained, improved, and extended since water-borne commerce in America's citadel of defense is essential for preparedness.

A Vital Artery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in these days of international turmoil our attention is properly directed to defense measures which ought to be adopted to safeguard against future attacks.

I have today introduced a bill which asks for a survey and examination for a ship canal connecting Lakes Superior and Michigan. This, I believe, should be studied at this time, despite the fact that the project has previously received an unfavorable report, because attention is now directed to the importance of the proper protection of the locks at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., in my district, through which is shipped the iron ore so vital to our defense program.

This iron ore upon which our steel plants now depend comes from the mines in northern Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. The locks take care of the 23-foot drop from Lake Superior to Lake Huron, permitting the shipment by boat of as many as 70,000,000 tons of iron ore in 1 year. If through sabotage or an attack from an enemy nation these locks were destroyed, the shipment would be seriously delayed, and the cost of transportation would be very much increased.

My bill would provide for a study of a second or alternative route, connecting Lakes Superior and Michigan through the construction of a ship canal from Au Train Lake in Lake Superior to Little Bay de Noquet at the head of Lake Michigan. In addition to serving as insurance for defense in an emergency, such a route would cut off a distance of 360 miles in the shipping distance between the mines and the steel mills in the Chicago and Gary, Ind., area.

Also such a canal would serve to open up new territory and make possible the development of power sufficient to operate the locks in the canal, with enough surplus to supply the demands of the cities and towns in the territory and contribute richly to their further development. Such construction would also help residents of the territory to rehabilitate themselves. Due to the depletion of the timber resources which supplied the lumber mills and furnished the raw materials which served toward the upbuilding of our larger urban centers, there is now in many sections of this territory a greater need for relief than elsewhere in the rest of the State of Michigan.

It is my belief that if we can provide this rehabilitation, and at the same time provide for the greater safety of our Nation, the building of this ship canal should receive early and serious consideration.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, for permission to include as a part of my remarks an editorial from the Detroit Free Press entitled "A Vital Artery," telling something of the importance of the Soo locks presently, and some of the earlier history of their construction.

[From the Detroit Free Press]

A VITAL ARTERY

The soldiers patrolling the locks at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., are entrusted with a grave responsibility.

The destruction of these locks would cut the "life line" of the American steel industry. Coal and iron ore are the two most important minerals in steel making. Was it by design that nature put most of our coal in Pennsylvania and most of our iron ore as far west as Minnesota? At any rate the coal and ore have to be brought together, and the St. Marys Falls Canal is the bottleneck through which this union of essential minerals is effected.

As much as 70,000,000 tons of iron ore have passed through this canal in a year.

As early as 1797 fur traders dug a canal around the rapids at the Soo and built a lock to overcome the drop of 23 feet from Lake Superior to Lake Huron. That was on the Canadian side. American troops destroyed the lock in the War of 1812. All freight then had again to be hauled over the portage, a slow and expensive process.

When the Michigan Legislature voted $25,000 and started to dig itself a new and better canal, which Congress had refused to sanction, soldiers were sent to drive the workmen away. The Michigan canal question, as it was called, was before Congress for years. Among the project's strongest opponents was Henry Clay, who declared that it was "a work quite beyond the remotest settlement of the United States." Congress finally surrendered in 1852 and gave 750,000 acres of public land to help pay the cost of "a ditch around the rapids" on the American side.

The St. Marys Falls Canal was not so far beyond the remotest settlement of the United States but that in 1929 some 92,000,000 tons of freight passed through it—about 4,000,000 tons more than passed through the Panama, Suez, and Kiel Canals together.

A transportation artery of that importance could not be cut without serious results to our whole industrial system.

The Present Task of Law Enforcement

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

ADDRESS BY J. EDGAR HOOVER, DIRECTOR OF THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, before the forty-seventh annual convention, International Association of Chiefs of Police, Milwaukee, Wis., September 9, 1940:

THE PRESENT TASK OF LAW ENFORCEMENT

The annual conferences of the International Association of Chiefs of Police are typical of democracy at its best. Here we who represent law enforcement convene to determine how best we can meet the challenges that lie ahead. Since our last meeting the days have been filled with problems of importance and with difficulties that have at times seemed overwhelming. The future will present even greater emergencies, which will test our utmost ingenuity and our energy.

In recent months the world's complexion has materially changed. Nations of men once free have been cruelly crushed under a heel of might. Green fields have been reddened with freedom's blood and proud landmarks have been reduced to ashes. Transcending a vast expanse of ocean, the hostilities of the Old World have disturbed our own peaceful shores.

Today America has become the battleground of foreign agents. They spin their webs of alien philosophies to ensnare America, and in darkness weave insidious plans to scuttle our national defense. To counter and attack these vicious forces is the present task of law enforcement. Never have we had such responsibilities or opportunities. By protecting the rights of the citizens of this Nation we are preserving the security of America.

We of law enforcement already are aware of the potential dangers that menace every community in the land. These increased burdens on law enforcement produce an open invitation to the underworld to plunder and destroy. However, the threats of the underworld are of little consequence today compared to the threats of subverters who are bent on undermining and weakening our Nation, leaving it vulnerable to open attack.

There is no difference between the ruthless dictator of the criminal underworld and the high-handed political dictator of the upper world. Both deal in avarice, in greed, in lust for power, in mass murder, and in blood purges. We in America believe that prison or the electric chair is the place for such menaces to civilization. If we would protect America, we must determine that no group of espionage agents or subverters and no coalition of paid anti-American propagandists shall sway us from our American way of life.

Long before the present threat to our national security, law enforcement began to place its house in order. But much remains to be done. In times like these, to have widespread public cooperation, law enforcement must have widespread public confidence. When a law-enforcement officer or a public official will sell his honor and integrity to the underworld he will also sell his country's honor to a foreign agent for a price. Law enforcement cannot hope to cope with lawlessness unless it first emulates law and order.

Recently the F. B. I. was the target of widespread vituperation inspired by Communists and racketeers, aided by a few persons in both high and low places who seemingly had no desire to learn the truth. The "smear campaign" designed to discredit the F. B. I. and wreck public confidence in its mission, was planned by a group of Communist termites and furthered by their ever-willing fellow travelers and stooges. While they sought destruction, they were, of course, claiming their constitutional rights of assembly and free speech. To the credit of the American people, their malicious lies were recognized and discounted. We of the F. B. I. knew their charges were false and so did you. We of law enforcement have no love for the slimy racketeering, revolution-inciting ways of the Communist and the bundsman, and we realize that law enforcement will be maligned so long as these propaganda purveyors are allowed to revolt against our way of life.

Last September, the President of the United States designated the F. B. I. to coordinate the attack against the foreign foes within our gates. The President called upon all law enforcement to assist the F. B. I. in this task and to refer to it matters involving espionage, sabotage, subversive activities, and violations of our neutrality regulations. Never has law enforcement responded so promptly or so efficiently, and I am glad of this opportunity to thank each of you men of law enforcement for the splendid manner in which you have assisted the F. B. I. in this important task.

That there is a "fifth column" in America is an acknowledged reality; that it does menace America is an established fact; that it must be met is the determination of every decent American. A "fifth column" of destruction following in the wake of confusion, weakening the sinews of a nation and paralyzing it with fear can be met only by the Nation-wide offensive of all law enforcement. All America must determine that these foreign interlopers shall not establish themselves behind masquerading fronts.

I am happy to report that today we of law enforcement are better prepared to meet these foes than we were when America found herself embroiled in armed conflict in 1917. Obviously, the forces of the F. B. I., despite its far-flung ramifications, are relatively small compared with the job that must be done. The common task of law enforcement therefore has been to unify its efforts and coordinate its endeavors on every front. This has been achieved to an extent which has exceeded our expectations. In every locality of the Nation conferences have been held between ranking law-enforcement officials and the F. B.-I. to perfect the machinery of internal security, which today is functioning as one agency in handling complaints involving our national defense. Night and day your officers and those of the F. B. I. are quietly working in the closest cooperation in investigating complaints of activities allegedly inimical to our Nation's interests.

I always have abhorred the idea of a national police. Time after time I have pointed out that the only effective system of policing which this Nation wants and needs is a cooperative local, county, State, and Federal law enforcement. Today this is an accomplished fact, and we have done it in the American way. We recognize that the maintenance of our internal security is a joint responsibility. Together we will handle situations as they arise in a calm, impartial manner. There is need, however, for continued coordination of effort.

Unfortunately, in a few States efforts have been made by persons not fully cognizant of the magnitude and technical character of this task to create superstructures of agencies between local law enforcement and the F. B. I. to handle or direct these matters. This can never be, if our internal security is to be best served. There must be a direct and free flow of contact between all law-enforcement agencies and the F. B. I. That is why I am happy today to meet with you members of the International Association of Chiefs of Police. We of the F. B. I. want your ideas, assistance, and cooperation so that together we may better do our job. We will have frequent occasion to meet together and to utilize your facilities in our national program of protection against the activities of the "fifth column." I intend to continue to look to you for your advice and guidance and in turn the entire resources of the F. B. I. are always available to you.

The effectiveness of our efforts cannot be gauged by screaming headlines of dragnet arrests of spies, saboteurs, and subverters. Best results cannot be obtained by blatant statements of sweeping accusations against individuals or groups without legal and competent evidence to support such charges. The preservation of our internal security is too serious a task and too sacred a trust to permit it to be used as a springboard for self-seeking politicians or psychopathic publicity seekers. You know as well as I that such methods accomplish nothing except to console amateur reformers and pseudo Sherlocks. Counterespionage becomes effective only when foreign agents are placed under surveillance, their contacts observed, their methods of communication established, and sources of information ascertained and later controlled. The Nation need have no fear that professional law-enforcement officers of long experience will be moved by any emotional surges of prejudice and passion.

Complaints of espionage, sabotage, and subversive activities have been received by the thousands since the outbreak of hostilities last September. On one day alone, 2,871 complaints poured into the various F. B. I. offices throughout the Nation. The surging wave of patriotism which followed the declaration of a limited national emergency, encouraging as it is, has its dangers. Unbridled activities and loose statements of individuals investigating subversive activities are distinctly un-American, no matter how patriotic the aims. The vigilante method is distinctly contrary to American ideals of justice.

It is not necessary for our citizens to take the law in their own hands unless and until law enforcement breaks down. That, it will not do. The handling of matters dealing with espionage, sabotage, and subversive activities is a task which must be entrusted to experienced officers of law enforcement, if the desired results are to be secured. Citizens' groups could more effectively and expeditiously achieve their patriotic purposes if their energies were directed toward strengthening and supporting the law-enforcement agencies in their communities rather than in seeking to take over their duties and powers.

We of law enforcement must remember that our Nation has been formed of many different racial and national types. We must not allow misled, emotionally guided, or gossip-minded individuals to direct acts of nuisance and oppression against persons of different nationalities.

During the past war a foreign name often aroused suspicion and oppressive action. Already there have been accusations based purely upon racial backgrounds. The great masses of our people of foreign extraction repudiate and abhor the very sentiments expressed by the power-crazed demagogues who would inject into America the deadly virus of communism, nazi-ism, and fascism. The fact that America has been a melting pot is seized upon as a weakness by strategists and dictators abroad. Little do they realize the strength welded by this fuzing of peoples who love the democracy of the United States and hate the oppressions of other lands. The very fact that our ancestors sought a new life in America is proof that they would not wish to transplant here the terror and tyranny that was left behind in the Old World.

In charting our course for the future we must keep in mind that it is better to prevent than to detect. The common task of law enforcement demands not only a preparedness program but a program of prevention. I would urge every chief of police in America to immediately take steps to survey the utilities in his community. Nothing would be so devastating as the pollution of a city's water supply. The destruction of power utilities and fuel supplies could be just as demoralizing as the scream of the dive bomber. Civil defense plans are as vital as war plans. Every facility of the F. B. I. is available to assist you in this task.

We all join in the hope that our Nation will never again find itself at war. Should that time come, however, the armed services of the country can be expected to fulfill their missions. The task of law enforcement, which in reality is the first line of defense, will be to protect our country's sources of supply and the internal forces which will insure victory.

The headlines of past months have emphasized in every possible manner the vital need for training in all fields in the methods of modern warfare. All the equipment that the Nation could possibly afford would be of no practical value unless men were trained to use it effectively. Law enforcement some years ago recognized the necessity for this training in its own field. As a result, this association has played a vital role in the development of the F. B. I. National Police Academy.

The success of the academy has exceeded our fondest expectations. Its some 500 graduates have given a great impetus to widespread police-training schools in every section of the country. Our forces have become training conscious and the state of preparedness which law enforcement has reached is a justifiable source of pride to those of us who have recognized through the years the needs of West Point in law enforcement.

The F. B. I. National Police Academy has now met that need. It has already proven to be a powerful unifying force. In but little more than 5 years highly trained peace officers have returned to their home towns, constituting an encircling ring of protecting outposts. They have taken to their own departments a Nation-wide view point of present problems.

So far the major emphasis of my remarks has been directed toward internal defense from the so-called "fifth column," with its spies, saboteurs, and softeners of public morale. In other years, I have dealt with crime and its treatment. There is little difference between the conniving of the foreign foe within our gates and the filth and scheming of the criminal underworld. The methods that stopped the gangster, kidnaper, and bank robber remain the same. The formula is a simple one—superior manpower, superior equipment, and superior training.

Typical of all law enforcement, the F. B. I. has assumed more responsibilities and a greater volume of work than in any other period of our history. Yet the past year has been the most successful ever experienced—more convictions were secured; more cases were handled; greater services were rendered to you men of law enforcement through the Identification Division, the Crime Laboratory, the F. B. I. National Police Academy, and through training activities. Beyond these tangible achievements lies the fact that law enforcement is still a good investment for the taxpayers' money. During the past year for every $1 which was spent on the regular work of the F. B. I. over $8 were returned to the taxpayers in fines, savings, and the recovery of stolen property.

Naturally, I am proud of the record of the F. B. I. You, too, share in this pride, because the F. B. I. is your central service agency, and it symbolizes your own accomplishments. You have helped us to achieve, as I hope we have helped you. And at this time I extend to you and your associates my heartfelt appreciation for the splendid response you have given our every request. While offering our thanks, we continue to offer our services.

The enjoyable reflection on past attainments should serve as an inspiration for greater achievements in the future. We must press on to make America secure for our men, women, and children. But first we must make it unsafe for all spies, saboteurs, enemy agents, Communists, bundists, and the entire breed of hellish conspirators who have been spawned in the fetid swamps of European hate.

In the present conflict, fortunately, law enforcement has powerful allies. The honest workingman and the honest employer, the true American, whether by birth or by naturalization, owes it to his Nation, to his family, and to his God to stand by the land which protects him. Such real Americans must unite in telling everybody who assails the principles upon which our country was founded that if they do not appreciate what America stands for then they should go to the lands which foster the foreign "isms" they preach. This country has no place for the subverter or for the dictator lover, no matter under what innocent-appearing guise he may masquerade his activities.

Freedom of the press, of speech, and of thought, conceived by the founders of this Nation as a vital part of this country's heritage, were intended for honest persons seeking a land of liberty, and not for crooks or dictators, spies or traitors, Communists or bundsmen. Tc these malefactors the Constitution is merely a scrap of paper, not a symbol of liberty and freedom. They use the Constitution as a shield to protect themselves while they seek to kill, plunder, and destroy our American way of life. Let us not be beguiled by their smoke screens or their perversion, too often concealed under a false front of alleged civil liberties.

As a peace-loving people we have not emphasized an effective state of preparedness. We have been lulled into an unsafe sense of security by the subtle propaganda that has been unleashed in America. As a result, our defenses, both physical and moral, have been neglected. Fortunately, now in the face of a national emergency, we are developing a real state of preparedness that will defy and overwhelm any external enemies or internal plotters who would destroy this glorious Nation.

In the past we have failed to recognize and to attack the menaces that abound. This does not apply solely to equipping armies or navies. There is not a law-enforcement agency in the land that has not felt the ax of false economy at one time or another. There are few cities in America today which have provided their police departments with adequate compensation, sufficient personnel, and modern equipment. Now is the time to build up the forces of law enforcement and put them on a basis that will enable us to meet every emergency. It is of utmost importance that every police department's personnel be raised to the maximum quota in order that it may properly assist the F. B. I. in dealing with "fifth column" activities.

In surveying the advances of our profession we can take pride in the thought that today we are united. Inspired by the sacredness of a common task, law enforcement presents a solid phalanx of courage and integrity ready, if need be, to stop at no sacrifice to carry out our assignment of protecting America. I am certain that in this national emergency the country can feel safe in the knowledge that its internal defenses are manned by these gallant, skilled, self-sacrificing, patriotic law-enforcement officers, trained in modern methods and vitalized by the spirit that has made America great—the spirit that will continue to make our America endure and conquer every foe from within or without. We dedicate ourselves to this task.

Selective Compulsory Military Training

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

STATEMENT OF MILLARD W. RICE, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE REPRESENTATIVE, VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, much valuable information on the question of compulsory military training can be found in the printed hearings of the House Committee on Military Affairs.

For the benefit of the Members of the House, I am inserting herewith the statement made by Millard W. Rice, national legislative representative, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, before the House Committee on Military Affairs on Tuesday, August 6, 1940.

Mr. Rice is acknowledged as a close student of military affairs and an authority on problems confronting the veterans of the country.

The following statement clearly portrays the position of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States on the question of compulsory military training:

STATEMENT OF MILLARD W. RICE, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE REPRESENTATIVE, VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. We will now hear from the national legislative representative of that militant organization, the Veterans of Foreign Wars. Mr. Rice, will you come forward and make your statement in your own way?

Mr. RICE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House Committee on Military Affairs, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, commonly called the V. F. W., is, as you gentlemen know, a congressionally chartered organization, composed of American citizens who have had active campaign-badge service in some war, campaign, or expedition in which the United States has been engaged.

Inasmuch as most of its members are former front-line fighting men, who have served overseas or in hostile waters, in the United States Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, during some war, campaign, or expedition in which the United States has been engaged, the V. F. W. has long been insisting that adequate preparation for war is the best preventive against war.

To that end, the V. F. W. has, during all of its more than 40 years of existence, been insisting—by periodic pertinent articles and editorials in its national publication, Foreign Service; by numerous local and Nation-wide radio addresses by its local, department, and national officers and by speeches on the part of its many local department and national officers before gatherings of various organizations and associations—that our Nation was in need of many more men and much more modernized munitions and mechanized motorized matériel, in order to be sure to be able to protect America against any possible aggressive force.

During each of the last several years, Congress has provided for increased appropriations for the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard; there has therefore been a gradual, although apparently too slow, increase in the number of trained men in each of these branches of the armed forces of the United States, and in the incidental equipment, armament, munitions, guns, airplanes, and combatant vessels now so badly needed.

During the last several months this process of expanding our armed forces, both as to men and as to matériel, has been very much speeded up, and will, and should, continue to be speeded up as much as possible until brought up to the strength deemed necessary to guarantee our Nation's defense.

At the fortieth annual national encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States last year several resolutions were adopted calling for "an expanded Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, as well as National Guard, C. M. T. C., R. O. T. C., and Reserve Corps, amply equipped with scientifically developed modernized, mechanized, motorized matériel, sufficient to protect America against any possible aggressive force."

In order that this committee may be advised of the specific terms of the resolutions adopted by our last national encampment, directly related to the question of national defense, I should like to insert in the record at this point copies of three of such resolutions, as follows:

"Whereas the Veterans of Foreign Wars has during the past several years been vigorously advocating specific increases in trained men and modernized, mechanized, motorized matériel for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, and for the National Guard, the Citizens' Military Training Corps, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the various Reserve corps, by liberalized authorizations and appropriations to that end, with the conviction that effective preparedness for war is the best preparedness against war; and

"Whereas the authorizations and appropriations for national-defense purposes have each year since 1933 substantially liberalized and added to, responsive to the specific suggestions of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, so that appropriations for the United States armed forces for the current fiscal year are about four times as much as was appropriated for the year 1933 and greater than for any fiscal year during time of peace, for which the President and the Congress of the United States are deserving of the sincere gratitude of the American people; and

"Whereas lack of adequate military training was the reason for the useless sacrifice of the lives of many of the youth of America during our Nation's participation in the World War: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the Fortieth Naticnal Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we do hereby reaffirm our advocacy of an expanded Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, as well as an expanded National Guard, with C. M. T. C., R. O. T. C., and Reserve Corps, with scientifically developed and modernized, mechanized, motorized matériel and equipment, arms and ammunition, ships and airplanes, and other material, as may be considered desirable and feasible by our national committees on national defense and legislation.

"Resolved by the Fortieth National Encampment, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, That we give unanimous endorsement to a strong national defense program for the United States and one that will be capable of meeting on equal terms the armed forces of any other nation or combination of nations that may ever threaten the security of our shores or the principles of the Monroe Doctrine: And, be it further

"Resolved, That we favor such expenditures as may be necessary for the upbuilding of our national-defense system, including air forces and naval strength, to sufficient proportions to give the United States the balance of power in any dispute that may arise between our country and any other country that may be inclined to question America's position in the Western Hemisphere.

"Whereas the world is in a political and economic turmoil, with powerful nations prepared to take by force what they may want, in a world in which war has been present almost continuously during the 20 years since the World War, and when treaties and solemn compacts no longer bind their signatories; and

"Whereas, we view with approval the efforts of this Nation in the last year—

"1. To maintain its peace and safety in a troubled world.

"2. To build its Navy to a strength sufficient to protect our shores and our outlying bases against every possible aggressor.

"3. To increase its strength in the air of the Navy and Army to a size to combat successfully the air fleets that could be brought against us.

"4. To increase the Regular Army and the National Guard to provide an initial protective force of 400,000 to provide for our national protection without delay, and to equip those forces with the best and latest arms, transportation, and equipment.

"5. To provide for the training of the Organized Reserves, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the citizens military training camps, so as to produce a civilian army of maximum strength to support the initial force when necessary and to plan for the manufacture and delivery of modern supplies when needed.

"Whereas, we as veterans oppose war here and elsewhere now and forever, but as veterans we recognize that preparedness for emergency is the only remaining means to maintain peace for our prosperous and glorious Nation; Now therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the fortieth national encampment, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, approves and supports a program for national security adequate to preserve and defend the Republic of the United States of America from all enemies whomsoever."

We, of the V. F. W., do not pretend to be experts in determining the relative strength of the various branches of our armed forces which might be deemed sufficient "to preserve and defend the Republic of the United States of America from all enemies whomsoever."

Maintaining and defending the policies of the Monroe Doctrine constitute an important factor in the defense of the United States.

Having decided that the defense of our own country depends upon our ability, in cooperation with other American countries, to defend all of the Americas against any invasion or aggression by any non-American country, or combination of non-American countries, we consider it to be the task primarily of the Army and Navy Departments to decide just how many trained men we need in each of the several branches of the armed forces, and just what kind, and how much of each kind, of equipment and matériel may be necessary in order to be able successfully to defend America against any possible aggressive action.

The successive recommendations of the War Department and of the Navy Department, as transmitted to the Congress by the President, requesting the enactment of increasing authorizations and appropriations to provide more men and more materiel for national-defense purposes, have been promptly complied with by Congress during the last several months.

It is certain that by becoming adequately prepared to defend the Western Hemisphere we can very much reduce the possibility that any nation will decide to conduct any aggressive action against any part of the Americas.

Those of us who had the experience of front-line service in our Nation's armed forces during the first World War well know the terrible human cost of unpreparedness. Many of the lives of America's youth were snuffed out and thousands of them were wounded needlessly, during the World War, because of their inadequate training and because of the Nation's lack of adequate preparation for war.

We of the V. F. W. well know the cost of the human aftermath of war. We want, if possible, to avoid the necessity for our country becoming involved in war, but if the ruthless actions of other nations should make it necessary for us to become involved in war, then we most certainly want our country, and its young men—the potential veterans of future wars—to be well prepared.

By adequate preparations for war, we not only decrease the probability of becoming involved in war, but, in the event that war should come, we would thereby considerably have lessened the loss of lives and of limbs of our front-line defenders.

In order to reduce the probability of becoming involved in war, and in order to reduce the human aftermath of any such possible future war, the V. F. W. has long been advocating the adoption of a program of adequate preparedness—militarily, industrially, and financially.

Because we have believed that the morale of the men behind the gun is a very important factor in an adequate national defense, we have sought to secure the enactment of legislation to provide adequate pensions for those who may have become injured or disabled by reason of their active service in the armed forces of the United States, and for the dependents of those who may have died by reason of disabilities incurred in such service.

Because we believe that a sense of equitable treatment tends to increase the morale of men actively serving, or who might be inspired to serve, in our armed forces, we have sought the enactment of legislation to provide the same wages, at the same grades, and the same opportunities for promotion, for men in the Army as have long been available for men who serve in the Navy.

Hearings were held last April before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs concerning a bill so providing, namely S. 2224. We pointed out to such committee that it did not seem at all fair that a young man who might otherwise be prompted to enlist to serve in one of the armed forces of the Nation has had the opportunity of enlisting for a 3-year period in the Marine Corps or in the Army, at the low pay of only $21 per month—with the prospects that 95 percent so serving would remain at that pay grade during such 3-year enlistment—whereas had they gone in the Navy their income would be increased from $21 to $36 per month, after 3 months of service, and whereas had they decided to go into the Civilian Conservation Corps they could have enlisted for a 6-month period at a salary of $30 per month.

The enactment of S. 2224, to equalize the pay of enlisted men of the Army with the pay of the enlisted men of the Navy, was urged before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs several weeks prior to the first request for emergency appropriations for national-defense purposes, but has not yet been acted upon because the Bureau of the Budget has requested that action be deferred until next year. We see no reason for postponement of such an important subject.

The last national encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, by a resolution calling for "detailed plans for effective mobilization of men and money, labor and industry, in the event of war," certainly thereby gave its stamp of approval to selective conscription of manpower during time of war.

No resolution was considered by the last national encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, however, as to whether or not there should be selective conscription for training and service in the armed forces of the United States during time of peace. In the event that the required number of men cannot be secured on a voluntary basis for enlistment in the armed forces of the United States, for strictly national-defense purposes, then it would seem that if a national encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars were confronted with such situation that it would seriously consider a resolution calling for selective conscription of the manpower of the Nation for training and service in the various armed forces of the United States for needed national-defense purposes.

Our commander in chief, Otis N. Brown, personally has indicated his conviction that the Nation should immediately adopt the principle of selective conscription of manpower for training and service in our armed forces. Various other national officers have indicated their concurrence with that principle.

As the national legislative representative of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, I am not authorized to commit the organization to any proposition essentially different than that authorized by resolutions adopted at its last national encampment. The War and Navy Departments are in the best position to know how many trained men we need in our armed forces. Their representatives have expressed the opinion that selective conscription is necessary in order to have a sufficient number of trained men adequately to maintain our national defense. Therefore, we of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, not being in possession of all of the facts, cannot disagree as to the need for a selective conscription law.

In the event of the enactment of a conscription law, however, we believe that adequate protection should be extended to those conscripted by providing that (1) any such conscripted man who may have been a governmental employee shall be guaranteed reinstatement to his previous governmental position; (2) just as much protection as can constitutionally be granted should be extended as to seniority in and reinstatement to any private employment of any conscriptee; (3) adequate apportionments and allowances should be provided for the dependents of those who may be conscripted; and (4) the same protection, privileges, rights, and benefits should specifically be provided for those who serve or have served in the armed forces of the United States, under any such conscription law, as if they had actively served in the Regular Army or Navy—in other words, such conscripted men should be entitled to the same protection and rights as to insurance, hospitalization, domiciliary care, civil-service preferences, and pension in the event of service-incurred disability, and their dependents should be entitled to the same pensions in the event of death by reason of service-incurred disability, as if such men had served actively in the Regular Army.

It would seem that credit for previous service in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, or the National Guard or R. O. T. C. ought to be given to those whose names might be selected for conscription, in determining the period of additional training and service to be rendered under the contemplated conscription.

It would seem also that present uncertainties and opposition concerning this bill might be in large part eliminated if there should be a specific provision for the establishment of certain classes of prospective conscriptees under the bill, with priority for the call of certain classes, as compared with certain others, during time of peace, and for certain additional classes, in the order of their priority, during time of war.

It would also seem that after such conscription system shall have brought a sufficiently large enlisted Reserve Corps, then thereafter every young man, physically fit, sometime between the ages of 18 and 23, should be required to give 1 year of his life to the active military or naval service of his country, with appropriate credit given for such military or naval training as he may have received in one of the reserve components, such as the National Guard or the R. O. T. C. Such requirement for universal military training of all young men would soon establish a large enlisted Reserve Corps, which could be called into active service in the event of war. Military training should be made available, if not also compulsory, for all physically fit young men in all high schools and colleges insofar as constitutionally possible.

At its last national encampment the V. F. W. adopted a resolution offering the cooperation of all of its units and all of its members during any time of national emergency. We still stand ready so to serve. No stone should be left unturned, no steps should fail to be taken, no law should fail to be enacted which might help to increase the morale of the men who serve, or must serve, in our armed forces, to increase the productiveness of our industry, and speedily to equip our armed forces amply with all types of scientifically developed matériel which might in any way contribute toward the effectiveness of the defense of the Americas and our own national defense.

I thank you for the privilege of submitting this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you, Mr. Rice, for the constructive suggestions which you have submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, gentlemen, we will go ahead. General Shedd, will you come around, please, sir?

General SHEDD. Yes, sir.

Alabama Heard From on the Poll Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MOBILE (ALA.) POST

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Mobile Post, of Mobile, Ala. This is but another evidence of the interest that is being aroused on this subject. The editorial follows:

[From the Mobile (Ala.) Post]

TO ABOLISH POLL TAXES

A petition to bring the anti-poll-tax bill to the floor of the House of Representatives was laid on the Speaker's desk by Congressman LEE E. GEYER (Democrat, California). When signed by 218 Members of the House the petition will make the Geyer anti-poll-tax bill, H. R. 7534, a special order of business.

Prohibiting the requirement of the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting at Federal elections, H. R. 7534 was introduced in the House on August 5, 1939. The bill was referred to a subcommittee of the Judiciary and under the chairmanship of FRANCIS B. WALTERS (Democrat, Pennsylvania) hearings were held in March, April, and May of this year.

The Geyer anti-poll-tax bill would make it illegal to require payment of a poll tax in connection with the election of President, Vice President, and Members of Congress. In eight Southern States payment of such a tax is a prerequisite for voting: Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

"Largely because of the poll tax," said Mr. Geyer, "75 percent of the adult citizens in those States are denied access to the ballot. The amount of tax varies from $1 to $2.50 per year, but in some of the poll-tax States it is cumulative. In other words, if a voter fails to pay his tax for 1 year, he must pay 2 years' tax at the next election, and so on. A Georgian who has not paid his poll tax for 7 years will have to pay $15.50 to vote. In Alabama his bill may run as high as $36.

"In many sections of the eight poll-tax States hundreds of thousands of shapecroppers, tenant farmers, and city workers have been disfranchised because their low incomes do not permit them to buy the right to vote."

In the 1936 Presidential election an average of 66 percent of the adult citizens in the 40 non-poll-tax States voted while the averages in the poll tax suffrage States in that same election was as follows:

Alabama, 20 percent; Arkansas, 19 percent; Georgia, 20 percent; Mississippi, 16 percent; South Carolina, 14 percent; Tennessee, 33 percent; Virginia, 26 percent; Texas, 26 percent.

Organizations supporting the anti-poll-tax bill include: American Federation of Labor, Congress of Industrial Organizations, Young Women's Christian Association, Southern Conference for Human Welfare, Descendants of the American Revolution, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, railway brotherhoods, and other labor, civic, and progressive associations.

The Dutch East Indies Adrift

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

ARTICLE FROM FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under authority granted to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I submit an article entitled "The Dutch East Indies Adrift," by Mr. Rupert Emerson, which appeared in the July issue of Foreign Affairs, an American quarterly review, volume 18, No. 4, pages 735–41. Mr. Emerson is an associate professor of government in Harvard University and has been recently appointed Director of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions in the United States Department of the Interior. Mr. Emerson is also author of the book, Malaysia: a Study in Direct and Indirect Rule, and other publications.

The article by Mr. Rupert Emerson follows:

[From Foreign Affairs for July 1940]

THE DUTCH EAST INDIES ADRIFT

(By Rupert Emerson)

The German invasion of Holland and the flight of Queen Wilhelmina's government have thrown the Dutch East Indies largely on their own devices. Indeed, as these lines are written there are indications that the center of Dutch economic and financial life is being transferred to the Indies. For instance, leading Netherlands banks and shipping companies are reported to have removed their headquarters to Batavia. Likewise, in the political sphere, the Indies are becoming the center of Dutch power. The Governor General, Jonkheer Tjarda van Starkenborgh Stachouwer, has been empowered to act on his own authority, if necessary. The question therefore arises as to whether the East Indies will be able to survive as a Dutch possession. The answer to this question depends on such important factors as the economic and strategic value of the islands, the state of their defenses, and the policy which the United States would adopt toward any aggression against them!

On April 16, 1940, the Indies found, to their dismay, that they had become the object of those assurances of good will and disinterestedness which have come to be the first harbingers of imminent "protection" and destruction. On that day Mr. Arita, the Foreign Minister of Japan, stated in the veiled but significant language of diplomacy that because of economic and other considerations "the Japanese Government cannot but be deeply concerned over any development accompanying the aggravation of the war in Europe that may affect the status quo of the Netherlands East Indies." This declaration came 2 months after Japan's denunciation of her arbitration treaty with the Netherlands, an act which Tokyo officially described as having no political importance, being merely a routine gesture preparatory to the negotiation of a new treaty. To Mr. Arita's statement the American Secretary of State replied on the following day (April 17) that "intervention in the domestic affairs of the Netherlands Indies or any alteration of their status quo by other than peaceful processes would be prejudicial to the cause of stability, peace, and security, not only in the region of the Netherlands Indies but in the entire Pacific area." The German invasion of the Netherlands early in May immediately brought forth from Mr. Arita a further assertion that Japan would not permit the Indies to change hands. Another official declaration was made in Washington reiterating the statement of April 17, and the American Battle Fleet was kept in Hawaii for "further tactical exercises."

Economically, strategically, and politically the Netherlands Indies occupy a position of striking importance. The bare figures are in themselves impressive. With a land area of 734,000 square miles, the islands are some five times as large as Japan proper. They stretch, as Mr. Hull pointed out, "for a distance of approximately 3,200 miles east and west astride of the Equator, from the Indian Ocean on the west far into the Pacific Ocean on the east." At the last census (1930) the rapidly growing population totaled nearly 61,000,000; at present 70,000,000 would be more nearly correct. About two-thirds of this number is crowded into Java, though that island accounts for little more than one-fifteenth of the Indies' total area. The outer islands are relatively underpopulated and undeveloped except for occasional tracts such as the great rubber and tobacco region on the east coast of Sumatra. The mass of the people are of the Malay race and predominantly Mohammedan in religion; but there are 1,233,000 Chinese and 240,000 persons in the official category of "European," which includes Americans, Japanese, and a large proportion of Hollanders of mixed blood. The Japanese and Formosans in 1930 numbered just over 7,000, and the more recent migration figures indicate no marked increase. The number of Germans appears to be slightly under 7,000; late reports from Batavia indicate that all of them over 16 have been interned.

Holland's East Indian empire constitutes the richest colonial plum in the world. It produces rubber, tin, petroleum, sugar, coffee, tea, tobacco, copra, palm oil, and a host of other commodities, agricultural and mineral. Contrary to popular belief, most of the world's colonial areas are not great producers of essential raw materials; the Indies, however, are an exception, although even they lack certain types of coal as well as iron and cotton. Until the impact of the depression became seriously felt, the Indies concentrated almost exclusively upon the production of raw materials and foodstuffs for export, as well as of certain foodstuffs (notably rice) for local consumption; only to a limited degree were raw materials given a preliminary processing. The crushing effect of the depression on the islands can be seen in the catastrophic decline in the value of their exports from 1,488,000,000 guilders in 1929 to 493,000,000 in 1933 (by 1939 the figure had risen to 740,000,000). Of late there has been a marked swing in the direction of a planned industrialization in order to relieve unemployment, raise living standards, and reduce the Indies dependence on the world's industrial markets, thereby eliminating some of the causes for economic instability in the islands. Plans already being carried out include the creation of a chemical industry and the construction of plants for manufacturing aluminum, for melting scrap iron, and for the production of aviation gasoline; in addition, many smaller native and local industries are being encouraged.

The United States is the world's largest consumer of rubber and tin; it also holds considerable investments in the islands, particularly in rubber plantations and in oil. We cannot, therefore, be indifferent to the fate of the Indies. (Incidentally, the neighboring territory of British Malaya is the world's largest single producer of rubber and tin, and any change in the status of the Dutch islands must inevitably have drastic repercussions on Malayan economy.) The total direct American purchases in the Indies in 1938 came to $68,800,000 and in 1939 to $93,000,000; but it is very difficult to assess our actual dependence on East Indian supplies because of the large quantities which are transshipped to us via European and Malayan ports. In 1939 the Dutch islands produced 372,000 tons of rubber (35 percent of the world total) as against 376,000 tons for Malaya, and 31,280 long tons of tin (17 percent of the world total). The United States needs large quantities of tin and rubber, not only for its normal peacetime industries such as automobile manufacturing, but for its present greatly expanded defense preparations. At least nine-tenths of the rubber and tin we consume comes from the Indies and the nearby British territories. Another important American import from the Indies is quinine, of which the Dutch produce 90 percent of the world's supply.

Neither Britain nor France depends very much upon the products of the Dutch Indies since their own colonial empires provide for most of their needs. Although in the statistics the British Empire showed as the destination of one-third of the Indies' total exports in 1938, approximately half of this figure represented goods sent to Singapore for distribution to other countries, including Japan and the United States. Great Britain and Eire took about 5 percent of the exports of the islands, and Australia, whose connections with the Indies have in recent years become increasingly important, accounted for over 4 percent. These figures do not, however, adequately reflect the close collaboration that has grown up between the British and the Dutch Empires in the East. It is, in fact, scarcely too much to say that since 1816, when the British returned Java to Holland, the Indies have depended for their protection primarily upon the British Navy. The British have also invested heavily in the islands; for instance, the Royal Dutch Shell has sunk a large amount of capital in the oil fields there. Territorially, too, the connections are close; many small Dutch islands are within sight of Singapore with its great naval base, and the whole northern part of Borneo is in British hands. Australia has a vital strategic interest in the fate of the Indies in general, and a particular interest in New Guinea, of which it controls the eastern half. One of the maxims of Australian foreign policy is that no aggressive power must be allowed to gain a foothold on New Guinea. The Dutch are now engaged in hastily developing their half of the island in order to forestall outside encroachments.

In 1938, Germany's purchases in the East Indies amounted to 23,725,000 guilders, or 3.62 percent of the island's total exports. (The purchases of France amounted to 11,200,000 guilders.) Germany has found the Indies a valuable source of rubber, copra, fibers, and other tropical produce; and a considerable number of Germans have entered not only into the economic life of the islands but also into the Dutch administrative and military services.

Japan's interest in Netherlands India is naturally very great. Besides being a major consumer of its rubber and tin, she has a peculiarly vital concern in its growing petroleum production. Since no detailed Japanese figures as to either petroleum or mineral imports have been published since July 1937, and since Dutch export figures are not very relevant because of the large transshipments made through Singapore, it is impossible to estimate with any precision the extent of Japan's reliance on East Indian oil. It is obvious, however, that in case Japan should be cut off from American and British supplies, the wells in the nearby Indies would prove invaluable to her. The Indies stand fifth among the world's petroleum producers. Their 1939 output was 61,580,000 barrels, the largest in their history. The principal oil-producing region is on the east coast of Borneo, although the production of this field has been declining in recent years while that of southern Sumatra has been growing. According to recent reports, the new wells being bored by the Netherlands New Guinea Petroleum Co., in which both American and British capital is represented, have not yielded promising results. It is generally believed that the producing oil wells have been mined and would be promptly destroyed in case of a Japanese attack. The German experience in Rumania during the World War appears to indicate that this would impede Japanese utilization of the wells for a considerable, and perhaps crucial, period. New refining plants for the production of aviation gasoline are just coming into operation; the first one, near Palembang in Sumatra, began producing on March 2.

As a market the Indies are less important than as a source of raw materials, primarily because of the very low purchasing power of the mass of the people. However, for Japan's low-cost producers of cheap textiles and other commodities they offer attractive inducements in a world of shrinking and increasingly protected markets. A few years ago the Japanese share in the imports of the Indies skyrocketed upward at the expense largely of Dutch and British importers; but this trend was checked abruptly by the imposition of tariffs and quotas primarily aimed at Japan. More recently the internal strains developed in Japan by the "China incident" have seriously impaired her ability to compete in the islands. The Japanese doubtless feel that Holland has unfairly deprived them of a market which they regard as an integral part of that far eastern economy in which they believe themselves to be the major partners. The Dutch, on the other hand, complain that the failure of Japanese purchases in the Indies to keep pace with the flood of Japanese exports to them has been one of the chief causes for the disequilibrium in the islands' economy.

In 1939 Japan sold to the Indies goods worth 85,108,000 guilders, while she bought from them goods valued at only 24,788,000 guilders. Of Japan's total exports in 1939, only 3.9 percent went to the Dutch possessions, and of her total imports only 3.3 percent came from them directly. The Japanese Government has manifested its determination to continue drawing on the raw materials of the East Indies in the same proportions as before Holland was invaded. Both the Dutch and British Governments have assured Tokyo that they will not interfere with Japanese trade in the Indies.

The Japanese authorities have at no time given any overt indication of a desire to assume political control over the Dutch islands, although there are a number of unofficial statements which point in that direction. They have, however, regularly expressed their deep interest in strengthening economic ties. Japan's Foreign Minister declared to the Diet early this year that "With regard to the South Seas regions, the Japanese Government is desirous of maintaining with them a relationship of coexistence and coprosperity through economic cooperation and collaboration in the development of natural resources. We intend to put forth every effort along this line toward enhancing the existing close relation between Japan and those regions." The Dutch, for their part, have shown themselves eager to maintain friendly relations with Japan and to avoid any gestures which might be interpreted as hostile. They have come to find, however, that Japan's ideas as to what constitutes "cooperation and collaboration" overreach the limits of acceptable friendship. This has been especially obvious in Japan's efforts to secure opportunities for settlement and exploitation in New Guinea, which lies less than 500 miles from Japanese mandated islands. For many years Dutch New Guinea has been rife with reports of Japanese espionage, of Japanese fishing vessels far from legitimate fishing grounds, and of Japanese plantations with excellent sites for gun emplacements and landing fields.

Strategically and politically the Indies are extremely important because of the commanding position which they occupy at the crossroads of sea and air routes between Europe, the Far East, and Australasia. For the British Empire, and for Australia and New Zealand in particular, it is of the utmost importance that these islands remain in friendly hands. Were Netherlands India to pass to a hostile power, Britain would find it very difficult to retain Singapore and Hong Kong and to maintain free communications with her Pacific dominions and with China. Much the same can be said for France in connection with Indochina and her Pacific islands. As for the United States, it is concerned in several ways with the political fate of the East Indies. There is our interest in maintaining the balance of power in the Pacific. There is also our interest in keeping open the sources from which we obtain much of our rubber and tin. Above all, there is our interest in the Philippines. Manila may be some 1,800 miles by air from Batavia, but the Dutch islands northeast of Borneo are almost within sight of Mindanao. The Japanese now control all the islands to the east of the Philippines (except Guam); Formosa has been theirs for nearly half a century; they are said to be fortifying the island of Hainan; and they are now occupying the Spratly Islands in the China Sea. If the Dutch East Indies should pass into Japanese hands—and with them perhaps the British possessions on the north coast of Borneo—the Philippines would be completely surrounded.

From an economic point of view, the United States might not in the long run lose heavily from a Japanese occupation of the East Indies. Except for petroleum Japan could absorb only a fraction of the islands' vast production, which would still have to be disposed of on the world market—where the United States would remain by far the best and most available customer. Control over these supplies would, however, give Japan a strong economic and political weapon for compelling concessions from the United States, and in the short run this weapon might prove of great importance. Despite our ambitious projects for stock piling and our barter agreement with Great Britain, we have as yet accumulated very limited reserves of either rubber or tin. It is estimated that the present supplies of both commodities in this country would not last for more than 3 or 4 months at the normal rate of consumption. The extent of our anxieties in this direction is indicated by the fact that imports of rubber since the beginning of December 1939 have been the heaviest in history. In case the United States should become involved in the war, we would doubtless resort, as in the days of the Stevenson restriction scheme, to an extensive use of scrap rubber. There are also possibilities for making synthetic rubber in the United States and for increasing natural rubber production under American auspices in Central and South America. But neither of these sources has yet been developed to a point where it could fill immediate and pressing needs. In the case of tin, we could obtain a large part of what we need from Bolivia.

Turning to the question of defense, it must be admitted at the outset that for various reasons, including the rapidly changing techniques of warfare, only a very tentative estimate is possible. Even the strength of the Japanese Navy is a matter of surmise, though there is no doubt that Japan has a large preponderance over any other power in far eastern waters. The serious plight of Britain and France offers little hope that any substantial part of their naval or air forces could come to the aid of the Dutch islands. Presumably, neither the British nor the French have any capital ships in the Far East at the present time. Just prior to the outbreak of the European war, the British admiralty reported four of its cruisers in Chinese waters, with a fifth expected and three more cruisers on the East Indies station; to this must be added the six Australian cruisers and the two of New Zealand. Only the American Navy remains as a possible challenge to Japan, and it has been accepted by American naval opinion that operations in waters relatively close to the Japanese bases and shielded in part by the Japanese mandated islands would be extremely difficult and hazardous. The fortifications and bases of the Philippines and Guam are quite inadequate for the main American fleet, which would therefore have to base on Pearl Harbor, some 7,000 miles from Batavia.

The scanty but mobile defense forces of the Indies themselves could cause an attacking force great annoyance but could probably not put up resistance for any considerable time. The Dutch have been keenly aware of their exposed position in the Indies ever since Japan's invasion of Manchuria; yet they appear to have taken no very substantial steps to increase their defense forces in the islands. The Army is estimated to number 50,000 (representing roughly a ratio of 4 natives to 1 European), although somewhat larger reserve forces are undoubtedly available. According to late reports, the Dutch Navy in the Indies consists of 2 cruisers of 7,000 tons, 1 of 6,000 tons, 2 smaller ones of 3,500 tons, 12 destroyers, 18 submarines and a number of light auxiliary vessels. In recent years the Dutch have built up a fleet of seaplanes, many of them purchased in the United States; used as a scouting and bombing force these planes would prove invaluable in holding the narrow straits against invasion. It must, however, be kept in mind that the islands are scattered over a vast area and that the Japanese would therefore find no great difficulty in landing on such outlying islands as Borneo or New Guinea. Against this possibility must be balanced the fact that the distances from Japan to the Indies are great—from Yokohama to Borneo is some 2,400 miles—and that Japanese shipping is already heavily occupied in keeping essential supplies moving to Japan and to the Japanese-occupied parts of China. For Japan to strike far to the south would be to open herself, if not to war with the United States, at least to the sharp curtailment of her vital trade with North America and with the British and French Empires. And, of course, she would be exposing her flank to Soviet pressure, exerted either indirectly through Nationalist China or directly on Manchukuo. As these lines are written, there are reports that Japan is trying to extricate herself as gracefully as possible from China and to reach an understanding with the totalitarian powers with the object of exploiting to the full the present dire straits of the western powers. Should these reports turn out to be true, the situation of the Dutch East Indies would, indeed, become precarious.

What the attitude of the native peoples in the Indies would be in face of a Japanese attack is difficult to say. The nationalist movement is strong and no great love is lost for the Dutch rulers. However, relations between the nationalist leaders and Japan have not, it appears, been close. Japanese imperialism is something the East Indians have no desire to experience. Yet, on the other hand, they also lose no love for the Chinese, who control much of the islands' economic life. The East Indians are hence watching the progress of the present war in China with mixed emotions. Some of them feel that a Chinese victory, resulting in a much strengthened and unified China, would represent an even greater danger for the East Indies than a Japanese victory.

St. Paul's Cathedral of London

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES OF SEPTEMBER 13, 1940

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, today is Friday the 13th, a day looked upon to be of evil omen. This day is such and one, for the people of a great city wait with feinted breath the approach which seems to be inevitable. A missile of death in the form of a time bomb is said to be lying within the sacred precincts in one of the most famous cathedrals in the world, St. Paul's of London. The place occupied by this great cathedral in the history of the people it has served has been most beautifully described in the appended editorial which appeared in the New York Times today. The destruction of St. Paul's was predicted over 100 years ago by Macaulay when, in one of his famous reviews, he said:

She (the Roman Catholic Church) may still exist in undiminished vigor when some traveler from New Zealand shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's.

[From the New York Times of September 13, 1940]

For more than 200 years the dome of St. Paul's has floated serenely above the roofs of London. It has been many things to many generations of men. To some it has meant enduring strength; to others, who have seen it bathed in moonlight, soaring so lightly over the steeples near by, it has been a miracle of grace. To all in London it has been more personal than any church in the world. It was called the parish church of the Empire, because Londoners turned to it instinctively at deeply felt moments of national joy or sorrow. Streams of history flowed down its aisles; the tombs of heroes, of Nelson and Kitchener and Lawrence of Arabia, lay in its keeping.

What the Campanile is to Venice or St. Peter's to Rome, St. Paul's has been to London. It dominated the city's skyline from the river, from the huddled streets around it, from the distant hills on north and south. Londoners loved it so much that they felt, sometimes, it might not always be there. Nearly a hundred years ago Macaulay wrote of the New Zealander of the future who would stand on London Bridge and see the ruins of St. Paul's. Fifteen years ago the vibration of traffic endangered it, and a fund was raised so that the cathedral could be straightened and preserved. Now a delayed-action bomb has fallen in its churchyard; more than one bomb has exploded so near it that its sooty stones have trembled. Londoners now lift their eyes from the streets of death and destruction and look again at the dome that has meant so much to them, for they know they may never see it again.

Yet St. Paul's has been destroyed and rebuilt many times since Roman sentries stood on Ludgate Hill. There was a St. Paul's on the same spot hundreds of years before the first stones of Westminster Abbey were laid. There was an old, old St. Paul's that crashed in dust and ashes in the great fire of 1666; the masterpiece of today rose from its ruins. The end of this St. Paul's tragic and sickening as it would be, would not mean the end of London. There are more irreparable disasters than the loss of a dozen famous churches, of a hundred treasure houses of history. The supreme issue of this hour is not whether the shell of London can be preserved; it is whether the living spirit of free men and women can be saved, a spirit that has been passed on from one generation to another for hundreds of years, a civilization that lives in the hearts and souls of millions in England and across the seas. As long as the spirit of London remains unconquerable there can be a new St. Paul's. As long as the men and women of England can keep the flame alive within them there will be hope for a new and better world, no matter how much fire and death may rain down upon them.

Electric Power Rates in Wisconsin

OF

HON. CHARLES HAWKS, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

LETTER FROM C. M. JANSKY, OF MADISON, WIS., TO HON. JOHN E. RANKIN, OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter recently addressed to Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN by Mr. C. M. Jansky, of Madison, Wis.:

MADISON, WIS., August 26, 1940.

Representative JOHN E. RANKIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: "Totius autem injustitiae nulla capitalior est, quam eorum qui tum, cum maxime fallunt, id agunt ut viri boni esse videantur."—Cicero.

Cicero was right when he said that of all wrong, there is none more heinous than that of those, when they deceive us most grossly, so do it as to seem good men. Deceit is iniquitous no matter whether it is practiced by utility promoters, stock salesmen, self-seeking politicians, or a governmental agency. Deceit is deceit no matter what the circumstances.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 1 are some figures, inserted by you, which purport to prove that the customers of private electrical utilities "are paying tribute, an indemnity, if you please, to the organized juggernaut known as the Power Trust, etc." You also ask the "people of every State to analyze these figures" knowing full well that very few have either the facilities, data, or ability for such an analysis, and few know that the T. V. A. costs cited by you as a standard of comparison are a pure guess or estimate at best. T. V. A.'s total income last year was $14,850,000, and hence there is no way of determining what the total cost of the energy consumed in the United States at T. V. A.'s rates to the ultimate consumer would be. But that is not of any great consequence. A much more serious matter is the inaccuracy of your figures and the false implications of them.

Congressman BENDER, of Ohio, conclusively showed the falsity of your claims, and as his devastating refutation of the falsity of your charge that privately owned utilities overcharge their customers by more than a billion dollars has had no effect on your propaganda, I am not so naive as to think that accurate figures will have any more effect. Nevertheless, some readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may acquire a better understanding of the utility controversy, and especially of your unverified and unverifiable propaganda. This letter, therefore, deals only with your propaganda as it relates to the utilities of Wisconsin.

In the article mentioned above, you say that all consumers of electrical energy in Wisconsin in 1938 paid $49,483,978 for the energy they used, and that this was an overcharge of $20,858,242, if T. V. A.'s rates are used as standard. I wonder where you got these figures. The facts as given in the Wisconsin Public Service Commission's preliminary report are as follows:

Private electric utilities

Operating revenues:
Sales to ultimate consumers	$46,707,000
Sales to other electric utilities	5,721,000
Miscellaneous revenues	1,237,000
Total operating revenues	53,665,000

As costs to ultimate consumers are the issue, it is evident that your figures are approximately $3,000,000 too high, or, to be exact, $2,776,978 too high. Furthermore, according to the same report for 1938, the operating expenses of the private utilities were:

Operating expenses, excluding depreciation	$20,910,000
Depreciation	6,510,000
Total deductions	36,597,000

As it is impossible to allocate these deductions between sales to ultimate consumers and other revenues, let's subtract them from the total operating revenues. When we do this we find that the utilities operating income was $17,068,000. It would be interesting to learn how an operating income of $17,000,000 can be stretched into an overcharge of over $20,000,000. Perhaps an item of nearly $4,000,000 means nothing according to New Deal arithmetic.

You further state that the overcharge of $20,858,242 is "in addition to all operating expenses and reasonable returns on legitimate investments." Please note carefully that no "reasonable returns" are included in the total revenue deductions. They must, therefore, come out of the $17,000,000 remaining. As the legitimate investment, not assets, in the property and plants of the private utilities is approximately $300,000,000, the average return on legitimate investment is less than 6 percent. One wonders by what process of hocus pocus these legitimate returns can be swelled into an overcharge of more than $26,000,000. See your reply to Congressman JOHN C. SCHAFER, of Wisconsin, in the July 3 issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

All the above discussion is based on the assumption that your standard of comparison, namely, T. V. A.'s rates, is valid and legitimate. But an examination of this standard discloses that it is spurious and false. I cannot readily compare the distributions of the revenues of all of the private utilities in Wisconsin with like distribution of revenues of T. V. A., but such a comparison between the distribution of the earnings of three outstanding private utilities with those of T. V. A. is very instructive.

Distribution of each $100 of revenue

	Madison Gas & Electric Co.	Wisconsin Power & Light Co.	Wisconsin Electric Power Co.	Tennessee Valley Authority
Operating expense	$46.14	$35.97	$39.65	Not disclosed.
Taxes	18.79	18.28	19.05	$5.
Depreciation	11.10	12.81	12.05	None.
Interest on debt	5.60	17.13	13.00	Do.
Dividends and surplus	18.38	15.81	16.25	None disclosed.

The interest on T. V. A.'s indebtedness is paid by the taxpayers whose money has been sunk in the project and not by the beneficiaries of the development. T. V. A. has no stockholders other than the taxpayers who get neither interest nor dividends on their involuntary investments in the Tennessee Valley.

The above table shows conclusively that the so-called T. V. A. "yardstick" does not contain the same elements as do the privately owned utility rates. In short, that it is a spurious measuring rod. But there is still more conclusive evidence.

In the last fiscal year, the revenue of T. V. A. was $14,850,000. As no one seems to know exactly how much money has been spent on T. V. A.'s projects a reasonable estimate is 350 to 400 million dollars. Interest on these sums at only 3 percent is 10.5 to 12 million dollars. If to the last sum is added 10 percent of the revenues for taxes, the sum is approximately equal to the total income and nothing remains for operation. I know that T. V. A. has allocated only $182,040,672 to electric power. The taxpayers, however, are paying interest on all the moneys spent, and not merely on a part. But if we take the smaller sum and calculate legitimate fixed costs, we discover that T. V. A. is not earning even these. The fixed charges of the three private companies listed above range from 12 to 15 percent of the cost of their property and plant. The New York Power Authority, a municipal ownership advocate, estimates that 11.5 percent of the value of the plant is a reasonable fixed charge. Let's take 10 percent, which is lower than either. Ten percent of the allocated costs of T. V. A. to power is almost $4,000,000 greater than its total revenue. How can a rate that does not yield fixed costs be a "yardstick"?

But there is more evidence that T. V. A.'s rates have no relation to costs of development and hence that they are a spurious "yardstick." Perhaps the most cogent is the following:

"When the power program of the Tennessee Valley Authority was still in its infancy, a group of men sat down in a cottage on a Madison lake, jerked off their neckties, rolled up their sleeves, and went to work.

"The result of their labors was the electric-rate schedule under which T. V. A. power is sold retail and which has hit the nail almost squarely on the head as far as average rate is concerned. The group aimed at an average rate of about 2 cents a kilowatt-hour; the average under T. V. A. is approximately 2.1 cents" (from an interview with David Lilienthal as printed in the Wisconsin State Journal, Aug. 17, 1936).

Perhaps that statement needs no comment, but as T. V. A.'s rates were established long before the costs were known, they obviously could not be expected to yield a revenue to cover all the costs. Their sole, or main, function was to undersell the private utilities in the Tennessee Valley. If the rates had been based on the costs of the development, they would have been so high that T. V. A. would have died aborning.

Apparently municipal and Government ownership advocates think that if the subsidized rates of T. V. A. are lower than the average of the privately owned utilities, they have proved the superiority of governmental ownership. Obviously if such logic is correct, then it follows that if only one privately owned utility has lower rates than T. V. A., the superiority of private ownership is indubitably demonstrated.

As evidence of the superiority of private ownership over governmental ownership according to the foregoing logic, I submit my last electric bill for 168 kilowatt-hours. You will notice that this bill is for $3.62. The same consumption in Tupelo would cost $3.86, which is 24 cents, or nearly 7 percent, higher. Lest anyone think this is an exceptional case, I respectfully refer them to the following table, which shows the relative costs of specific consumptions in Madison, Wis., and Tupelo, Miss. Column I shows the costs with taxes included, and column II shows the relative costs when the taxes paid by the Madison Gas & Electric Co. and T. V. A. are deducted. The electrical division of the local company last year paid 20.5 percent of its gross revenues in taxes. The 18.79 percent given in the preceding table is for both the gas and electric divisions.

Relative costs of specific consumptions of electrical energy in Madison and Tupelo, at domestic rates

Consumption in kilowatt-hours	Madison		Tupelo
	I	II	I	II
15	$0.90	$0.72	$0.75	$0.71
25	1.10	.88	.75	.71
50	1.60	1.28	1.50	1.40
75	2.10	1.68	2.00	1.90
100	2.60	2.08	2.50	2.38
150	3.36	2.68	3.50	3.35
200	4.10	3.28	4.50	4.28
250	4.85	3.88	5.00	4.75
300	5.60	4.48	5.50	5.23
400	7.10	5.68	6.50	6.17

The table shows conclusively that the net revenue of the local company from domestic consumers is less than that of T. V. A. Ergo, the proposition is demonstrated. I may add, however, that the local company is a subsidiary of a holding company, the bete noire of demagogic politicians.

I do not claim that all private utilities can reduce their rates to the level of those of the Madison Gas & Electric Co. I merely cite these facts to show that the taxpayer-subsidized T. V. A. is by no means the paragon of excellence you insist it is. The Madison Gas & Electric Co. is advantageously located but it is not subsidized nor does it, according to T. V. A. rates, overcharge its customers.

The Wisconsin Power & Light Co., a subsidiary of an Insull holding company, however, serves 330 communities and their adjacent rural areas located in 31 counties of the State. Two hundred and five of these communities had previously no electric service and 24 had only part-time service. Furthermore, the company was one of the pioneers in rural electrification, which it began long before the Government thought of subsidizing—at taxpayers' expense—such service. It now serves 16,511 rural customers. (See Trans A. I. E. E., vol. XLV, 1926, p. 511.) Obviously under such different conditions the rates cannot be as low as those of the subsidized T. V. A. or of the local utility.

As far back as 1935 you also inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some figures purporting to prove that Wisconsin utilities were overcharging their customers by $17,893,000. You stated that the people of Wisconsin in 1934 consumed 1,888,207,000 kilowatt-hours, for which they paid $37,026,063. Instead of citing the Tacoma, Wash., municipal utility as a standard of comparison, I wonder why you do not go north some 22 miles and cite the Seattle utility as a paragon of excellence. It, too, is a municipal utility. At that time the average revenue of the Seattle municipal utility was 1.977 cents per kilowatt-hour. If you will take the trouble to multiply the consumption in Wisconsin, as given by you, by 1.977, you will discover that the cost in Seattle would have been some $300,000 more than the figures you gave. You neglected, however, to mention the fact that the Wisconsin utilities paid many more millions in taxes than would have been paid by the Seattle utility. Again, I ask, where is the overcharge?

But even that is not all the evidence confounding your unwarranted attacks on private ownership. In the annual report of T. V. A. for 1935 we find:

"The new power generation facilities provided by Norris Dam and the increase in power output from downstream plants made possible by Norris Reservoir storage are of unquestioned value to national defense since in an emergency unusual power demands for expanded munitions manufacture at Muscle Shoals must be met immediately."

Unless the reports in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are false, the T. V. A. recently was given by Congress $25,000,000 toward an ultimate construction cost of $65,000,000 to provide power for the present emergency. Obviously the statement in the report is wholly misleading, to say the least.

But when you are driven from the protection of the T. V. A. post you immediately seek shelter under the Tacoma pillar, for in your reply to Senator BRIDGES you say:

"I am going to use the Tacoma, Wash., rates to make my comparisons for the reason that the opposition is constantly bringing up the argument that these overcharges are absorbed by the taxes paid by private companies."

The seeking of shelter under the Tacoma pillar instead of demonstrating the error of your opponents, is a tacit confession that your contention cannot be defended. The untenability of your shelter under the Tacoma rates was demonstrated by Congressman BENDER, but it may not be amiss to correct or to point out some discrepancies between your figures and the figures in the official reports of the Tacoma utility.

The official reports of the utility show that in 1936 the revenue from sales of electricity was $2,359,964.91, and the taxes paid, including gratuitous work, were $272,935.16, which, according to the accountant's calculation, was 11.57 percent of the gross revenue and not 16 percent.

In 1938 the like revenue of the Tacoma utility was $2,473,734.27, and the taxes amounted to $280,418.70, which, the report says, is 11.34 percent of the gross revenue. Believe it or not.

The 1938 report further shows that the value of the plant and equipment of the Tacoma electric utility was $24,429,241.93. This is more than twice the value of the local utility which last year paid $472,738.12. On the basis of plant values, the Tacoma utility should have paid over $800,000 in taxes, and on the basis of earnings it should have paid over $500,000 and not merely $280,000.

If as already stated it is conceded that 10 percent of the depreciated value of the plant and equipment is a fair charge for fixed expenses, then the earnings of Tacoma lack $132,000 to meet the fixed charges and operating expenses. How can the Tacoma rates be made the standard of comparison?

I am not criticizing the citizens of Tacoma for the manner in which they conduct their utility. If they do not desire the utility to earn taxes, interest on the investment, fixed charges, and other expenses, that is their affair. But these charges must be paid by a private utility from earnings as it cannot charge them to the taxpayers. A private utility must earn fixed charges and operating expenses at least if it wishes to stay in business.

As already stated, I wonder why municipal and public ownership advocates think that their case is proved if they can show that one outstanding municipal utility has lower rates than the average rates of all the private utilities in the country. Such a comparison proves nothing as already shown. A much fairer comparison is that made between the average costs to ultimate consumers of both the municipal utilities and privately owned utilities of the whole country. Such a comparison has been made by the Bureau of the Census of the Department of Commerce. According to press release of May 15, 1939 (second series, Elp. 1), in 1937 the private utilities paid 14 percent of their gross revenues in taxes whereas the municipal utilities paid only 1.5 percent of their gross revenues in taxes. But, mirabile dictu, the same report shows that the average selling price to the ultimate consumers was 2.6 cents for the municipals and 2.1 cents per kilowatt-hour for the privately owned utilities. If the percent of gross revenue paid by the private utilities had been only 1.5, the comparative rates could have been 2.6 and 1.84 cents, respectively. On the other hand, if the private utilities had charged the same average rate as did the municipals, the customers of the private utilities would have paid $915,000,000 more than they did. That is, on the assumption that they paid only 1.5 percent of their gross revenues in taxes. See press release, Bureau of Census (third series, Elp. 1), May 23, 1939.

Previously I stated that the Wisconsin Power & Light Co. is a subsidiary of a holding company formed by Samuel Insull, the red herring of public-ownership advocates. It seems to me that that herring should be consigned to the garbage can if those who constantly drag it across the trail wish to avoid its disagreeable odor.

I make no defense of any crime or fraud that Insull may have committed. If he defrauded anyone, it was not the consumers of electric utilities, but the purchasers of his engraved paper. If in these transactions he committed fraud, he should have been punished, but if fraud was committed, the Government was derelict in the performance of one of its most fundamental functions, namely, the protection of the innocent from such fraudulent transactions. It is not the function of government to emulate Insull. What do I mean? Simply this: Every purchaser of Insull's engraved paper did so of his or her own free will; persuaded he may have been, but he was not forced. Legally there is a difference between the Government's action and that of Insull, but will you please explain the moral difference between Insull's squandering of his stockholders' money, which he obtained by persuasion, perhaps, and the Government's squandering of the taxpayers' money, which it extracts from their pockets forcibly? The money is wasted in either case, and I can see no moral difference. The Constitution of the United States does not authorize the Government to go into a proprietary business such as the electric utility business. The Supreme Court of the United States has not declared the power projects of T. V. A. to be constitutional; it has merely declared that the 18 protesting private utilities had no standing in court. It requires more than a mere ipse dixit to prove that the function of government is to provide the people with electricity. If so, it should also provide them with food, clothes, gasoline for their cars, etc., because all of these are more essential to existence than electricity. Therefore the money wasted by the Government in the "write offs" for navigation, in the many navigation projects on inland rivers, the money wasted in Passamaquoddy power project, the Florida Canal, the Nebraska district power projects, the proposed waste for joining the Tombigbee and the Tennessee Rivers under the pretense that this was for national defense, the proposed expenditures for the so-called De Soto expositions, etc., stand on no higher moral plane than the waste of the stockholders' money by Insull. In fact, if Insull had attempted to sell so-called securities on many of the projects I have mentioned he would have been prosecuted for fraud. How, therefore, does an act that if committed by a private individual is a fraud become an act of statesmanship when committed by the Government? Please explain.

Lastly, the most important aspect of the controversy over the cost of privately and publicly produced electricity is not whether the one or the other can sell it the more cheaply. The issue is much more fundamental and important to the future well-being of the country than that. The fundamental issue is between some form of statism and free enterprise. It is the entering wedge between private enterprise and liberty, and some form of State-controlled enterprise and destruction of liberty. With the destruction of private and free enterprise, liberty will be destroyed. Free enterprise is the genesis of liberty and not its product.

There is no enterprise or business more the product of man's initiative, resourcefulness, courage, and self-reliance than the electric utilities. Private enterprise, inventive ingenuity, and skill assisted by private capital produced the generator and all the other electrical apparatus associated with it. Private initiative and ingenuity has made it possible to generate electricity more cheaply by steam than by water. Private research has reduced the consumption of coal per kilowatt-hour from 5 to 7 pounds to less than 1 pound, and the end has not been reached. That is conservation of natural resources par excellence. Governments have contributed nothing to these developments. Electricity is beyond comparison the product of man's endeavors; much more so than the wool in the coat that one wears. The fundamental issue is, Shall all the private resourcefulness, courage, initiative, enterprise, and ingenuity that have contributed so much to the comfort and well-being of man, and that have made possible discoveries and explorations in other fields of inestimable benefits, be stifled by the dead hand of government and political rule? Governments seldom if ever create; they merely appropriate or pirate what has been created by private individuals.

Yours truly,

C. M. JANSKY.

The Poll Tax

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

LETTER FROM SCIPIO JONES AND RESOLUTION OF THE SOUTHWEST REGIONAL CONVENTION

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a letter and a resolution. This is but another example of the ardent desire among the people of the South to have the poll tax as a requirement for voting abolished. The letter and resolution follow:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., August 23, 1940.

Congressman GEYER,

Congressional Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am enclosing herein a copy of the resolution that was unanimously adopted by the Southwest regional convention, at the time and place mentioned in the resolution.

I chanced to be in the convention hall at the time the resolution was requested and adopted by the officials of the Southwest regional convention, to see that you receive a copy of the resolution expressing their deep appreciation for the valuable services you are rendering to the disfranchised citizens in different States and to find out if there is any way in which they can assist you in bringing about the enactment of your poll-tax bill.

This organization represents a federation of women's clubs. Mrs. Robert R. Moton is its president (nat.onal), and its headquarters, as I understand, is the Frederick Douglass Home in Washington, D. C. This body is composed principally of women who purchased the Frederick Douglass Home for consideration of several thousands of dollars.

From newspaper reports, it seems that you are fighting the battle of others alone and single-handed, and this club is anxious to help in any way it can.

Very truly yours,

SCIPIO A. JONES.

Whereas Congressman GEYER of California has introduced a bill in Congress to make it a felony to refuse to let a citizen vote unless he has paid his poll tax, and is urging the enactment of such bill: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Southwest Regional Convention, composed of the following States: California, Colorado, Arizona, Arkansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana, Nevada, and Utah, now assembled at Muskogee, Okla., go on record in endorsing Mr. GEYER's patriotism and expressing to him their deep appreciation for his unselfish service in behalf of the disfranchised citizens for the States aforesaid and other States.

Unanimously adopted this 21st day of August 1940.

ANNIE B. GILLAM,
President, Little Rock, Ark.
WOXIE WEAVER KING,
Secretary, Muskogee, Okla.

Contracts and Allocations for the Construction of Naval Vessels

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL VINSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

MEMORANDUM PREPARED BY THE BUREAU OF SHIPS OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a memorandum prepared for me by the Bureau of Ships in the Navy Department showing the contracts and allocations made for the construction of naval vessels on September 9, 1940.

With the allocation of these ships all combatant tonnage authorized by Congress has been placed under construction.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF SHIPS,
Washington.

Memorandum for Mr. VINSON:

1. Contracts and allocations made for construction of 201 naval vessels—total value

Newport News Ship Building & Dry Dock Co., 4 aircraft carriers and 2 cruisers	$307,301,000
Bethlehem Steel Co.—Fore River Plant, 4 aircraft carriers and 6 cruisers	450,666,000
Union Plant, 4 cruisers and 18 destroyers	290,974,000
San Pedro Plant, 6 destroyers	65,764,000
St. Island Plant, 10 destroyers	105,132,000
New York Shipbuilding Corporation, 10 cruisers	544,875,200
Federal Shipbuilding & Drydock Co., 5 cruisers and 17 destroyers	310,634,445
Seattle Tacoma Shipbuilding Co., 20 destroyers	206,582,415
Consolidated Steel Corporation, 12 destroyers	128,280,912
Bath Iron Works, 11 destroyers	112,070,200
Electric Boat Co., 25 submarines	145,440,000
Manitowoc Shipbuilding Co., 10 submarines	61,021,000
Los Angeles Shipbuilding & Drydock Co., 1 repair ship	18,168,500
Gulf Shipbuilding Corporation, 4 destroyers	43,836,000
New York Navy Yard, 2 battleships	240,000,000
Philadelphia Navy Yard, 3 battleships	330,000,000
Norfolk Navy Yard, 2 battleships	210,000,000
Boston Navy Yard, 6 destroyers	60,000,000
Charleston Navy Yard, 5 destroyers	50,000,000
Puget Sound Navy Yard, 6 destroyers	60,000,000
Portsmouth Navy Yard, 6 submarines	36,000,000
Mare Island Navy Yard, 2 submarines	12,000,000
Total contracts and allocations	3,788,745,672

2. These prices include armor and armament and Government-furnished material and are corrected to date.

3. In addition to the above ship awards, award was made on 24 sets of submarine-propelling machinery to the General Motors Corporation at $19,800,000; 11 sets of submarine-propelling machinery to the Fairbanks-Morse Co. at $10,307,088; and 8 sets of submarine-propelling machinery to the Hooven-Owens-Rentschler Corporation for $7,617,048; total for the submarine-propelling machinery of $37,274,136.

4. The amount for this propelling machinery is included in the cost of construction of submarines as given in the ship table awarded to the Electric Boat Co., the Manitowoc Shipbuilding Co., for the Portsmouth and Mare Island Navy Yards.

Endorses President Roosevelt for a Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS OF MAYOR LAGUARDIA, OF NEW YORK

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix an address delivered last evening by Mayor Fiorello H. LaGuardia, of New York, endorsing President Roosevelt for a third term.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAGUARDIA'S ADDRESS ENDORSING ROOSEVELT

In a democracy, citizens are called upon at stated intervals to select from amongst themselves the men to whom they will entrust the affairs of government. In a true democracy, the country accepts the choice of the majority. Full discussion of the issues and of personalities of the campaign is helpful.

I shall support the candidacy of Franklin D. Roosevelt for President. Time on the radio was provided through mutual friends, by the National Democratic Committee. I shall not support all the Democratic candidates on local tickets. I will join with other independents and progressives throughout the country in this campaign in bringing support to the candidacy of President Roosevelt. The Honorable GEORGE W. NORRIS, the outstanding leader of all of us independents and progressives, has consented to serve as honorary chairman of an independent committee for Roosevelt.

I belong to no party. I do not like politicians. I want nothing from either party. I do love my country. I am concerned and worried over world conditions and our relations to them. I know that President Roosevelt's foreign policy and his preparedness plan are the only hope of keeping our country out of war. I enthusiastically approve of the social-welfare program of the New Deal. I prefer Roosevelt with his known faults to Mr. Willkie with his unknown virtues.

Government administration is a science; it cannot be learned overnight. In these perilous times there can be no time lost in getting "the feel of things" by a new administration or "time out" for breaking in a new Cabinet.

RECALLS BANK CLOSINGS

I cannot forget the condition of the country prior to 1933. I was then a Member of Congress and knew of the general distress throughout our land, which reached a complete collapse in the early part of 1933 with the closing of banks, business at a standstill, factories closed, and distress everywhere. No President in our history ever took office with greater problems to solve or the country in a more deplorable condition. President Roosevelt met the situation, and with a program daring and courageous restored the confidence of the people in their Government. He immediately put the banks on relief and saved the deposits of industry, the savings of the thrifty, and the money of the investors.

Since that time there has been a constant development of a social welfare program, the like of which has never taken place in our history. Breadlines and soup kitchens were eliminated and work provided for millions of unemployed.

Not only were millions of citizens given employment but every State, county, city, town, and village was enriched by the fruits of such labor. The self-respect and dignity of these American families were maintained.

The frugal, thrifty people had their confidence restored in the banks when they saw the sign, "Deposits in this bank are insured by the United States Government." Often we had attempted to pass a bank-deposit insurance law previous to the Roosevelt administration only to have it defeated year after year.

SAYS MAYORS WERE FRANTIC

Every mayor in this country became frantic at the distressed appeal of the finest type of our citizens—the owners of their own little homes, who saw their years of savings wiped out by the cruel grasp of a mortgage foreclosure. Along came the Roosevelt Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and hundreds of thousands of homes were saved.

For years we had known of the problem of superannuated workers. No State was able to carry this burden itself. Now we have as a permanent policy of government an old age pension system which has permanently removed the horror of the poorhouse from millions of our older fellow citizens. Along with it we have Federal aid to States for the care of dependent children, maintaining the family rather than institutional life. The tin cup has been taken from the unfortunate blind and provisions have been made to partially compensate for the handicap of their terrible affliction.

While temporary work was being provided for the unemployed, a scientific, national system of unemployment insurance has been started.

Since the Roosevelt administration the farmers have seen the difference between interest in their cause translated into legislation and help and campaign promises turned into Presidential vetoes. How chagrined Senator MCNARY must feel. How embarrassing it must be for him to profess his party's friendship for the farmer after having so often felt the sting of a veto from his own party's President.

NO CLAIM OF ORIGINALITY

No claim of originality is made for any of these social-welfare measures. Every one of them has been a subject of study for years. But not until President Roosevelt courageously sponsored these measures and put his now historic "must" on these bills, were they enacted into law.

It takes years to perfect the administration of such measures as unemployment insurance and labor relations. That is true not only of social-welfare laws but it is true of any innovation in our system of government. It took a generation to get a railroad regulation functioning properly, through the agency of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Federal Reserve bank made many mistakes in the early days of its creation.

We realized at the time of the enactment of social- and economic-security laws that it would take time and experience for perfection and smooth administration.

I do not undervalue the President's opponent. He is a brilliant executive of a utility holding company. If I were a bondholder in the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation, interested only in the dividends of my holdings, and were I to choose between Mr. Roosevelt as the president of this utility company or Mr. Willkie, I would cast my vote for Mr. Willkie. I do not believe that President Roosevelt, with his concern for the American people, with his keen desire to make their homes comfortable and happy, with his determination to bring cheap electric rates all over the country, would make a good president of a utility company, who must necessarily soak consumers to make profits for his bondholders.

The experience of the two men in power companies has been quite different. Mr. Willkie has been engaged mostly in the financial structure natural to a holding company. Mr. Roosevelt has been engaged in the building of great power plants operated for service. Mr. Roosevelt has been turning the mighty wheels of the turbine. Mr. Willkie has been watching the little wheels of the stock ticker.

REFERS TO TAMMANY

Mr. Willkie has had no experience in government. He has had considerable experience in politics. He served his apprenticeship in the Democratic machine of Ohio and obtained his master's degree in Tammany Hall when he was handed a certificate of election to the Tammany county committee. I do not like Tammany Hall. I have licked Tammany time and time again, and shall continue to do so in the future. No one is forced to join Tammany Hall. Prior to my administration it was expedient for businessmen to do so.

Now let me tell you the difference between a member of the Tammany machine and a real Democrat. In 1936—the last Presidential year—there were 2,289,213 enrolled Democrats in New York City. At least 1,700,000 of them are not members of Tammany Hall. They are the same fine type of Democrats that are found all over our country. In addition to the 2,289,213 Democrats in New York City in 1936, there were 413,527 enrolled Republicans. Over 300,000 are not members of Republican organization clubs. They are the same kind of fine type of Republicans found in the mid- and far-West. These nonorganization Republicans and Democrats are the people who have established good government in New York City. These nonorganization Democrats are the people who supported Grover Cleveland and Woodrow Wilson.

In New York City, Democrats voluntarily choose Tammany by joining the local organization club. That is exactly what Mr. Wendell Willkie did.

Tammany also has its county committee. One must be a regular Tammany organization man to be selected for this county committee, for there is no minority there. Mr. Willkie became a member of the Tammany county committee. The Tammany county committee is composed partly of those high in Tammany circles or of those low in the social strata. Utility men are rarely innocent of politics. They know their politicians.

RECALLS ROOSEVELT FIGHT

Mr. Roosevelt entered politics as a Democrat and not as a Tammanyite. He won his spurs as a member of the New York State Senate by fighting Tammany Hall and successfully preventing the Tammany, railroad, and utility interests from sending their man to the United States Senate.

President Roosevelt during the last 7 years has brought about a great change in our Uncle Sam. He is no longer the stern old uncle interested only in diplomacy, rivers and harbors, and interstate commerce. We now have a rejuvenated Uncle Sam, smiling and friendly, concerned with the welfare and happiness of every home in the land. He is no longer a distant, strange figure in Washington. He is in every State, county, city, and town. He is concerned in keeping families together and a roof over their heads. He is tearing down slums and tenements and building sanitary and cheerful homes. He is concerned with boys and girls being able to continue in high school and to go to college, through the assistance of the National Youth Administration. He wants to live in peace but will not permit anyone to trample on our rights or destroy our democratic institutions. Roosevelt has regenerated our country. Roosevelt has made America the hope of the world.

That is why I am for President Roosevelt. That is why children throughout our land each night, when lisping their "Now I lay me down to sleep," add "God bless America."

Conscription—a Golden Opportunity for Americanism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. GIBSON

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 13 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

STATEMENT PREPARED BY A CONSTITUENT

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by a young man of my State, dealing with the subject Conscription—a Golden Opportunity for Americanism.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the face of all arguments, that conscription is contrary to Democratic principles and the American way, it is my profound belief that conscription is a golden opportunity for democracy and the furtherance of Americanism.

It is necessary to recognize the fact that our conscripted army is not going to be involved in any conflict outside of the Americas. The statements of the foremost military men of both Britain and the United States support this fact. Such men make the unqualified statement that the British Empire has already supplied all of the men that the British Isles can quarter and that many more are all ready to be transported there whenever the need for them is imminent. Having granted this fact, we may now proceed to proving the golden opportunity which rests in the conscription of our young men.

First, a democracy is defined as being government directly by the people collectively, that is the entire mass of the people working together as a body and cooperatively producing the rules and laws under which they will live and do business with one another.

It has long been recognized and stated as a fact by the foremost psychologists and economists that the troubles of the Nation are directly attributable to the factions which have sprung up. These factions, by trying to further their own particular aims without regard to the aims of the Nation as a whole, are continually opening breaches in the cooperation of the people toward common ends.

Conscription will tend to dispell the causes of these branches: First, the young men who are the backbone of the Nation for the next generation will be drawn together for a common purpose, that purpose being to learn how to best serve and protect the Nation as an entire unit from any enemy attempting to conquer it from the outside. They will learn that any objective must be attained by the concentrated cooperative action of the whole body and not by individual small groups seeking self-aggrandizement. Also, they will learn that all men, shorn of their factional colors, are the same fundamentally and naturally drawn together in attaining a common purpose.

The fact that conscription works equally in all directions and upon all classes and conditions of men will necessarily gather representative members of all factions together. They will then have to plan together, in open discussion, their common problems in a common cause. This in itself will provide closer bonds between the factions which were discussed above and in turn bind the Nation closer together.

Another fact which has long been before the eyes of the Nation is that the people as a whole do not exercise their right of participation in this great Government. The cure has often been stated as political education, teaching the people what their rights, as well as their duties, are in maintaining the rights and privileges granted them under the Constitution. When at any other time and under other conditions will an opportunity as great as that afforded by conscription be presented to teach the people of the United States the working fundamentals of their Government?

It is my fond hope that the training program of conscripts, Reservists, and the Regular military forces will include at least a half hour every drill day devoted to the teaching of democracy, its meaning and its relationship to every citizen. I feel that this teaching will tend to remove a majority of the obstacles which confront the smooth operation of "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," and will again make us "resolve that such government shall not perish from the earth."

Sugar-Beet Farming in United States Contributes One-third of a Billion Dollars to Our National Income, So Why Strangle it?

REMARKS

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have had prepared by the Department of Agriculture, Triple A, Sugar Division, a statement showing the returns to sugar-beet growers from processors and from the Federal Government for all purposes, covering the seven crops from 1932 to 1938. This shows that the processors have paid to the growers approximately $343,500,000, and the amount paid through the sugar acts which the Congress has approved from time to time is approximately $76,500,000 for the period.

As this table contains a great deal of information interesting to consumers and producers, friends of the industry and enemies of the industry, I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

This table, Mr. Speaker, is sufficient evidence to convince any fair-minded citizen that the great sugar-beet industry of this country is worthy of an important position in the economy of this Nation. It must not be forgotten that during the past 7 years the Treasury of the United States has been called upon to furnish subsistence to millions of people who were, unfortunately, unemployed. Here is an industry, engaged in producing a nonsurplus crop or food item, which is now justifying its immortality in the economic life of this Nation. It gives employment to thousands of workers. It furnishes buying power to farmers and factory workers and those engaged in numerous industries from which the processors purchase great quantities of goods and which are consumed by the processors in the manufacturing and extracting of the sugar contained in the sugar beets and in its preparation for the consuming market. Such major supplies consist of cotton bags, coal, coke, limestone, rubber goods, machinery parts, transportation services by the railroads and trucking companies, automobile parts and repairs for the vast number of trucks used by the farmers and the manufacturing branch of the industry. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this is a great industry that furnishes employment for a vast army of our civilian population. It contributes greatly toward supplying our people with one of our principal food items which is so necessary in peacetime and in war. It gives us independence from foreign countries and protects the purses of our people against the exploitation of sugar producers doing business in foreign lands. It contributes to the standard of living of our people who reside in the sugar-beet areas and adds to our national income. Any domestic activity which adds one-third of a billion dollars to our farmers' income is worth protecting and perpetuating. Why strangle it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The table referred to follows:

Domestic sugar-beet growers—Returns from processors and Federal Government for all purposes covering 7 crops, 1932–38

[1] Covering gross disbursements to growers under the Jones-Costigan Act and the Sugar Act of 1937, before deducting county association expense and after deducting in 1937 and 1938 the reduction in large-scale payments to growers whose "commercially recoverable sugar" exceeded 500 short tons, raw value.

[2] Payments (excluding those with respect to acreage abandonment and crop deficiency) under Jones-Costigan Act and Sugar Act of 1937; does not include agricultural conservation-program payments.

[3] Although average payments were as indicated, participating producers received approximately 40 cents per ton.

[4] As shown in the explanation for column (16), these averages were derived by dividing the total returns from all sources and for all purposes (column 8) by total production (column 1), but it should be remembered that abandonment and deficiency payments by the Federal Government were not based on actual production.

[5] Refund payment to cover reduction in returns to growers resulting from imposition of the processing tax and/or corresponding floor-stocks tax on sugar for such sugar of the 1933 crop unsold as of June 9, 1934.

SOURCE AND EXPLANATION

Column (1). From Agricultural Statistics, 1939 volume, for all crops except 1938, which is from Agricultural Marketing Service report.

Column (2). Same as column (1).

Column (3). From Sugar Division and Agricultural Adjustment Administration records; payments with respect to the 1934 and 1935 crops were made on basis of parity; payments with respect to the 1937 and 1938 crops were made at the rate of $0.60 per hundred pounds of "commercially recoverable sugar," raw basis, with graduated reductions to large producers.

Column (4). From Sugar Division and Agricultural Adjustment Administration records; payments with respect to the 1934 and 1935 crops were made at the rate of $1.75 and $1.13 per ton, respectively, on the larger of actual or normal production; because of a severe crop failure in certain areas in 1934, there was a wide disparity between actual and normal production in that year.

Column (5). Column (3) plus column (4).

Column (6). From Agricultural Adjustment Administration records showing total payment to cooperating growers; payments were made at the rate of about $0.40 per ton to those growers who complied with the provisions of the act.

Column (7). Column (5) plus column (6).

Column (8). Column (2) plus column (7).

Column (9). Column (2) plus column (3). This column shows the total amount paid on the basis of actual production by processors and the Federal Government to all growers before giving consideration to abandonment and deficiency or compliance with the provisions of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act.

Column (10). Column (9) plus column (6); explanation for this column is the same as for column (9) except that column (10) shows the total returns for actual production after giving consideration to compliance with the provisions of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act.

Column (11). Same as column (1).

Column (12). Column (3) divided by column (1).

Column (13). Column (9) divided by column (1).

Column (14). Column (6) divided by column (1); these payments, however, were made at the basic rate of about 40 cents per ton to cooperating growers.

Column (15). Column (10) divided by column (1).

Column (16). Column (8) divided by column (1).

Republicans in Congress Back Willkie

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of the minority leader, Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr.:

Edward Flynn, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, accustomed as he is to the goose-stepping in the last 8 years under President Roosevelt, cannot believe anyone can be at all independent. I do not want to cause Mr. Flynn too many sleepless nights and therefore I hasten to reassure him he needn't worry about the cooperation Wendell Willkie will get in Congress after he becomes President next January. Republicans will support his recovery and peace program wholeheartedly as will scores of honest Democrats whose hearts have ached as they have seen this country drift aimlessly the past 8 years toward bankruptcy, inflation, national insecurity, and war.

We may differ with Mr. Willkie on an amendment, but I think the country wants Congress to do some thinking of its own. That is what they expected when Congress stopped the move of Mr. Roosevelt to put a bunch of "Charlie McCarthys" on the Supreme Court bench. That was the way the people expressed themselves when Mr. Roosevelt demanded a "rubber stamp" Congress and set out to make his famous series of purges.

However, I want to assure Mr. Flynn there is no difference between Mr. Willkie and the Republican membership in Congress concerning the fundamental issues in this campaign or before the country at this time. We are opposed to breaking the traditions of this country and giving a third term to any man, and particularly to one who has failed to bring the country recovery, security, or peace.

We are in agreement with Mr. Willkie in his desire to give the country an administration which will stop the reckless joy ride toward bankruptcy. We are for Mr. Willkie in his determination to bring real security to the people by making it possible for them to have real jobs at American wages. We are for Mr. Willkie in his fight to arrest the steady march toward socialism, dictatorship, and extreme radicalism. We are for Mr. Willkie in his battle to give private enterprise a chance to live, to give the small-business man an opportunity to flourish and thereby provide millions of jobs to American workers. We are for Mr. Willkie in his effort to bring real unity to this country, the unity which is absolutely essential if we are to have a prosperous country and a contented people. The Roosevelt administration has demonstrated that it cannot do this.

Yes, we may differ, Mr. Flynn, on an amendment. This is still a free America and we want after next January to have a free Congress. You can rest assured we will give President Willkie 100 percent cooperation and support in his program to free America from the chains of bureaucracy; to free the country from communistic barnacles, to restore the Government to the people, to bring security and an abundant life to the people instead of merely handing out "applesauce" talk. To give America an opportunity to be free to breathe, free to do and free to go ahead to a finer and better country.

Resolutions Adopted at the Midwest Defense Conference in Kansas City, Mo., August 30, 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

Friday, September 13, 1940

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting herewith a list of the resolutions adopted at the Midwest defense conference, which was held in Kansas City, Mo., on August 30, 1940. Businessmen and other community leaders from the nine States of Arkansas, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, Oklahoma, and South Dakota attended this important conference, which was called for the purpose of developing cooperative methods whereby a more equitable share of the national defense orders and facilities might be located in the great inland empire represented by this nine-State area.

The following resolutions were adopted at this conference:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE MIDWEST DEFENSE CONFERENCE

The representatives of the 9 States and the more than 200 communities here assembled pledge their unqualified support to the national-defense program and their loyalty to the common welfare of our country.

Yet these States and communities are determined that, while they stand united for defense, the program shall not become the occasion of a social and economic tragedy for this region.

For these States and communities cannot but view with genuine concern the social and economic consequences of this program—necessary as it is—if in its operation it is not to be thoroughly and justly decentralized and spread over the Nation.

This nine-State area, while it has found great basic strength in agriculture, has suffered peculiarly because of the lack of an essential balance between industry and agriculture and the shutting off of markets for its products.

GOVERNMENT ADDS WEIGHT

This process has been going on for years. And now, with a sudden and tremendous expansion of industrial expenditures by the Government, we can see an industrial set-up in other areas of the country which would throw this territory more out of balance than ever.

These nine States and their hundreds of communities are resolved that they are not going to be reduced to a position of agricultural slavery.

This great middle western area is already seeing the new process at work—seeing its raw materials and its skilled labor and its great untapped reservoirs of farm boys—the very life blood on which the territory must depend in years to come—drained off into other sections for their further enrichment.

These States and their communities take the position that it is not enough to be for a decentralization of industry in principle.

EMPHASIS ON DECENTRALIZATION

The Middle West insists that in the spending of the billions, and in the allocations of new industries, decentralization shall become a fact, in processing and manufacturing, and this area shall receive its just and proper share of the outlays of public funds.

This is not a cry for "pork." It is the voice of the Middle West asking for justice—for that to which it is clearly entitled, giving each man and woman, insofar as possible, a particular job to do so that all may be busy and all will feel they have a part in the defense of America.

The Middle West today has industries that are not concentrated. They are perhaps small as individual units, but they are large in the aggregate. In addition to the allocation of new plants, the industries already in this region should be utilized.

This conference expresses its satisfaction that the f. o. b. Philadelphia on orders has been eliminated and that split bidding on orders has been established.

WOULD BREAK ALL BARRIERS

It calls for the elimination of any and all barriers that now militate against the Middle West and are obstacles to its meeting of the competition of the more centralized industrial areas on an equal basis.

Advantages of the Middle West are fully commensurate with its claims for fair recognition. They include:

1. Invulnerability against attack.
2. An adequate and easily available supply of raw materials.
3. An adequate and easily available supply of native-born, trained labor.
4. Adequate transportation facilities.
5. Adequate and easily available food supplies.
6. Abundance of fuel and power.
7. Aviation advantages, arising from strategic geographical location.
8. Industries manufacturing clothing, uniforms, and tents.
9. Industries manufacturing steel and steel products.
10. Industries producing leather goods, shoes, saddlery, and the like.
11. Adequate supplies of oil and oil products, natural gas, and coal.
12. Adequate and varied mineral supplies.

In view of all these advantages and existing supplies, the representatives of these nine States and hundreds of communities insist that before the Government undertakes the establishment of new industries, new housing, and other facilities in already congested districts it shall utilize those of the Middle West.

It is the further position of the Middle West that sound defense must have a broad foundation, and that no program of national defense can be sound or adequate unless it includes the vast resources, the industries, the materials, and the multiplied advantages of this great agricultural area; and be it finally

Resolved, That the executive committee of this conference deliver these resolutions through an appropriate committee to the President of the United States, the Advisory Council on National Defense, the Army and Navy Boards, and other proper authorities.

TO THE ADVISORY COMMISSION TO THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

Whereas 1,500 representative businessmen from the 9 Middle Western States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Nebraska, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, and Oklahoma, meeting in Kansas City on August 30, 1940, listened with close attention and patriotic interest to an explanation of the part these States may play in the rearmament program of the United States, including the splendid talk by Mr. Ralph Budd; be it now

Resolved, That the Midwest Defense Conference representing these nine States respectfully request the Advisory Commission to the Council of National Defense, and the Army and Navy of the United States, for an outlined list, including specifications, of all rearmament plants yet to be located and the requirements yet to be filled, to be sent the Midwest Defense Conference at its headquarters in the Hotel Muehlebach Building, Kansas City, Mo., and be it further

Resolved, That the Midwest Defense Conference and the several State groups that make it up, will promptly thereafter study this list, weed out those plants and items which it would be impractical to locate in this area, or fulfill here, and thereafter make presentations for the remainder in behalf of this region.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN

Whereas there is evidence of substantial misunderstanding of the nomenclature of the United States on the part of numerous agencies of the Government, including both Houses of Congress; be it

Resolved by the Midwest Defense Conference in session in Kansas City, August 30, 1940, That for purposes of the general geography in locating the rearmament industries of the country, the region between the Mississippi River and the Appalachian Mountains be hereafter referred to by its true name of the Middle West.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Whereas a great deal of unfortunate confusion has arisen as to the advisability of locating the Government's own rearmament industries in the middle of the country, as well as where the expansion of existing defense industries, now privately owned, should take place: Be it

Resolved, That the Midwest Defense Conference, composed of 1,500 representative businessmen from the 9 States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Arkansas, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, and Oklahoma, in session at Kansas City, Mo., August 30, 1940, respectfully request the President of the United States to clarify his splendid statement of several months ago regarding the strategic value of locating such industries in the interior, and that he do this in a supplemental expression to the Advisory Commission to the Council of National Defense, and to the Army and Navy planning boards, and to the press of the country, so that there may be a better understanding of what the best thought on this important subject really contemplates.

TO THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission has, upon its own motion, instituted an investigation into the basic freight-rate structure applying to, from, and between points in the general territory east of the Rocky Mountains, the proceedings being instituted under the I. C. C. Docket Nos. 28300, 28310, and MC C–150; and

Whereas, since this investigation was instituted, an emergency has arisen involving the national defense of this Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved now, That the Midwest Defense Conference, in session in Kansas City, August 30, 1940, urges the Interstate Commerce Commission to pursue its investigation with redoubled vigor and speed, so that if it is found, as this conference believes it will be found, that unfair barriers do exist because of the territorial method of freight rate making, such corrections as should be made will be made with great promptness in the interest of the national defense now, and for the future even-handed prosperity of every part of the United States.

TO THE REPRESENTATIVES AND SENATORS FROM THE NINE MIDDLE WESTERN STATES OF IOWA, KANSAS, MINNESOTA, MISSOURI, NEBRASKA, NORTH DAKOTA, SOUTH DAKOTA, OKLAHOMA, AND ARKANSAS

Whereas the Members of the House of Representatives of Congress of the nine Middle Western States of Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Oklahoma, and Arkansas have organized in Washington with the election of Representative KARL MUNDT, of South Dakota, as chairman, for the purpose of advancing the interests of this section so that the United States may rearm along sounder lines; and

Whereas the Senators of these same States have met frequently, although informally, for the same purpose: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Midwest Defense Conference, That these organizations are approved and that the Congressmen and Senators participating in them are urged to continue this activity to a successful conclusion.

TO THE ADVISORY COMMISSION TO THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

Whereas Mr. Ralph Budd, one of your members, was kind and considerate enough to travel to Kansas City, Mo., at your instance, we understand, to speak to the Midwest defense conference of 1,500 delegates representing the nine States of Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Oklahoma, and Arkansas, Friday, August 30, 1940: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That we thank you sincerely for this cooperation.

TO THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

Whereas electric power is an essential in industrial development, especially since more and more industries are becoming electrified, it is proper that careful consideration be given to our developed power resources: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Power Commission be requested to take immediate steps to survey the power situation in the great Midwest area to determine the power requirements for present and future needs for adequate industrial development and national defense in this area.

Mr. Speaker, a study of the figures revealed by national-defense orders up to date shows clearly that this nine-State area is trailing far behind the national average in the amount of business pick-up attributable to national-defense business. Since national defense is a Nation-wide program of great significance to every section of the Union and which must be financed by the taxpayers of all America, it is a highly desirable objective that the procurements involved in this program be distributed over as much of the country as possible without in any way reducing the speed, economy, and efficiency of the national-defense build-up. The very decentralization of national-defense orders and facilities is, in itself, a great step forward toward a more permanent and effective state of national industrial preparedness.

About 2 months go the Members of Congress from this nine-State area formed a group committee for the purpose of cooperating with the National Defense Council and the War Department procurement officials in calling to their attention the availability of the vast natural resources, industrial facilities, and labor reservoirs of this region. Our committee functions as a service group to facilitate the activities of the national-defense officials and is in no sense a pressure group simply trying to secure economic advantages for this nine-State empire.

Among the splendid advantages which this region offers the Government in its preparedness program are the following: Aviation advantages with great airports, favorable climate, and a network of emergency landing fields on level terrain; food at low cost for laborers and for Army units as demonstrated by the fact that as of last January this area had on hand 34 percent of the cattle and calves, 43 percent of the hogs and pigs, and 18 percent of the sheep and lambs in the United States; great facilities for manufacturing clothing, shoes, uniforms, and tents; many steel and steel products plants with easily expandible facilities; strategic location away from coast lines and all possible sources of attack; it is the most invulnerable area in America; 86 percent of the people living in this area are native-born whites; no labor group in America is freer of subversive tendencies than the labor reservoir in this region; oil and oil products are produced in vast quantities in this area and extensive pipe lines make these products readily available throughout the nine States; all three primary fuels—coal, oil, and gas—are found in abundance in this region, and many hydroelectric power potentialities are available for quick development there; great supplies of minerals highly essential in the defense program are scattered throughout the area, including bauxite, cement, zinc, lead, iron ore, and manganese; many of these can provide great stock piles in the ground instead of on top of the ground if a little stimulus is given the use of domestic, strategic, and critical minerals at this time.

Our nine-State committee has been cooperating steadily with the procurement officials in Washington, and with the officers and members of the Midwest Defense Conference, and our members stand eager and ready at all times to do everything it can, individually or collectively, to further the whole defense program of America, and to increase its permanent usefulness and effectiveness by helping to distribute its activities into this inland region where production and living costs are reasonable, and where nature adds her great influence to the protection of industries in this region from any possibility of foreign attack by air, land, or water.

The membership of our committee is as follows:

MEMBERS OF THE NINE-STATE COMMITTEE

Arkansas: E. C. Gathings, Wilbur D. Mills, Clyde T. Ellis, Fadjo Cravens, David D. Terry, W. F. Norrell, Wade H. Kitchens.

Iowa: Thomas E. Martin, William S. Jacobsen, John W. Gwynne, Henry O. Talle, Karl M. LeCompte, Robert K. Goodwin, Ben F. Jensen, Fred C. Gilchrist, Vincent F. Harrington.

Kansas: W. P. Lambertson, U. S. Guyer, Thomas D. Winter, Edward H. Rees, John M. Houston, Frank Carlson, Clifford R. Hope.

Minnesota: August H. Andresen, Elmer J. Ryan, John G. Alexander, Melvin J. Maas, Oscar Youngdahl, Harold Knutson, H. Carl Andersen, William A. Pittenger, R. T. Buckler.

Missouri: Milton A. Romjue, William L. Nelson, Richard M. Duncan, C. Jasper Bell, Joseph B. Shannon, Reuben T. Wood, Dewey Short, Clyde Williams, Clarence Cannon, Orville Zimmerman, Thomas C. Hennings, Jr., C. Arthur Anderson, John J. Cochran.

Nebraska: Hyde Sweet, Charles F. McLaughlin, Karl Stefan, Carl T. Curtis, Harry B. Coffee.

North Dakota: Usher L. Burdick, William Lemke.

Oklahoma: Wesley E. Disney, Jack Nichols, Wilburn Cartwright, Lyle H. Boren, Mike Monroney, Jed Johnson, Sam C. Massingale, Phil Ferguson, Will Rogers.

South Dakota: Karl E. Mundt, Francis H. Case.

Speech Nominating Speaker William B. Bankhead for the Vice Presidency

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD, OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by me in seconding the nomination of Speaker WILLIAM B.

BANKHEAD, of Alabama, for the Vice Presidency of the United States, delivered at the National Democratic Convention in Chicago, July 20, 1940:

Mr. Chairman, and ladies and gentlemen of this great Democratic convention, in the limited time which I have, it is impossible for me to tell you of the many accomplishments and splendid ideals of the gentleman whom I wish to second for the nomination for the Vice Presidency of these United States. This man has been a Member of the United States Congress for 24 years and in his early service as a Member of the House of Representatives, he was assigned to and served on the Committee of Reclamation and Irrigation which has so much to do with the water problems of our great Nation and at the same time, he also served as a member of the Merchant and Marine Committee and upon these two committees, his application to his duties and the able manner in which he handled them was quickly recognized and he was assigned to the Rules Committee to the House and there served for many years with distinction, again manifesting a splendid ability which was recognized by every Member of the House of Representatives.

His ability, his sincerity and fine, friendly manner so thoroughly established him with the Members of the House of Representatives that upon the death of that honored and splendid gentleman, Speaker Burns, this man was elected to that high position, Speaker in the House of Representatives, by acclamation. This is a feat in itself rarely accorded and definitely indicates the fine regard in which this man was held by every member in his party.

That gesture by the Members of the House of Representatives was splendid, but not enough for trying as the position is and exacting as it is, this splendid gentleman was again reelected at the expiration of his first term without opposition. I know of no man who has more friends, who has deeper respect or enjoys the affection of the Members of the House of Representatives than the gentleman to whom I refer. He has consistently in his position—sometimes alone—supported the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt 100 percent. A man who has been sympathetic to the problems of the North, the East, the West, and the South that is so proud of him, and as a Representative in Congress from the Golden State of California, it gives me honor far beyond that which I could have anticipated, to second the nomination of a man who would be a worthy teammate of our splendid President, the Honorable WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD.

Proof of Authenticity of the British Secret Document—Concluding Article

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. THORKELSON
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

EXCERPTS FROM THE PRESS AND AN ADDRESS BY DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include excerpts from the press, and Need for Action, by Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler.

Mr. Speaker, this is the concluding article in the series which I have inserted in the RECORD, relative to the authenticity of the British secret document. The evidence which I have used is taken from magazines, newspapers, and other publications, which may be found in the Congressional Library. This is particularly true where specific dates are used in the British secret document, such as reference to the last chapter of Triumphant Democracy, by Andrew Carnegie, which appeared in the North American Review, 1893; in Whitaker's Almanac, where American officers were listed; and in the article by A. Maurice Low, wherein he endeavored to minimize the importance of titles conferred on the American officers who were knighted by King George.

Much of this evidence has not only been recorded, but I have photostats of the original articles; such as, for instance, the article which appeared in the New York Times, May 16, 1919, in which it is stated that British interests acquired title to the Famous-Players Laskey Corporation. It is especially significant to note that this deal occurred nearly 1 month before the letter was sent to Lloyd George, and not in December 1919, as stated in Mr. Merrill's report.

The British secret document accepted the fact that Woodrow Wilson was to be the first president of the League of Nations, a position in which he would carry America into the League with him. The League of Nations is now past history, but inasmuch as considerable space is given to it in the secret document, I shall refer to it in order to further authenticate this letter to Lloyd George. I quote from a newspaper article by Shaw Desmond, October 4, 1919:

WILSON SEEN IN ENGLAND AS A FALLEN ANGEL, VICTIM OF IDEALISM AND WRECKED ON SHOALS OF DIPLOMACY—LEAGUE APPEARS DOOMED—EUROPEAN DEMOCRACIES SEE FOUNDATION OF NEW ONE ON ASHES OF COVENANT

(By Shaw Desmond)

When Woodrow Wilson rode out of the west on the wings of the morning to tilt at the windmills of Europe's diplomacy he was hailed by the democracies of Europe as the savior of democracy. It is true he carried with him on one of the aforesaid wings a Sancho Panza of the name of House, whose position in salvation was not quite so clear. The average worker, like the average man, has been puzzling ever since as to the colonel's position. Whether America elected him or whether he elected himself. But let that pass. To the Briton, the American Constitution is a thing fearful and wonderful.

* * * * * * *

They expected him to make war impossible. It looks funny today in the cold print, but that is what they expected. They expected him, as head of that hundred millions which, in the breath of a man, had become the determinative factor in the future of Europe, to be arbiter of the destiny of Europe's democracy. They expected his 14 points to be the Magna Charta of the new democracy—his League of Nations to be—well, what did they expect it to be?

* * * * * * *

THE PRESIDENT'S PROGRESS

The President's progress, forming a picture for a twentieth century Hogarth, is interesting to the social psychologist. Nor is it difficult to follow. It has had so many predecessors. In the beginning Wilson, probably sincere-souled democrat and idealist, set out to reform the world. In that "ecce homo" psychology of his, he saw himself the divinely inspired author of a league of nations, saw his descent down the avenue of time as the founder, caught his reflection in the mirror of history. * * * Then he went to Paris. Paris has always been the grave of reputation.

Somebody, somewhere, somehow, some day, will tell the story of his study with Colonel House of the maze of European treaties before he left. That is not my business. It is enough here to say that he was attempting to master in a month what European diplomacy had studied through generations. When he reached the conference table he was the amateur playing against the professional. He was matching himself, with their own weapons and on their own ground, against the astutest brains in Europe. And he had the same chance as a tallow rabbit in h— with an asbestos greyhound trailing his heels.

The statements made by Mr. Desmond in his article are generally known to those who kept in touch with the happenings in Europe in 1919. Mr. Wilson was hopelessly lost. He was in the hands of international Jewry, the men who wrote and drafted the Treaty of Versailles. Mr. Baruch did not fail to brag about the power he had at the Peace Conference, and it is so recorded in the Senate hearings.

I shall refrain from expressing my opinion of the League at this time, except to say I am absolutely opposed to it and its off-shoots, World Federation and Union Now.

In order to expose one of the most un-American organizations, I now quote from the New York American, December 18, 1934, and March 11, 1935:

CARNEGIE MONEY AND COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA—A NEW DEAL IN DISLOYALTY

When will these everlasting Carnegie Endowments and Carnegie Funds and Carnegie Foundations cease to afflict the American people?

Their persistent self-injection into every situation, with biased and bigoted propaganda, their intrusion into every question, both domestic and international—offering a field for their disloyal and un-American activities—is getting to be more than can be borne, or should be borne.

The latest outrage they have perpetrated is perhaps their worst. It is in the form of a pamphlet entitled "The Political and Social Doctrine of Communism." This pamphlet is the December issue of a periodical calling itself "International Conciliation" published monthly by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

In a preface of clumsy apology, excuse is made for the publication on the ground that there should be an authoritative setting forth of both communism and fascism as political, economic, and social doctrines, and then follows the full text of the report on the work of the central committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union by Stalin to the All-Union Communist Party Congress held in Moscow on January 26 of the present year.

As if the threadbare twaddle and familiar bunk of the Soviet tyrant and terrorist were not enough, there is appended to his report an article by Dr. Sidney Hook, professor of New York University, who appeared in the news a few days ago as one of the active figures in the merger of the Communist League in America and the American Workers Party into an organization whose avowed intention is the overthrow of the American Government by force.

It is needless to say that Stalin's article attacks capitalism and exalts communism, predicting that bourgeois capitalism is coming to an end.

The familiar Soviet thesis that the capitalist countries of the world are preparing for an imperialist war against Russia is trotted out for home consumption.

The revival of this bug-a-boo, with the recurrence of open terrorism and murderous repression in Russia, confirms the report that all is not well behind the censorship network of the Soviet Republic.

The Stalin article is propaganda pure and simple.

Its publication by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace is an act of thorough disloyalty to America—indistinguishable from the common and familiar circulation of seditious and subversive literature by secret agitators.

The organ which carries such stuff, even if it has the imprint of the Carnegie endowment, is not one with less blameworthy and censurable than the skulking enemy of society whose scene of operation is the dark alley and the hideout.

This Carnegie endowment is an old offender. It has persistently advocated American entanglements in all foreign complications. It has steadily condoned Europe's repudiation of its debts to the United States. It has sought to undermine the American democracy by spreading Communist material which is designed and used for propaganda.

Perhaps Carnegie's International Conciliation sees nothing to criticize in Communist Russia's threat of war against Japan, in Russia's alliance with war-hungry France, and her support of Yugoslavia in its war threat to Hungary.

Perhaps the disloyal pacifism of the Carnegie Endowment is so vision-twisted or money-lulled that it can find nothing to criticize in Russia's impudent interference in the life and government of every peaceful and friendly nation in the world with which it can establish contact.

Perhaps it even approves Stalin's declaration:

"The American Communist Party must be improved and bolshevized. For that end we must work in order to forge real revolutionary cadres capable of leading the many millions of the American working class toward the revolutionary class struggle."

Perhaps all this is considered international conciliation. The straight-thinking American is apt to consider it something very different. He knows these Carnegie organizations, their mischievous vaporings, their pestilent un-Americanism, their incurable antagonism to every true and just aim of the United States.

He despises their propaganda and their endowed publications which exist only to disseminate it.

By such publications the Carnegie endowment not only affronts the American reading public but it discredits the press itself and the freedom which the latter enjoys under the Constitution.

THE CARNEGIE ENDOWMENT—ARCH PROPAGANDIST FOR UN-AMERICAN PRINCIPLES

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University and president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, tells us how to abolish the United States of America in the interests of Europe.

In his report to the directors of the fund which Andrew Carnegie left to promote the Europeanization of America under the mask of universal peace, Dr. Butler expounds quite frankly the astounding anti-American propaganda that this organization is carrying on. This movement is for what Dr. Butler calls a world state. It is the most seditious proposition ever laid before the American public. Seditious because it gives aid and comfort to the Communist, Fascist, and Nazi-ist, absolute enemies of the very rock-bottom principles on which our Government is founded.

In this world state America would be a county, yielding all our liberties and democratic institutions up to the despotic nations of Europe.

Dr. Butler's vast scheme for kidnaping the mentality of American youth and delivering it over to the big shots of Europe consists, so he boasts, of indoctrinating our youth with endowment literature through international mind alcoves, international relations clubs, and children's international mind alcoves.

There are now 352 such clubs in American colleges, he says, and 100 clubs in high schools. The laboratory where this poisonous literature is manufactured is at the endowment offices, at No. 342 Madison Avenue, New York City.

Dr. Butler offers not peace, but a sword. And that sword is aimed straight at the heart of American nationalism. No paid agent of a European power was ever more brazen than this representative of the predatory big shots of Europe when he said that his proposition to make America a part of Europe is analogous to the welding together of the Thirteen Colonies into a whole.

Dr. Butler hides the obvious fact that there has never been a world state sentiment in Europe. He hides the obvious fact that Europe is farther from a United States of Europe than ever in its history. He hides the obvious fact that, after thousands of years of living next door to one another, the nations of Europe are nearer to butchering and poisoning one another in a final demoniac effort at mutual annihilation than ever before.

Is this hypocrisy, publicity paranoia, or a deliberate betrayal of American interests to the foreign nations which have decorated, bemedaled, beribboned and superdegreed Dr. Butler until he, born an American, is now as international as the Marseilles waterfront?

Indeed, a reading of Dr. Butler's career in Who's Who in America gives us the psychological low-down on the doctor's international mania. Honorary degrees from Toronto, St. Andrews, Manchester, Oxford, Cambridge, Glasgow, Paris, Strasbourg, Nancy, Louvain, Rome, Prague, Breslau, Budapest, Szeged, and many others. New Jersey commissioner to the Paris Exposition, Watson professor of American history at British universities, president of the American branch of the Conciliation Internationale, president of the American-Slav Institute in Prague, president of the Kahn Foundation for Foreign Travel of American Teachers, vice president of the Congress of the Royal Institute of Public Health (London), member of the Institute of France, president of the Germanistic Society, honorary vice president of the American-Scandinavian Society, of the American Academy in Rome, of the France-America Society, of the American Hellenic Society, of the Italy-America Society, corresponding member of the Associazone Internationale Per Gli Studi Mediterranei, Rome; honorary member of the Kant Goesellschaft, Berlin; vice president of the Stresemann Memorial Friedensstiftung, Berlin; foreign member of the Czech Academy of Sciences and Arts, Prague; awarded one-half of the Nobel Peace Prize, 1931 (meaning, apparently, that the awarders thought he was only, under cover, a 50 percenter in regard to peace on earth); decorated by the Governments of France, Prussia, Greece, Jugoslavia, Belgium, Poland, Italy, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Hungary, Holland, etc.; member Athanaenum (London), Beech (Southampton), Reform (London) Clubs; decorated before the war with the badge of the Commander of the Order of the Red Eagle of Prussia and cabled the Kaiser that "he rose almost to the miraculous."

And now this international showcase for decorations and degrees tells us that the United States of America is through, and that we should join a world state in which we will be the tax gatherer, the goat, and the inexhaustible plum tree.

A world state today means either world communism or world fascism—both of which are regressions, atavisms, completely at variance with the American spirit of personal liberty and national independence.

The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace was founded by a sentimental Scotch crackpot, whose only use for America was what he could get out of it.

In the hands of Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, it has become a European device for turning America back into a plundered colony of Europe.

There is only one thing to be done with the Carnegie Endowment, and that is for the United States Government to suppress it and sequestrate the fund for loyal purposes.

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, I regret to say, has been one of the most submissive tools in the hands of alien governments in the dissemination of radical doctrines within the United States. It is he and others who have used the Nation's wealth to undermine the Republic and spread alien doctrines within our schools, colleges, and churches which are destroying respect for our own Government.

This is particularly dangerous, in that it has changed the true American teachings in our schools, which will in turn destroy patriotism in our youth.

In order to make this clear, I shall quote an article by Dr. Butler, entitled "The Need for Action":

THE NEED FOR ACTION

(An address over the Columbia Broadcasting System, October 3, 1937, by Nicholas Murray Butler)

What is there to say of the dangerous world situation which confronts us all that has not already been said and well said? Surely, more discussion is not necessary. The need is for positive, prompt, and constructive action. That action can only be taken by governments and such governments as still rest upon the basis of democracy depend in turn upon public opinion. Therefore it is public opinion in the United States, in the British Commonwealth of Nations, in France, in Switzerland, in Belgium, in Holland, in the Scandinavian countries, in Czechoslovakia, and in distant Argentina which must bear responsibility for that action, or that failure to act, upon which the immediate future of our long-building western civilization must depend.

It cannot be said that public opinion is without guidance. Of all the numerous and often important international conferences which have been held since the end of the great World War, the most important, the most constructive, and the most helpful was that held at Chatham House in London in the month of March 1935. It was entirely unofficial, although in every sense public.

Some 62 outstanding statesmen, economists, and men of affairs, drawn from 10 nations, then assembled on the invitation of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace to consider and, if possible, to propose a program of action which would deal effectively with the gravely menacing problems of international trade and international finance, as well as with the whole question of international peace and its relation to the economic, the social, and the political organization of mankind. Those who then assembled represented every conceivable point of view and almost every conceivable background of experience and conviction. To their own surprise but to the intense gratification of all, this truly great and representative international group agreed unanimously upon a plan of action to be pressed upon the governments of the civilized world. That plan of action, which has been published in every land, endorsed, and earnestly supported by the international organization of the great chambers of commerce of the world, may be obtained for the asking by addressing the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace at its offices in the city of New York.

Already more than 2 years have passed since the Chatham House Conference was held, and the world continues to drift dangerously toward the breaking point. One of the most distinguished members of that conference, M. van Zeeland, soon became prime minister of his country, Belgium, and in that post has been doing everything in his power to have the recommendations of the Chatham House Conference understood and accepted. Our own Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, has lost no opportunity to do the same thing and his voice is now fortunately being heard not only in Europe but in Asia. But time presses, and the economic and social forces which are disintegrating society will not wait. They must be quickly met and overcome, and constructive, forward-facing movements put in their place. It is no longer possible to say that we do not know what should be done. We have been told what to do, on the highest authority that there is in the world. Nothing stands in our way now but lack of intelligence, sluggish indifference, and that appalling policy of "wait and see," which is the pride of the so-called practical politician, whether in public office or out of it.

More than a year ago the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, and of France made an effective beginning in that international monetary agreement which was quickly accepted by several other nations. But that was only a beginning. Public opinion must require governments to press forward to the establishment of an international monetary unit which shall be as definite and as fixed as the meter or the kilogram. Then and only then can that national and international trade which is the hope of the world be put upon a foundation which will be free from uncertainty. Public opinion must require the taking down of those high tariff barriers and other obstacles to international trade which are impoverishing the mass of mankind for the benefit of a few who are, in effect, living upon an unseen dole which is met in unrecorded fashion by the entire mass of the people. Anyone who will study and reflect upon the facts relative to cotton growing in our southern and southwestern country will quickly find convincing evidence of the severe damage being done to the American people themselves by continuance of present policies of trade restriction.

The struggle between different forms of government need not and should not involve international war, although something may happen to bring about that unhappy result. We in our own end are concerned with the protection of our fundamental democratic principles as embodied in our Federal Constitution with its Bill of Rights, and as illustrated through a century and a half of really marvelous national life and growth. Any talk of our being isolated from the rest of the world is grotesque absurdity. No nation is more closely interrelated with world happenings and world problems than is our own. This is in part the result of our size, in part the result of the varied origins of our complex population, in part the result of our long-time prosperity despite the crises which have confronted us now and again, and in part the result of the success which has attended our great experiment in democracy. If the world does not prosper, we cannot prosper long. If world peace is in danger, our peace is in danger. The one sure way to keep out of war is to join in preventing war, and the one sure way to prevent war is to enact into public policy without further delay the recommendations of the Chatham House Conference, which would remove the outstanding temptations to war.

In the face of a situation such as this, nothing could be more tragic than the contemptuous disregard of formal treaty obligations by governments. Among civilized peoples having some understanding of what morality means, the obligation of a contract has been looked upon as sacred. If this be true as to contracts between individuals, how much more true must it be as to contracts between governments. Yet today we look upon what must be bluntly described as governmental assassination in China by an invading host of Japanese having the authority and bearing the flag of a government which has solemnly engaged with eight other governments to maintain and uphold the territorial integrity of China. We are now assured by legalistic advisers that the eight other nations can do nothing about this breach of trust, since the treaty in question makes no mention of any procedure to follow should it be violated. Can anything more monstrous be said than that? The only inference from it is that contracts made by treaty have no moral obligation whatsoever. If that be true, the time has passed when treaties are needed or should be made. If morality is not to rule human conduct, whether individual or governmental, then we need not trouble ourselves about legal technicalities. The one alternative to moral control is the rule of force. That means constant and growing armaments and eventual world-wide war, with the literal, not figurative or rhetorical, destruction of western civilization. The choice is plain, and there is no time to be lost in making it. It is between the rule of moral principle or world ruin.

In this article Mr. Butler speaks of the British Commonwealth of Nations and the Chatham House conference, neither of which should concern the United States. The gentleman is more concerned with foreign nations and world government than he is in the perpetuation of our own Government; and, feeling that way about it, there is nothing to hinder him from taking up his abode on the other side of the Atlantic.

Mr. Butler also refers to the sanctity of treaties, and I would like to ask him which nation in Europe has more willfully disregarded treaties than Great Britain. She has broken every treaty she has made—not only with us but with other nations as well; and today she stands alone, leaning upon the United States. Europe knows this, and so should we, had we real statesmen in our Government.

Did England keep her treaty with the United States in regard to the payment of the war debt? Did not the author of the British secret document suggest to Lloyd George that England should be careful in her negotiations with the United States until the war debt was canceled? Of course he did, and that is precisely what Great Britain has done.

There is a group in the United States that wants to fight for England, and I say go ahead; and when they are through and disillusioned the true picture will appear in its most tragic form.

I am not interested in Europe, or in the affairs of Europe, except that I want all European nations to stay out of the United States; and they will stay out if our statesmen understand the meaning of neutrality. We need a President who understands our foreign policy from an American viewpoint, and whose interest is at home instead of in foreign governments.

Convention of Jewish War Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DAVID I. WALSH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 14 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. DAVID I. WALSH, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech delivered by me at the annual convention of the Jewish War Veterans held in Boston on August 31, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and fellow Americans, these are dark days in the world. War and all its destructive results—famine, pestilence, suffering, hatred, and every evil that is an enemy of civilization appears to have been let loose. It is an hour when courage, faithful citizenship, strong patriotism, and trust in the Almighty needs to be joined in the bosom of every person living in America. It is a time for calm, dispassionate thinking and for imbuing in our souls the determination to do everything possible to preserve America, its ideals, traditions, and free institutions.

The qualities which are needed in America today have been splendidly exemplified by the Jewish war veterans of the United States who are tonight gathered here in annual convention. I esteem the opportunity of addressing you who are present and through the instrumentality of this modern magic which we know as radio broadcasting. Indeed it is a distinct privilege to greet you, to congratulate you and to urge a continuation of the patriotic services you rendered in the time of war, during these serious and momentous days for our country and for the world.

Some may inquire, Why a Jewish or any racial organization of American war veterans? Nearly all the racial and religious groups have organized similar veterans' organizations. This does not mean that you or they are not satisfied and proud to be American veterans and belong to the Nation-wide veteran organizations—but it does indicate a desire to take justifiable pride in the contribution which the several racial groups have made to our military service in the American wars. It also serves the purpose of letting the general public know the loyalty and willingness of the children of those who were born in other lands and who are now American citizens, to make the supreme sacrifice of death for the preservation of our American institutions. Let it also be said, it should banish forever the whispering propaganda of those who would question the loyalty of the Jewish-born or other foreign-born citizens and their descendants or seek to deny them the full enjoyment of the civil and religious liberties guaranteed to all citizens by the Constitution.

Let us consider in some detail the glorious record of our Jewish veterans, for it attests the loyalty, the patriotism, and the bravery of those of Jewish ancestry first in the war for our independence and thereafter in every war in which the United States has ever engaged.

In these days, when a billion dollars is voted by Congress for national defense in a few hours, the reference in the history of our Revolutionary War to an advance by a Jewish patriot of $300,000 to help finance the Continental Army under George Washington may appear as a small matter. But it was a huge sum of money in those days and of inestimable aid to the Revolutionary cause.

The rolls of our fighting forces in the War of 1812 and the Mexican War both contain the names of men and officers of Jewish blood.

At the outbreak of the Civil War in 1861 the Jewish population of this country was estimated at about 200,000. Some 8,000 Jews are believed to have served in the Union and Confederate Armies. The veterans' rolls of the Spanish War in 1898 tell a similar story.

The total number of Jews in the service during the World War is conservatively estimated from 200,000 to 225,000, which constituted more than 4 percent of the armed forces of the United States, whereas proportionately the Jews in this country formed about 3 percent of the total population.

No less than 1,100 citations for valor awarded to men of Jewish faith are on record. The Congressional Medal of Honor, of which only 78 have been awarded to date, was conferred on 3 Jewish soldiers. The Distinguished Service Cross is worn by at least 150 American Jews and the Croix de Guerre by 174 Jews of the A. E. F.

The racial and religious groups which you represent, indeed all our racial and religious groups may take justifiable pride in an equally glorious record of service and sacrifice.

It may not be amiss to take this occasion to refer to an incident which occurred a year ago this very month. This incident and this meeting tonight presents the history of progress and advancement of the Jewish people in a striking manner. I refer to the occasion of the unveiling of a monument presented by the Jewish people of Newport, R. I., to the city of Newport, on which occasion I had the honor of delivering the dedicatory address. Two hundred and eighty-one years previous to the date of this dedication a small band of Jewish families, after a long and hazardous sail from Brazil and the West Indies, entered the harbor of Newport and become part of the community which the followers of Roger Williams had founded.

They were poor, weary, discouraged, and disheartened. They brought with them, however, the spiritual values of the religion of their fathers. It was the only influence that sustained them and gave them hope and courage. Realizing the priceless value of the ancient religion of their forbears they immediately turned their thoughts to God. And recognizing the great fundamental duty that man owes to the Almighty, namely, worship, gratitude, praise, and prayer, they built on this spot the first synagogue erected in America. From that day to this, persecuted and exiled Jews have continued to find an asylum in every seaport that encircles the territory of the United States of America.

Tonight I am honored by being invited to join with you in honoring the memory of the thousands of Jewish youths who have given their lives and services to our country.

Tonight as we look about throughout the country we behold a different picture. The kith and kin of those early immigrants have taken a position in American life of prominence and influence, that is proof of the industry, perserverance, and the capacity of the men and women of your blood to benefit by and take advantage of the opportunities and free institutions that America has guaranteed to all who have come here from the Old World to escape tyranny and oppression and to enjoy the benefits of free institutions and equality of opportunity.

The memory of your Jewish ancestry and your Jewish war heroes should fill your hearts with patriotism, your minds with high resolve, the resolve that the land of the free which welcomed your ancestors and for which your heroes fought and died shall ever remain free. On this solemn occasion you fittingly contemplate the service and sacrifice you and your comrades made for America, and your fellow citizens of every race and creed will join with you in solemnly resolving that all Americans of every race and creed shall dwell in peace with one another. There is a sentiment inscribed on one of the public buildings in the city of Washington which expresses the sentiment that applies to all: "God made us neighbors, let justice make us friends."

If Americans of all religious beliefs would stop blasting at each other's racial inheritance and religious beliefs they would not only give manifestation of sincerity of their religious faith but we would indeed all really live in the true spirit of America. The Old World enmities, jealousies, and long-continued feuds have no place in the life of America.

There is nothing I know of more foreign to the free institutions of America than to question or deny the birthright of every American, no matter from what land or race his ancestors emigrated, to enjoy the equality of opportunity, religious liberties, and social and political justice that are guaranteed to all.

Who would have dreamed a few years ago that in this so-called age of enlightenment that we should be witnessing, under the totalitarian governments of Europe, persecution of religion and of your race as cruel and distressing as in the Dark Ages of bygone centuries. This must never happen in America. All history tells us that wherever in the world religion has been crushed, tyranny has been enthroned. It is not enough to deprecate the hateful intolerance of Hitlerism, but we must be ever vigilant and aggressive to prevent such doctrines from growing on the free soil of America.

We must be on our guard also to preserve our priceless heritage from the insidious forces of destruction within our own land—the question of the defense and security of the democratic institutions of our own beloved country. Let us be alert to detect false propaganda and false dogma from subversive elements and groups that are attempting to undermine and destroy our democratic institutions; indeed to annihilate the freedom for which our forefathers fought and died.

It is difficult to recognize them, therefore they are harder to defeat. It will demand constant alertness and careful reconnoitering to recognize the foe when you meet him, but if guided by basic American ideals and principals for which your comrades died, you cannot fail.

You living veterans who 20 years ago left the military service must not think your battles are over. You must make yourselves the inspired leaders in all the great movements for advancement and progress of our beloved country.

We seek not to suppress the right of any man or woman to think and speak freely. That is their God-given right as American citizens. But we must exert our utmost influence in thought, speech, and action against the apostles of foreign philosophies, alien to American ideals, who would, if they had their way, topple our most precious institutions about us and erect on the ruins the superstructure of destructive communistic or totalitarian government.

Guarding the destinies of America against the perils that threaten it from abroad and the sinister enemies that would undermine it at home is more than ever a cause to which you and I may well dedicate ourselves.

Power Plank in the Democratic Platform

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 5, 1940

SPEECH BEFORE THE PLATFORM COMMITTEE AT THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION, CHICAGO, ILL., JULY 15, 1940

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, at the request of our friends in the House, who are members of what we call the public power bloc, I went before the Platform Committee of the National Democratic Convention at Chicago and appealed for the adoption of a power plank in the platform and also for one pledging the party to continue the extension of its program of rural electrification.

I was successful in securing both and, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting here my speech to the platform committee, together with a copy of the power plank adopted by the convention.

The matter referred to follows.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I come here primarily representing the 27,000,000 consumers of electric light and power in this country. I am here to discuss with you for a moment the attitude of the Democratic Party on the outstanding domestic issue of this campaign, and to plead for a strong farmer plank in the platform.

The greatest domestic issue with which we are confronted today is the power question—the development of our water power resources and the protection of the users of electric energy in the rates they have to pay.

I told you in this convention in 1932 that this would be the greatest issue with which we would have to deal for the next 25 years. That prediction is now being borne out. The people are looking to us for protection.

The Republican Party has been "blitzkrieged"; it has disappeared. It succumbed to the Power Trust fascisti at Philadelphia and nominated the Hitler, or the Mussolini, of the power monopoly as its standard bearer in the coming campaign. They even did it before they investigated his politics. My information is he started out a Socialist and landed in the Republican Party, or in charge of the Republican Party, on the third bounce.

While this was going on, our dear beloved friend, Herbert Hoover, was addressing the convention, appealing to them to "hold an election and not an auction." The poor fellow didn't know that the auction had already been held, and that he had been sold down the river by the party he was supposed to represent.

I am chairman of what is called the public-power bloc in the House of Representatives, the most effective unofficial organization connected with either House of Congress. We have adopted a platform, or a program, and I am going to read a portion of it, if you will give me time, in order that you may understand exactly what we are driving at. This power issue reaches into 21,000,000 homes, 4,000,000 commercial establishments, and 2,000,000 industrial plants, 95 percent of whom are overcharged approximately 100 percent for electric energy.

We saw the German machine in 1871 roll down across France and impose an indemnity of $1,000,000,000 on the French nation, which the French people were required to pay within 30 years. But this utility fascisti, this gigantic octopus sprawls over this Nation, runs its tentacles into the pocket of every human being who pays an electric bill and takes from the American people in overcharges approximately $1,000,000,000 a year, or as much in 1 year as the French were required to pay in 30. We have checked those figures and double checked them, and I can prove to any intelligent man that they are substantially correct. Instead of $1,000,000,000 in 30 years, they have taken from us $30,000,000,000; and if we pussyfoot this issue we might as well not nominate a ticket; they would take twenty billions more in the next 20 years. Besides, they have absolutely ignored rural electrification.

Franklin D. Roosevelt has done more for the power consumers of America than all the other Presidents combined up to this time. [Applause.] When we came into power, only about 10 percent of the farm homes of America had electricity; they were around the big cities. We were lagging behind every other nation on earth. England, France, Germany, Norway, Sweden, Belgium, and Denmark, all had 90 percent of their farms electrified. Holland and Switzerland had approximately 100 percent, and even Japan had 90 percent of her farms electrified, while we had only 10 percent. Someone said the other day in answer to that statement, that those were thickly settled countries. That is no answer; New Zealand, a new and sparsely settled country where the farms are few and far between, had 65 percent of her farms electrified 4 years ago.

Now, since we have gone into this struggle, we have electrified 20 percent more, something like 2,000,000 farm homes. The other day in their scramble when the Republican Party broke down at Philadelphia, and the utilities moved in, they absolutely forgot rural electrification entirely. They never mentioned the power issue; but we are going to mention it from now on.

People in your home State of New York, Senator WAGNER, are overcharged, according to the T. V. A. rates, $170,000,000 a year; and according to the Ontario rates, $192,000,000 a year; in the State of the gentleman from Kentucky here [Senator BARKLEY], $11,000,000; in the State of Ohio, $40,000,000; in Massachusetts, $44,000,000. Every man who turns an electric switch, every man in the organization represented by Mr. William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, who spoke here today, every man in the organization represented by Mr. Taber—the National Grange—everyone who has electric lights in his home—except a few isolated areas such as the Tennessee Valley area, or the extreme far West, or in cities like Cleveland, Ohio, where they own their own municipal and distribution systems—has to go down into his pockets and pay as tribute to this fascisti approximately 100 percent in overcharges on his light and power bill every month that rolls around.

A few of us had been carrying on the fight in the House of Representatives, as well as in the Senate. We found we needed organization, so the House Members who favored public power organized what we call the public-power bloc. We adopted a platform setting out the policies for which we stand. That was in 1937. We have fought on that platform for 3 years and have never changed it. There are Members within the sound of my voice, and some of them on this committee, who have fought with us, and who are members of our bloc. They were kind enough to elect me chairman, and I am appearing in that capacity here today.

We say that we are banded together for the purpose of saving for the American people, now and for all time to come, the hydroelectric power of this Nation, one of the greatest natural resources in all the world. If we lose it now, it will be gone forever.

We regard the hydroelectric power in our navigable streams and their tributaries as public property, national wealth, which belongs to all the American people and should be used for the benefit of all. Whoever controls the water power of this country in the years to come will control the Nation. We believe this power should be made available to every home in America and to every business establishment at rates based upon the cost of generation, transmission, and distribution. If that were done, even in the State of the distinguished gentleman to my right—Governor Olson, of California—where they have the benefit of Boulder Dam power; if it were distributed over the rest of the State at the rates prevailing in the Los Angeles area, they would save something like $30,000,000 a year; and if it were not for Boulder Dam and those cheap rates in Los Angeles, the people of California would pay over a hundred million dollars a year in overcharges for their electric lights and power.

We believe the Government should hold in perpetuity the dams it now owns, or has under construction, or in contemplation, and should build and own the transmission lines to convey the energy generated at those dams throughout the distribution radius and sell it wholesale to cities, towns, cooperative associations, and other public agencies, at the minimum rates necessary to amortize that part of the investment charged to power in 40 to 50 years.

That is our policy at Boulder Dam. We will amortize the Boulder Dam investment in 50 years. They buy falling water, but it costs them at Boulder Dam 1.63 mills per kilowatt-hour. It is delivered at Los Angeles at about 4 mills a kilowatt-hour. This power is being sold at a sufficient profit to pay for the entire Boulder Dam investment in 50 years. Power can be generated with coal, gas, oil, or water power, anywhere in the United States, and distributed to the ultimate consumer at the T. V. A. yardstick rates, after paying all expenses and allowing for reasonable return on legitimate investments.

We believe in encouraging and assisting through governmental aid the counties, cities, towns, cooperative associations, and other public units in owning and operating their electric distribution systems. The Commonwealth & Southern made a contract in 1926 to buy power generated at Muscle Shoals. I live closer to Muscle Shoals than any other Member of Congress. I am one Member whose district is cleared.

The private power companies do not own an insulator in my district, and I hope they never do again. We bought them out and paid what their property was worth. They were buying this power at an average of 2.004 mills a kilowatt-hour in 1932 and were selling it in sight of the dam at 10 cents a kilowatt-hour, or about 4,800 percent spread. In 1932, 1,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity a month cost a residential consumer in my district $66.10. Today it costs him $8.90. We are paying 5 mills a kilowatt-hour for it wholesale, where they were paying 2.004 mills. We are paying more taxes than the power company paid when they owned those distribution systems. We are paying our distribution systems out; and in Tupelo, Miss., where I live, we made so much profit we had to reduce the maximum rates from 3 cents a kilowatt-hour to 2.5 cents a kilowatt-hour, where we were paying 10 cents a kilowatt-hour in 1932.

There are just two sides to this question: The Republicans have taken one side and we have taken the other. We have taken the side of the American people, the ones who pay the bills.

They are sending out this new-made Republican as an apostle of farm relief. I said on the floor of the House a year ago that they were going to try to nominate him for President, and that if they did they would urge him as the farmers' friend. I said there was one thing about it—he could teach the farmers of this country how to water the stock and shear the sheep. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARPENTER, of Kansas. He said in Topeka, Kans., the 1st of June that all the wheat in Kansas could rot in the field if it took him to harvest it.

Congressman RANKIN. Who said that?

Mr. CARPENTER, of Kansas. Mr. Willkie.

Congressman RANKIN. You pay overcharges for electricity in Kansas amounting to $10,000,000 a year. In the State of Ohio they are overcharged $40,000,000. They only raise about 40,000,000 bushels of wheat a year in Ohio. The entire wheat crop of that State wouldn't pay these overcharges, which are being taken out of the pockets of every human being in Ohio who turns an electric switch, except in a few places like Cleveland and Columbus, where they have municipal systems.

Organized labor is going to be with the Democrats, because they haven't anywhere else to go. Nobody else has ever done anything for them. Where are the farmers going? Every farmer in America who has electricity is crazy about it and his wife is crazier about it than he is. Why? Because it brings relief from drudgery. It brings to the home light, refrigeration, the electric iron, the electric washing machine that lifts the burden of drudgery from the housewife, the water pump, and many other things that go to make those homes more pleasant, more attractive. Every farmer who has this power, if he knows the facts, will give us credit for it, and he ought to support the Democratic ticket; every man who hasn't got it is praying for it, and he knows very well he won't get it unless we elect a Democratic administration. The Republicans didn't mention rural electrification in their platform. When I spoke in the House the other day and called attention to the fact that the Republican platform did not mention rural electrification, practically every old guard Republican in the House applauded, which shows that they are committed to the other side of this issue.

I have the rates in every community in America in my office. I have been digging into this subject for years. I can take any town and show to what extent the people are overcharged; and 95 times out of a hundred it will be around 100 percent. Another thing, we are unalterably opposed to pooling our public power with that of private power companies, or to pooling our power lines with theirs. Let the Government own the dams; let the Government own the distribution lines; then let the community own the distribution system.

In order to avoid duplication we favor the Government's purchasing the transmission lines where they would parallel the public lines necessary to carry public power to its destination, provided these lines can be purchased at their actual values. We are not trying to take property for nothing. They are going out now and saying they skinned us out of several million dollars in the Tennessee Valley deal. As a matter of fact, we paid all that property was worth, and I agreed to it in advance, because I was consulted, but we did it to get their hands out of the pockets of the people of Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and Kentucky. We are saving $10,000,000 a year as a result. That will soon pay for the entire purchase.

Our people are using electricity now. Residential consumers in my town are using 170 kilowatt-hours a month, while in the city of New York, and in this city of Chicago they are averaging about 70 kilowatt-hours a month. Low rates result in increased consumption.

We favor the municipalities owning their own distribution systems. Where those distribution facilities are owned by private power companies, we favor aiding the municipality in buying them out, provided they can be purchased at what they are worth. If not, then we favor aiding the municipality in constructing its own distribution systems and stand-by plant. We favor rural electrification on a national scale, in order to supply electric energy to every farm home in America at the present yardstick rates, which means the T. V. A. yardstick rate, which has a maximum of 3 cents a kilowatt-hour and then scales down to 4 mills.

I want to say in that connection, gentlemen, that we have already forced reductions in light and power rates in America since the T. V. A. was created $580,000,000 a year and still have $1,000,000,000 to go. They were charging us the same rates in 1933 as they were in 1925; but when we created the Tennessee Valley Authority, the greatest development of ancient or modern times—one that will take Franklin D. Roosevelt's name down the centuries—when we constructed the T. V. A. and put the yardstick rates into effect, the people raised such a clamor that they began to reduce rates, and up to now they have reduced them about $580,000,000 a year. Wendell Willkie did not do that. This administration did it and made them fall into line—or start to falling into line.

I would like to know the number of State legislators in the United States that are on the pay roll of this power Fascisti from Maine to Mexico. In one State I am told that a majority of the State senators are on their pay roll. They are on there as lawyers. One man said to me, "I have been drawing a very good retainer. I am attorney for them."

"Ever try a case?" I asked.

"Never tried a case. They don't own property in my county," he replied. He was in the State senate. That is their "fifth column" tactics. That is the way they went out and "blitzkrieged" Taft's and Dewey's delegations at the Philadelphia convention. I wish we knew how many members of those delegations were tied in with the power interests in the beginning. The understanding was, "We want you as a Dewey delegate to vote for Dewey until he caves in; then, of course, you know where to go." They packed the galleries with the rest of them.

They also have been sending out canned editorials, and have been filling newspapers with useless advertisements. For what? To rub down the editors. I find that even in the South today those canned editorials are being published by newspapers whose editors don't know what it is all about. That is some more of their "fifth column" tactics. I understand they had a meeting here last night—going to place the name of Wendell Willkie before this convention and ask for his nomination on the Democratic ticket. If they do, Senator BARKLEY, please yield to me for some observations, won't you? [Laughter.]

MEMBER. You think Willkie was Hopson's choice?

Honorable RANKIN. I'm sure he was. [Laughter.]

I don't want to interfere with the Republican Presidential campaign. I think when they nominated Willkie they ought to have put Hopson on as Vice President, and not humiliated my friend, Senator MCNARY. You people from the West ought to resent any such treatment of as good a man as CHARLIE MCNARY.

The next great steal they are trumping up is the Columbia River—that great Blue Danube of the West; the greatest wealth the West has, perhaps, outside of her soil. They are getting ready to try to steal the power at Bonneville and Grand Coulee. If they do, the people of the West will be deprived of one of their greatest birthrights.

Governor OLSON. You ought to include Shasta Dam in that.

Honorable RANKIN. And the Central Valley. They are getting ready to steal that, just as they were trying to steal Muscle Shoals.

We are unalterably opposed to pooling this power at Bonneville and on the Columbia River with any private power company. We want to save the Columbia River for the people of that area. We want to develop every river from the Penobscot to the Rio Grande, from the Columbia River to the Savannah. We want to develop the water power of this Nation and make this country rich and prosperous in the years to come.

As I said, we favor rural electrification. A few years ago I took up this fight for rural electrification, after this power-bloc platform was adopted. I said to these boys: "If you will stay with me,

I will get us $100,000,000 for rural electrification for next year." We got that $100,000,000, and it didn't last throughout the year. This year we added $60,000,000 to that as a result of the efforts of this organization whose members have carried on this fight ever since this administration has been in power.

We believe in adopting the allotment plan, the loan and grant plan that has been used by the P. W. A., in order to enable these rural-electrification projects to build their lines to reach these distressed farmers. Why should you give a city 45 percent grant and 55-percent loan, and then require the farmers to pay all theirs back? We want the same treatment given to them that we give people in the cities. If you will give us half the money the Republicans gave the railroads back in the old days, we will electrify every farm home in America. We will have it understood and so provided that these lines, when built and paid for, will belong to the farmers themselves.

You people are paying over twice as much for electricity as I am. We are paying our lines out. A private power company never amortizes. You will pay yours until doomsday if they get control of this Government, and they will raise it at will and you can't help yourself. They have got their "fifth columnists" in and around, or on, every State utilities commission in America. If they haven't got them on the commission, they are working with or through the commission, with the result there isn't a State in the Union where the commissioners have been able, even since we got control of them, to break their strangle hold and reduce rates to the proper levels. We tried it in Pennsylvania. We were doing fairly well until Pennsylvania, unfortunately, elected the James administration and reversed the policy.

Now look what the James' gang has done to Pennsylvania. According to the Tacoma rates—and I put them in the RECORD the other day—the people in Pennsylvania are overcharged $105,000,000 a year for electric light and power. They have jumped on us Democrats and talked about corrupt politics.

You and I can remember when Pepper and Vare had their ballot-stuffing, vote-buying contest up there, and Vare was declared the Republican nominee by $400,000 majority. [Laughter.] They sent him down to Washington, and the Senate threw him out. [Laughter.]

Sam Insull, whom Mr. Willkie said he wanted to succeed in his great effort—you heard his speech yesterday—succeeded in purchasing a seat, he and his forces from Illinois, and sending a hand-picked Senator down to Washington, and even a Republican Senate refused to seat him.

This same old influence is now shoving forward; they are trying to paralyze our rural-electrification program; they are trying to put a stop to this internal development; they are trying to put a stop to the development of hydroelectric power. They are not going to permit the sale of power at reasonable rates if they can help it. If we lose this fight, the American people will pay $1,000,000,000 a year in overcharges from now on.

We favor the continuation of the Electric Home and Farm Authority, and such extensions of it as may be necessary to enable that organization to extend credit to the householders of America at the lowest rates of interest possible, in order that they may equip their homes with those electrical appliances necessary to lift the burdens of drudgery from the shoulders of the housewife and other members of the families, and enable them to enjoy their share of these blessings which this advance electric civilization provides.

Take it into every home; it doesn't matter whether it is on the farm or in the city. If a man in the city struggles and toils, it is useless to pay him high wages if you are going to take them away from him in house rents and utility rates. If you are going to hold him down to where he can't enjoy any of the comforts and conveniences of life, what good have you done him?

Here is the greatest issue of this campaign. I am for adequately preparing America so that no enemy will ever dare set foot on American soil. I believe in Thomas Jefferson's policy of peace; commerce and honest friendship with all nations; entangling alliances with none. But if we are going to make our country great, we must take these leeches off the American people, and the Democratic Party is going to have to do it.

Now, I want the strongest public power plant this committee can write into the platform. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I will now yield to any question you desire to ask.

MEMBER. Have you copies of this address so that we may have them?

Mr. RANKIN. There are some in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that resemble it very much. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the platform committee reported the strongest power plank ever adopted by a national convention. It was unanimously approved by the convention. In addition to pledging the party to the policy of "enlarging the rural-electrication program," the convention adopted the following plank on electric power:

ELECTRIC POWER

During the past 7 years the Democratic Party has won the first major victories for the people of the Nation in their generation-old contest with the power monopoly.

These victories have resulted in the recognition of certain self-evident principles and the realization of vast benefits by the people. These principles, long opposed by the Republican Party, are:

That the power of falling water is a gift from God, and consequently belongs not to a privileged few but to all the people, who are entitled to enjoy its benefits;

That the people have the right through their Government to develop their own power sites and bring low-cost electricity to their homes, farms, and factories;

That public-utility holding companies must not be permitted to serve as the means by which a few men can pyramid stocks upon stocks for the sole purpose of controlling vast power empires.

We have condemned the Republican policies which permitted the victimizing of investors in the securities of private power corporations, and the exploitation of the people by unnecessarily high utility costs.

We have condemned the opposition of utility power interests which delayed for years the development of national-defense projects in the Tennessee Valley and which obstructed river-basin improvements and other public projects bringing low-cost electric power to the people.

The successful power developments in the Tennessee and Columbia River Basins show the wisdom of the Democratic Party in establishing Government-owned and operated hydroelectric plants in the interests of power and light consumers.

Through these Democratic victories whole regions have been revived and restored to prosperous habitation. Production costs have been reduced. Industries have been reestablished which employ men and capital. Cheaper electricity has brought vast economic benefits to thousands of homes and communities.

These victories of the people must be safeguarded. They will be turned to defeat if the Republican Party should be returned to power. We pledge our party militantly to oppose every effort to encroach upon the inherent right of our people to be provided with this primary essential of life at the lowest possible cost.

The nomination of a utility executive by the Republican Party as its Presidential candidate raises squarely the issue whether the Nation's water power shall be used for all the people or the selfish interests of a few. We accept that issue.

This was another victory for the power consumers of America, as well as for the public power bloc. It means that this will be one of the chief issues in every campaign from now on until we succeed in developing the water power of the Nation, electrifying every farm home, and reducing rates to where every user will get his electricity at the yardstick rates, or at rates based upon the cost of production and distribution.

It means that we are on our way to an electrified America.

The Complementary Marketing Function of the Bituminous Coal Act to the Interstate Commerce Act and to the National Labor Relations Act

OF

HON. JOHN KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 14, 1940

ADDRESS OF W. A. RICHARDS, OF BLUEFIELD, W. VA.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I include the following address delivered by Mr. W. A. Richards, of Bluefield, W. Va., at the annual meeting of section of mineral law of the American Bar Association held in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., September 10, 1940. Mr. Richards is president of the Sovereign Pocahontas Co., has for a number of years been prominently identified with the coal industry of West Virginia, and his able and learned address upon a most timely subject will, I am confident, be of great public interest.

The address follows:

The natural hesitation that I feel as a layman in addressing learned members of the bar on the intimate relationship of the three major Federal laws now regulating the bituminous-coal industry is set at rest only by the hope that a discussion of these laws from the unusual standpoint of their interrelationship to the practical production and marketing problems of an individual operator in that industry may later help the members of the legal profession to come to such a consonance of thought and interpretation of them as to eventually result in achieving for each interest the largest possible measure of social good with the very minimum of dislocation or conflict to anyone.

I would like it clearly understood that even an intimate acquaintanceship with some of the finest guardhouse lawyers in any man's army has not hardened me sufficiently to infer that any statement I may make herein is in any sense a legal opinion. I have read the able papers of such eminent lawyers as Mr. John L. Steinbugler, Mr. Charles F. Hosford, Mr. Robert W. Knox, and that of Mr. Thomas J. Michie, and I am more than satisfied to leave the law to them. I shall try to cover other points and to talk impersonally, much as an engineer might do in describing the requirements of a bridge necessitated by given conditions of traffic and site.

The wisdom of either the Interstate Commerce Act or the National Labor Relations Act I do not presume to challenge. I accept as a base that they are now supported by the force of public opinion of the substantial majority of the American people, as is best evidenced by the public declarations of the present candidates of the major parties for the office of President of the United States. Given these conditions of traffic and site, I shall try to briefly describe the necessary role of the Bituminous Coal Act in complementing the other two acts from a marketing standpoint, and to point out the desirable objectives of their present and future consonance of interpretation from an operator's standpoint.

Certain it is to my mind that these laws are basically complementary, one to the other, and that on members of your profession rests the chief obligation to assure the needed harmony of their future interpretation and their future improvement.

RELATIVE IMPORTANCE OF THE THREE LAWS IN FIXING THE TOTAL COSTS TO THE CONSUMERS

Almost all bituminous coal is consumed at points distant from the mines. Its market value is therefore determined by competition at destination. And the price at the mine is that market price less the applicable transportation cost. Because of the inflexible freight rates, competition manifests itself almost entirely in the sales price at the mine.

Outside of minor quantities shipped solely by truck and by river, or consumed at the mines, probably 90 percent or more is transported, at least in part, by rail. According to studies of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the latest being statement No. 3747, dated October 1937, the ratio of originated freight revenue to the destination value of bituminous coal in 1936 was 56 percent. The same statement gave the average of the freight revenue from all other classes of commodities to their destination values to be but 7 percent; and the corresponding ratio for such classes as "Manufacturers and Miscellaneous" to be but 5.5 percent; agricultural products to be 9.6 percent; and animal and animal products to be but 4.1 percent. If the same ratio of freight rate to delivered value obtained for coal as for the average of all other traffic, it would have reduced the freight rate from $2.25 to 28 cents per ton. Statement No. 3747 declares that these ratios indicate in a general way "the importance of freight rates as a factor in affecting financial returns in individual industries" and that, including coal, "the total freight burden is only 8.47 percent of the total value of the commodities carried."

Here, then is the first great distinction between the marketing problem of bituminous coal and that of all other classes of commodities. Manifestly, the incidence of variations in freight rates from competing mines to their common consuming markets in the United States ranges from 4 to 14 times and averages 8 times as great in its destructive effect on prices at the mine as is the effect of the freight rates on the prices of other classes of commodities at their points of production. Manifest also is the fact that a minimum of 56 percent of the rail destination cost of bituminous coal to the average consumer is thus fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the Interstate Commerce Acts. Since differences in total delivered cost per ton to a consumer of 5 cents or less will divert business between mines, and since freight rate differentials between mines to present common consuming markets of 25 cents per ton are common and that they range higher than $1, their importance in allocating traffic in coal is obvious.

According to reports of governmental agencies, running from the United States Coal Commission of 1922 to the National Bituminous Coal Commission of 1937, the labor proportion of the total cost of producing and selling bituminous coal averages 60 percent. The present rates of wages and hours of work per week are fixed by voluntary collective bargaining between the operators and miners on a Nation-wide basis under the actualities of the National Labor Relations Act. Since labor costs even between mines within subdistricts, vary up to 50 cents per ton, their controlling importance is also obvious in marketing coal. This is the second great distinguishing characteristic of the marketing of bituminous coal, for this ratio of 60 percent is three times greater than is the ratio of labor costs to production value of the 48 largest manufacturing industries, and taking it together with the rail freight rates, a minimum total of 82 percent of the rail destination cost of that commodity is now fixed for the individual consumer not by the Coal Act primarily but by the costs incident to the other two Federal acts.

Of the remaining 18 percent, no less than 10 percent is estimated to be fixed by the operation directly or indirectly of some Federal or State law, leaving but 8 percent of the rail destination cost of bituminous coal to the consumer to be fixed solely through the operation of the Bituminous Coal Act. That law only provides for a realization return to the industry of its average cost before Federal income taxes and does not include any return on the investment, prudent or otherwise. If the industry possessed, inherently, the ability to operate at an average return of 6 percent, it would establish a price structure realizing cost plus 25 cents. Such a structure would be 25 cents per ton higher for every size and grade of coal to every market than the price schedules presently proposed under the act.

The present pattern of distribution or commerce in coal has been the result of the interplay of the three major economic factors of transportation cost, production cost, and quality of the coal. The distribution for the year 1937 is remarkably representative of the average commerce among the States for the 5-year period 1934 through 1938, when the industry operated under a Nation-wide wage scale with no substantial localized suspensions. Upon this pattern of distribution the social interests of the employees, the operators, the mining communities, the railroads, the consumers, and the suppliers of products to the mines, railroads, and consumers are presently builded.

The American people have, through their chosen representatives, seen fit to accord the railroads a fixed price out of the fluctuating market value for coal. They have seen fit to accord to labor a fixed price out of the same fluctuating market value for coal. It is only common sense to believe that the American people meant to accomplish just that. And since the industry has long demonstrated its inherent inability to maintain a stable market price sufficient to pay these two charges and keep itself solvent, that the American people, to make the first two acts meaningful, have desired to assure the fulfillment of the purposes of the first two acts by the complement of the Bituminous Coal Act.

I therefore accept as a base the distribution of bituminous coal for the year 1937 as representative of the interest of employees, employers, railroads, and consumers, as well as others directly dependent upon those industries.

COMPLEMENTARY MARKETING FUNCTION OF THE BITUMINOUS COAL ACT RELATIVE TO THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

The ideal marketing situation is for each mine to be able to accord each buyer, no matter where he resides in the United States, the same lowest or "most-favored-nation" mine price for any given size and class of coal that is accorded to any other buyer by that mine. Not only does this appeal to a sense of justice and good conscience, but 98.5 percent by value of the commodities carried by rail have a total freight burden of but 7 percent of their market value and can, therefore, cushion the variations and vagaries in their freight-rate charges to accomplish this end.

However, in the case of bituminous coal with a rail freight burden of 56 percent, this is utterly impossible.

The existing freight rate structure for bituminous coal is the most complex and variegated assortment of patterns possible to humanly conceive. The rates permitted the Pocahontas carriers shock the conscience because of their swollen revenues and are approved only because, as a practical matter, the rates of other carriers could not otherwise be increased, said the Interstate Commerce Commission in General Commodity Rates Increases, 1937 (227 I. C. C. 657). No single theory underlies their construction and they vary in all parts of the country from the ideal pattern, of group rates having the same fixed differentials over broad market areas between competing mines, to point-to-point rates having varying differentials from each mine to every destination within more restricted market areas. This structure is the result of accretions to and adjustments on a structure developed during the period of time prior to 1924 when their destructive force or impact on a stabilized mine price had been largely smothered by the involuntary control of production then existing in the bituminous industry which was caused by the doubling growth every 10 years in the annual consumption of coal and by the blessings of an inadequate railroad-car supply.

The full car supply to the bituminous industry, available since 1924, has had the same destructive effect, within that industry, as a full supply of whisky would have had upon the Indians.

These varying freight-rate differentials compel an operator from day to day to vary his mine prices on the same size and quality of coal as between purchasers at different destinations in an endeavor to meet the different competitive conditions then obtaining in the various consuming markets, or else to forego participation in the market demanding the lower price. Unfortunately, the election by one operator to forego such a market in order to protect his price structure by not giving a lower price to one customer than to another, is rendered void of its stabilizing effect if a single one of his competitors, having the same freight rate and quality of coal, elects otherwise And because of oversupply and the insistent need to secure the full operating time necessary to achieve a minimum cost, some operator, like death and taxes, is certain to be compelled to meet the demand of the lower market.

The force of severest competition in the market falls on the smaller sizes of screenings, chiefly a size embracing 1¼- or ¾-inch resultant screenings or fines. This is because the supply-demand ratio for the different sizes of coals increases destructively from the 10 to 9 ratio for lump to the 4 to 1 ratio for screenings because no size smaller than lump can physically be successfully applied in the large size combustion equipment, but all sizes can be applied in the smaller size combustion equipment through application of mine run or by crushing down the large sizes to the specifications of the smaller. These smaller sizes are produced as a consequence of producing the larger sizes and must be currently disposed of or else the railroad siding of the mine is blocked off by no-bill cars of screenings and the mine must then shut down.

These small sizes are used chiefly by industries because they generally contain the same heat units as the larger sizes and have always sold for substantially less than the larger or domestic household sizes. Modern combustion furnaces, available from a cost standpoint only to larger consumers, are designed to burn these sizes with as high or higher efficiency and therefore substantial economy has resulted to these industries through their consumption of such sizes.

Naturally, the lower the price for coal the higher becomes the ratio of rail freight to destination value of coal; and, therefore, in the case of screenings (¾ inch by 0 in size) the average ratio of rail freight to destination value will not be less than 60 percent and will range as high as 90 percent.

Thus it is that the most destructive impact of varying freight-rate differentials falls on that size of coal that is the most critical from the standpoint of determining the annual opearting time of each mine. And the low cost from full operating time or the high cost from idle time are the main determining factors in the profit or loss of a particular mine in any year.

This is the size of coal that falls within the theory of Mr. E. G. Bailey, vice president of Babcock & Wilcox Co., one of the foremost combustion engineers in the world, that the joint problem of the operators, railroads, and steam generating plants is to take the latent heat of coal in the ground and transform it into steam in the pipes at the lowest possible cost.

Possibly the simplest illustration of the adverse nature of existing freight-rate differentials on the ability of mines to maintain the same price to all consumers wherever located is the situation between the low-volatile mines of central Pennsylvania and southern West Virginia. The operators in these fields share business at Worcester, Mass., New York City, and Youngstown, Ohio, among other destinations. If the mines in central Pennsylvania voluntarily establish the same price, $2.25, for example, for industrial coals to each of these destinations, the price obtainable by producers in southern West Virginia becomes the difference between the sum of the f. o. b. mine price in central Pennsylvania plus its applicable freight rate and the applicable freight rate from southern West Virginia.

This establishes for southern West Virginia $1.45 for Worcester, $1.87 for New York, and $1.25 for Youngstown. As soon as any operator from southern West Virginia grants the low competitive price of $1.25 in Youngstown, then all consumers of that size and grade of coal from southern West Virginia, residing anywhere, demand the same or "most-favored-nation price." It is not long under conditions of oversupply until that low price is quoted everywhere and until it reaches back to Worcester and New York. When it does it forces a reduction in the $2.25 price of central Pennsylvania to meet it, and immediately the reduced price of central Pennsylvania, in turn, is carried back to Youngstown by some operator in central Pennsylvania thereby forcing a reduction in the competitively compelled price of $1.25 from the operators in southern West Virginia. The merry-go-round is then ready for its second downward spiral around the same circuit.

A second illustration among the hundreds in existence is the grotesque series of differentials between the southern West Virginia low-volatile mines of district No. 7 and the southern West Virginia and eastern Kentucky high-volatile mines of district No. 8.

To tidewater markets along the eastern seaboard the freight differential is 9 cents in favor of the low-volatile mines and to Virginia destinations it is 10 cents in favor of the same mines. However, going west, the differential swings against the low-volatile mines in favor of the high volatile in the amount of 10 cents to Cincinnati, 15 cents to Richmond Ind.; 20 cents to Terre Haute, 25 cents to South Bend, then drops to 20 cents to Chicago, and to 15 cents for Minneapolis or St. Paul. Thus, swings of as much as 35 cents per ton in destination costs must be compensated for in f. o. b. mine prices, if equality of delivered prices is to be secured in each market to maintain competitive marketing opportunity for these mines. Just as in the Youngstown-New York-Worcester case, the low price named from either group to any adverse destination by any operator eventually is carried over to all destinations with the exactly similar result of kicking down the original low price.

Aiding and abetting this process is the fact that the ratio between remaining supply to remaining demand rises sharply during the industrial contracting season of the year which forces the producers who have not succeeded in selling early to seek the more adverse markets. The price such an operator is forced to make in this adverse or remote market is then quoted back by him to all markets without knowledge or thought in most instances that his competition lessens in his sheltered markets.

The complementary marketing function of the Bituminous Coal Act in relation to the Interstate Commerce Act is thus seen to be the opportunity it affords to establish prices at the mines that reduce to the very minimum the variations therein necessary to compensate for the existing differentials in freight rates to common markets and yet to still maintain the commerce in coal among the States without friction or diversion. These price differentials necessitate the force of law to secure their maintenance against conditions of prevailing oversupply in the market.

COMPLEMENTARY MARKETING FUNCTION OF THE BITUMINOUS COAL ACT TO THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

The ideal marketing situation with respect to a Nation-wide wage scale would be first a uniform freight rate from every mine to every destination and similar conditions of cost of production and quality of coal from each producing mine.

Of course, neither uniform freight rates, uniform costs of production, nor uniform qualities of coal happen to prevail. Rather there is every conceivable variation and gradation of each of these three major economic factors.

The unregulated forces of free enterprise broke down the prices of bituminous coal from $2.68 per ton in 1923 to $1.10 during the first half of 1933, in successive yearly declines that were virtually unbroken for each district except for a slight pause of 2 cents per ton in 1926, a year of most extraordinary demand that resulted from long strikes in the American anthracite industry and in the entire British coal industry.

The struggle among mines for survivorship during that period caused all semblance of uniform wage scales within districts or as between districts to disappear except possibly in some sporadic subdistricts, such as those of Illinois. Individual operators, obeying the primitive self-preservation instinct, had largely established varying rates at their mines that tended more and more to be predicated on the economic principle of ability to pay at the level of market price then obtaining. This, of course, was an inevitable consequence caused by the substantial variations in margins secured by mines operating in even the same seam of coal in the same district resulting from differences in the physical conditions of bed horizon, thickness of seam, character of roof and bottom, amount of impurities, and prevailing conditions of the workings. The severity of this unrestricted competition in lowering standards of living can be judged from the fact that wages paid employees in coal mines in West Virginia dropped from an average of $175,000,000 during the 4 years ending June 30, 1923, to less than $52,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933.

Organization of the industry by the United Mine Workers of America followed rapidly upon the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act in June of 1933 and by late September of that year a wage contract substantially covering the entire industry had been negotiated through the collective-bargaining process coincidentally with a complementary price-fixing coal code.

An industry-wide wage scale arbitrarily wipes out the individual mine rates within large mining subdistricts that had been based on individual mine ability to pay and sets average uniform rates in lieu thereof. It also narrows, to the economic extreme, broad geographical differentials between sections of that industry. This is because of the competitive ambitions on the part of the advantaged operators and the human interests of the representatives of the miners. Naturally, the low cost or high realization operators gain a substantial financial advantage thereby because of the exceptionally high proportion that wages bear to total costs.

Time alone is all that is theoretically necessary for an ideal business monopoly to inexorably result from such a national wage scale under the price-shattering forces of free enterprise. In the past, however, the fact that coal-mine labor is not susceptible to resettlement in other industries, combined with the force of local opinion desperately trying to preserve its only pay roll, has heretofore tended to prevent an actual business monopoly from obtaining for long. Eventually, resort to just beating widespread bankruptcy by breaking the wage scale sufficiently to permit continuing operation of the hitherto marginal mines has acted to break the threatened business monopoly.

Therefore, one basic principle that must underlie an industry-wide wage scale is that all districts and subdistricts in the bituminous industry must be kept reasonably alive. Economically, this can only be done by a market price sufficiently high to enable that scale to be maintained by such a substantial majority of the operators in the various districts as to secure local public opinion to support it. Studies of frequency tables of realization and costs indicate that a minimum price approximating average cost will enable from 50 percent up to 65 percent of the tonnage in each district to break even or show a profit. Sixty-five percent has thus been regarded by experienced operators in the industry as the bulk line point from which any further drop in realization has heretofore started the cycle of broken wage scales. This is the basis of the return provisions of the present act.

Lest too little regard is accorded to this underlying principle, because shut-downs and bankruptcies have not assumed alarming proportions in the industry during the extensive period necessary to establish valid prices, your attention is directed to the fact the last wage agreement was negotiated only as a consequence of a 6 weeks' shut-down of the mines in the big Appalachian territory, comprising some 70 percent of the Nation's tonnage. This, of course, represented an attempt to improve the market price by a crude form of production control. As Mr. J. L. Steinbugler has told you, the prohibitive shut-down cost of 15 cents to 20 cents per ton of annual capacity to maintain an idle mine practically compels the marginal operator to operate his mine until his working capital and his credit have been entirely wiped out by losses, since his only other alternative is to abandon his property, and once and for all time to sustain the loss of his entire investment.

The direct effect of the act on increasing the standard of living among the employees in the mining industry is illustrated by the fact that the wages paid to employees in the bituminous industry in West Virginia for the fiscal year 1940 increased to $156,000,000 from the $51,800,000 paid in the year ending June 30, 1933. Of the former figure some $25,000,000 is due to greater tonnage shipped.

Thus the complementary marketing function of the Bituminous Coal Act with reference to the National Labor Relations Act is seen to be not only in raising the standard of living and improving the opportunities for our youth, but in preventing a business monopoly from occurring by means other than the broken wage scales of the past.

CONSONANCE OF INTERPRETATION OF THE THREE LAWS

The thread of symmetry that I find in the interpretation of the three laws was eloquently expressed by Justice Cardozo in his minority opinion in the Carter case to be "the maintenance of commerce among the States without friction or diversion."

Certain it is that the essence of a Nation-wide union wage scale must be to preserve the various locals that make up its whole, for otherwise survivorship alone must compel the idle employees to drop their membership in that union.

Certain it also is that future diversion of commerce among the carriers must force higher rate differentials on the gaining districts in an arbitrary attempt to continue the allocation of railroad traffic. The greater resulting revenue needs of the traffic losers bar adjustments downward in their rates.

Surely the only pragmatic test of whether the existing fair competitive opportunities for the average operator have been preserved by his price relationships under the Coal Act will be the resulting fact of whether he continues to sell his coal in the same relative volume to his competitors or not, consumer requirements and production limitations excepted.

Since freight rate levels and wage rate levels are the result of unity of action among the carriers and the employees, respectively, and that these two factors compose over 80 percent of the rail-delivered cost to the consumer, the stockholders of the coal industry have no more say in the choice of its defensive weapons to fight its economic battles than does England have against Hitler. It must adopt the same unity of action with respect to its price levels. Otherwise the stockholders are in the position of spotting the carriers and labor pat hands in a poker game in which the delivered market value of coal comprises the table stakes, and then trying to win their proper economic share by beating the pat hands by the futile task of drawing better cards.

Acceptance of the principle of the maintenance of commerce among the States without friction or diversion as being both the social and the economic objective standard of the three laws, immediately paves the civilized way for unity of action among the three interests to increase the use of bituminous coal through the lower production costs that will result from profitable operation of the mines and from the research that profitable operation alone permits; to increase the consumer satisfaction in the purchase of coal by eliminating a great many of the arbitrary freight-rate differentials that now compel variations in mine prices and thus provoke a sense of consumer discrimination; and by mutual and intelligently proportioned adjustments of rates and prices to meet the competition of laborless fuels. The accomplishment of the Baily theory is only possible, from an engineer's viewpoint, by the complementary marketing function of the Bituminous Coal Act to the other acts in fulfilling Mr. Justice Cardozo's thread of symmetry.

FUTURE OF THE COAL ACT

a. Criticism of the Act

I recognize, of course, that every industry is composed of three groups of participants. First, that third economically advantaged by production costs or quality and by transportation charges, or by a combination of either two or all of these economic factors. Second, that third disadvantaged by these factors, and lastly the middle third having advantages over some competitors and disadvantages against others.

The record of continuing financial losses to the industry over a long period of years is sufficient for an engineer to accept as evidence of an inherent inability of a voluntary price structure to carry the imposed financial load, and that under the factual record of that generation of experience, that private rights must succumb to public need. Low costs for an entire industry come from profits and not from losses because "the profit motive constitutes the incentive to human endeavor which makes industrial efficiency possible."

With criticisms that the magnitude of the task warrants its abandonment, I have utterly no patience. The officers of the mining companies have been hired by their stockholders to earn money and not to whimper that the job is difficult. Certainly it is a job to be done, whether hard or simple, and the admitted point that it is a task of great magnitude immediately confirms the fact that only by an industrial organization such as is provided in Coal Act could it ever hope to be done. Certainly it is futile to conceive of its being accomplished under the hopeless conditions of the individual marketing cannibalism of open competition.

Nullification of freight rates charged by some critics is an absurdity. Thousands of pages of testimony in congressional hearings, Interstate Commerce Commission hearings, and Bituminous Coal Division hearings bear uncontradicted factual evidence that it is open competition itself that tends to nullify freight rate allocation barriers, by concessions in price larger than the freight differential, and that the price structure under the Coal Act, on the exact contrary limits the mine-price adjustment to the exact freight-rate differentials in the case of common markets, quality being equal, and to less than the freight-rate barrier in the case of markets not common to the producer.

Criticism of the act has been made on the ground that it is not coordinated with a national-fuel policy including oil, gas, hydroelectric power, and anthracite coal.

Competition with such fuels is at destination, and excepting only anthracite coal, the greatest factor in such competition has been the increasing transportation burden placed on bituminous coal. As Commissioner Aitchison stated in his dissenting opinion in General Rate Level Investigation, 1933 (195 I. C. C. 78):

"Generally those commodities which are closest to the soil—agricultural products, fruits, lumber and its products, and coal—have been considered as 'tied to the rails,' and every effort has been made to adhere to the standard-rate scales, so that relatively they have been compelled to bear the greatest proportion of the transportation burden."

Nowhere has such competition been keener than that with fuel oil along the Atlantic seaboard from Norfolk to Porland. The record shows that despite the fact that the Pocahontas carriers were then operating at a net railway-operating income equivalent to cost plus 48 percent after Federal income taxes, that the destination spot price of fuel oil had declined to a comparative price less than the tidewater rail freight alone on coal from the mines on their lines, that wages had been cut to the bone and that the mines were admittedly operating at a cash loss, relief in the form of lower competitive freight rates could not be secured by the coal industry in 1933 either by formal action before the Interstate Commerce Commission nor by informal conferences with the carriers.

The record of the last 18-year period discloses that open competition in the coal industry has been utterly no safeguard to protection from inroads of oil competition along the seaboard because the greatest losses to coal have occurred during the years of lowest mine prices and the resultant periods of strikes or suspensions and the carriers took advantage of the helplessness of the coal industry during this period to actually raise the transportation charges.

Certain it is, therefore, that future competition with such fuels should be met by mutuality of action of the carriers, operators, and miners as, when, and how it develops. To the extent that profitable operation of the mines induces a lowering of general costs and prevents labor disputes, the Coal Act, of itself, will aid the competitive situation of the industry with respect to competing fuels.

The competition of fuels requiring less labor in their production and transportation is part of the much larger problem of existing unemployment in the United States. That unemployment can only be relieved by making employment of such labor profitable.

The Coal Act tends to prevent a business monopoly from occurring because of the opportunity it gives to a greater number of operators to still participate therein with chances of ultimate financial success. Competition of a fair, sound, and healthy nature will be fostered by the very degree that such monopoly is lessened. Criticisms of the act in this respect are as unfounded as are those criticisms charging the annual losses of the industry in the past several years to the operation of the law. There has been no establishment of prices except for a brief period, and these annual deficits have been but the continuation of the string of financial losses to the industry occurring since 1923 due to the unrestrained play of the forces of free enterprise on this industry.

There is but one criticism of the Coal Act that I have consistently felt had some merit and that is whether simple price establishment over a long run of years can withstand the ravages of substantial fluctuations in demand if it was unsupported by direct control over output, or over shipment in commerce. Voluntary provision for such control is provided in the marketing-agency section of the present act.

As Mr. Charles F. Hosford stated in addressing this same section in 1936, the minimum prices have the purpose of balancing production to demand in order that the market as a whole may return the average cost of the industry.

Obviously the necessary restriction in output to achieve such a market value depends primarily on adequate enforcement of the act. In turn, enforcement is rendered easy or hard depending upon the ratio of available supply to current demand, because a demand equalling supply would naturally make enforcement moot. How severe a drop in demand relative to available supply that it would take to so multiply administrative difficulties, though applications for changes by individual mines for more favorable price classifications and thus induce enforcement difficulties by virtue of the numbers involved, cannot be foretold in advance any more than one can predict when such drop in supply-demand ratio would occur, if ever, in the future. Too many variables, such as the impact of the fact that no one mine produces more than a fraction of 1 percent of the total consumption in the largest price area and that therefore classification may not be as important as the length of hearings taken has indicated, such as the opportunity the price stabilization gives to accomplish physical mergers of mines or selling agencies, and such as the operation of marketing agencies may counteract successfully dire predictions or forebodings of difficulties in other directions.

Certain it is to my mind that if freight rates and wage rates can survive the economic pressure of the past 5 years that such fact is an earnest that adequate enforcement can also accomplish the same result with the Coal Act.

I have no doubt whatsoever, that, barring the unescapable imperfections in a task as monumental as the fixing of minimum prices for the entire bituminous industry, that consumers of coal will find great satisfaction in a stabilized price structure from the standpoint of knowing with certitude the prices for coal that their competitors are in reality paying, in the opportunity for reductions in delivered costs or in securing parity of mine prices from a consonance of action under the three laws, and in the satisfaction that it gives every American to be a part of the profit system. No purchasing agent has ever taken pride in holding the nose of the bituminous industry under the water level of profit; he has only been forced to do so by the requirements of his job to buy as economically as his competitor.

I have no doubt also that the producer of coal, under a price schedule that is simplicity itself compared to his daily variations under open competition and which is no less than 100 times better coordinated with all of his competitors, will find the same great satisfaction at knowing definitely what his price competition actually is, as he has taken for that reason in a uniform wage scale.

No one has expressed the feeling in the industry better than Mr. James W. Carter in the latter regard when he testified in the Carter case.

"So far as labor is concerned, I am sure there is a unanimity of feeling that the men and women employed by and dependent upon the industry should not be subject to a lowering of their standards of living because of the unrestrained play of economic forces. It seems obvious and unanswerable that some provision must be made for the protection of these workers, and it would seem that the best sort of protection which could be afforded them would be the maintenance by statute, of maximum hours of labor and minimum rates of pay" (Carter v. Carter Coal Co., R. 278).

Certainly no producer nor consumer, unanimously echoing that feeling, can have anything but satisfaction at operating under and in paying, respectively, prices that translate this social and economic doctrine into an actuality. Therefore, I have no doubt as to the sincere support of the price structure by public opinion, including the producers and consumers.

b. Modification of the act

Strongly as I feel in regard to the probability that simple price fixing will reasonably stabilize the price structure of the coal industry under conditions now possible of prediction for the next few years, I, as an engineer enamored with the axiom that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points, do not desire for a moment to fail to advocate an amendment to the present act establishing a supplementary control of output through marketing quotas.

Only the fact, as stated in Senate Report No. 252, dated March 25, 1937, that direct production control of bituminous coal was of doubtful constitutionality prevented the use of such means to regulate the industry under the present act.

Since then, however, the Supreme Court, in Mulford v. Smith (307 U. S. 38), has drawn the line of constitutional validity to include the establishment of marketing quotas in interstate commerce, as prophesied by Mr. John L. Steinbugler, and since, from an engineering standpoint, unlimited production of coal at the mine, while physically possible, would not be a desirable or feasible matter if shipments in interstate commerce were restricted, the establishment of marketing quotas in commerce would practically, if not legally, accomplish the same purpose as direct control of production.

As Mr. John L. Steinbugler pointed out to you in 1936, all foreign countries, after years of experience, had centered their regulation of their coal-mining industries around the direct control of production. Such a stabilization measure is now being attempted on a voluntary basis in the Anthracite Coal Industry of Pennsylvania.

The desirability of such an amendment springs from the fact that it simplifies many of the practical problems that arise in the control of output of coal solely by means of price fixing.

It would reduce to a minimum the need for price variations as to common market areas, as to sizes, and as to uses. By placing the premium on possession of the coal rather than on possession of the order, it would greatly aid enforcement of the price provisions of the act.

Its consonance with the Interstate Commerce Act and the National Labor Relations Act I have already outlined.

The standards laid down in the Agricultural Act of 1938 relating to the establishment of marketing quotas in tobacco, that have been approved by the Supreme Court with respect to fixing quotas, allotments, treatment of new farms, and transfers of quotas among farms, seem to be well suited to the requirements of the bituminous industry and can be accepted, by an engineer, in such an amendment to the coal act with the confidence that they are not constitutional experiments.

CONCLUSION

1. I conclude that so long as the Interstate Commerce Acts and the National Labor Relations Act remain in effect that the Bituminous Coal Act is necessary as the marketing complement to each.

2. That the Bituminous Coal Act affords the necessary means to tremendously simplify the present rail freight-rate structure in the direction of permitting the widest possible extension of consumer parity or "most favored nation prices" at the mine and thus conduce to consumer satisfaction and to the increased use of coal.

3. That modification of the coal act should now be sought, in the light of the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Mulford against Smith, to establish marketing quotas for bituminous coal in interstate commerce for the purpose of simplifying the control of production in that industry now exercised by the mediums of freight rates, wage rates, and fixed prices.

4. That the consonance of interpretation of the three laws should be the maintenance of commerce in bituminous coal between the States without friction or diversion.

Address Before Golden Anniversary Convention of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America

OF

HON. B. CARROLL REECE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. B. CARROLL REECE, OF TENNESSEE

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address which I delivered before the golden anniversary convention of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, held at Pressmen's Home, September 1940:

Mr. President and delegates to the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Convention, I received the invitation to address you with a great deal of pleasure because Tennessee is your home, as it were. All the citizens of this State are proud of the fact that the pressmen's home is located in the State of Tennessee, and I am especially proud of the fact that it is located in my district. I am also proud not only of the fact that Tennessee's distinguished son, and my personal friend, is president of this great organization, but that you are meeting here today, in your home, among our beloved east Tennessee hills; and I wish to say that whatever we have, the beauty of our mountains and plains and the hospitality of our hearts, are yours.

Inasmuch as you meet in convention only every 4 years, you have much serious business to transact at this convention. Many events have happened in the world, and many events have happened in our own United States of America since your last convention—events which give us pause; developments which cause use grave concern; developments which we, as Americans, must meet and meet bravely. Not only are world conditions terribly unsettled, not only does bloody war grip the most of Europe, and the smoke and the flame of conflict cover the Far East as well, but our own internal problems are such that they will require our best efforts, our united energy, and our deepest patriotism to overcome, in order that we may not face trouble perhaps from without and from within at the same time.

Therefore, I come to you today as a Representative in Congress, as your representative, not to discuss any of these questions from a partisan standpoint, but to discuss them with you as one American with his fellow Americans; as a citizen of one nation undivided; one people inseparable, whose interests are all bound up together, whose efforts must be for one another if they are to protect each individual in his rights and liberties, as we have known them all our lives in this Nation.

I wish to remind you of something which, of course, you already know, and that is the mutuality of interests between employers and employees. To any thinking man or woman it must be obvious that there is an inseparable mutuality of interest between the employer and the employee. The interests of both the employer and the employee depend upon the consuming public with the purchasing power to acquire and the capacity to consume the goods and services which are produced in the process of the manufacture and distribution of goods and services in our free economy.

It must also be obvious to every thinking person that nothing which steps down industry, which interferes with it too much, which paralyzes it, or causes it to cease to operate, can take place without having a serious, if not disastrous, impact upon labor. After all, we must never forget, my friends, that the only reason for production is consumption. All jobs depend upon consumption. All profits depend upon consumption. All reason for industry of every kind and character depends upon consumption.

It is only in the production of goods and services that we actually produce real wealth. We all know that. It is the exchange value of pay-roll dollars for goods and services that governs the actual wages of the American working man and woman. Regardless of how many dollars are in the pay envelope for any given number of hours of work, it still remains an inevitable and inescapable fact that it is the exchangeability of those pay-roll dollars for goods and services that determines whether or not the wage earners of America will live well or will live poorly.

The question of equitable division of what is produced is as old as history, is older than history, as a matter of fact. Disputes between employer and employee have been going on ever since the first man employed the second man to work for him. Yet I submit to you that it is an undeniable fact that labor attained to greater dignity, it has made greater progress in the United States of America, it has achieved greater rights, it has reached greater heights of accomplishment, both socially and economically, than the working people of any nation in the world ever achieved at any time in history.

In no other country in the world do the working people have anything like the luxurious mode of life they possess in the United States.

Now, just as it is true that this mutuality of interests involves the welfare of the workers whenever industry is interrupted from any cause whatsoever, it is equally true that that same mutuality of interests makes it impossible for labor to be injured without industry being hurt as well.

Since one is the natural complement of the other, and since both are dependent upon a prosperous consuming public, and since the great body of that consuming public necessarily is made up of wage earners, then it naturally follows that any disagreements, any quarrels which cannot be amicably settled, any legislation or any other disturbance of the operations of industry, necessarily must hurt both the employers and the employees. At the same time such conditions must result in either a let-down or a cessation in the production of real wealth—goods and services—and in that way to hurt the consuming public as well.

It must be obvious, it is obvious to all of us, that the more abundant life cannot possibly be gained unless we produce more and more of goods and services—of those things which contribute to, and which are necessary to, the more abundant life, unless we continue to produce them in ever-increasing quantities and at ever-reduced prices without a reduction of wages.

We all agree, I think, that the American economy must be an ever-expanding economy. We must continue, if we are to maintain and perpetuate our free economy, to produce more and more goods and services at lower and lower prices in order that the wage dollar and the farm dollar may have a higher rate of exchangeability for the real wealth of goods and services that go to make up those things which we need and must have if we are to be happy.

This question of the mutual responsibility of industry and labor to each other and to the consumers is not political and it ought never to be made political. It is purely an economic question; it affects us all. You can readily see, of course, that if you are not at work, if you have no wages, the doctor, the barber, the butcher, the candlestick maker must all suffer because you have no money whereby to engage their services or to consume their goods. On the other hand, it is obvious that if industry cannot afford to employ labor and you are out of jobs, then you are not living the more abundant life, you are living a life of hardship and privation along with your dependents.

Now, I am one of those who regards as highly dangerous this trend of the Government taking over paternalistically more and more of the functions of labor unions. I recall that that splendid and able labor statesman, Samuel Gompers, preached for 40 years and more to the labor unions of the United States the gospel of independence of governmental regulation and control. He said time and again that if the labor unions went to the Government to get things done for them, in doing that they gave the Government the right and the opportunity to do things to them if the Government happened at any time to be antagonistic instead of sympathetic to organized labor.

We all recognize the dangerous group pressures which have grown up. Every group and class in the United States wants a subsidy of some sort at the expense of all the other groups and classes, with the result that if all these pressure groups get what they want, all the benefits of all groups would necessarily be nullified by the benefits and the subsidies granted to other groups; we would be no better off than we were before.

Let me also remind you at this point that the working people do not escape taxation. Mr. Roosevelt once well said that:

"Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors. * * * If excessive, they are reflected in idle factories, tax-sold farms and, hence, in hordes of the hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain. Our workers may never see a tax bill, but they must pay in deductions from wages, in increased cost of what they buy, or—as now—in broad cessation of employment. * * * Our people and our business cannot carry its excessive burdens of taxation."

He never spoke truer words in his life.

The burden of hidden taxes is constantly rising. In 1930 those taxes bearing most heavily on the well-to-do contributed 68.2 percent of the Government's total internal-revenue and customs receipts while miscellaneous taxes and customs receipts bearing most heavily on the consumer—the wage earners—contributed only 31.8 percent of such receipts. As of last Christmas Day, this situation had been almost exactly reversed. According to a statement by Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, on December 22 the taxes bearing most heavily on the consumers had gone to more than 60 percent, while the taxes falling most heavily upon the well-to-do had gone to less than 40 percent of the total revenues and customs receipts of the Government.

It means something to you, and it means more to your wives, who have to do the buying, that Federal, State, county, and municipal taxes today in this country consume about 22½ percent of the national income. Let me say to you that those who are making $150 a month are paying in indirect and hidden taxes alone something like $242 a year.

There must be an economic balance between profits and wages, as related to the price the consumers must pay, if they are to have the goods and services which the wage earners of this country must produce if they are to continue to work and to live well.

In the very nature of the American system of economy, then, it is just as important for the wage earners to help to keep the wheels of industry turning as it is for the employers. The wages of workers depend upon the wheels of industry continuing to turn.

The profits of the employers depend upon the wheels of industry continuing to turn. The returns on the investment of capital also depend upon the wheels of industry continuing to turn; and above all, most importantly, the whole standard of living of all of our people depends upon the wheels of industry continuing to turn. That is why it is of such grave and tremendous importance that we put an end to the fears of industry, that we again induce private capital to venture into production, that, as soon as possible, we begin to reduce taxes on business instead of increasing them, in order that industry may carry the burden without having to take it out of wages or without having to close down. That is why it is so important that there be an attitude of helpful cooperation, instead of hostility and suspicion, between the government and business and between industry and labor.

I want to call your attention to the trends we are facing throughout the world today. There is no denying that there is a trend toward dictatorship all over the world. It is also an undeniable fact, my good friends, that in every totalitarian country on this globe organized labor has been wiped out. The wage earners have been brought under the heel of dictatorship the same as everybody else. The labor unions have been disbanded. Their wages have been lowered. Their hours of labor have been lengthened. The conditions of that labor have grown perfectly terrible in most of these countries; and their living levels have gone back 50 years.

Dictatorship, as we all know, begins with small encroachments on the rights and privileges and liberties of the people. It is in most cases a gradual—an almost imperceptible—centralization of government in the hands of a few—most of them people who never submit themselves or their policies to public approval, but who gain power as bureaucrats. Always—without fail—the dictator comes as a savior of the poor people. He comes as a champion of the workers. He makes them extravagant promises of plenty, of leisure, and of short hours of labor at high wages, until he gets power; and then he does precisely what Stalin has done in terror-ridden Russia, what Mussolini has done in crushed Italy, and what Hitler has done in driven Germany—he abolishes the labor unions, he regiments the workers, he gives them their orders and they accept whatever working conditions, whatever wages and whatever hours of labor the dictator prescribes, or they are stood against the wall, or are sent to concentration camps. The trend in the United States has been more and more toward centralization of government in the hands of those at Washington—and I do not now have reference to any particular Administration; it has been true under the Republicans as well as under the Democrats and under the New Deal, because the tendency has been under way for a good many years due to general world conditions, and the pressures of competition in the markets of the world.

There has been an assault on the independence of the judiciary. There has been an assault upon the freedom of the press. There has been regimentation of the farmers. Any curtailment of personal privilege is going to be a curtailment of your privileges along with those of all the other citizens of the United States. I dare say there is no class of citizens in this country who prize more highly and who are ready to fight more determinedly for personal liberty and the Bill of Rights than members of labor unions. Without those liberties there would be no such thing as the labor organization in the first place; secondly, you would not have the privilege, through your unions, of collective bargaining. In the totalitarian countries labor has nothing whatsoever to say about the conditions under which it has to work or the hours it has to work, or the wages it gets for the work. It takes orders. Of course, the very essence of free speech is a free press and a free radio. If the press can be suppressed, if the radio can be influenced or censored, then the next step is to make it so dangerous for the private citizen to express his views that he, too, will remain silent. Now, it is only a step from that point to forcing the labor unions to be silent as well. And, thus, step by step, some of them, as I said a while ago, almost imperceptible, we journey toward dictatorship in one form or another.

Now, I want to speak very frankly about some fallacies and pretenses that some people are trying to foist upon you. You have heard a good deal about conscription of men. But there has been a declaration almost every day that all of the special objectives that have been gained in the last 8 years are to be continued in spite of any requirements growing out of our necessity to build hastily an adequate national defense. Now, of course, you and I, all of us, want a national defense for this country adequate to protect us against any attempted aggression by any nation or any combination of nations at any time. But we want that national defense built as economically and as efficiently as possible, and in the shortest time possible consistent with economy and efficiency. But in the debates over the conscription bill a good many spokesmen have tried to impress upon the wage earners of the United States that labor was not to be touched in this thing. Now, don't be fooled by that. A little quiet thought will show you the fallacy of those arguments. Whenever any man, young or old, is taken from his job, whether he is getting 40 cents a day, or $4 a day, or $14 a day, whenever he is taken by the Government from his job in private life and is impressed into the military service of the Nation at board and uniform and $21 a month, he has been conscripted, and that is conscription of a worker, of a wage earner, of labor. Now, it would be a wholly different thing if a wage earner were taken from his regular occupation in private life and were put into the Army either at the same work or some other work but were given the same wages; he would in such case be transferred from private life to the Army but he would not be conscripted in the sense of his labor being taken for less money for the service of the Government than he gets in private life for the same service.

Now, that does not mean to say, gentlemen, that we can have any quarrel with the philosophy that every citizen owes to his Nation in time of peril his best services. He does, of course. But I merely want to clear up the point in your minds about conscription of labor. The great mass of those who will be taken in under the Conscription Act will be from the working classes of the United States.

Now, let me touch upon another point. There has been a good deal of agitation and debate over the amendment to the Conscription Act to give the Government power to commandeer plants in event the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War or somebody else in the Government cannot reach a proper agreement with industry. It has been urged that Congress has been to blame because the progress on the national defense has bogged down. Well, now, let me tell you something that your President, Major Barry knows—you know it if you stop to think about it: There has always existed, and there exists now, power under the Constitution for the Government to condemn and to take over for public use any private property of any character and reasonably and rightfully to compensate the owner therefor. That is all that is proposed to be done under this amendment, which was put into this bill, in my opinion, for purely political purposes. We are not discussing now the question of whether or not wealth, so-called, or industry, so-called, should be conscripted to do its part along with the workingman who is being conscripted. We are talking now about this insistence that they are going to conscript industry along with labor. They are definitely not going to do anything of the sort, and the amendment which was added in the Senate to the conscription bill does not accomplish that end at all. What does take place if the powers given to the Government in this amendment, which simply parallel, as I said a moment ago, the powers already existing under the Constitution; then the Government would take over a plant or plants and the owners thereof would be compensated for them at a fair price. Now, there is a vast difference between taking a man who is making $4 or $14 a day in private life and yanking him into the Army, away from his family, and saying to him, "Here's a uniform. We will give you your meals, a cot, and you will get $21 a month," and the Government taking over a going industry or a plant and paying its owners full value for it under some court decision.

I do not intend to discuss today the question of conscripting men or conscripting industry or conscripting wealth beyond what I have told you. I do want to impress upon you, however, that the welfare of each one of us is the welfare of all of us, and the welfare of all of us is necessarily the welfare of each one of us. There can be no concentration of Government at Washington, there can be no regimentation of any of the citizens, there can be no suppression of liberties granted us under the Bill of Rights, there can be no suppression of free press or free speech, without affecting all of us. At the end of that road lies dictatorship and nothing else, because just as surely as the sun rises yonder over Clinch Mountain, it is in the very nature of humanity and the very nature of government that if, as and when all criticism can be effectively silenced, love of power, arrogance, and dictatorship will follow as night follows day.

Now, as I have said, this amendment to the conscription act purports to empower the Government to take over these plants. Now, if the Government does take over any industries, and if the Government had 500,000 or 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 men in the armed service, what do you think is going to happen if there is any discontent, or disagreement between the workers in those plants and the military officials? You know just as well as I do what will happen. The military officials will simply pick out from among the soldiers men skilled in operating those industries and they will put them there and they will be working there under assigned duty as soldiers at $21 a month, and labor not in the military service will find itself out. Now, if that should prove to be the case, there is nothing organized labor can do about it, because organized labor cannot strike against the Government even in peacetimes; and manifestly it could not strike against the Government if the military officials chose to replace civil workers with military workers in any commandeered plant. So, then, my friends, don't be fooled by these protestations that labor is not going to be required to make sacrifices along with everybody else in connection with the preparation of the national defense or in time of war.

Now the fact of the matter is, and Major Barry knows this undoubtedly as well as do I, this conscription bill and this amendment to commandeer plants are just two steps toward the enactment of the mobilization plan in peacetime. That mobilization plan would make of the President of the United States, whoever he is, an absolute military dictator. Boards and commissions would be set up to cooperate with the Army and the Navy, but the Army and Navy officers would be in supreme command under the President of the United States. And let me say to you that there is not a single representative of either labor or agriculture provided for on any of those boards and commissions. Not one.

So then it behooves you to be very vigilant against any overconcentration of power, against the danger that may be hidden either in conscription bills or in bills to commandeer the plants of industry.

I think it is only fair to say that Republican administrations have operated this Nation for 42 out of the 50 years between the end of the Civil War and the beginning of the last World War, and except for 4 years of the Cleveland Democratic administration American industry boomed and labor prospered beyond example, and organized labor developed most of its present strength.

During that long period labor was not yet formed into mobile voting groups, and all of the benefits received under Republican rule were granted without cracks of whips or without threats, so common today, and without huge contributions by organized labor to any political war chest.

Everything that was done to improve the condition and position of labor during this period was done because of the party's natural interest in labor. It was sympathetic. The welfare of both labor and the Nation was best served by endowing workmen with certain powers and certain rights to maintain a definite position in our scheme of economic activity.

I remind you of these facts not because the Republican Party has been the only party that has tried to do anything for labor but to remind you that the New Deal administration has not been the only administration that ever tried to do anything for labor.

Now I am not trying to talk politics here. I am merely pointing out that the evolution of American labor has come about through the evolutions of the times, and not through the actions of any particular political party.

Now, you in this convention represent probably one of the most enlightened and able unions of artisans to be found in the United States or in the world. You are men competent to pass upon these questions You are competent to think for yourselves as to the justice or the advisability of a conscription plan; as to the justice or the advisability of trying to conscript wealth and industry; and you are also competent to look beneath the surface of political promises and to see what dangers to the welfare of the worker lie hidden in these measures.

I haven't a doubt in this world that you fully agree with me that we want to keep our Nation out of war if it is humanly possible to do so.

We want to be at peace with every other nation of the world if we can be at peace with them, and we want to continue to expand our own life; we want to continue to improve our own country; we want to continue to discover and produce more and more of the good things of life.

War is destruction, and therefore it is retrogression; it is never progress. You and I know that following the war there will be economic conditions that must react first and most forcibly against the wage earners. Hard times always do.

Economic chaos always affects the workers first. We face today in this country a very grave danger of inflation, and inflation is bound to hit the workers first, because it actually reduces the exchangeability of their wages for goods and services because prices get clear out of bounds.

Personally, I think there has been too much hysteria created by this war scare. I do not think we are in danger of invasion from any source at this time. I do not believe that the pioneer spirit is dead in America. I believe that America not only has the most magnificient production plant, but she has the ablest and the most intelligent workers, the most competent workers, the most energetic workers, and we can get busy in this country and in less time than it can be done in any other country in the world we can produce a national defense that will be adequate to protect us from any possible danger that might threaten us from any source anywhere in the world.

It especially behooves organized labor, my fellow citizens, to be on guard against the hysteria of war. There is no question in my mind, and I do not believe there is any question in your mind, that if we do get into a war, labor will lose many of its rights and privileges. Many of the gains it has made in the last 20 or 30 years would be lost, certainly for the duration of the war, and in all probability for sometime after the duration of the war, and possibly for many generations to come.

I do not know how many of you may be familiar with the 1939 revision of the industrial-mobilization plan, but I can tell you—and I dare say Major Berry knows about this—that there is a provision in the 1939 revision of the 1936 Mobilization Act, which in turn was a revision of an earlier act, providing that the commissions and boards of control set up to aid the Army and the Navy in regimenting all of the men, women, and children in the United States, shall be continued after the termination of the emergency until such time as the Commander in Chief shall decide that the readjustment has taken place and restoration to normal life has come about.

It is never a bad thing and in most cases it is a very good thing, to proceed very cautiously about these matters of war, and it certainly can do no harm for us here today to look at this question squarely, to review a little history, and to see actually what has happened to bring any threat of war to us.

A year has passed since war was declared in Europe. As pointed out recently by a very well known columnist, a movement was started here to amend our Neutrality Act. That act, as you will recall, had been passed originally under the theory that should war come in Europe we might be drawn into it if we put ourselves in the way of making money out of it.

We knew that if our ships ventured into the war zones, or if our bankers loaned money to England and France, if our neutrals traveled on belligerent ships, if, in other words, we put ourselves in the way of being an economic ally of one of the warring powers, we might then reasonably expect the other to become offended at us and thus by a series of provocations get us into war.

As was pointed out by this columnist, the President and his congressional leaders demanded certain amendments to that law. They said that these amendments would strengthen the law, that they would make us actually neutral. When the act was passed, they told the American people that we were now safely insulated from involvement in Europe's war.

Now, let us just recall that since that time not one of the European powers has committed against us any act of war. Not one of them has done anything to us to which we can take exception. None of them has insulted us or crossed our path in any way.

Yet, despite those facts, we have drifted day by day, week by week, closer and closer to war. We have done this not because we have been provoked but because our Government has persistently and insistently created provocation after provocation.

Some of our most prominent Americans have insulted foreign governments and rulers.

We have thrown our aid on the side of one of the belligerents. We all know here today that actually we are neutrals in term only but not in spirit or in action. We have sent food, ships, arms, planes to one of the belligerents. And now we are to send a part of our Navy.

Again I wish to remind you that this is not a discussion of the merits of either side of this armed conflict. I am not discussing here who is right and who is wrong in this war. I am merely pointing out facts which, when put together, make a definite pattern. The great point to remember is that none of this warlike atmosphere has been created as a result of any offense offered to us by any other nation. Every step that is leading us into war has originated in this country; not in Wall Street, not with the bankers, not with industry, but in Washington.

Now, Mr. President and delegates, I cannot too strongly urge upon you the necessity, the vital necessity, for organized labor to be vigilant against this drift toward war, because if we do get into war it is absolutely certain that organized labor cannot possibly gain any advantages but must lose many advantages it has already gained.

Organized labor must be vigilant against this constant trend toward centralization of the Government in Washington and the abolition of State's rights. Organized labor must be constantly vigilant to uphold the Bill of Rights, because no class of our citizens can possibly be more interested in free speech, free press, the right of free assemblage, and the right of petition to the Government than organized labor.

As I said a while ago, America has not lost that great pioneer spirit which motivated our forefathers who came to these unknown shores to escape centralized government, tyranny, and compulsory military service in the armies of Europe. Those pioneers came here for freedom, and from these primeval forests and arid plains they carved out the great Nation which is our heritage today. And even greater than the material resources of this Nation they established as the spiritual and cultural freedom which also is our great heritage of today. We must all, as one people, as one nation, be vigilant to uphold and to perpetuate that great heritage and to pass it on to our children and our children's children unimpaired.

So, then, instead of becoming hysterical over this thing, instead of giving up the Bill of Rights, instead of throwing the labor movement back 50 years, instead of going under some mobilization plan in peacetime under which one man, a military dictator, can regiment all of the people, men, women, and children, let us go about this thing in the American way, with American courage, with American enterprise, and in the American spirit, and do the job.

I am sure, let me say in conclusion, that you gentlemen and the unions which you represent are perfectly ready as patriotic citizens to do your share and more toward protecting this Nation. You are perfectly ready to make whatever sacrifices can be shown to be necesssary. You are perfectly ready, if the time ever comes when any enemy ever seeks to land upon our shores and to invade our homes, to shoulder your guns and go out to meet them. You are perfectly ready to man antiaircraft guns and to capture parachute troops—all that sort of thing. But let me say to you that such things as those are separated from us by 3,000 miles of stormy sea.

So, then, let us look forward not to war but to peace. Let us look forward not to continued depression but to a return to prosperity. Let us look forward to working together as American people should work together. Let us look forward to wiping out class hatreds and sectional jealousies and as one Nation, as a people united, go forward to new progress and to new levels of prosperity.

F. H. A.—Its Excellent Administration

HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 13, 1940

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the very splendid work being performed by the Federal Housing Administration, and I particularly call your attention to the splendid work they are doing in various metropolitan centers. I have a letter addressed to me by Stewart McDonald, Administrator of the Federal Housing Administration, which reads as follows:

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, September 10, 1940.

Hon. EMANUEL CELLER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN CELLER: At the end of June 406,843 New York families had received F. H. A. home-financing loans totaling $39,509,813. These loans were all made by private lending institutions to private citizens. Congress, as you know, in creating the Federal Housing Administration authorized it to insure loans of private-lending institutions and it does not lend Government money.

Of this amount $197,727,214 was obtained by 367,393 families in order to improve, repair, and remodel their properties under the property improvement provisions of title I of the National Housing Act.

In addition, F. H. A. insured loans totaled $198,782,599 in New York for the purpose of financing home ownership for 39,450 families.

New housing for workers in areas of increased industrial activity by reason of the national-defense program has placed a great responsibility upon private construction and financing, which are already responding with enthusiasm and vigor. This response is reflected in the number of new homes being constructed under the F. H. A. program. In fact, with this number currently running approximately 50 percent ahead of the same period last year, we estimate that new-home construction in 1940 will approximate that which took place in 1927–29.

This substantial increase in F. H. A. business will further augment the already stable position of F. H. A. mortgage insurance operations. I am sure it will be of interest to you to know that the estimates for the current fiscal year indicate that this Administration's income will be approximately $9,800,000, in excess of operating expenses.

If you desire, I shall be glad to send you a further summary of F. H. A. operations in New York.

Sincerely yours,

STEWART MCDONALD,
Administrator.

Mr. Speaker, if you go to New York you see miles and miles of splendid homes purchased most cheaply and occupied now by workingmen who have bought them on the installment plan. The sight of these houses occupied by contented families is most cheering and inspiring. This could not have been accomplished had it not have been for the mortgage-guaranty system of the Federal Housing Administration and the fine work being done at the head thereof by Stewart McDonald and his able assistants, Abner H. Ferguson, Ray T. Cahill, Robert B. Smith, and Jay Keegan. [Applause.]

Caught in the Draft

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 14, 1940

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, after I made my broadcast last Monday night entitled "Conscription," I received many letters such as the following:

Just listened to your most intelligent radio address and would like to have a copy of same with other American messages from you that are available. I am personally putting you in the class of my highest liked in Congress; Hiram Johnson, Burton K. Wheeler and those past, La Follette of Wisconsin, and John K. Shields of Tennessee. I mainly want your speeches for my two boys of military age.

Sincerely,

A. B., Jacksonville, Fla.

Another one reads:

I consider myself most fortunate in having just heard your courageous address over the radio tonight. It does my heart good to hear an occasional voice raised in a losing battle for American principles. Your reward will no doubt be the same as that of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, and a few others who have dared to suggest that American interests be held foremost in our minds.

Sincerely,

E. J. F., New York City.

But I also received a few, seven, to be exact, which are not nearly so complimentary. Their authors seemed to think I was too hard on conscription in my evaluation of the benefits or results to be derived from the bill. To that group I wish to say my remarks were only general in nature and very charitable, as I simply classed the current conscription bill as only another false promise and fake cure-all offered the wishful people of America in the name of peace and security from danger. And as I said then, it will fail, just as the so-called Neutrality Act which was held up before us with such glowing promises is failing to safeguard us from war. But I am not going to argue that point now except to say that most assuredly we want preparedness, both individual and national, but preparedness of the right sort. Preparedness which will make us ready for the sort of conflict we are told we are about to face.

Rather in this address it will be my purpose to give some needful and timely advice to the youth of America who may shortly be called into service under the conscription bill now before Congress. Under this bill, men, ages from 21 to 34, inclusive, will probably be taken, ostensibly for 1 year, but actually as provided in this law men will be subject to call thereunder for a period of 15 years and 8 months or until May 1956. Any young man reaching 21 years of age during the next 5 years will also be taken. To these age groups and to their parents and friends I address this message for they need help and advice, judging from the experiences of thousands of World War veterans and as one of whom I speak. Hardly a day goes by that we as Members of Congress do not hear from someone who served in 1917–18 and who has been unable to get what the laws enacted for the benefit of veterans and their dependents provide. One of the main reasons why this situation exists is because of loss of records and because of inability on the part of the veteran or his family to furnish legal and documentary proof of his rights and equity. In other words you must have evidence the same as in courts.

A recent address to the disabled American veterans by Gen. Frank T. Hines, Federal Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, pointed out some statistics which will serve to indicate what I am getting at. You will recall that there were some 4,700,000 men taken into service in the World War. But listen to General Hines. I quote:

The number of widows and children on the rolls on account of non-service-connected World War deaths is now 41,000. The children's rate of compensation on this account is something less than $7 a month. However, the widows rate approximately $30 a month. It should be kept in mind that the data I have just given you relates solely to non-service-connected World War deaths. The persons affected are the widows and orphans of veterans who had service-connected disability, who died of causes unrelated to World War service.

In other words, it is like putting a camel through the needle's eye to get on the compensation or pension roll after the loss of your veteran husband or father, and, as I just said, one of the big reasons for this is because of inability to prove service connection for the death or disability.

You have all heard of the Military Order of the Purple Heart which, as I recall, was instituted by George Washington after or at the time of the Revolution in order to do official honor to those bearing wounds for their country. One of their leaders, National Commander Herbert A. Church, being interested in our future veterans has authorized me to make a statement for them, and it is as follows:

The Military Order of the Purple Heart, an organization composed of men wounded by an act of the enemy, in all of the wars in which the United States has been engaged, joins in full accord in the effort to furnish to the men who are about to enter the service of their country information which will prove to be to their lasting benefit.

The loss of enlistment and service records, whether by careless handling, fire, shell explosion, or any of the many other causes that are attendant upon Army service, is nothing less than catastrophic to the interests of the men who may be concerned. Another cause is one that is fostered and encouraged by the carelessness of the soldier himself. A medical examination is of course obligatory for any one entering the service. One is just as necessary when a man leaves it. Many men who served in the first World War waived their right to that last examination thinking by doing so that they would save time and get back into civilian life much more quickly. They did just that, but now they rue their mistake. Or they failed to state as they left the service that they were suffering from a disability that was not readily apparent to the examining doctor.

Two instances illustrative of these points follow: A man suffered an injury to his back, receiving it while in service. Neither complaint nor history was recorded at time of discharge. He filed claim 2 years after discharge, but the hospital records were hard to find, in fact they were not found until 1929, 10 years after the war. The man is now receiving $100 a month, but has lost compensation up to the year 1929 because no record or history was given by him at the time of his discharge. Another case:

A man suffered from an injury to his leg, from flat feet, and from defective hearing, service connected. The record of the treatment received while still in service was lost. He made no complaint at discharge concerning these disabilities. He is now drawing a permanent total nonservice pension of only $30 per month. Had the record been perfected at time of discharge, he could have been receiving $100 per month as a wounded veteran should.

I can give another case with which I am personally acquainted, where the veteran had had an operation on his neck for cervical adenitis in 1916. He tried to enlist immediately upon the declaration of war in April 1917 but was rejected on account of the scar from the operation, which was presumed to indicate the presence of tuberculosis. He made several other attempts to get into the military service, but without success, until he finally managed to get sent with an infantry draft quota. At camp when examined he stood sidewise to the examining physician so the scar was not noticed and no record made of its presence.

Later on because of exposure to the elements, poor food, and all the extremes of physical strains to which service puts an infantry soldier, the glands in the neck again became infected and after a few days the thin skin on the old scar broke open and pus came out in a steady stream. This veteran also was attacked at the same time with a very bad case of pleurisy. He refused, however, to go to the base hospital for treatment and dressed the scar himself daily for fear he would be hospitalized permanently, or removed from the service. Finally, when he was examined for his discharge, he covered the scar and the opening where the pus was flowing out with a plain piece of adhesive tape. The examiner asked him what it was and he said, "just a boil," so absolutely no record was made of the real situation.

Reaching home the next day he was immediately taken sick and finally ended up with a severe case of inflammatory rheumatism which lasted a year and still troubles him unless a strict diet is observed and careful living habits are followed. A claim was filed and an attempt made to prove the service connection for this party's suffering and ill health, but there was not the slightest evidence in the records to support the facts, so he still carries the full load of the burden caused by his patriotism.

Now, what is the lesson to be learned from these cases by the boys and men who will serve under this Conscription Act, or as volunteers? It is that they should see that everything is made a matter of record, especially those things having to do with their physical and mental welfare, both present and future, and not forgetting their families and dependents. Keep a daily diary or memorandum, putting in the names and addresses of comrades and friends with whom you associate and serve. Also the names and addresses of your officers, especially the captain of your outfit, and the doctors who treat you if you require medical attention. Also the nurses, too, especially if young and beautiful. This is an excellent idea for future protection, and even if not needed it will be a source of pleasure in years to come to be able to communicate with these new friends and fellow comrades.

Now in conclusion let me make one more suggestion. Early in this address I said personal and individual preparedness is needed. When we know from the records in the Surgeon General's Office that the average mental age, of the draftees in the World War I, was 13.08 years, and when we know that 311,000 of them were wholly illiterate, and 712,000 relatively so, or a total of 1,023,000 veterans who could not read or write English, we can wish for something in the way of preparedness besides training in the manual of arms. But because soldiers are not men, but human machines which are trained to commit legalized murder as unconscientiously as a bomb or a torpedo, we know this aspect will receive small attention.

Conscription rather aims to train men so as to make them oblivious of all former knowledge and practice of conscience, and then such machines, which were once men, can easily and indiscriminately be shipped abroad in the same crates as munitions.

So, as the poet has said, the big problem in personal preparedness is to keep your head while all about you are losing theirs. Keep a positive conviction that no matter how much men are made machines, you will not lose your faith in the good in man's nature, in the true in the world, and in the fact that God is in His heaven and eventually by your service, your sacrifice, and faith will triumph over the forces of greed and hate which foment war.

Naval Legislation Enacted by the Seventy-sixth Congress, Third Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL VINSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 14, 1940

STATEMENT BY THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL OF THE NAVY

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement furnished to me by the Judge Advocate General of the Navy:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,

The following bills have been reported by your committee and passed by the House but have not yet become law: H. R. 10406, H. R. 10438, S. 4165.

The March of Democracy

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 14, 1940

BULLETIN OF WOMEN INVESTORS IN AMERICA, INC.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, Women Investors in America, Inc., of which Catherine Curtis, nationally known leader of independent women, is national director, has as its slogan, "We are all investors in America, whether we are stockholders, bondholders, jobholders, or husbandholders."

This independent women's organization, which has membership in every State in the Union, released on August 30 from its national headquarters at 535 Fifth Avenue, New York City, a special bulletin titled "The March of Democracy."

The material contained in this bulletin is of vital interest at this particular time when we hear so much on all sides about democracy. It correctly points out that our country never was intended to be a democracy; that its true, constitutional form of government is a republic. The article is as follows:

THE MARCH OF DEMOCRACY

Today public officials and others in this country speak of our American democracy and state that—to protect it and our liberties—we must join in the defense of the democracies. The founding fathers evidently did not intend our Government to be a democracy, for that word is not found in either the Declaration of Independence or the Constitution. But they did specify a form of government for us in the Constitution in article IV, section 4, which states:

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

What is a democracy? The United States Army Manual, 2000–25, on Citizenship states on page 91:

"Democracy: A government of the masses. Authority derived through mass meeting of any form of 'direct expression.' Results in mobocracy. Attitude toward property is communistic, negating property rights. Attitude toward law is that the will of the majority shall regulate, whether it be based upon deliberation or governed by passion, prejudice, and impulse, without restraint or regard to consequences. Results in demagogism, license, agitation, discontent, anarchy."

This same publication states on page 88:

"The Government of the United States is not a democracy but a republic."

The United States Army Manual 2000–25 is no longer used in teaching our soldiers citizenship. It was withdrawn from use a few years ago as some of the matter contained was found to be of "a controversial nature," according to official statements.

That international authority on world revolution, the late Duke of Northumberland, in his book, History of World Revolution, published in 1931, declared:

"The adoption of democracy as a form of government by all European nations is fatal to good government, to liberty, to law and order, to respect for authority, and to religion, and must eventually produce a state of chaos from which a new world of tyranny will arise."

But we were told we entered the World War "to make the world safe for democracy." Let us see what has happened to nations that adopted that form of government:

Russia: Kerensky brought "democracy" to Russia with the revolution of February 1917. All power was centralized in Moscow. Lenin and Trotsky seized that centralized power in the bloody revolution of October 1917 and established the first Soviet-Communist nation. They would have been unsuccessful had not Kerensky first centralized all government power.

Women were "freed" under Russian "democracy." Children became property of the state. Women were given equal opportunity to work beside men in factory, field, and ditch—while their children were cared for in state-controlled nurseries. Women were even "nationalized"—all men being given equal right to them, with the husband having "first choice," provided he was a member in good standing of the state.

Family ties were broken. Divorce was simplified in keeping with the "new democratic freedom"—for marital ties could be broken by either party appearing before a public official and declaring the marriage ended. Is it any wonder Russian men flocked to its "democracy"? Liberty, such as it is in that country, is for members of the Communist Party only.

Hungary: With the collapse of Hungary in late 1918, Count Karolyi seized control of the government and established a "democracy." He offered the Allies more of his country than they asked, in return for recognition of his regime. Son of a wealthy and aristocratic family, he suffered from physical impairment and was ignored by his own class. He entered politics to satisfy his ego and, for political advancement, associated himself with the "rabble" in his country.

Under his "democracy," Hungary was thrown into chaos—governmental powers centralized, later to be seized by Bela Kuhn Cohen, Trotsky lieutenant operating under orders from Moscow. He established a Soviet state, resulting in the slaughter of 160,000 Hungarian men, women, and children in 9 months. The masses ran riot. Privileges and protection were only for those holding cards in workers' unions. Cohen and his associates—most of whom were imported from Russia—looted the public treasury and taxed wealth into poverty.

His regime continued until Cecile Tormay, noted Hungarian woman author, inspired and organized Hungarian women, revived courage and fight in Hungarian men, and drove Karolyi, Cohen, and their followers from the country. Admiral Horthy then took control of the government. He has continued as dictator. Liberty in Hungary at present is for members of Horthy's party only.

Germany: Democracy was established in Germany with the fall of the Kaiser after the World War. Again came complete government centralization and Hitler—slowly but steadily—marched to dictatorship. Long before this war, basic property rights were ignored. Women were urged to bear more and more children for the protection of the state. Liberty in Germany is for members of the Nazi Party only.

Mexico: Calles promoted democracy in Mexico. He centralized complete powers in Mexico City. He moved to the United States when his term of office ended. His successor immediately began to abuse the centralized powers. Calles returned to Mexico to end that abuse, was thrown in jail, his wealth confiscated, and eventually was expelled from his native land.

His successor seized American oil properties in Mexico. American investors in those properties do not know how much, if anything, they will salvage from their investments. But they do know investors in Russian properties seized by the Soviet democracy never salvaged a penny.

Newspaper reports of the recent elections in Mexico claim citizens not members of, or in accord with, the ruling party were barred from voting. The present ruling party will continue in power, unless the opposition stages a successful revolt, with its usual destruction, suffering, and misery. Liberty in Mexico is for members of the Labor Party only.

Italy: Following the World War, Italy limited the powers of her King and established a partial democracy. The usual centralization of power followed and eventually was seized by Mussolini. Without such centralization, Mussolini never could have become dictator. Property rights are negligible in Italy—were so even before the present war. Women have been granted equal opportunities, and Il Duce urges them to bear more and more children for the state. Liberty in Italy is for members of the Fascist Party only.

Austria: Following the World War, Austria became a republic. Within a few years, it changed to a democracy. Today, Austria is no more. It is part of Germany. Liberty in Austria is for members of the Nazi Party only.

Spain: Also following the World War, Spain established a republic. Soon it, too, changed to a democracy, followed by centralization of power in Madrid. The people discovered this centralization was leading to dictatorship, that a plot was well advanced to declare Spain part of the Soviet union.

That discovery resulted in the most horrible civil war in world history. Spaniards revolted against the communistic plot. The internationalists—Communists, radicals, and liberals—rushed to its defense from all parts of the world. The story of that civil war is one of the most atrocious in the civilized world. While the internationalists were in control of the Government, women were given equal opportunities only to find themselves in the trenches, their womanly rights disregarded and assaulted. Russia, France, and other democracies sent arms and munitions to bolster the Spanish internationalists' resistance, but General Franco's Nationalist army won. Franco now is dictator of Spain. Liberty there is for members of the Nationalist Party only.

France: For many years France was a republic with nationalist policies. Following the World War, step by step, it abandoned its nationalism and republican form of government. Finally, under Leon Blum, called father of the French New Deal, it adopted "democracy" and internationalism as its government policy.

Under Blum's regime, France followed the usual trends of a "democracy"—centralized planned economy, government-controlled prices, unbalanced budgets, riotous government spending, currency revaluation, harassment and restriction of private enterprise, with lowered production, less jobs, and lowered living standards for all except those in power.

Sit-in strikes originated in France under Blum, quickly followed by sit-down strikes in the United States. He led European "democracies" in aiding the Spanish internationalists by stripping his country of defense weapons and sending them to Spain. These were captured by General Franco, turned over to Hitler, and used against France.

France, at war, found her industries in chaos due to Blum's "social reform" laws—her munitions, airplane plants, railroads, and communications practically under control of Communists and internationalists who had risen to power under Blum's protection.

France now is a dictatorship—the result of joining the march of democracy. "Liberty" there is for members of the dictator's party only.

The United States: The trend toward more and more centralization of power in Washington has steadily increased during recent years. This has resulted in continual encroachment, bit by bit, on individual freedom and basic property rights. We have been forced to accept centralized planned economy, currency revaluation, unbalanced budgets, and riotous Government spending. Private enterprise is harassed and restricted by government.

Today, centralized Government control extends over our railroads, radio, utilities, banks, stock and commodity markets, agriculture, labor, and education. Under guise of "emergency" we are asked to accept more and more centralized control.

But we have not quite reached the final stage of "democracy" where "liberty" in the United States is for members of the ruling party only.

Rarely in the messages or statements of our former Presidents, do we find "democracy" mentioned, until popularized by President Wilson during the World War. Since then, our people have been insidiously propagandized to accept "democracy" and forget our guaranteed form of government.

Washington, Jefferson, Madison, John Quincy Adams, Jackson, Harrison, Lincoln, Garfield, Cleveland, and McKinley all spoke and wrote of our republican traditions and institutions. They termed the leaders of our War for Independence the "Fathers of our Republic."

The founders of our Republic deliberately selected that form of government for us because they knew, through its division of powers and decentralization of authority, it guaranteed protection to all. Therefore, they purposely separated the functions of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches, making each independent of the other to protect the rights and liberties of all—minority as well as majority.

The majority of power was placed in the hands of the people's representatives in the Congress and the States. They intended we should look to our elected representatives for protection—not to any one individual in whom all power was centralized. They knew, from Old World experience, centralization would lead to dictatorship and loss of liberty, but a republican form of government would bar that centralization.

It was that basic republican principle of "protection of the rights and liberties of all" that led Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury in Washington's Cabinet, to state:

"We are forming a republican government. Real liberty is never found in despotism or in the extremes of democracy."

And John C. Calhoun, famous South Carolina statesman, to declare:

"The Government of the United States is, of course, a republic, in contradistinction of an absolute democracy; and the theory which regards it as a government of the majority rests on a gross and groundless misconception."

Unquestionably it was recognition of that same basic principle that caused the Supreme Court in 1891 to rule:

"The distinguishing feature of a republican form of government is the right of the people to choose their own officers of governmental administration, and pass their own laws in virtue of the legislative power reposed in representative bodies, whose legislative acts may be said to be those of the people themselves; but while the people thus are the source of the political power, their governments National and State, have been limited by written constitutions, and they have themselves thereby set bounds to their power, as against the sudden impulses of mere majorities."

In view of all this, it is time we gave careful consideration to the famous statements of three outstanding fathers of our Republic. The first is that of James Madison, often referred to as the "Father of the Constitution," who said:

"Democracies have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention; have ever been found incompatible with personal security or the rights of property, and have in general been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their deaths!"

The second is that of Samuel Adams, who declared:

"Remember, democracy never lasts long. It soon wastes, exhausts, and murders itself! There never was a democracy that did not commit suicide!"

And last—but by no means least—is that of Benjamin Franklin, who, when asked at the close of the Constitutional Convention what type of government we were to have—a monarchy or democracy—replied:

"A republic—if we can keep it!"

Will we continue to travel the low road of democracy to national suicide—or will we regain the high road of the republic and keep our independence?

The women of these United States must not forget the part their foremothers played in founding this country—those brave women who stood shoulder to shoulder with their menfolk against wilderness, redskin, and redcoat. Their determination, inspiration, and spiritual ideals spurred on their men to make the vast wilderness a great productive land. Those qualities gave our forefathers the courage to revolt against the tyranny of Old World centralized control, and to establish our Republic.

As we salute our Stars and Stripes, we should remember with pride that a woman gave our Republic that flag—made by her own hands!

Therefore, our women have three powerful investments in these United States—first, the spiritual, which conveys the right to preserve that inspired quality of citizenship directly responsible for founding this free country; second, the physical, which includes the right to a higher standard of living than that enjoyed by women in any other country; and, third, the financial, with the right to own property and freely invest their savings in the private enterprise system for profit, security, and advancement.

Because of women's great contribution to our country and the preferred position they have achieved under our Republic, I recommend they give serious thought to the facts set forth in this bulletin.

As has been pointed out, we have not yet reached the final stage of democracy.

It is reported that George Washington, on laying down his pen after signing the Constitution, said:

"Should the States reject this excellent Constitution, the next will be drawn in blood."

I am convinced that unless our women revive the spiritual ideals and courage of our Revolutionary ancestors, organize as did the women of Hungary, we may well witness the loss of our liberty and independence and the death of our Republic in the days that lie ahead.

Approval of the Conscription Bill Conference Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 14, 1940

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, although I have in nowise changed my opinion that passage of this peacetime conscription measure is unwise and a definite threat to both our peace and our freedom, I want to state very clearly what my position in the matter is now. It has been made the law of the land, the method duly enacted for the manning of the defense forces of our Republic.

I reserve my right to criticize this law as much as any other duly enacted law of the land, as well as my right to urge its amendment or repeal at some future date. But I pledge myself to aid wholeheartedly its efficient administration and just enforcement.

Further than this, as it is now the law I expect to vote for such appropriations as are necessary to put it into effect.

Address Before Tennessee Farm Bureau Federation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. CARROLL REECE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. B. CARROLL REECE, OF TENNESSEE

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address which I delivered before the Tennessee Farm Bureau Federation at its annual convention held in Johnson City in October 1939:

Whenever the subject of our farm problem is brought up, my thoughts revert instinctively to the Biblical story of Joseph in Egypt; the unforgettable story of the 7 fat years and the 7 lean years. I do not attribute this to any strange quirk in my mental processes. Rather do I believe that the explanation lies in the plain fact that the story of American agriculture in our day is a story of 7 fat years followed by 7 lean years.

But there the analogy ends. You will remember how Joseph gambled on 7 lean years following 7 fat years and won. And you cannot forget how the economic planners in Washington gambled on 7 fat years and lost. Yet circumstances have conspired to obscure how close to the brink of disaster this gamble pushed our farmers.

Twice were they shoved to the very edge of the abyss. The first time rising prices caused by drought diverted attention from the danger. And that time dust from the great western bowl got in the eyes of the American people and blinded them to the danger our farmers had so narrowly escaped.

Once again last summer our farmers stood on the brink. Then came the war in Europe and temporary salvation. This time we must not let the smoke of Europe's war get in our eyes and blind us to the fact that the perils of the New Deal farm gamble are just as menacing today as they were before the armies of Europe started to march.

The very inconsistencies of this farm policy also have served to obscure its true character. The quick shifts, the lightning changes of position blur the whole picture. Mental images that once were clear have become vague or perhaps even forgotten. How many of us recall that mental picture, once so clear—that picture of Franklin D. Roosevelt, standing in the convention hall in Chicago on July 2, 1932, accepting the Democratic nomination for President of the United States and declaring with gusto:

"We should repeal immediately those provisions of the law that compel the Federal Government to go into the market to purchase, to sell, to speculate in farm products, in a futile attempt to reduce farm surpluses."

To recall that picture now is enough to bring tears to the eyes of the old potato.

Yet if we will peer closely enough through the haze of the dust storms and through the smoke from European battlefields, we will discern one element of consistency, one major characteristic, that is of the essence of the New Deal farm policy. That element is the gambling element. From beginning to end, this farm policy has been nothing more than a huge gamble with Fate.

It is part and parcel of the New Deal devotion to white magic, the frantic search for a witching formula, a cure for all ills, which it has pursued with the same fanaticism that inspired Ponce de Leon in his quest for the elixir of life.

Stripped of all of its impressive-sounding phrases, such as planned economy and ever-normal granary, it stands revealed in stark outline as a gamble with the welfare and security of our great farm population.

I sometimes wonder if the gamblers do not forget how extensive that population is. Farmers constitute 24 percent of our population of some 130,000,000. That is something to give pause to even the wildest-eyed theorist. Can any administration in good conscience undertake to gamble with the welfare of such a numerous group? Can any party stoop so low as to make their well-being the football of partisan politics?

I do not question the good intentions of those who have toyed with our farm problem for almost 7 years. But I do challenge their method of approach; their willingness to trust to a gamble instead of relying on the lessons of experience. And what has it brought the farmer? Let me quote you the answer that was given to that question by Morris Erickson, of North Dakota, a director of the National Farmers' Union. Said Mr. Erickson, in a radio address over the National Broadcasting Co.'s system, on June 24, last:

"While farmers constitute more than 24 percent of the population of the United States, they receive less than 11 percent of the national income."

"These brief figures sum up, to a great degree, the cause of the numerous problems which beset agriculture."

Now, let me review for you briefly the efforts that have been made to solve those problems and the pathetic results that have attended them.

The original A. A. A. contained obvious weaknesses. But, the old A. A. A. did not ruin the farmers nor the country. It had no chance to do so. Before its fallacies could produce their logical effect in the production of a crushing wheat surplus, the drought intervened. * * * Before the effects of the drought were off, the Supreme Court intervened.

Instead of thanking Providence for this deliverance from the consequences of their own folly and buckling down to the job of working out a real farm program which would take into consideration all of the diverse factors involved, the theorists went off on another gambling spree.

They pulled out of the top hat a whole litter of white rabbits which were sold to the public under the names of soil conservation, agricultural adjustment, and what not. It was another gamble—taking a wild chance on being able to repeal the economic law of supply and demand as related to agricultural products and to substitute for it price fixing—for governmental loans on stipulated commodities are nothing else.

You will recall that the first Agricultural Adjustment Act was put on the statute books in May of 1933 and that it actually swung into operation in July 1933. Now let us look at the net results of our farm-relief legislation 6 years later, in July 1939, before the situation was complicated by the effects of the war in Europe. And, in a spirit of fairness, I want to say that the United States was not the only nation to suffer from the handiwork of economic planners.

Let us begin with wheat. In July there was virtually no important country in the world which did not have a government wheat plan of some sort. Statisticians have calculated that various governments were spending more than $2,000,000,000 annually in an effort to hold up grain prices. After all their activities in recent years, the prospective world supply of wheat for 1939–40 was placed at 5,290,000,000 bushels, the greatest on record, while wheat had fallen in the Liverpool market to the lowest prices reached since Queen Elizabeth's time. By a tariff and Government loans, we had kept American wheat from falling quite so low.

It became strikingly apparent that some of our policies had made the plight of the American wheat grower worse instead of better. There was unmistakable evidence of the futility for a country that grows wheat for export to adopt an acreage restriction scheme. Our own restriction was not great enough to affect the world price, but it reduced farm income by reducing the amount of wheat we had to sell.

We tried but failed to help ourselves by subsidizing wheat for export. In combination with other countries doing the same thing, the result was merely to push down the world price further.

In the 12 months ended on June 30, 1939, the United States Government sold 93,754,000 bushels of wheat in the export markets at a loss to the Government of $25,700,000, or 27.4 cents a bushel. In other words, the foreign consumer was able to get his wheat cheaper at the expense of the American taxpayer. That is not the way to enrich either the farmer or the Nation.

Corn in July was selling at the lowest prices since 1933. For this again our own Government policy must bear a large share of the blame. Last year and the year before the Government made "nonrecourse" loans to enable the farmers to hold large stocks of corn off the market. The loan rate was made so attractive that it even paid farmers to build extra cribs to store on their own farms the corn under Government loan.

The result of all this was that the farmers withdrew from the market and stored in their own cribs some 257,000,000 bushels of 1937 and 1938 corn. This helped to keep up prices for a time, but since the loans matured on August 1—and unfortunately all loans do mature—fear that the Government would be forced to take 100,000,000 bushels or more of the grain in satisfaction of the matured loans and sell it started to depress the market.

I happened to pick up a newspaper the other day and came upon an article by William P. Black, which, in my opinion, is an illuminating commentary on this situation. Mr. Black was making a motor trip through the corn belt of Illinois and without even getting out of his car was able to observe striking symbols of the difficulties of the corn planters of the A. A. A. Said he:

"On one side of the road may be seen a group of the Government's shiny new galvanized steel storage bins erected or being erected to take care of the surplus 1938 loan corn which the farmers declined to hold another year on their own farms.

"On the other side is a field holding a bumper crop of 1939 corn and carrying a sign which proudly states that this corn has been grown from Funk, Pfister, or De Kalb hybrid seed.

"The bins are evidence that the farmer grew too much corn in 1937 and 1938 despite all the efforts of the A. A. A. to hold production close to consumption. They are evidence that the farmers, or at least a large number of farmers, are willing to play along with the ever normal granary idea of the A. A. A. only if the Government does the storing of old corn at its own expense and risk.

"The signs are evidence of the intensification of yield per acre which has gone very far to offset the A. A. A.'s reduction of the acreage seeded. They are evidence also of the strong promotional advertising campaign of the hybrid seed suppliers which this year caused Illinois farmers to plant more than half of their corn acreage in hybrid, and which has brought the State the highest yield per acre ever recorded.

"Larger billboards at highway curves expound more fully the advantages of hybrid seed over the old varieties. They show that the seed suppliers are battling tooth and nail for their share of this new business which owes at least a part of its beginnings to the research of Secretary Henry Wallace on his Iowa seed farm, and a good deal of its expansion to the A. A. A. regulations tending to limit the corn acreage planted, but setting no restrictions on the intensification of per-acre yield."

Mr. Black then goes on to say, and note this carefully:

"At a hotel in Peoria, the traveler met James Wallace, brother of the Secretary, and now an official of the Wallace family's pioneer hybrid seed company. With three associates he was, in the course of a trip, to lay the foundations for an increased Illinois distribution of his company's seed, now a leading brand in Iowa."

What do you think of that? But listen; that isn't all. The next day I picked up another newspaper and read that the A. A. A. is planning a 1940 corn program calling for an acreage reduction in 12 States, averaging approximately 10 percent.

Here is an exhibition that would have warmed the heart of that master of the art of exhibition of curious oddities and strange freaks, the late P. T. Barnum. Why, it's one of the greatest brother acts of all time. Henry, sitting in Washington, in the chair of the Secretary of Agriculture, ordering a cut of 10 percent in corn acreage. Brother Jim, traveling up and down through the Corn Belt selling the Wallace company's seed with the argument that it will increase the yield per acre. Henry cuts down the number of acres. Jim sells the seed to increase the per-acre production to offset the cut.

But let us get back again to the prices the farmer has been getting for his crops. Were it necessary, I could take up crop after crop, as I have taken up corn and wheat, and show you that in the case of each crop the drop in price has been comparable to the declines in wheat and corn. I have no intention, however, to so presume upon your time and patience or to burden you with dry statistics. Suffice it to say that on July 15, 1939, exactly 6 years after the New Deal farm program was put into operation, the market price of oats, barley rye, buckwheat, potatoes, flaxseed, cotton, butterfat, and wool were lower than they were on July 15, 1933.

It is the July and the August figures which enable us to make comparisons which are the real measure of the success or the failure of the New Deal farm policy. In September and October, as today, the figures reflect the war influence. When Hitler started out to take control of Poland on that day the war started to take control of farm prices.

So it is quite beside the point for apologists for the 6 years of failure to make good the President's promise in his radio fireside talk of October 22, 1933, to raise farm prices; his boast that "if we cannot do this one way, we will do it another. Do it we will." It is idle for these apologists to assert that the rise in prices since the start of the war has added about $1,000,000,000 to farm income and has reduced by about $120,000,000 the Government's losses on wheat and corn loans. But for the war disaster would have overtaken us. And the war at least is something of which not even the most enthusiastic new dealer would have the temerity to say, "We planned it that way." It was just another gamble and another lucky break.

And let me tell you this: Don't get too optimistic over the farm outlook because of the war and the repeal of the arms embargo and the cash-and-carry provisions of the Neutrality Act. The plain facts are that a goodly share of the reduction of our crop surpluses since the beginning of the war has been due to the operations of speculators who had visions of unloading later at a huge profit.

The best-informed opinion in trade circles today runs contrary to this point of view. Observers believe that because of the cash-and-carry provisions, the Allies will limit so far as possible their purchases in this country to arms and ammunition, because they cannot obtain credit, but must pay for what they buy in cash and take their purchases away in their own ships.

For products they are likely to turn to countries where they can arrange convenient credit terms and have their purchases delivered, freeing their own ships for the transportation of arms and ammunition from America. Let me quote briefly from a syndicated article by John T. Flynn, economic authority, which appeared in the newspapers on October 25. Said Mr. Flynn:

"A glance at the records of the board of trade (in Chicago) reveals that there is plenty of speculating in wheat and that the turn-over is heavy among those who have no use for wheat save to gamble in its price.

"But every factor in the situation should make for a lower price. The estimate of the Government as to the prospects of the new crop has been increased. Then by whom and how is the price of wheat being held up?

"It is said in Chicago that Canada is not getting the orders from England for wheat which she expected. That is why wheat is 73 cents there. She is not getting the orders because England is buying wheat in those markets where the Germans go for wheat, in order to prevent the Germans from getting it.

"But if the English are not buying wheat from Canada at 73 cents, is it possible to believe that they are buying it from the United States at 85 cents? That does not make sense. And if the war countries are not buying wheat, and if our enormous surplus remains hanging over the market, and if the outlook for the next crop is greater, then who is buying it in such quantities as to send the price up?"

Who, indeed? as Mr. Flynn asks. Why, the speculators, of course! Heaven help the American farmer if he is placed at the mercy of the wheat-pit speculators!

Now let's look at this New Deal farm policy from another angle, the angle of parity. Ah, parity! That's a term on which the new dealers used to roll their tongues. In the early days of the New Deal enthusiasms, whenever there was talk of farm prices there was always talk of parity. Well, how about it? Let's see.

The objective of this parity of which we heard so much was to restore to farmers the same purchasing power for their commodities in relation to manufactured articles they themselves purchased that prevailed in the 5-year period immediately preceding the World War.

In 1932, the average of farm prices was only 65 percent of that existing in the pre-war 5-year period from 1909 to 1914. This year the average is about 89 percent. Thus, the average gain from 1932 to 1939 is 37 percent.

But the nonagricultural price level has also risen, although by no corresponding margin. The gain, as compared with 1932, is 11 percent. In 1932, at the bottom of the depression, the ratio of prices received by farmers to the prices they paid for what they had to buy was 61 percent of the pre-war parity. Today this ratio has risen to 74 percent, which, of course, is slightly less than three-quarters of the administration's coveted goal.

In plain words, the ratio in 1932 was 39 points short of pre-war parity. Today it is 26 points. There has been a gain of only 13 points, or exactly one-third of the ground that must be regained in order to attain the administration's objective. The failure to achieve the announced purpose therefore is crystal clear.

Now let's forget all about parity prices and look at actual prices. Here again we find only a record of failure. On the basis of figures made public by the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the total gross farm income for the 7 years from 1926 to 1932, inclusive, was $73,718,000,000. For the 7-year period from 1933 to 1939, inclusive, it amounted to only $61,000,000,000 and this total included more than $2,000,000,000 of Government payments to farmers. And incidentally the estimate of the 1939 income for the farmers is about $8,000,000,000 which does not compare favorably with the $10,469,000,000 they received in 1929 or the $15,300,000,000 in post-war 1919.

Here is our striking comparison between the 7 fat years of Republican administration and the 7 lean years under the New Deal. It is true that some of the so-called fat years were none too fat for the farmer, but the fact that in the last 7 years the loss suffered by farmers by comparison amounts to $12,000,000,000 is staggering. Add to this the fact that the loss would have been $15,000,000,000 had it not been for payments by the Government and the figures become overwhelming.

"It would seem far better to revise our policies so as to restore the higher farm incomes of the years 1926 to 1932, which included both prosperity and depression, and hence a normal average income. If we could restore the 1926 to 1932 farm incomes, the farmer would have more income without asking for Government payments. Farmers are upright, independent citizens who prefer asking no favors of anyone, but they do insist upon their right to supply the American market with American-raised farm products."

This observation on the right of the American farmer to supply the American market with American-raised products serves to remind us of the inherent conflict between the farm policy and the reciprocal trade treaty policy which the administration has been attempting to pursue at the same time. It results, of course, from the attempt to find a formula for each individual problem and the failure to recognize that most of our problems are inextricably intertwined. When any one of them is tackled without regard for the others the result is likely to be, indeed, actually has been, a pulling in opposite directions which produces little of good and much of evil.

Thus, while our farm policy has had as its objective the reduction of surpluses, even if such reduction has to be accomplished by outright payments to the farmers with the taxpayers' money, in many cases our reciprocal-trade policies have tended to increase our surpluses.

I do not need to remind you of the influx of eggs, turkeys, and other farm commodities into the United States market following the treaty with Canada. Nor do I need to remind you of the constantly increasing stream of imports which is subjecting our farmers and our cattlemen to grossly unfair competition.

Despite my earnest desire not to tax your patience, I am going to ask your indulgence to permit me to recite a few of the import figures of the Department of Commerce which have a very direct bearing on this matter of reciprocal-trade treaties and our duty to preserve the American market for the American farmer.

These figures for the first 6 months of 1939 show that imports of cattle amounted to 486,497 head, compared with 242,584 head for the corresponding period of 1938. Imports of other meat products, which include beef, pork, and poultry, amounted to 79,472,315 pounds compared with 75,884,822 pounds last year, and the total value of the imports of merchandise for the first 6 months of 1939 amounted to $1,071,731,563, compared with $943,315,226 for the comparable 1938 period.

American farmers engaged in the production of hogs should be told in all candor that despite the falling prices for their pork products the importation of pork still continues on a large scale. For the first 6 months of 1939 the imports of cheaply produced pork amounted to 25,827,000 pounds, against 25,661,000 pounds for the same period in 1938.

Our domestic market also is being flooded with cheaply produced fats and oils, which also work to the detriment of the farmer. On August 15 last the wholesale cash price of lard in the New York market fell to 5 cents, a low for the current year and 2 cents less than the price on May 12, 1933, the day the first A. A. A. came into being.

I do not believe there is any need to caution you not to mistake the upswing of farm prices due to the war in Europe for a return of permanent prosperity and a solution of our farm problem. It is just another shot in the arm. Indeed, some of its effects already are beginning to wear off. The latest report of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, for instance, has this to say:

"Prices of slaughtered cattle declined unevenly after the sharp advance in early September, but in the first week of October were somewhat above the low level reached in mid-August." Somewhat above the low level reached in mid-August. What irony.

Even Secretary Wallace, whose credulity at times seems to surpass all human understanding, is not deceived about this war boom in farm commodities. Last summer the Secretary was tearing his hair in an effort to find still another new scheme to increase farm prices. Now he is going around voicing a warning against the danger of a war boom. He is pointing out that the rise in farm prices in all likelihood will be followed by a slump of corresponding proportions. He is cautioning farmers who are receiving higher prices for their produce to get their storm cellars ready for rough winds in the offing. That, in my opinion, is sound and timely advice.

So where does all of this discussion of our farm problem get us? It leads us, I believe, to the conclusion that all New Deal efforts to solve the problem have failed; that in some respects the problem is even more serious than it was when the New Deal so gleefully undertook to find the right answers by procedure that smacked more of flipping a coin than of thoughtful and painstaking analysis, and that a new start must be made and a new method applied

That is precisely what the Republicans in Congress have undertaken to do. Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., of Massachusetts, Republican leader in the House, several weeks ago announced the appointment of a committee to make an exhaustive study of agricultural problems. CLIFFORD R. HOPE, of Kansas, ranking Republican member of the Committee on Agriculture, was named chairman.

As to objectives and methods, I do not think there can be clearer exposition than that given by Mr. MARTIN when he announced formation of the committee. At that time he said:

"The many conditions involved in the depressed and unhealthy state of American agriculture cannot be remedied by any single formula. The factors which have operated to reduce agriculture to its present unhappy plight have arisen from causes which extend throughout the entire economic structure of America and the world.

"Some of these causes are due to changes incident to the progress of civilization, technological advancements, and alterations in the mode of life and habits of entire peoples, including those of America, and are permanent. Other factors also involve foreign markets, industrial unemployment at home, sectional, soil, and climatological conditions, each of which must be dealt with in a special way.

"The administration's farm policy is now a demonstrated failure. The so-called remedies have proved to be merely temporary expedients of no permanent value.

"The first prerequisite to an intelligent effort to solve the problems confronting American agriculture is a careful study of each problem and its relation to the others. In order to achieve a comprehensive study of the agricultural problems from the viewpoint of working out permanent solutions, I have named a large study committee composed of Republican Members of the House who have a special knowledge of the various phases of agriculture. In order to encompass the wide range of study and analysis necessary this committee will have to be subdivided into subcommittees, each of which will study one phase or problem.

"The divisions of study fall generally into the following categories: 1. Dairying, poultry, eggs, etc. 2. Livestock, meats, etc. 3. Wheat. 4. Corn and hogs. 5. Potatoes. 6. Vegetables and canning industries. 7. Wool. 8. Cotton and other southern crops, competition, etc. 9. Fruits. 10. Sugar. 11. Farm chemurgy. 12. Soil conservation. 13. Irrigation. 14. Foreign markets, reciprocal-trade treaties, and effects; dumping, barter, etc. 15. Marketing, cost of production, processing, etc. 16. Tobacco. 17. Farm credits.

"It will be necessary to reconcile as far as possible conflicting sectional interests in order that the whole agricultural question may be constructively approached from the standpoint of national welfare.

"It is imperative we work out an affirmative and constructive approach to the rescue of agriculture. It is an outstanding problem and upon our efforts in behalf of the farmer will depend in a large measure the future prosperity of our country."

That is an agricultural program to which I believe all of you can heartily subscribe. You will note that it is no hit-or-miss scheme, no quack remedy, no shot in the arm, but a scientific approach to a problem as important as it is difficult, and which will defy solution unless, as this program does, all of the various factors involved are carefully weighed and balanced.

Benefits of Farm Relief Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED CUMMINGS

OF COLORADO

LIVESTOCK

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, on August 15, 1940, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article published in the Farmers' Union Herald showing the prices of grain on December 24, 1932. Today I am placing a similar statement regarding the prices of livestock on the Chicago market on December 23, 1932, and August 27, 1940.

On December 23, 1932, choice yearling steers sold for $7.25; several loads, $6.40 to $7. On August 27, 1940, fat steers, $13.10, some higher; numerous loads, $12 to $13. Hogs, 1932, top, $2.30; good to choice, 140 to 180 pounds, $2.75 to $2.80; packing sows, $2 to $2.25. Hogs, 1940, top, $7.65; good to choice, 190 to 240 pounds, $7.45; sows, $5.40 to $6.65. Lambs, 1932, many loads well finished, 79 to 90 pounds, and fed westerns, $6.25 to $6.40; fat ewes, $1.75 to $2. Lambs, 1940, 25 lower, some good handy weights, $9.50 to $9.75; native ewes, steady, $3.50 to $3.75.

The above increase in prices had a very material effect on the bank accounts in the sections where they raise livestock. For instance, the principal industry in Wyoming is the raising of livestock. In 1933 they had 64 banks with total deposits of $40,366,000. In 1939 they had 58 banks with a total deposit of $70,034,000, or approximately a gain of 72 percent. Colorado, a neighboring State, whose principal industry is farming and the growing of livestock, in 1933 had 139 banks with a total deposit of $203,455,000, and in 1939, 145 banks with deposits of $344,431,000, or an increase of approximately 69 percent. The bank-guaranty law, a part of the New Deal program, insures a return of those deposits. No small part of the 1933 deposits were lost in bank failures.

In 1933 you could not borrow a dollar on any farm in the United States at any rate of interest, and mortgages were being foreclosed by the hundreds of thousands. Now you can borrow it at 3½ percent. The Government has loaned $2,000,000,000. Foreclosures on farm mortgages have decreased 69 percent.

Farm income in 1932 was $4,628,000,000. The estimate for 1940 is $9,000,000,000. In 1933 you sold wheat or corn for any price that was offered at the elevators. Wheat in Liverpool recently was the lowest in 342 years. Yet it sold in the United States for twice the 1933 price. The growers of wheat have borrowed $46,000,000 and the growers of corn $146,562,000. Those loans are absolutely sound. In case of a drought there will be no shortage of bread and no sacrificing of livestock.

SUGAR

People in my district are interested in sugar; in fact, I believe everyone in the United States is. Farmers' income from sugar beets and cane in 1933 was $68,364,000 and in 1939, $90,411,000. In 1932, with a net sugar price of $3.50 per hundred, the growers of beets received $4.56 per ton. In 1940, after deducting the 50-cent processing tax, the same priced sugar nets them $6.20 per ton. In addition to this, the present law also provides liberal payments in case it is necessary to abandon the crop. In 1933 the people who furnished 98 percent of the sugar consumed in the United States, realizing the necessity of doing something to bolster the market, met in Washington and signed a quota agreement. This agreement provided for practically the same quotas that are in existence today. In 1932–33 the world production of sugar was 28,872,000 tons and in 1938–39, 34,719,000 tons. This is an increase of about 23 percent. War conditions in Europe have destroyed a large part of the market for offshore cane. This sugar is accumulating in the hands of the growers and is a threat to future prices.

The 20 republics invited to the recent Pan American Conference in Havana produced during the 1938–39 crop season approximately 5,600,000 long tons of sugar. They consumed 2,400,000 tons, and exported more than 3,000,000 tons. For the current season crop production is estimated at 5,800,000 tons, of which 3,400,000 tons will be available for export. Europe cannot take this sugar. It cannot come to the United States without a complete disruption of our market, and tremendous losses to all elements of the domestic industry. This makes it absolutely necessary to have a quota if we are to receive anything like a reasonable price for our sugar beets.

There is a good deal of discussion at the present time regarding the attitude of the Democratic and Republican Parties on agriculture legislation. I have been a member of the Agriculture Committee since the spring of 1933. All legislation affecting agriculture is first considered by this committee. Let us read the record.

President Roosevelt called an extra session of Congress in March 1933. On May 12 the first Agriculture Adjustment Act was signed. There were 60 Democrats in the Senate and 34 Republicans. In the House there were 309 Democrats and 117 Republicans. Sixty-five percent of the House Republicans voted against the three-A bill, and 52 percent of the Senate Republicans opposed the measure. Ninety-one percent of the Democrats in the House, and 92 percent of the Democrats in the Senate voted for it. The Hoosaic-Mills decision of the Supreme Court in January 1936 declared this act unconstitutional. Congress then enacted the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act. Seventy-seven percent of the House Republicans voted against it, and 89 percent of the Democrats in the House supported it. Sixty-nine percent of the Republicans in the Senate voted against it, and 82 percent of the Democrats for it. In 1937, when the question of parity payments was before the House for consideration, on a motion to recommit the bill, which was a vote to kill the parity payments, 95 percent of the Republicans voted for it. It was a direct vote against parity payments.

In the fall of 1937 Congress met in special session to enact new farm legislation. In February of the following year the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 became a law. This act contained the conservation program and provided for an ever-normal granary to stabilize supplies and prices of farm products. An important feature of the act was the authorization of parity payments to the producers of five basic crops. The new act also provided for crop insurance on wheat. On the passage of this bill 87 percent of the Republicans voted against it. In the Senate 81 percent of the Republicans opposed it and 79 percent of the Democrats voted for it. In 1939 when the parity payments were again up for consideration the vote of the conference report on June 22 showed 86 percent of the Republicans voted against it. In March 1940 when parity payments were again voted on, 86 percent of the Republicans voted against and 81 percent of the Democrats voted for it. On August 1, 1940, 73 percent of the Republican Members in the House voted against increasing the available capital of the Commodity Credit Corporation from $900,000,000 to $1,400,000,000. If the Republicans had had their way, the farmers who raised corn, cotton, wheat, and tobacco would have lost their opportunity to get Government loans on those commodities this year. That is the record.

Since the close of the first World War 83 percent of the Democrats in Congress have supported farm-relief legislation and only 39 percent of the Republicans. In the 12 years the Republicans were in power 68 percent of the Democrats voted for farm legislation, and in the last 7 years 85 percent of the Democrats have voted for farm legislation and 78 percent of the Republicans have opposed it.

Just how has this affected Colorado?

INCOME

Farmers make more money—1939 cash income up 83 percent from 1932; buying power, 171 percent from 1932; farm real-estate values in 1940, up 13 percent from 1933; 149,174 acres of 1940 wheat protected by crop insurance; 2,047,537 bushels of wheat were put in the ever-normal granary under 1939 commodity loans; $71,753,015 loaned by Farm Credit Administration agencies from 1933 to 1939; debts of low-income farmers reduced $1,395,237 under Farm Security Administration debt-adjustment service; 16,449,000 pounds of surplus foodstuffs distributed to needy in last fiscal year.

CONSERVATION

Farmers are conserving their soil—38,000 Colorado farmers participated in the 1939 A. A. A. program, representing about 85 percent of the State's cropland; 1,563,560 acres covered by 5-year agreement with the Soil Conservation Service in 1939; 281,400 trees distributed for planting during 1939.

SECURITY

Farmers are more secure in their homes—13,700 farm families received rural rehabilitation loans totaling more than $1,674,400 from 1935 to 1940; $1,875,926 made in grants in the same period; 44 tenant families started toward ownership by loans for farm purchases; 2,576 miles of rural electric lines to serve 8,301 farm families made possible by allotments of Rural Electrification Administration; 3,355 more farmers getting central-station electric service in 1939 than in 1935.

DEMOCRACY

Farmers help run the programs—56 county A. A. A. offices with 1,435 county and community committeemen administer A. A. A. program locally; 51 county committees and 20 tenant purchase committees working on program of Farm Security Administration; 75 local national farm-loan associations and 8 production credit associations in operation; 38 county land-use planning committees formed.

Not a bad record.

OF
HON. CARL HINSHAW
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 14, 1940

LETTER OF K. K. KAWAKAMI, AUTHOR OF ARTICLE

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, in justice to Mr. K. K. Kawakami, author of the article, Far Eastern Triangle, I submit the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 13, 1940.

Hon. CARL HINSHAW,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I feel myself honored to have my Foreign Affairs article reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at your instance. However, I wish to make a few observations on your introductory remarks.

Your remark that my story is couched in difficult diplomatic language is a great surprise to me. I thought that I used the language of the man in the street.

Then, too, I do not feel myself complimented when you say that the article might have been written by the Japanese Foreign Office, and that in any event it must have been approved by that office.

I dashed off that article in a single day, as newspapermen are always in a hurry, and sent it off to Foreign Affairs. I do not write in diplomatic jargon. I confess you are the only gentleman who has said that the article is difficult to understand.

The ideas I express and words I use are my own. My ideas often run counter to the policy of the Japanese Government, but I do not hesitate to express them. I am not in touch with the Japanese Foreign Office. I do not even go to the Japanese Embassy here, except once in a few months.

You may be interested in reading Far Eastern Policy of the United States, by Prof. A. W. Griswold, of Yale University. In fact, my article was inspired by that remarkable book.

Daniel A. Reed Assails "Wallace, the Destroyer"

HON. LOUIS E. GRAHAM
OF PENNSYLVANIA

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED]:

DANIEL A. REED ASSAILS "WALLACE THE DESTROYER"

WASHINGTON.—Congressman DANIEL A. REED, of New York, charged Wednesday that the new dealers already are making plans to continue their program of reckless squandering of public funds should the third-term attempt prove successful in the November elections.

"The evidence is clear that the third-termites despise every thought of prudent policy," REED said. He cited a recent speech by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, in which the New Deal Vice Presidential nominee praised public squandering since 1933 as an achievement of statesmanship.

"Wallace the Destroyer naturally is not disturbed by the fact that the New Deal has more than doubled the Federal debt in 7½ years. A public official who destroyed more than 10,000,000 head of livestock belonging to the farmers of America, and who then plowed under more than 15,000,000 acres of American crops, obviously would not hesitate to spend other people's money for any cause. The new dealers have been wallowing so long in the United States Treasury that they cannot bear to think of the time—now close at hand—when they will be limited to spending their own funds."

Congressman REED said the Maine election foretold a solid national victory for the Republicans in November.

"The Republican vote in Maine last Monday was the largest, in percent of the total vote cast, since 1928, when the Republicans recorded the greatest national landslide in the history of the party.

"Millions of real American Democrats from coast to coast have repudiated Roosevelt's violent third-term ambitions. With dictatorship engulfing all of Europe and Asia, no real American Democrat will vote for one-man government in the United States

"Our mighty Nation has been weakened by New Deal squandering and demoralized by Roosevelt's broken promises. Recovery has been sacrificed to starry-eyed experimentation. More than 10,000,000 unemployed have been kept out of jobs. But even in this crippled condition, the Nation is not yet ready for a Roosevelt dictatorship. What ground is there for a hope that the authors of court-packing and purge would not quickly embrace all the other methods and devices of dictatorship, if elected for a third term?"

REED recalled President Roosevelt's 1932 promise to reduce Federal expenditure "by not less than 25 percent." Instead, he added, the routine expenses of the National Government, exclusive of defense, have more than doubled. But spending has not brought prosperity.

"The United States per-capita income in 1929 was $672. For 1940, according to the latest Commerce Department reports, our adjusted per-capita income will be only $645. These figures mean only one thing—that the New Deal is dragging America to a constantly lowered standard of living for all the people—the farmer, the worker, and the businessman alike.

"Every year under Roosevelt has brought at least six Roosevelt 'emergencies.' The Nation has lived constantly in an atmosphere of tumult and crisis. And now, after they have tried every device of squandering, Wallace, the Destroyer, tells the American people the New Deal should be given 4 years more to complete its work.

"But the American people have no more time for brain-trust theories. There is important work to be done. We must build up our national defenses. We must catch up on 7 years of New Deal neglect and incompetence. This is a practical job, for practical men. It cannot be accomplished by the Roosevelt-Wallace-Hopkins squanderbund.

"The American people are patient where noble purposes and honest intentions are evident. But our people are in no mood today to place the stamp of approval on an administration which has bluffed through for 7 years by the ignoble devices of trickery and tyranny.

"America is in a mood of rededication. The people are out to reclaim their Government from its despoilers."

Plot To Make United States British Colony

EDITORIAL FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Gaelic American, New York, of September 7, 1940:

[From the Gaelic American, New York, September 7, 1940]

PLOT TO MAKE UNITED STATES BRITISH COLONY

"Union Now" is the title of a society formed a few weeks ago by Clarence K. Streit, who was for 10 years the New York Times correspondent at Geneva, later the same paper's Washington correspondent, and now connected with the Twentieth Century Foundation, a New York Times concern. Union Now is for an immediate merger or alliance of the United States with Great Britain, Canada, Ireland, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand. In the early months of 1939, after Mr. Streit's return from Geneva, he delivered three lectures at the Cooper Foundation at Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania, in which he advocated a superstate which he referred to as a union of the North Atlantic democracies and the countries which he would unite were at that time United States, United Kingdom, France, Canada, the Netherlands, Belgium, Australia, Sweden, Switzerland, Denmark, Finland, Ireland, Norway, South Africa, and New Zealand.

His revised plan is for a merger of the United States with the British Empire. In a broadcast over WMCA on August 26, under the auspices of Union Now, he made a plea for an immediate merger of the Republic and the Empire. Nothing short of this union will satisfy Mr. Streit's desire to safeguard the British Empire. His speech was broadcast to South and Central America and to Europe. The same program is heard three times a week over the same radio station, WMCA. Who is paying for carrying Mr. Streit's voice all over the world? The cost is very considerable, too much for any private individual.

Mr. Streit, as a Rhodes scholar, spent a full term at Oxford University, England. His training in internationalism at the fountain head of English imperialism gave him inspiration for the plan which he is now trying to foist on the American people.

Cecil Rhodes, the founder of the scholarships, according to his will, had the ambition to bring the world under English rule and in particular, the United States. The Diamond King's scholarships were intended to spread friendship for the British Empire and to inculcate respect in the minds of the Rhodes scholars for English institutions. The Rhodes scholars, and more particularly those from the United States, receive special care at Oxford Part of the scheme is to treat them with kindness, to invite them to the castles and mansions of the titled caste on week ends and short vacations. Everything is done to make them at home and impress them with the importance of the empire. They acquire an English accent and mannerisms and a number of them became more English than the English themselves. It is only those of independent minds and sturdy Americanism who retain a regard for their own institutions. Those who succumb to the blandishments of their fellow students regard England as the greatest country in the world, even greater than their own Republic.

The revised scheme formulated by this product of the Rhodes foundation would place the United States under a supergovernment of which the United States would be one of the seven countries, of which five are outside the American continent and Canada is a British Dominion. This would give the United States only one vote in the union outlined by Streit.

In this union of seven states, England would have six votes, and in case of any disagreement the United States would be outvoted 5 or 6 to 1. This is not a very inviting position for the United States to assume after more than 150 years of complete independence and her present position as the most powerful nation in the world.

Mr. Streit's plan follows that outlined in Carnegie's prophecy that the United States would again unite with Great Britain. In his book Triumphant Democracy, published in 1893, the late iron king states: "Let men say what they will; therefore I say that as sure as the sun in the heavens once shone on Britons and Americans united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again the re-United States, the British-American union."

To this purpose Carnegie bequeathed a large part of his legacies, and in particular to the endowment for international peace. Among the many activities of the endowment is the creation of the international mind, which would weaken American patriotism and make college students citizens of the world rather than American nationalists. Both Cecil Rhodes and Andrew Carnegie would make the entire world the patrimony of England and relegate the United States into the subordinate position of a British colony. The Rhodes and Carnegie foundations have the same purpose—that of bringing the world under the jurisdiction of a power that has already annexed by conquest more than a quarter of the world's surface.

So far the Rhodes scholars have not attained to any commanding position in their own country. Their sojourn at Oxford has not helped them to gain any unusual prominence in the United States. This English training has undoubtedly undermined their Americanism without adding in any appreciable degree to the qualities which make for success—political, business, or professional—in the land of their birth.

Mr. Streit will not impress his countrymen with his panacea for world amity by the establishment of a union in which the United States would be submerged by England. Is England a democracy? What do the more than 300,000,000 of India ruled by English bureaucrats know about democracy? Will America be placed in a fantastic union under the tender mercies of Great Britain and her dominions?

An entering wedge for the merging of the United States into the British Empire, is President Roosevelt's fantastic scheme to negotiate a defensive and offensive alliance with Canada, one of the belligerent countries. The negotiations for the acquisition of naval and air bases in Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica, and other islands in the Caribbean Sea must be carried on directly with England. A merger or alliance with the British Empire is evidently being pushed by the Washington administration.

The Dies committee should not keep its eyes closed to the most subtle of all the propaganda with which America has been bombarded, in more than 50 years—British propaganda. Why not investigate Mr. Streit, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and the numerous propaganda bureaus, under various names, maintained by England in our big cities? The time has come to check the influences working for the establishment of the Carnegie-Rhodes proposed British-American union which would haul down the Stars and Stripes and lift up the flag of England. The time is now, not tomorrow, next month, or next year, for that vigilance which is the price of liberty. Wake up, America!

ARTICLE FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN

[From the Gaelic American (New York) of September 7, 1940]

LUNDEEN'S DEATH A NATIONAL LOSS

The tragic death on August 31 of Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, came as a great shock to the millions who esteemed him as a fearless and outspoken exponent of old-time Americanism.

A determined foe of alien propagandists and their native agents, an independent in politics who never bent his will to bossism, and a Senator who could not be cajoled or coerced to support any measure which he regarded as inimical to the best interests of his country, his death is an irreparable loss at this critical period in American history. A man of rare ability and integrity he was an uncompromising opponent of sham and hypocrisy.

He voted in 1917 against President Wilson's declaration of war and time has fully vindicated his stand. He understood that involvement in a war, which had no vital interest for America, was a mistake, even a crime and neither clamor nor hysteria could divert him from opposing a blunder which turned out to be the cause of so much evil, loss of young American lives, and waste of billions of dollars. As time passes the folly of Woodrow Wilson seems more serious and inexcusable. Senator LUNDEEN, who was then a Member of the House, is remembered and revered for his patriotism and steadfastness, while the "yes" men in the House and Senate are nearly all forgotten or despised.

His death at this crisis in the country's affairs is a severe blow to those who were associated with him in an effort to keep the country from involvement in a war which is not worth the life of one American citizen. A veteran of the Spanish-American war, a crack shot, and a man of great energy and versatility, his views, particularly on military affairs, were listened to with respect and attention by his Senate colleagues.

His fight for virile Americanism and his respect for the warning of Washington against foreign alliances made him a leader of the movement to keep America out of the imperialist wars of the Old World. His death, coming so soon after that of the great Borah, weakens the ranks of the old guard in the Senate, the men who fought and defeated the League of Nations, the World Court and the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. Senator LUNDEEN will be remembered for his loyalty, courage, and service to his country. Men of his caliber are far too few in the House and Senate.

Senator LUNDEEN'S death is a national loss. May God be good to his noble soul.

A Newspaperman's Estimate of Congressional Accomplishment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS D. CULKIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 14, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE WATERTOWN (N. Y.) TIMES

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the permission heretofore given by the House I place in the RECORD an estimate of my congressional work written by that able and veteran newspaperman, Mr. Jesse S. Cottrell, and appearing in that excellent paper, the Watertown Times, under date of September 12, 1940. Mr. Cottrell is not only a good newspaperman but a good friend, and I fear he may have slightly overdrawn the record of my services.

The article follows:

[From the Watertown Times]

CULKIN'S WORK THIS SEASON WIDESPREAD—NORTH CONGRESSMAN HAS MANY ACCOMPLISHMENTS TO HIS CREDIT

(By Jesse S. Cottrell)

WASHINGTON, September 12.—With the work of the present session of Congress practically completed and leaders arranging adjournment effective the latter part of this month, Congressman FRANCIS D. CULKIN, of the Thirty-second New York District, is concluding 9 months of the most strenuous but fruitful periods in his long and successful legislative career.

Like other Members of Congress who occupy high stations by virtue of important committee assignments and advocacy of reforms that will be beneficial to their constituents, Judge CULKIN has, in fact, had his nose to the grindstone during the last 9 months, both in committee work and constant attendance upon long sessions of the House.

Judge CULKIN is ranking Republican on two of the most important committees in the House at this time: Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and Rivers and Harbors. Should the next House be Republican, which is now generally conceded by political prognosticators, Judge CULKIN will have the chairmanship, no doubt, of one of these committees. He is also a member of Elections Committee No. 2 and has, during the last 9 months this session has been in progress, written decisions of some of the most troublesome election contests that have been before the House.

In closing out the major part of his legislative program for this session, friends of Judge CULKIN refer with pride to his accomplishments which, generally speaking, have been unusual, in view of the fact that a large number of major measures were before Congress and consumed much of the time and attention of that body in a general way.

One of the most outstanding accomplishments of the Thirty-second District Congressman has been his unceasing and tireless work in behalf of the dairy farmers of northern New York. It is pointed out by his colleagues from dairying sections that he is not only the outstanding but the most fearless sponsor of legislation in the interest of the dairymen and advocate of their interests in the House.

Judge CULKIN has always taken the position that the dairying industry is not only the most vital to human life, but that it is surrounded by circumstances which cause the interest of the dairy farmer to be overlooked in many instances. The Congressman has always sought to free the dairy farmer from the shackles of the monopolistic influences and has sought at all times to bring about conditions whereby the dairy farmer would obtain a fair return for his milk and dairy products.

In furtherance of that objective, he was successful in obtaining an appropriation at this session whereby the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice may be enabled to have sufficient investigators and legal talent to delve into the dairy situation.

As a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Judge CULKIN has sedulously and persistently sponsored legislation and has been able to secure it whereby the merchant marine of the country may be amply equipped to carry on a constant flow of exports, especially from the farming sections of this country, so that the farmer might be given the same treatment in finding foreign markets for their products as the manufacturer. In this connection, he was able to free the Merchant and Marine Commission of shipbuilding influences, so that it might carry out its mission.

The estimated saving to the taxpayers of the country wrought by Judge CULKIN in this connection is estimated at forty to fifty million dollars.

Since the Thirty-second District borders on Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River, Judge CULKIN handled every phase of Great Lakes' interests and was largely instrumental in applying the old-age pension law to seamen on the Great Lakes and the oceans. The legislation that he sponsored in this respect, has only recently gone into effect. He also fought constantly for betterment of living conditions and pay for seamen on the Great Lakes and the high seas.

THE SEAWAY PLAN

While handling matters relating to the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River and their development, the Congressman has ever been mindful of the advantages and benefits that would come to the north country through the proposed Great Lakes and St. Lawrence seaway. Judge CULKIN feels that this great project is now nearer consummation than ever before.

As an example he today hailed the proposed establishment of a Navy base at Newfoundland as a forward step in this respect. He pointed out that establishment of this great base would give a new impulse to construction of the seaway and that it meant that immediately foreign vessels would now be admitted passage on the St. Lawrence as a consequence.

Before leaving for his home at the conclusion of this session, Judge CULKIN hopes to have the program successfully finished under which the proposed acquisition of an additional 300,000 acres for Pine Camp will have been successfully carried out. Backed by loyal and patriotic citizens in Jefferson, Lewis, Oswego, and other counties, who are vitally interested in this project, Judge CULKIN hopes to secure ample funds for it by including a clause in the final deficiency bill that will be passed during the last days of this session.

Only yesterday, Judge CULKIN made another trip to the War Department and went over the entire matter with high Army officers and feels that the War Department officers will approve the recommendation that this property be acquired just as soon as it reaches their desks.

Judge CULKIN also hopes to obtain a $50,000 appropriation for Cape Vincent, and improvements of the harbor at Clayton, N. Y. Both of these items are on the river and harbor agenda for the next session, and he is confident that he will have little difficulty in having them included in the bill, and has assurance of Senator BAILEY and others that they will be taken care of.

Aside from the Pine Camp project, Judge CULKIN already obtained an appropriation of $270,000 for Madison Barracks at Sackets Harbor, and an additional $200,000 has just been provided at that place for additional housing facilities.

During the present session of Congress, Judge CULKIN handled for the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries the $270,000,000 appropriation for additional locks and improvements in the Panama Canal, and feels that it is one of the greatest contributions to national defense that has been made at this session, although he sponsored and voted for this improvement before existing exigencies arose that have brought about the enactment of the two national-defense programs.

In case the St. Lawrence treaty comes before the next Congress, as is expected, the fiscal phase of it would be referred to Judge CULKIN'S Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and his intimate knowledge of the seaway proposal, and his experience in handling such matters as the appropriation for the Panama Canal, would serve him in good stead and would be fortunate for the sponsors of the project in this respect.

PENSION MEASURES

A check of Judge CULKIN'S office today revealed that he has obtained the passage at this session of over 75 private pension bills, the largest number to the credit of any House Member, for the benefit of aged widows of Civil War veterans, Spanish-American War veterans, and their dependents, and World War veterans or their dependents. These have all cleared the calendar in the House and have gone to the Senate, and the attitude of that body as to such legislation will determine their fate.

One of Judge CULKIN'S major accomplishments at this session of Congress was obtaining a ruling by the Federal Communications Commission prohibiting liquor advertisement over the radio. He has fought consistently against liquor being advertised on the radio, his position being that a public utility like the radio should not be used to indoctrinate children in the use of alcohol.

This ruling was the result of his bill against liquor being advertised by radio.

Friends of Judge CULKIN feel that while this session of Congress has been the most strenuous in which he has ever participated, it is perhaps the most beneficial to the Nation as a whole and the district which he represents in Congress particularly, so far as the legislation he has sponsored is concerned.

National Defense—The Summit (N. J.) National Defense Organization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DONALD H. McLEAN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 14, 1940

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, of interest to all who are interested in national defense is the recent reorganization of the National Defense Organization of Summit, N. J., originally instituted in April 1916.

Its purpose is to provide the opportunity for voluntary military training. It will also cooperate with the mayor and Governor of the State in matters of national defense. It has already provided the nucleus of personnel for the local national-defense council.

Thousands of American citizens throughout the country—more accurately, millions—want opportunity most earnestly to get some preliminary military training before the time when they may be called into new and unaccustomed service by a draft act, by universal military training, or similar national necessity. It is all a very human reaction in the face of present dire, undesired necessities.

The following letter depicts this attitude:

On September 23, 1917, I reached Camp Dix, one of the many draftees.

On November 26, 1917, arrived at St. Nazaire, France, member of an engineer labor battalion.

On June 12, 1918, transferred from labor battalion to flash ranging engineers and sent to school.

On August 18, 1918, was given a rifle and told to make up my pack for the front, which I reached next day.

Fortunately for me, I was brought up on a farm, and as a result, was familiar with firearms, because there I was on the front lines with a rifle and no one had even shown me how to load the thing. I personally had two replacements in the front lines ask me to show them how to operate their rifles.

Try to imagine what I would of given for 1 year's military training under my belt.

Looking into the future from my small pond, a need for two, or even three, million trained men could easily materialize. If not, what harm has the training done?

Every community in the country is trying to do something about this, to evolve helpful methods for its citizens in this respect—helpful alike to the individual, and to the country.

An excellent undertaking in this regard is an undertaking involving no national or other expense, but, as it seems to me, valuably effective. It is being administered in the city of Summit, in my county of Union, N. J. This Summit plan involves what they call a little Plattsburg.

The original Plattsburg camp for military training came into being in 1915, through the inspiration of the late Gen. Leonard Wood. Many invaluable officers in the former World War came out of the preliminary training these men had received at Plattsburg.

In the National Defense Act of 1920, the Government provided for continuance of the Plattsburg idea by inaugurating citizens military training camps in every State of the Union, and thousands of young men have since been given opportunity each year to get some preliminary military training, some orderly idea of reasonable discipline, some accustomedness and leadership in handling men, and a valuable impetus toward unselfish patriotic endeavor. All this has been of immense service to individuals and to the country.

The Military Training Camps Association of the United States came into being during the former war, its membership composed mostly of graduates of the original Plattsburg camps. This is an active country-wide organization of well-known men. Upon the passage of the National Defense Act of 1920, the Government recognized the standing, efficiency, and patriotism of the M. T. C. A. and placed it in direct civilian charge of the procurement of candidates in every State for the yearly Citizens' Military Training Camps, which began in 1921. And this year it was this organization that inspired the immensely popular Business and Professional Men's Training Camp at Plattsburg and elsewhere, and administered its inception, cooperating with the Regular Army. The courses of training of this new Plattsburg camp, and the courses of the basic-year training of all the regular C. M. T. Camps, are practically the same. In 1923 the War Department inaugurated the present system of civilian aides to the Secretary of War, comprising a chief civilian aide, a corps-area aide in each of the nine Army corps areas, and a State civilian aide in each of the 48 States. The Secretary of War, on nomination by the M. T. C. A., appoints these civilian aides from the membership of the M. T. C. A.

In Summit, N. J., is a local organization surviving from the former war, called the National Defense Organization of Summit, N. J., widely known then as the N. D. O. It was organized in April, 1916, its object stated to be "to coordinate thought and action for local defense and national preparedness." In February 1917 ex-President Theodore Roosevelt wrote a letter to the N. D. O., certain statements of which letter, in the light of pending developments, are highly interesting and significant. I am permitted to reproduce this letter, as follows:

OFFICE OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
February 16, 1917.

Mr. BUFORD FRANKLIN,
Mayor, Summit, N. J.

MY DEAR MR. MAYOR: Good for Summit, N. J. If the rest of the country had the same spirit of enthusiastic patriotism, there isn't an American citizen on shore or afloat who would be in danger of an attack by the representatives of any power on earth, and we would have universal military training for every man in this country, and every citizen would accept it as a matter of course that in time of war he or she would serve the country in whatever capacity would be most efficient. Meanwhile, until we get universal training of this kind, the best work that can be done is just such work as you, and your fellow citizens of Summit have been doing. I wish you well, with all my heart.

Sincerely yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Twenty-three years ago, Theodore Roosevelt advocated universal military training as belatedly millions advocate it today. And a prominent weekly took up the matter of the Summit N. D. O. and spread it broadcast; and many towns throughout the country patterned defense and preparedness organizations on the Summit N. D. O. In April 1916, a year before we went into the war, men began learning many elementary military items, and when these men enlisted, or were drafted, after April 6, 1917, they rapidly became noncoms, and later officers, and many returned from France with the highest military decorations.

And last May the N. D. O. of Summit got into active operation again, through the initiative of its former—and present—president, ex-Mayor Ruford Franklin, of Summit; who has also been New Jersey civilian aide to the Secretary of War since the inception of that plan in 1923, and also a member of the executive committee of the M. T. C. A., Second Corps Area.

"Fifth column" activities were at once given consideration in cooperation with Federal, State, and city authorities; a headquarters in a prominent location has been opened for enrollments, information about technical schools, and similar opportunities, and for direct recruiting for the Army, National Guard, and the other services; a women's division is operating, and a course of up-to-date elementary military training was got underway at once. A large group of ex-service officers and men and some recent R. O. T. C. graduates have been training since early June to perfect themselves as instructors. This, of course, is particularly necessary because of the drastic changes in Army drill regulations in force since last year. These men will soon be ready to drill the larger body.

I had opportunity, while at home during the recent brief congressional vacation due to matters at Chicago, to interrogate Mr. Franklin. The executive committee of the N. D. O. has arranged its operating organization on the plan of a regular army "general staff," (G-1, personnel; G-2, intelligence; G-3, training; G-4, supply). "In the matter of training," said Mr. Franklin, "we have arranged courses practically the same as the basic year of the regular C. M. T. C., which is the same as that given the older men at the Plattsburg "business and professional men's camp" this year. In other words, a little Plattsburg right at home. Naturally the men will not live together in tents as at Plattsburg. They will live with their families as usual, and pursue their regular daily avocations; the training and instruction will be in the evenings and on Saturdays. Later, if needed, we have an excellent field ready to be flood-lighted and used. Or wide streets, or a park, can be made available. A nearby gymnasium or large hall will be used in stormy weather. Some difficulties will have to be ironed out; but we are on our way, and let no man tell you differently. Whatever happens, the course we'll give will be the Plattsburg-C. M. T. C. course. If every community in the country would have a little Plattsburg—a little Plattsburg that effectively began the training of a few, or a few hundred, men—then many thousands of patriotic citizens all over the country would feel much better, and of higher morale; and the Army, and the country, would already be measurably on its way toward real preparedness. And all with no expense to anyone; just patriotic expense of spare time.

I asked Mr. Franklin, "What are you going to do about rifles to drill with?" He said, "I expected that question. We have a couple of dozen old Springfield rifles that we have commandeered in various ways. We shall drill the men by squads; which is not so good as we would like; but our men have the spirit and will do the trick. Besides, it should be remembered that there are many items in the Plattsburg course of training that do not necessarily involve drill with an actual rifle. Close order drill, extended order drill, military organization, courtesy and customs, duties of noncoms and officers, elementary map reading, and so forth. As a matter of fact we do not expect to turn out major generals; only incipient ones! In the first World War, the War Department loaned us a couple of hundred old outmoded Army rifles for drilling purposes. There must be millions of such stored away now, all over the country, of no practical use except for drilling. Cannot they be unearthed and put to this real, very practical use? Could it not be done under proper authority and with proper restrictions?

Little Plattsburgs all over the country will serve as a practical, valuable aid to individual patriotic Americans, and as an aid toward actually speeding up the defense and preparedness of the country as a whole. Congress should authorize and direct the War Department to loan at once, for the purposes of civilian drill, all needed old outmoded rifles, to all such practical patriotic organizations as the N. D. O. of Summit, N. J., under proper conditions and restrictions.

With the thought and hope that many of you may carry the Summit, N. J., little Plattsburg plan to your own communities, I am appending hereto the impression of an observer at one of the recent meetings of the Summit N. D. O.; also copies of the first and second reports of the organization to the people of the city:

[From the Summit Herald of August 20, 1940]

THE N. D. O. PRELIMINARY TRAINING COURSE LITTLE PLATTSBURG—JOIN UP!

"Right face; right shoulder arms; forward march!" And 32 men, members of the N. D. O. instructors' training group, were off, in a column of files, for another evening of drill, familiarizing themselves with the infantry drill regulations and tactics.

Your Summit Herald representative, privileged for the first time to witness this group practice the new infantry drill, wore a perplexed expression as he turned to an N. D. O. official. This type of drill was different from that which he expected to see.

Replying to a question, the official explained that the old squad formation of 8 men has been changed to 12 men who now "fall in" in single rank; that rifles are brought to the shoulder while the formation is at a halt; that facings and flank movements largely replace former squad tactics; that intervals are different; that, in short, anyone having had military training prior to September 1939 has a great deal to forget and much to learn anew.

Furthermore, your representative was informed, that former service men, thinking of tactical formations and equipment in terms of their own experiences, will be considerably surprised at the variety of weapons, in addition to the old faithful Springfield, now found in an infantry company, and with which each doughboy must become familiar in case of an emergency. Not only has the infantry company become streamlined, but it is highly technical and mechanized as well.

It was a recognition of these drastic charges and improvements in modern military drill, tactics, and equipment which prompted the N. D. O. to interest a group of former service men, graduates of military schools and other patriotic citizens, to train for the past 2 months under the direction of active Army Reserve officers, learning the new regulations and tactics, to the end that they may form the initial instructors' group for the N. D. O. Little Plattsburg which opens soon after Labor Day.

In connection with little Plattsburg, this N. D. O. official stated, "In addition to other matters being administered under the N. D. O., the present particular effort is being directed toward the approaching commencement of the training course."

Commenting further regarding the desirability for such training in Summit, the N. D. O. official said: "In many communities throughout the United States men are beginning to acquaint themselves with the elementary principles of military drill and discipline. These men are alert; they recognize the critical possibilities with which our country may be confronted, and, realizing the part they may have to play, are getting a head start. They know that even a smattering of military knowledge acquired now can prove most beneficial both to the Nation and to themselves, if and when they are called into active military service. In past similar emergencies many noncommissioned as well as commissioned officers gained their initial advantage through the training received in these voluntary drill groups.

"As in 1917–18, when the N. D. O. of Summit gave such training to hundreds of men, many of whom benefited thereby when they entered the military service, this organization has been making arrangements to give military instruction to all those having the foresight and willingness to spend some of their free time in this constructive effort.

"The N. D. O. little Plattsburg will be open to all men, aged 17 to 50, who desire to take the course. The training to be given is that which is common to all arms of the military and naval service so that those who complete the course and who are later called for active duty or home defense will have the advantage of this experience over other recruits. Furthermore, during the course, those showing aptitude for leadership will be given ample opportunity to develop it in the actual handling of troops at drill and in the field."

The N. D. O. little Plattsburg course is, as nearly as practicable, the same as the basic citizens military training camps' course and the Business and Professional Men's Training Course at Plattsburg.

The basis of the course is infantry drill. Practical training will also be given in interior guard duty, physical training, nomenclature, care, and markmanship of the rifle and pistol, extended order drill, map reading, and military sketching.

Elementary instruction in military organization, Army regulations, customs of the service, duties of officers and noncommissioned officers, military sanitation, hygiene, and first aid, and signal communication will be included. Other subjects may be added as occasion requires and time permits.

The drills and training will be conducted a few hours at night in designated areas out of doors, and in halls during inclement weather, and any sacrifice of free time will be more than counterbalanced by this contribution made to the national need and the experience gained by those who may be later called to the colors. Preparedness is the only insurance against disaster.

Information and enrollment forms may be obtained at N. D. O. Headquarters, 19 Beechwood Road, Summit (open daily 10 to 12, 2 to 4, and 7:30 to 9:30 p. m., Monday through Friday; and on Saturday from 10 to 12 and 2 to 4).

SUMMIT'S N. D. O. ISSUES FIRST COMMUNIQUE TO LOCAL CITIZENS—LISTS SIX MAIN OBJECTIVES AS ITS FUNCTION TO COORDINATE THOUGHT AND ACTION FOR LOCAL DEFENSE AND MATERIAL PREPAREDNESS IN COOPERATION WITH CITY, STATE, AND NATIONAL AUTHORITIES

A detailed report has just been issued on the six objectives of Summit N. D. O. and some of its accomplishments to date. The text of this report, which The Summit Press is pleased to publish, follows:

To the People of Summit:

The National Defense Organization of Summit, N. J., known as the N. D. O. (organized April 1916, refunctioning, May 1940), hereby submits the first of a series of reports to the citizens of Summit:

REPORT NO. 1

The N. D. O. has been functioning actively since its renewal of operations in May. It conceives its function to be, to coordinate thought and action for local defense and national preparedness, in cooperation with city, State, and National authorities.

Accordingly, the N. D. O. has six main objectives, as follows:

1. The consideration of "fifth column" activities. The executive committee at its first meeting authorized and instructed the president to appoint an appropriate committee, the personnel thereof to be known only to the president. This was done at once, and the committee has been actively in touch with the local police authorities, the F. B. I., and other agencies. Any communication in this regard should be addressed: N. D. O., post office box 412, Summit, N. J.

2. The matter of military training Communications were at once sent in May to all ex-service men in Summit and vicinity; and a notable response resulted in two crowded and tensely interested meetings in the council chamber, city hall. Valuable suggestions were made and others later by letter.

One of the points discussed was the drastic changes recently made in the drill regulations used in all branches of the military and naval services.

It is intended to offer soon to all citizens of Summit a course of military training identical, so far as practicable, with the basic-year training of the citizens' military training camps, which is essentially the same training as is being given to the business and professional men's camp at Plattsburg now. The Military Training Corps Association of the United States brought about the C. M. T. C. in 1921 and sponsored the present undertaking and obtained the authorization for it from the War Department.

Ex-Mayor Ruford Franklin, president of the N. D. O., has been a member of the executive committee of the Military Training Camps Association and civilian aide for New Jersey to the Secretary of War, for many years since the first World War; and as such has had charge of procurement for New Jersey for the regular citizens' military training camps; and similarly, for New Jersey, for the Business and Professional Men's Camp of this year.

Under the direction of Lt. Col. Robert E. Woodward, United States Infantry Reserve, one of the chairmen of the N. D. O. Military Training Committee, and a frequent instructor for the regular Citizens' Military Training Camps at Fort Dix and Plattsburg, a group of about 25 ex-service men and Reserve Officers' Training Camp graduates have been practicing the new drill regulations for a number of weeks, drilling 2 evenings from 7:30 to 9 and Saturday morning from 9:30 to 11 each week, to qualify as instructors. In other words, Summit is rapidly preparing to offer its citizens a "Little Plattsburg." This will give men an opportunity for basic military training in advance of any call by the Government.

3. Home defense: This ties in with the foregoing, and plans will be duly perfected and announced.

4. The matter of technical and mechanical training for war purposes: Summit has no institution of its own equipped to do this vitally essential work. In cooperation with Mr. John B. Dougall, superintendent of schools, and Mr. Thomas H. Hogan, in charge in Summit of the State unemployment service, full information as to vocational and technical schools, now being rapidly established under State and Federal authority, will be afforded in due course to citizens at N. D. O. headquarters, 19 Beechwood Road. These schools offer training without cost to those who enter and retain those who show aptitude with pay.

5. Recruiting. The N. D. O. will have full information from the regular recruiting officers of the Army, Navy, National Guard, Marines, and air services for those who desire such. If and when practicable, the attendance of a regular recruiting officer will be obtained at stated times.

6. Women's division. The women's division, Mrs. Carroll P. Bassett, chairman, is rapidly perfecting plans for all proper matters. It will cooperate with the local Red Cross chapter but in no manner seek to duplicate the splendid work already being done by that organization.

Further details as to all the foregoing will be submitted from time to time.

The officers of the N. D. O., are: President, Ruford Franklin; vice presidents, Carroll P. Bassett, Edward B. Twombly, Guy Bates; treasurer, Oliver B. Merrill; secretary general, Newman C. Wade; recording secretary, Frederick C. Kentz.

The operating organization of the N. D. O. follows the plan of a Regular Army General Staff; G–1 (personnel, Gardner Eastman); G–2 (intelligence, Lloyd S. King); G–3 (training, Robert E. Woodward, Theodore S. Kenyon); G–4 (supply, Ralph P. White).

The executive committee consists of the officers; and as ex officio members when called upon, the heads of the G–1, G–2, G–3, and G–4; and the current commanders of Summit Post 138, American Legion, at present John C. Conant, and of Beacon Hill Post 190, Veterans of Foreign Wars, at present Russell McGowan.

General and special enrollments in the N. D. O. will soon be opened at headquarters. General enrollees will be required to sign a card embodying the oath of allegiance to the United States. In addition to the foregoing, special enrollees will enroll for such service as they wish and consider themselves best adapted.

The N. D. O. has no dues or initiation fees. The work has been financed so far by the residue of a small fund remaining from the former wartime. No drive or requests for funds is contemplated now. There may be need for funds in the future. This can be taken care of by special contributions. A number of Summit citizens, without being asked, have already sent substantial checks to the treasurer, "for the good of the cause," an action which is deeply gratifying and symbolic of the spirit of Summit in the present crisis.

Respectfully submitted.

THE N. D. O. ISSUES SECOND REPORT IN REFERENCE TO ITS ACTIVITIES

To the People of Summit:

The National Defense Organization of Summit—N. D. O.—hereby submits the second of a series of reports to the citizens of Summit:

REPORT NO. 2

Following previous information, we report that the N. D. O. headquarters, 19 Beechwood Road, will be open for general business next Monday night, August 12. Until further notice, the headquarters will be open every night, except Sundays, from 7:30 to 9:30 o'clock.

The purposes are as follows:

(1) To offer information in reference to aviation schools, technical and other defense schools, courses of training or instruction, activities for women, etc.

(2) To offer information in reference to enlistments in the Army, Navy, National Guard, etc

(3) To receive general enrollments for membership in the N. D. O. The general enrollment form is worded as follows:

"I am a citizen of the United States of America, and professing full allegiance and loyalty to the Nation and to its ideals and personal freedom within law, hereby enroll as a member of the National Defense Organization of Summit, N. J. (the N. D. O.). It is understood, (1) that there are no fees or dues; and (2) that membership entitles the holder to apply for opportunity to take part in some activity of the organization."

(4) To offer special enrollment forms to those desiring same, including enrollment forms for the Little Plattsburg course of military training (to begin early in September), for instruction of women in handling firearms, etc. Information will be afforded as to all such matters.

It should be noted that general enrollments for memberships are basic, and are open to both men and women, 17 years of age or over (no upper limits). (Junior memberships, under 17, will be announced in due course.) A general enrollment means (1) that the enrollee is duly a member of the N. D. O. (no fees, dues, or other obligation); (2) that the enrollee thereupon becomes entitled to participate in any of the defense and preparedness activities instituted through the N. D. O., if he or she desires; (3) that the enrollee is entitled to receive special notices of local or national concern; (4) that, in any event, the enrollee is a live American awake to the present crisis and in sympathy with the aims and endeavors of the N. D. O. to provide for the community such opportunities for preparedness and defense as may be within its power as a local, unofficial organization; and that he or she testifies thus, by such enrollment, to his or her moral support, at least, to united effort for the benefit of the community.

It should be noted also that the officers of the N. D. O. and everyone connected with it, are all giving their time and thought to its operation purely as volunteers, without pay or emolument of any kind. That its expenses for postage, printing, and various unavoidable items (light, telephone, meetings, etc.), are being met from the proceeds of unsolicited contributions from patriotic citizens for the good of the cause. That information about the Summit Plan for Little Plattsburg and other N. D. O. activities is already being asked for by communities in various parts of the country, and is being supplied (as was the case in 1917–18) and will continue to be supplied. That, in cooperation with local, State, and Federal authorities, the matter of the "fifth column" is always under consideration. That, in cooperation with the able work of the Red Cross, plans are in hand for use of resources in the event of increased emergency.

And it should be noted that the fundamental thought of the N. D. O. in these present days of stress is that the only common sense way is to look at matters at their worst; and then, realizing possibilities, to try, so far as humanly practicable, to be prepared for the worst. If the worst doesn't come, so much the better. But it may.

Respectfully submitted.

RUFORD FRANKLIN,
President.
NEWMAN C. WADE,
Secretary General.

Volunteer System Should Be Given a Trial Before Adopting Compulsory Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD K. CLAYPOOL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 14, 1940

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Speaker, we have before the House the question of whether or not to adopt the report of the conference committee on the Burke-Wadsworth compulsory military service bill. When this bill was previously before this House I voted in favor of the bill as then written. At that time it contained the provision delaying conscription for a period of 60 days and providing for voluntary enlistment in the Army during this 60-day period and for any necessary conscription of industry. I favored and still favor this arrangement. Our danger is certainly no more imminent than that of the Dominion of Canada, which has not yet adopted conscription, though it has been in the war as a part of the British Empire for months, and its parent England in dire and immediate danger of invasion, if my information is correct. The people of the United States of America are in my opinion equally as loyal to their Government as the people of Canada are to theirs. At least they certainly are entitled to the opportunity under existing conditions to show their interest in the welfare of the Nation by volunteering to enter the Army in sufficient numbers for 60 days to fill the immediate needs. Furthermore, I believe it will take the Army 60 days to be ready to take on the detailed work of conscription. There is no evidence that the volunteer system for 60 days will not provide all the soldiers the Army can train in the period.

I am strongly in favor of preparedness and have voted for every defense measure and will continue to do so. I want every American soldier to be clothed and armed 100 percent. I want industry speeded to the point that no weapon of defense will be lacking when, if ever, attack comes. My record shows my votes in accord with this statement.

I believe, with our great President, as stated in his speech of September 11, 1940, before a great body of the labor of America, that appropriations of property by paying reasonable compensation therefor is a long recognized right of government. I believe when necessary industry should be conscripted to fill the needs of our Army in an emergency such as now confronts the United States.

I cannot support the conference report leaving out the 60-day period for voluntary enlistment. The object of the Army is to obtain 1,000,000 men by February 1941. The present strength of the Army, including reserves, is 686,000 men. This leaves 314,000 men to be obtained in 4½ months. Enlistments in the Army jumped from 3,872 in the month of January 1939 to 33,888 in August 1940 on the basis of preliminary reports. Final reports are expected to show this enlistment to have reached 45,000 in August. If this rate continues plus the percentage of increase per month as shown from January 1939 to August 1940, the voluntary system would produce the 314,000 men desired by February 1941, and keep in mind that these enlistments were for 3-year periods at $21 per month while the new provision would have required only 1 year enlistment at a base pay of $30 per month. For these reasons I intend to vote against the conference report as now submitted. The House was right when it originally passed the bill with the 60-day opportunity to enlist. I disagree with the conference committee and will not allow them to substitute their judgment for mine as to the patriotism of the men of America.

Let American industry gird itself to arm American men and the hearts and souls and minds of the men of America will respond with valor to the needs of today as did their forefathers of the days of Valley Forge and Chateau Thierry. I have faith in America.

Preserving America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STEPHEN BOLLES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 14, 1940

LETTER FROM L. R. CLAUSEN, OF RACINE, WIS.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks and include a letter received by me from Mr. L. R. Clausen of Racine, Wis., which is so complete and so analytical that I think it should be read by everybody.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1940.

The Honorable STEPHEN BOLLES,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOLLES: This letter requires no answer, as I am a believer in the American form of government, which is a republic, with Representatives, and not a democracy for direct action, as so many people have been misled to think. Our Senators and Representatives in Congress are there to use their own best judgment, and not to respond to appeals made by telegrams, letters, etc. Your own activity in Congress should be greatly commended.

I presume from my previous letters you will understand how at least one of your supporters feels about—

1. The obvious attempts of the administration to get this country into war.
2. The obviously drummed-up hysteria that is being created by the administration through false representations and false propaganda.
3. The unnecessary and unsound legislation that is coming out of this un-American campaign of un-American activities.
4. The failure to do the obviously necessary thing if the Nation is really and sincerely interested in preparedness.

One example of the vicious and false representation used to instill fear in our people emanates from the statements made by the President himself about submarines being in Alaska, along the Oregon coast, and around Santiago, in the Caribbean Sea, off Halifax, off New England, and off Cape Hatteras, with the outright statement, or the implied reference that these submarines were German. Another example is the statement regarding the ease of invasion of the United States by air from South America, Greenland, Canada, and everywhere else—from Bermuda, and other points on the Atlantic seaboard, with the implication that Germany not only could but intended to invade the United States, further adding to the fears of our people.

Another example is the exaggerated and misleading statements regarding the "fifth column" activities in various countries to the south of us and in South America, with the implication that these are German activities.

Another case of trying to stir up not only fears among the people but hatred against the Germans in general and Germany as a country in particular, is the omission of the real "fifth column" activities in the White House and in Washington, and by the Communist Party in the United States and all the Western Hemisphere countries; this has been very carefully omitted in this false and misleading propaganda; in fact, the Communists are very carefully protected by the present administration. We have plenty of them drawing money from the Government, on important jobs, right in Washington, where the real "fifth column" activities are centered.

The attitude of the administration toward foreign countries is obviously aimed at putting us in the war, and there are many who feel that there will be a most deliberate attempt to do this before election day so, by some emergency act, the election can be postponed or omitted, leaving the President with full dictatorial powers which have been handed to him by a subservient and un-American Congress. It is obvious, even to the most simple-minded, that Congress has practically abdicated during the past 7 years because it has, by direct legislation and by the confirmation of appointments of the Chief Executive, deprived our citizens of many of their constitutional rights and impaired our Supreme Court, which is presumed to protect these rights.

There are many questions that have never been answered:

(a) Why does the administration aid and abet Communist-controlled countries and simultaneously insult some of our best friends among foreign nations?

(b) Why did we cancel the trade treaty with Japan, our third best customer, who is at peace with us and always fulfills its obligations, and at the same time turn around and aid and abet Communist-controlled China by loaning them hundreds of millions of dollars and sending troops, etc., to protect so-called American rights or the open door? We do not have to spend any money in Japan to protect Americans; American rights and American people who live in Japan are safe.

(c) Why do we withdraw our Ambassador from Berlin, Germany, a good customer and friend of the United States, and at the same time maintain an Ambassador in Moscow in Russia which has been an enemy of the United States ever since 1917, and has done her best to undermine the American form of government?

(d) Why do we insult Italy, one of our best friends and at the same time assist other countries who have double-crossed us on occasion after occasion?

(e) Why do we try to pick a fight and stick our nose in European affairs that are none of our business if we really and truly desire peace?

(f) How can anyone believe that there is any sincerity in the representatives of a Chief Evecutive who has lied to us so continuously during the last 8 years?

The only protection we have left as a Nation is in Congress; our Supreme Court is gone. Our Chief Executive is not only trying to involve us in disastrous foreign wars but he appears to be a willing stooge or accomplice in promoting an international free-for-all general world war.

The foregoing statements may seem to you to be extreme but they are far from telling the whole truth; they are, in reality, much understated, and others, including Senators and Congressmen, have made far stronger statements. If the people of this country could know the real truth about what is being done to them by the national and international activities of their own Government I believe that there would be an uprising that would amount to a civil war.

We have at the present time Senators rising in the Senate of the United States and seriously proposing the confiscation of people's property as well as their services—they have already been deprived of their constitutional rights. It seems almost a form of insanity if there is any honesty or desire to maintain a government or a country where men can enjoy any liberty and freedom whatever.

Any such action as conscription of the people's property and the destruction of their rights is proof of the desire of Congress to destroy America and not to maintain it. Any Senator or Representative who seriously proposes this sort of thing could be very honestly impeached for a violation of his oath of office in my opinion. He cannot uphold the Constitution of the United States and at the same time act and vote in Congress to destroy this Constitution and the rights of the citizens under it.

We draft men to fight or go to war, but what do we draft them for and what are we fighting for? We draft them to fight to maintain our liberty, our freedom and our right to own and hold property; otherwise there would be no point in sending them to war. If people are to be deprived of their liberty and freedom and their right to hold property, then there is no point in drafting men and any talk of conscription of property along with men is an absurdity.

Obviously if you are going to fight you have got to have men and provide them with arms, but you don't have to destroy the liberty and freedom of the people behind these men, the very things that these men enjoy—the things that these men who have been drafted are fighting to protect.

If the Government can conscript factories or money then they can conscript homes and everything else and the very purpose of having a government is wiped out. The American form of government was erected to protect people in their liberty and freedom, and the natural rights of man one of the greatest of which, after the privilege of breathing and eating, is the right to own and hold property. Even a dog fights for rights such as this. Now if the Government is seriously considering the wiping out of these rights under the semiplausible and obvious if not vicious excuse that man must fight then we might as well say good-bye to America because we have lost all the things that America was created for.

A part of the vicious and crooked program that is being carried on is the smearing of industry and the false propaganda emanating from the Government itself to the effect that industry is refusing to carry on its obligations in a defense program, or is conducting a so-called sit-down strike. To anyone who knows what is going on in the country it is not hard to trace the reason for this kind of vicious propaganda. It is obviously nothing more than a part of the general program of making the people hate industry and throwing dust in their eyes so they can be led by the nose into international complications and war without protest until it is too late to protest.

The violence of the campaign against industry that has been carried on in Congress and Washington during the last 7 years, the lying propaganda which was used to make the people believe that industry was behind the wars, and the makers of munitions were trying to promote war, resulted in a Neutrality Act to prevent munitions, etc., being shipped to any belligerent; the temper of Congress, as well as their lack of spine, is demonstrated by the fact that Congress stultified itself a year ago by repealing this act and passing an unneutral act in its place, at a time when European nations were at war. I can think of no more unstatesmanlike performance than this and it is in entire harmony with the campaign against industry which has been recently loosed upon the country from Washington to cover up the incompetence and mistakes of the administration and to throw dust in the people's eyes so they can be herded like sheep into the slaughter of another war, as they were in 1917. The same crooked propaganda, the same methods, and even some of the same individuals, are trying to put this country into the war as were operating in 1917. The same kind of deception is being practiced by the Chief Executive and obviously the same kind of commitments to foreign nations are being secretly made.

There does not seem to be a sufficient number of real Americans in our present Congress to uncover this program and these activities and properly checkmate them.

There is no nation on earth that wants to fight the United States; every nation wants to be our friend; they all want us to be their friend. If we need preparedness, the time to have done it was back in 1919, 1920, and 1921, when many good honest men, good Americans, advised the necessary steps. If we wanted conscription or drafting, it should have been done at that time, and each young man required to spend about a year in the service of his country so he could be taught to be a man. This hasty passage of confiscatory legislation at this late hour, on false misrepresentations, is plainly not only unsound socially and economically but, in my opinion, plainly dishonest.

There is no occasion for any great rush. We can take our time, because no one wants to fight us; no one is going to try to fight us, and we can avoid some of the colossal waste and extravagance which always accompanies any activities of the American Government, especially when it is under the control of political shysters and demagogues. There will be plenty of young men who are willing to take limited service in the Army and Navy to take care of all the requirements, without any drafting at the present time, and there need not be any excessive confiscation of property if the Government will stop throwing away the people's money. Enough can be saved out of the present unnecessary waste of money to finance any kind of a defensive program within the bounds of sanity.

I presume it is true that the protests of one individual American citizen is of very minor consequence, but I could not refrain from writing you my views in the face of the daily events in Washington and the bills that are being seriously introduced in Congress by men who ought to know better or who may be the willing tools of some forces behind them.

Please be assured that I am writing of the majority of Congress and the executive department and not of your individual activities which I strongly approve.

Yours very sincerely,

L. R. CLAUSEN.

Mr. Roosevelt Spoke Truths in His Smoky Mountain Speech

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 14, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ADRIAN (MICH.) TELEGRAM

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the privilege granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Adrian (Mich.) Telegram, which is as follows:

WE HAVE GROWN SOFT

Rugged individualism is needed in America after all, we are told by President Roosevelt in his speech dedicating the Great Smoky National Park. This was a surprising statement from a President whose administration has so steadfastly preached the duty of the state to look after the needs of the individual. Now the President talks about the duty of the individual to the state, something we all have been familiar with right along but something the New Dealers have not emphasized.

Americans are growing soft, the President declared, saying: "Today we no longer face Indians and hard and lonely struggles with nature—and also—we have grown soft in many ways. If we are to survive, we cannot be soft in a world in which there are dangers that threaten Americans—dangers far more deadly than were those the frontiersmen had to face."

The frontiersmen had no beneficial government aiding them, no wage-hours legislation, no social security, no relief agencies. If they were to survive they had to fight for their existence and by fighting they became strong. For them there was no distribution of surplus commodities; their food had come from the work of their own hands. Neither could they spend all their reserves and mortgage the future. They knew the lesson of thrift, of providing for themselves against the possibility of rainy days.

If the American people have grown soft, as the President said, he is partly responsible. He has led them into fields of soft living. He and his advisers have set them unparalleled examples of public spending for so-called social benefits. To have economized and balanced the Budget was the hard way, the way of the pioneers that the President extolled, but the President chose the soft way—borrowing against the future, postponing the day of reckoning.

President Roosevelt so greatly emphasized the duty of the Nation to take care of the unemployed that many got the idea that idleness under benefit of a Federal check was to be a permanent condition. The incentive to find work was weakened. Individual stamina, courage, and initiative were forced into the background and rated of far less importance than the obligation of the State to make the individual secure.

Mr. Roosevelt spoke truths in his Smoky Mountain speech. In speaking them he was following the leadership of Mr. Willkie for Mr. Willkie spoke them sooner. That is not to his discredit. It is to the credit of both of them, for both of them were right.

Tempus Fugit—Experimentia Docet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 14, 1940

ARTICLE FROM WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted by the House, I place in the RECORD a review of certain facts in our military history, important but often forgotten, as set forth by William Randolph Hearst in an article appearing in the Washington Times-Herald. The excerpts follow:

IN THE NEWS—A REVIEW OF MAXIMS AND COMMON SENSE

"Tempus fugit" is a very fine phrase and a very well-known quotation.

One does not have to have any very profound Latin learning to know that time flies.

And, of course, Mr. Roosevelt is quite right in stating that the United States does not want to lose any time in adopting and executing a proper program of preparedness.

But time has been busily engaged in flying for the past 7 years without particularly disturbing the New Deal administration.

And seven thousand million good American dollars have been spent in that protracted period without securing any preparedness whatsoever.

Maybe a little careful and thoughtful consideration by Congress will now be better than overhaste.

We do not wish to lose time, but we do not wish unnecessarily to lose life, or to lose liberty, or to lose even, mayhap, our independence.

There are other phrases besides "tempus fugit" which very learned Harvard men like our great and good President and your humble columnist quote on occasion—and all applicable to the present situation.

There is the Italian motto, "lestina lente," which being translated means make haste slowly—not in order to waste time by any means.

Then in addition to the Italian motto there is the perfectly good English motto, "Look before you leap."

That does not even have to be translated. It is in the native tongue and is sound Anglo-Saxon common sense.

Finally, there is the grand old English line so full of wit and wisdom. "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

Davy Crockett said in more homely phrase:

"Be sure you are right and then go ahead."

Davy Crockett went ahead perfectly well in the effective manner which has handed his name and fame down to our time.

But first he took pains to make sure that he was right.

That is all Congress need do, and that is all the patriots in Congress are trying to do.

Using our minds, let us think what happened to the French when they rushed headlong and heedless and unprepared into the present war.

And using our memory, let us recollect what happened to us during the last war when we assembled our vast army of American youth and had no equipment for them, and no sufficient clothes or shelter for them, and no adequate hospital accommodations or hospital supplies.

General Wright, commandant of Camp Doniphan, Okla., declared on January 28, 1918:

"The Army was forced to expand from less than 150,000 men to 10 times that number, and in the process of expansion inefficiency was bound to be found in all departments, and the result of that inefficiency we see right here in the Camp Doniphan base hospital.

"Medical Reserve officers who a few weeks before were practitioners in civil life, many of them merely country doctors, were called on to do the administration work of a great base hospital. Of course, they could not do it, and the patients suffered.

"Whoever is responsible for the delay in the construction of the hospitals is also to blame for these conditions. Instead of having the base hospital furnished and completely equipped when this division moved in, not a nail had been driven. Real construction had not been achieved until the middle of December, and by that time we had on our hands scores of cases of measles and other diseases.

"These cases were forced upon us. Instead of giving us a base hospital at first for us to put the sick men in, we gave them the sick men and they built a hospital around them."

On December 11, 1917, the Senate Military Affairs Committee, "actuated," according to the New York Times, "by criticism from all over the country," began investigation of lack of equipment in Army training camps.

Senator WADSWORTH, speaking for the Senate Military Affairs Committee, declared that not one Army camp post was adequately equipped with ordnance; but in the matter of clothes, the Army was even worse off.

General Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, speaking before the committee on December 12, 1917, said:

"The Government has been trying to do in 1 year what the National Defense Act of 1916, when war was imminent, had planned to have done in 5 years."

On December 19, 1917, Army Surg. Gen. William C. Gorgas announced that poor hospital facilities were responsible for many deaths.

He reported 2,000 cases of measles at Camp Bowie, Tex., and said the base hospital there was unfinished and without water, plumbing, or sewerage conditions.

Another 2,000 cases of measles broke out that month in Camp Sevier, S. C.

Senator Hitchcock read a letter received from Camp Cody, N. Mex., written by a camp trainee. It read in part:

"I can't help but remark the soldiers that are dying in the base hospital of pneumonia. Pretty near every time I go up I see three or four funerals. I feel safe in saying that an average of 10 or 15 a day pass over the Great Divide.

"We have two base hospitals here, with five to six thousand men in each, with practically no attention at all, so I see why there are so many dying off."

On December 28, 1917, Senator MCKELLAR told the committee he had received telegrams from commanders of eight camps telling him they were short of overcoats to the amount of 46,000 in the dead of winter.

Finally the authoritative Government records show that the number of Americans who died in the Great War were:

Killed in action

Army	37,568
Marines	1,450
Navy	871
Total	39,889

Died of wounds

Army	12,942
Marines	1,007
	13,949
Total deaths in action or from wounds	53,838

While due to neglect and insufficient facilities, and unpreparedness and haste, and carelessness the deaths from disease were:

Army	62,670
Total deaths from disease	62,974

So that it will plainly be seen that due to thoughtlessness and impulsiveness, incompetence and inefficiency, and unreasonable hurry and unwise lack of thought and care, the United States rushed into the late war and lost nearly 10,000 more men in the World War from disease than were killed in all the actual engagements on sea or land.

We hurried ahead before we were sure we were right.

We leaped before we looked.

And, as a consequence, we sent 62,000 American boys, dead of neglect and disease, home in boxes to their heartbroken American families—10,000 more than were killed in all our battles in the war.

Let us not repeat the same dreadful mistake.

In 1917 General Crozier said:

"The Government has been trying to do in 1 year what the National Defense Act had planned to have done in 5 years."

Now a more reckless and incompetent administration is trying to do in 1 year what it has spent $7,000,000,000 for and foolishly failed to do in the past 7 years.

Let us now proceed thoughtfully, systematically, and efficiently, and not again be persuaded to rush in like fools.

If we want to display our classical lore, there are other mottoes than tempus fugit.

There is the motto from Tacitus:

"Experimentia docet"—experience teaches.

And there are the inspiring and enlightening words of Patrick Henry:

"I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided and that is the lamp of experience."

Petition Against Entrance Into War

OF
HON. PIUS L. SCHWERT
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 14, 1940

PETITION BEARING THE SIGNATURES OF 225 MEMBERS OF THE LADIES' AID OF SALEM EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Mr. SCHWERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following petition:

BUFFALO, August 17, 1940.

Hon. PIUS L. SCHWERT,
Congressman, Forty-second District,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SCHWERT: We, the undersigned, being truly interested and concerned over the grave situation now existing in our national governmental affairs, both at home and abroad, wish to express our hopes and prayers and trust that, with the expressions of others, and with God's blessing and guidance overshadowing us all, true consideration and wisdom will rest with our Representatives who are now charged with the responsibility of guiding our beloved country through its present crisis.

We wish herewith to express our opinion against our beloved country favoring any entrance into the present war, whether it means sending our young manhood overseas or defending other countries in the Western Hemisphere. We feel that the political troubles of foreign countries need not be ours and do not warrant the supreme sacrifice of our youth. In case of attack by a foreign power upon our own country or any of our possessions, then we will be willing to make the utmost sacrifice to defend our country and its democratic principles against foreign aggression. We feel that to send our boys across the seas, there would be nothing to gain and a great loss in manpower, a needless loss, which only a parent can fully understand. The physical and mental wrecks of once healthy, strong manhood are a constant reminder of grim, useless warfare.

We hope and pray that the representatives of all classes of people will be and remain such, and not be influenced by wealth and selfish power. As each problem affecting our neutrality presents itself, may each Representative weigh his decision as though the life of his own son hung in the balance.

The undersigned are a group of citizens associated with Salem Evangelical Lutheran Church, Salem Street at Abbott Road, Buffalo, N. Y.

Respectfully yours,

THE LADIES' AID OF SALEM CHURCH,
MRS. MINA SCHULTZ,
MRS. RUTH POHLMAN,
MRS. A. KASTNER,
Committee.

Congress Must Answer to the People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. THORKELSON
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 14, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, on the 14th of September 1940, 232 Members of Congress voted for peacetime conscription, an act which is clearly illegal, and for the enactment of which no powers are delegated to Congress by the Constitution of the United States.

Let us not forget that Congress alone is responsible for the security of our Nation and for the welfare of our people; and neither can be protected by engaging in a war wherein we pit our forces against a united Europe, fighting for a common cause.

Some Members of Congress have an erroneous idea of the power which the people have delegated to this body in the Constitution, and to aid in clarification of this I shall quote from page 12091 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 13, 1940:

> Section 8 of article I of the Constitution enumerates the powers of the Congress. It says the Congress has the power "to * * * provide for the common defense."
> It has the power "to raise and support armies."
> It has the power "to provide and maintain a navy."
> It has the power "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States."

The gentleman who quoted the above forgets, however, that such powers are granted to Congress in order to "provide for the common defense and the general welfare" of the United States. It is not within the rights of Congress to give aid to a foreign power which is at war, and we cannot provide for our defense and promote the general welfare of our people by depleting our own defenses. On the contrary, in giving a part of our Navy to a foreign nation we actually retarded or destroyed our own defenses; and the Constitution calls that treason. The Constitution does not place our first line of defense outside of the United States and we cannot add to our own protection by projecting our first line of defense 2,000 miles from our shores. Neither has Congress the constitutional right to grant the President greater power than that given to him in article II of the Constitution.

It follows, therefore, and I base my opinion entirely upon the Constitution, that Congress did not have the right to sustain the President's act in the transfer of combat airplanes, armaments, ammunition, and the 50 destroyers to a foreign power now at war. In congressional failure to challenge this unwarrantable act of the President, we have jeopardized our defenses—which is not for the general welfare of the people. Article I, section 8, paragraphs 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, are very clear on this issue, and Congress should be guided by the literal meaning of these paragraphs. These specifically delegated powers are restricted by the tenth amendment, and the powers not mentioned, or what I choose to call unwritten powers, are fully protected by the ninth amendment to the Constitution.

In no place in the Constitution are powers delegated to Congress to conscript men in peacetime or wartime, and Congress has no right to conscript private industries at any time, whether we be at peace or war. After all, it is the people in this Nation who are the power, and they will, in their own interest, and for their own protection, give all aid in manpower and equipment, should such necessity arise for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States.

Congress should never forget that all acts of legislation and appropriation must be in the common defense and for the general welfare of the United States, and not at any time in defense or the general welfare of any foreign power—and certainly not of any power which is at war. Such an act on our part is not only unneutral but is, in addition to that, an act of war.

The quotation to which I have referred conveniently omits mentioning paragraph 15 of article I, section 8, which I shall now quote:

> To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

This states clearly the purposes for which the militia may be called forth, namely, to suppress insurrections and repel invasions, but not to be sent out of the United States in the service of a foreign power.

Then, paragraph 16 is mentioned only in part, and for better understanding I shall now quote all of it:

> To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

It should therefore be clear that Congress must, until advised otherwise by the people, adhere to these paragraphs as they are written into the Constitution of the United States.

In enacting peacetime conscription legislation Congress forgot its obligated duty to preserve, protect, and defend the rights of the people and the principles of their government. On the same day 218 Members of Congress voted for an appropriation of $500,000,000, which is supposed to be used in the rehabilitation and reconstruction of agriculture and other industries in Central and South America. This, of course, can only terminate in the destruction of our own industries, with more idleness, poverty, and suffering to our people.

I shall discuss each one of these acts, so that the people may know how one Member of Congress views this congressional retreat before the money changers who are now ruling England and America by the control of inflated money and credits, and who are also attempting to rule the world by control of gold and international gold credits. This motley Shylockian wrecking crew is made up of those who designate the patriots who remained to defend their country as "traitors" and "fifth columnists," while they themselves ran away to England and America with their ill-gotten wealth and stolen gold. These cowardly traitors did not have the courage to aid in defense of Norway, Holland, and Belgium, but, like rats leaving a sinking ship, they absconded with the gold under the protection of the British Government and our own refugee ships.

Mr. Hambro, an internationalist, is now traveling in the United States as a Norwegian, which he is not. He is engaged in disseminating pro-British propaganda, advocating aid to England. Is he here in the interest of Norway? If his interest is in Norway, why did he remove the gold from that country? Why did he leave the Norwegian people helpless and unable to buy dire necessities for the lack of foreign-gold credit?

Mr. Hambro is well connected in the English banking circles. Why has he not, with that influence, prevailed upon England to return a few ships to Norway so that they may be used to carry food supplies to a people who are likely to suffer extreme hardships during the coming winter months? Why has he not, with one hundred and fifty millions of Norwegian gold now stored in the United States, set up a credit for that country as an aid to the people he pretends to love? He has shown no such humane inclination. Did he remain behind to meet the invading foe? It is quite evident that he did not, for he is here now trying to involve us in the war, which is the making of his own international banking groups.

No true Norseman should be deceived by the twaddle Mr. Hambro is handing out, for he is as deceptive as those who are now here working for the interests of England in order to restore the United States as a colony of the British Empire under a world government.

How can these deserters, who ran away, shout "traitors" to those who stood by the flag and in defense of their own country?

Many of these deserters, now called refugees, are engaged in the same exploitation of the United States as they were in the countries from which they fled, and will, make no mistake about it, destroy us and leave us as they left the invaded nations of Europe. It was these thieving deserters, who, after having fled to France with the Belgian gold, called King Leopold and his army traitors, when they, short of ammunition, short of water and food, were compelled to capitulate to save defenseless civilians; and the Belgian Army, which, back to the wall, had stood by their guns, fighting for Belgium against better-equipped and organized forces.

I take off my hat to the King of Belgium, who, like a man, stood by his troops, his people, and his country.

Let us look at this from a purely impersonal viewpoint. What would we think of Government officials, who, when faced by an invading force, removed the gold from the Treasury of the United States and then, at the height of danger, deserted their posts for a safer place? I do not believe that such action would sit well with us, and those who were left behind no doubt feel as we would in similar circumstances.

The President and the money changers in America receive these international deserters—or breeding stock as someone has called them—with open arms, when, in justice, they should have been returned to the countries from which they fled and which they did not defend in their hour of greatest need. This administration has opened our gates to all of this riffraff, radicals, and criminals of Europe, who will, if they are allowed to remain in the United States, wreck this country as they have those they so ignobly deserted across the water. Those who cannot enter the United States directly from Europe because of quota restrictions are now coming in through South and Central America or the Caribbean Islands—countries from which it is easier to enter the United States. The United States is now the world's dumping ground for international degenerates and European criminals.

I wonder if anyone has given the slightest consideration to the fact that the people of Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France, being unable to raise sufficient food at home, depend upon imports for such needed supplies, and that the same countries also depend upon imports for clothing and raw materials, the lack of which will cause great hardship and suffering during the coming winter months.

Has anyone given the slightest consideration to the fact that food and other necessities cannot be bought without gold or gold credit, and that many mothers and children in these countries will die from starvation and exposure, because of their having been deprived of buying power? It is well to bear in mind that one nation cannot buy from another without gold or its equivalent, and while thinking of this, do not forget that the total world gold, including the tons stored in the United States vaults, is not owned by the people of the United States, but is instead owned and controlled by the international bankers; by the same people who fled from Norway, Belgium, Holland, and France, and after they had removed the gold to England and to the United States.

We are fortunate, because we are practically self-sustaining, but bear in mind that even we cannot buy rubber, coffee, tea, or travel abroad without gold credit; and that power is, as I have already said, under the absolute control of the Shylocks.

Does anyone realize that England, with the connivance of the administration, has commandeered or taken possession of the merchant marine of Norway, Holland, and Belgium, thereby leaving those countries without means of transporting food supplies to their people, even if they had gold credit in the United States and other foreign countries?

As a neutral American ask yourself this question: Is it an act of justice on our part to give aid to England, and so help her starve the people of Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France, who in no sense are responsible for the conditions which exist in those countries at the present time? Are we, in giving aid to England in this unjustifiable procedure saving Christian civilization? This is a problem to which we might give serious consideration, so that we will not allow ourselves to be led into an international situation where we will, when it is all over, be left without even one single friend among the family of nations.

Is it not probable that we may, in following the people who are blinded by hatreds, be led into a position where we invite reprisals from a unified Christian civilization, which is now fighting for its very life? I do not think that anyone can actually believe that Christianity will be destroyed by the very countries which have given this faith its greatest support. Is it not well for us to bear in mind that Spain, France, Germany, Belgium, Holland, Scandinavia, the Slavonic countries, Italy, and Greece will unite, and that Turkey will join such alliance against the powers that now control the gold? Is it not likely that these nations, united in the interest of their people, may force Russia to join such alliance, under a government purged of the Communist, as crusaders against those whose god is gold and whose savior is a bribe? Suppose such alliance will promise freedom to India and self-government to the native slaves of Africa. Where would we be, tied to the money changers in the British Empire? We would be in a very compromising position, particularly in view of the fact that the English people themselves are not in sympathy with their own administration. I may even say that the British are in less sympathy than we, for they understand the international problem much better than we do.

I have taken the liberty of calling attention to a few of these possible situations, so that Members of Congress may think about it before the administration leads our Nation into a position from which it will be difficult to retreat.

Some day the truth will be told, and we will find that the present administration, the administration advisers, the State Department, and our meddling diplomats are largely responsible for the invasion of Poland, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France. Evidence which is now filtering through shows clearly that promise of aid was given to Poland and France, and no better evidence should be required to prove that than the following excerpts:

Jacques Doriot in La Liberte, February 2, 1939:

"America has accustomed us to words of support which are denied the next day * * *

"Before relying on the military assistance of the United States of America, let us settle our differences, if possible, with our neighbors. Do not let the chance of peace slip away for the shadow of American support" (translation from Action Francaise, July 11, 1939).

Firmness Does Not Exclude Prudence (by J. Delebecque).

"England's resolution and determination are excellent. One should beware of the intrigue of those who are doubting and those who would like to assume an air of bravery of a kind to precipitate the desired conflict. In the critical period we are passing through the chiefs of state in England, as in France, are literally walking on eggs. There are people who advise them to put on iron-shod boots, because for various reasons—personal interests, fanaticism, total bewilderment—they desire the 'bloody omelette.' The Poles have in hand a blank check signed by London and Paris. They are urged to use it. It is sought to incite and intimidate the British and French ministers by shouting into their ears 'Munich.' The holy war in which they seek to plunge us is not a war for an endangered fatherland; it is a war of 'ideas', the religious war in a new guise; that is to say, a war truly frightful and criminal. Any such affected patriotism is to us terribly suspicious.

"The perfect statesman needs a cool head and a strong heart. And in these days we need more than ever a perfect statesman."

(Monsieur Delebecque was formerly in the French diplomatic service. More recently he has been the specialist on foreign affairs for Action Francaise.)

PART OF THE SPEECH OF GEORGES BONNET BEFORE THE FRENCH SENATE, FEBRUARY 7, 1939

And the United States of America? I have the greatest admiration for the great American democracy and for its eminent chief, President Roosevelt; the admiration felt particularly by all those who have lived in America and certainly, Mr. President Berenger could testify like myself.

We know what may be expected of America. I have retained friendships there from which I experience the loyalty almost every day. But I am not unaware that the best service one can render to our American friends is to allow in our friendship a shade of discretion. [Applause. Very good! Very good!] To avoid expressing herself with any exuberance harmful to her own interests. (Renewed proofs of approbation.)

This does not mean that our own diplomacy should be inactive as you can well understand. We have not ceased during these recent weeks, as formerly, to have the closest contacts with the American Government, and we have found there an active comprehension.

Our three democracies are conscious of their enormous material and moral forces. They know their place on the globe, in history, their economic power, and they know that no nation could impose its hegemony upon them.

But this friendship does not constitute and does not wish to constitute a menace to anyone. It does not aim at anything other than to assure the development of the three great peoples in peace and liberty. No nation, small or great, lacks the certainty that not one of these three democracies has any hostility toward it.

Chancelor Hitler in his recent speech said: "We see no advantage in exporting national socialism as an ideology. We have not any more reason to make war against any other nations because they are democracies."

On our part we may give the same assurance. The democracies do not nourish against anybody, against any nation, the slightest thought of propaganda, still less any aggression. They know that ideas cannot be imposed upon men by violence and they all have the same desire for peace. (Very good, very good.)

For, gentlemen, there has been one truth which the heads of governments, with a concurrence unanimous and comforting, have proclaimed before the bar of public opinion, that war would not increase the happiness or the power of any nation and that it would perhaps mark the end—anyway the retrogression—of European civilization. (Very good, very good, and applause.)

This agreement itself, this unanimity on the evidence, do they not give hope that diplomacy will find means to assure the peoples of the long peace which they wish with all their hearts?

No statesmen could have expressed the feeling of apprehension of the French people better than Jacquest Doriot, J. Delebecque, and Georges Bonnet, and it should be quite evident after reading their statements, that there was a diplomatic solution for England and France, instead of war. These gentlemen also realized that the situation was critical, and that war might terminate in a religious conflict—which would retard if not destroy Christian civilization. They also expressed fear that we could not fulfill the promises made to them by the administration as expressed by our diplomatic representatives in Europe.

However, some unseen power launched both France and England into a war which has already resulted in the loss of millions of lives and untold destruction of property.

What part did we play in launching this conflict by our meddling in Europe? Did we promise help? Diplomatic correspondence with Poland reveals that we did promise our aid, and in the repeal of the arms embargo, we, in a sense, allied ourselves on the side of England and France. Can we Members of Congress wash our hands of guilt? Is it not most probable that had we come out last year with a firm declaration of neutrality, that disagreements would have been settled through diplomatic channels instead of war?

It is my firm belief, that had the Congress adopted such wise course, Europe would have been at peace today. In acquiesence to the President's wishes, Congress has in reality condoned his warlike acts, which we should have curbed in the making. The result is that we are now about to be involved in a conflict that might be as disastrous to us as it will be to Great Britain.

Let us in all fairness admit that Congress alone is responsible for the security of our Nation and for the welfare of our people; and neither interest can be protected by engaging in a war where we will pit our forces against a united Europe and, as the French statements clearly reveal, may terminate in a holy war.

Let us now stop this foolish and supine attitude toward the administration. Let us set the President and his advisers right. Let us prevail upon them to lend every effort in restoring the peace and tranquillity in Europe among the nations which are now torn by strife. It is only in such manner we can justify ourselves as defenders of the civilization we now claim might be destroyed.

This now brings me to the subject that I wish to discuss, namely, conscription in peacetime. Why are we conscripting an army that can be raised by voluntary enlistment, and why are we upsetting our national business structure by conscripting and forcing private industries to submit to Federal domination and dictation, when such industries would only be too glad to give full aid were we threatened by invasion or war by any foreign power?

What is it all about, and why all of this eleventh-hour attempt to bring about a war hysteria among our people by deliberate and planned campaign of propaganda? Is it a childish attempt to scare the united European powers? If so, no one will disagree with me when I say it is too late, and that such act on our part may have the opposite effect by stampeding those powers into a closer union for mutual protection.

Is it not possible that we may bring about a holy war, in which Islam will join the united European powers to free the world of those who use gold as a weapon to crucify business and subdue nations?

Are we conscripting an army to replace the English who are now opposed to this war, and who understand and recognize the evil powers behind the war machine? If such is the case, if our conscript army is to follow the 500,000 rifles recently shipped to England, it will be according to the policy laid down by the League of Nations, by which they intended to police all nations with foreign troops. No one should fail to recognize the import of such procedure, for we are slipping right into such plan, laid down by the League of Nations.

Are we conscripting an army to be transported to Africa or India to battle a unified Europe and Islam in the Sudan, Egypt, Arabia, Iraq, and Palestine in an attempt to establish the contemplated kindom of David, with Jerusalem as the capital? Let us not be fooled, for, as fantastic as this may seem, it is the ultimate goal of the British-Israel World Federation, the Anglo-Saxon Federation, and other internationalistic organizations, which are now interrelated and dominated by those who sit in the grand orient lodges, and who are also in control of world gold and international credit.

In conclusion let me say that the ideas expressed in this discussion are thoughts which I hold to be reasonable. They are not based entirely upon my own opinion, but upon opinions of unbiased and informed statesmen and writers more familiar with conditions in Europe than we are in the Congress of the United States.

I impore Members of Congress to put their shoulders to the wheel by taking charge of this Government, as it is our duty to do, so that we may direct this Nation in its common defense and for the general welfare of the people, who are placing their faith, hope, and trust in the Congress of the United States.

Selective Training and Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KEY PITTMAN OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 18, 1940

LETTER BY HON. KEY PITTMAN, OF NEVADA

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask leave to publish in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter that I have written to Hon. Malcolm McEachin, secretary of state of the State of Nevada, relative to the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C., September 16, 1940.

Hon. MALCOLM MCEACHIN,
Secretary of State, Carson City, Nev.

MY DEAR MR. MCEACHIN: I have your letter in which you state that you will no doubt receive a great many inquiries concerning the contents, operation, and effect of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940. I will have sent to you a number of copies of the act so soon as printed as a public document.

I sent you a copy of the original Burke-Wadsworth bill as it was introduced in the Senate. If you will compare this bill with the act as it passed the Senate, you will find that there have been so many changes made in the bill by amendments on the floor of the Senate that the whole effect of the original Burke-Wadsworth bill has been changed. In fact, from reading the act as it passed the Senate and House, you would hardly recognize that it was based on the Burke-Wadsworth bill.

Unfortunately public opinion was based upon the Burke-Wadsworth bill as introduced. This is quite natural. A number of speeches were made against the bill before the limiting and protective amendments were adopted in the Senate. Nearly all of these amendments were adopted on the last 2 days before the bill was finally passed by the Senate. It was quite difficult to keep up with the purpose and effect of these amendments as they were being passed very rapidly and no official print was made of them until the bill passed the Senate.

In the first place, there was no limitation upon the number of conscriptees that could be inducted into the service by the President except the refusal of Congress to appropriate money for such purpose. If there were no limitations upon the number that might be inducted within the number required to be registered, then the induction of any number would be legal and Congress would be strongly persuaded to appropriate the necessary money. The Senate, however, for the purpose of making absolute limitation in this matter, expressly provided through the Lodge amendment on the day that the bill passed that not to exceed 900,000 of the conscripts or trainees should be inducted into the service or be in training in any 12 months. It has already been stated by the military departments that not to exceed 400,000 would be inducted into the service on the first call, and that it would be at least 6 months before the next 400,000 were inducted into the service for training. The military departments limited themselves to this number because of a lack of facilities for housing a greater number. There is still now another limitation and that is the Lodge amendment which was adopted limiting the trainees to 900,000 in any one 12 months.

The total number of estimated registrants between the ages of 21 and 35, inclusive, is approximately 16,000,000 men. Nevada's quota for registration will be approximately 16,000 men. This may be reduced by the number of men from Nevada now in the military service. Under the statutory limitation and the plan of military service, approximately 400 will be drawn and inducted into the service from Nevada on the first call. At the end of a year's training the trainees will be placed in reserve in different branches of the military service unless an imminent threat of war is pending at the end of the year, in which event they may be retained in the service.

The second important amendment adopted on the floor of the Senate was a provision that these men inducted into the service for training shall not be used in the military service outside of the Western Hemisphere and our own possessions. That means that the President and the military departments are absolutely commanded not to send these soldiers outside of the Western Hemisphere except to our own possessions. It is true that it is contended by two or three able and sincere Senators that the President of the United States would violate this law. Such an attempted violation by any President of the United States is inconceivable. Not only would Congress refuse to appropriate the money for such an undertaking but the President would be subject to impeachment. These Senators base their suspicions upon the alleged and mistaken grounds that the President has violated the law in trading 50 over-age destroyers for 6 naval and air bases off our Atlantic coast. Whilst it would be contrary to international law for the President to sell to Great Britain, a belligerent, these destroyers for gold, which would not give us the immediate defense we need, yet every neutral government, as well as belligerent governments has a right to take any steps deemed necessary for its defense without regard to how such acts may incidentally affect warring powers. These bases are of inestimable value to the United States in the defense of its shores and the Panama Canal.

It is hardly worth while, however, to discuss these legal questions, as the President has time and again promised the country that he does not intend to take our soldiers into the European war. It would be impossible for the United States to land its soldiers in Europe, and the President, having great knowledge of these subjects, is aware of this fact. Great Britain has all of the soldiers she needs. The vital test between Great Britain and Hitler is now on. The immediate results will probably be decided in 2 or 3 weeks. If Great Britain wins this battle, then our danger of war is far removed. If she loses the battle, our danger will be more acute and more proximate.

I am firmly of the opinion that Hitler cannot invade directly the United States. Even if I am correct in this opinion, however, it does not mean that Hitler in cooperation with other totalitarian powers may not establish puppet governments in Latin America and there accumulate their forces and armament for an approach toward our borders. Let us admit that even in the event of victory it would take a year or two or maybe longer for Hitler to accomplish this purpose in Latin America. Still if this attack ever comes from Latin America we must be prepared to meet it and conquer the enemy. At any and all costs it is the intention of the Government of the United States, backed up by the people of the United States, to prevent forever the destruction of our democracy and our liberties such as has been suffered by the democracies of Europe at the hands of the brutal Hitler.

Whether our boys are trained to defend themselves in war or not will not make war come or stay away. If war does come to us at some time through Latin America, then our boys who are qualified for training today would be qualified to fight then and would be conscripted. The only question that we have to consider is: "Shall our boys be thrown into a war improperly trained to protect themselves as many were during the World War or shall they be trained?"

The chief objection made to the present conscription and training is that there should not be conscription in peacetime. Few have made objection to conscription in time of war. The World War proves that there isn't time to train soldiers during war.

There are a few brutal men in the United States and there are a few brutal writers in the United States who favor selecting men of the brutish type and making them more brutal. It is unfair to quote these military maniacs as an expression of the opinion and desires of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives or of the people of this country. No people in the world are so free of brutal instincts as the American people. We must profit by the experience of the unnecessary destruction of our troops during the World War through the lack of training and the lack of the knowledge necessary to protect themselves on the battlefield against destruction.

There was not sufficient protection granted to those inducted into the training service in the original bill as to the welfare of their dependents, their own financial welfare, and the protection of these trainees against the loss of employment, the loss of their property, and the loss of their benefits under the social laws that our Government has enacted for those who depend upon their labor for their living. Those trainees who leave the Government service or private employment are assured of return to their positions upon their discharge, to the same ranks and priorities and the preservation of all benefits under existing law that they enjoyed at the time they were inducted into the service.

Again the Senate adopted an amendment protecting such trainees while in the service against foreclosures and other actions at law and granting a moratorium on insurance premiums, on unemployment insurance, compensations, and other characters of relief as are now provided by law in cases of foreclosures.

In case the Government is compelled to take over and operate a plant, it is provided that "nothing in this section shall be deemed to render inapplicable existing State or Federal laws concerning the health, safety, security, and employment standards of the employees in such plant." In fact, every provision of law has been made in the act to protect the status of the trainee at the time that he was inducted into the service until he is discharged.

It is recognized in the act that no successful war can be carried on by soldiers alone. Soldiers must be supplied not alone with the instruments of war but also with food and clothing and shelter. For that reason, as was done in the World War, those who can perform more valuable services in the event of war in supplying the necessities of the country as well as the Army will be placed in a deferred class.

The Senate by amendment provided that ministers of the gospel and divinity students should be placed in the deferred class and exempted from training.

It is also provided in the act by amendment adopted in the Senate that students who have entered college in 1940 shall in no case be called into training until July 1, 1941.

Those having dependents and who must rely upon their salaries or wages to support such dependents are placed in a deferred class.

Every protection for the welfare of the trainees has been carefully considered and provided for.

The rules and regulations governing registration and classification and the induction into the training service will be proclaimed and circulated in the near future. There is one thing certain—and that is mandatory in the law—that the conscription boards shall be established in each county in each State and will be composed solely of citizens of such counties. These boards and personnel officers will be appointed by the President of the United States upon the recommendation of the Governors of the respective States. The Senate adopted an amendment which expressly provided that no member of the military services of the United States will be qualified to be a member of any such boards. If any inductee feels aggrieved by action taken by a local board, he will under rules and regulations prescribed by the President have an appeal to an appeal board.

If anything on earth will prevent war being forced upon us, it is the action taken by the President and the Congress in preparing such a defense that no one will dare attack us. It knows that our boys will not be led into any war outside of the Western Hemisphere and our own possessions, and only within the Western Hemisphere if we are threatened with attack.

For the sake of their peace of mind, let the mothers of Nevada and the rest of the country banish groundless fears.

Sincerely yours,

KEY PITTMAN.

Wendell L. Willkie's Visit to Chicago

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 18, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement issued a day or two ago by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], chairman of the midwestern region of the Democratic National Committee, following the visit of the Republican nominee for President to the city of Chicago on last Saturday.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL.—Senator SCOTT W. LUCAS, chairman of the midwestern region of the Democratic National Committee, issued the following statement after Wendell Willkie's recent visit to Chicago:

"Mr. Willkie's speeches in Chicago yesterday were sufficient to give the Nation a solemn warning regarding his essential unfitness to be President. I doubt that the whole range of American political history can show a Presidential candidate exposing more clearly and unmistakably his basic instability and entire failure to grasp the meaning of statesmanship and governmental responsibility.

"Nothing in all his gyrations in Chicago yesterday was more revealing than his jeer, 'To hell with Chicago,' made in Cicero on the outskirts of the great metropolis that was entertaining him.

"At the start of his adventurer's dash for the Presidency he announced he would not make a campaign of personalities, and yet, yesterday, he started his western tour with the cry, 'To hell with Chicago.' And I, as a representative of the people of this State in Congress, wish to rebuke him as emphatically as I know how. I am not a resident of Chicago and can therefore speak with more freedom, perhaps, than one who lives in that city. As a citizen of the State of Illinois, of which Chicago is a part, I wish to answer his insult with the statement that he has done more than defame Chicago; he has defamed Illinois, which is proud of its great city and of the people in it.

"This declaration, 'To hell with Chicago,' is no slip of the tongue, no chance quip or wisecrack. He began his day in Chicago by declaring publicly, 'If you will listen for the next 2 months, you will hear the truth in plain Indiana language nobody can misunderstand.'

"His consignment of Chicago to eternal damnation is a revelation of the primary rashness of the Willkie character. It shows his unsoundness, his lack of the balance, and of the wisdom which the Nation needs in this time of appalling emergency. Can any one of the men and women who, 3 months ago, were prepared to admire Willkie, now imagine him as President in the 4 years when the Nation's very fate may depend upon cool judgment?

"Democrats and Republicans alike, among the common people, agree today that what the Nation is going to need to guide its next administration is a seasoned, experienced, and well-trained mind.

"In view of this emergency, and of this performance of yesterday, we, as citizens, are entitled to ask if Willkie isn't the kind of man who might well lose his head, any moment, and say to hell with New England, or the South, or perhaps the whole Middle West.

"He has already as much as said, 'To hell with independent newspapers.' He was president of the powerful public utility which strangled the Chattanooga News because it dared oppose his monopoly. He has treated with contempt the tried and proved statesmen of the Republican Party and has gone off arrogantly with stock brokers and fellow utility barons managing his campaign.

"Yesterday he gave an insult to the patriotic businessmen of the country by declaring that if elected President he would prepare the country for war by giving the authority to 'businessmen not politicians.' In this he totally ignored the fact that the most thoroughly prepared businessmen are now directing the production of the necessary guns and planes. Does he imply that he, who was never more than a corporation lawyer, a front man for gigantic utilities, is abler to direct industrial preparedness than Stettinius of United States Steel and Knudsen of General Motors? Is he more trustworthy than Biggers and the other industrial leaders who are devoting their training and skill toward arming the Nation this minute?

"Some of my Republican friends in the United States Senate tell me they wish 'Willkie wouldn't talk so much.' But I answer with entire seriousness and earnestness that it is fortunate for America that he is talking enough and showing enough of his wisecracks and flippancies to reveal his true incapacity for statesmanship, his inability to comprehend what it takes to achieve common-sense government. Thank God, Willkie is talking. It has given the Nation a chance to discover in ample time that by some curious accident the Republican Party got a patent-medicine showman when it comes to the solemn business of considering national issues in this world crisis.

"In his strange performance of yesterday, Willkie insulted the intelligence of factory workers by assuring them that President Roosevelt has never given a man a job in private industry. This is plain nonsense, as any survey of the relative unemployment in 1932 and in 1939 will show. Long before war orders developed there had been a tremendous gain in national income and employment.

"The net result of Willkie's medicine show invasion of Chicago yesterday will be, I predict, that the city will rebuke him next November with a Roosevelt majority of 500,000 instead of the previously expected 300,000, and that down-State will join with its great metropolis in turning his profane insult back upon his head."

Registration of Aliens

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 18, 1940

ADDRESS BY LEMUEL B. SCHOFIELD, SPECIAL ASSISTANT TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL IN CHARGE OF THE IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on registration of aliens, delivered by Mr. Lemuel B. Schofield, Special Assistant to the Attorney General in charge of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, on August 15, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is my privilege to talk to you on an important phase of the national-defense program. I shall try to explain the nature and purpose of the Alien Registration Act, and how it will be administered by the Department of Justice, which, with the Post Office Department, has been entrusted by the Congress to carry out the provisions of this new law.

Our country has developed and grown to be the greatest nation on earth, largely because of our traditional policy that peoples of other lands are welcome here. Through the years they came from every corner of the world. They can still come and they are still coming, though their numbers are now limited in accordance with a plan adopted by the Congress some years ago, based on allotments or quotas worked out according to nationalities.

These people came to us because they were looking for a new chance at life. They were seeking freedom. They wanted to live in a land where they could worship God as they saw fit, where their children could go to school, where they could think for themselves and speak out on occasion, where they had a chance to earn their daily bread according to their best ability and to lay aside a little against a rainy day, and where they could live and laugh without being hounded and driven from pillar to post at the whim or caprice of some autocratic overlord. In short, they sought liberation in this land of liberty. They came here to be free.

Almost all of them soon became useful, loyal, and welcome residents of this, their adopted country. Many of them married American citizens, and the children of all of them, if born here, became by operation of law, citizens of the United States. Hundreds of thousands of them took advantage of our liberal citizenship policy and became naturalized, a process which gives to the foreign-born resident the full rights and the same citizens' status as the native-born.

But, for one reason or another, about three and one-half million of them have not become citizens. One reason may be that we have never adopted the unwise policy of forcing citizenship upon anyone. We have never set a time limit and said to them, "You must become citizens or get out." Partly it is due to ignorance. Partly it is because, especially in times like these, the orderly process of granting citizenship by court procedure after careful investigation is not geared up to accommodate large onrushes of applicants. There are thousands of aliens in this country who have declared their intention of becoming citizens, and who are patiently awaiting their turn.

But, whatever the reason may be, the fact remains that we have with us this large number of aliens. For the most part, they are here legally and most of them have been admitted for permanent residence. There can be little doubt that the overwhelming majority of them are decent, loyal, hard-working, respectable people, from whom this Nation has nothing whatever to fear.

But a program of national defense must be adequate and complete. Nothing can be overlooked or neglected. We still have before us the tragic picture of those hapless nations who underestimated the dangers which lurked behind their lines. This Government must know everything it can learn about every alien within our borders. It must find out how many there are, who they are, and where they are. It must know why they are here, and what they are doing. A government to protect its own can do nothing less.

And it must do so, too, for the protection of the aliens themselves. These are dangerous days. Emotions run high, and good judgment and sound reason are apt to be overridden by rashness and impetuous enthusiasm. Hysteria must be kept down, and race hatred and prejudice must not be permitted to hold sway. This Government cannot allow the harmless, law-abiding, loyal alien to be harassed or persecuted by those who would act in passion and haste under a genuine but mistaken sense of patriotism. And it can best protect and safeguard those from other lands who live here if it knows all there is to know about them.

Thus all must agree that the Congress acted wisely and well, in the interest of our national security, when it decided last June that every alien must be registered and every alien over 14 years of age fingerprinted within the 4 months' period beginning August 27 next. It will be noted that the statute applies to every alien. This means, generally speaking, every foreign-born man, woman, and child in the United States and its possessions who has not been naturalized. All aliens over 14 years of age must register in person; children under 14 must be registered by their parents or guardians. When a child reaches the age of 14 he must then register in person. Moreover, after he has registered, an alien must report every change of residence within 5 days after he moves.

And let me emphasize that even though one has declared his intention of becoming a citizen and has received his so-called "first papers," he is still an alien in the eyes of the law and must register.

Registration is compulsory. Every alien must register. The law provides a penalty in the form of a fine and imprisonment for failure to register, as well as for refusal to be fingerprinted, intentionally giving false information, and failing to report changes of address.

Registration will consist of answering certain questions, such as name, address, place of birth, date and place of entry into this country, and occupation. Each alien will be asked how long he intends to remain in this country and whether he has had any military service either here or abroad. He will be required to list his activities and to name any organizations of which he is a member or in which he participates, and to state whether they further the interests or program of a foreign government.

So much for the nature and purpose of the Alien Registration Act. Now, as time will allow, a few words about the manner in which it will be administered. As I have said, the Congress has placed upon the Department of Justice and the Post Office Department the duty of carrying out the provisions of this act, and these two great departments of our Government are working in close cooperation in order that this huge task may be carried out smoothly, efficiently, and with as little disturbance in the lives of our alien population as possible.

The actual registration will be handled by a trained staff of courteous, experienced postal employees who will be on duty during the full period of registration from August 27 to December 26, inclusive, in every first- and second-class post office and in the post office at every county seat. The alien will be required to go there and answer the questions. Adequate provisions will be made for those who are infirm or bedridden or confined in institutions. The answers to the questions will be recorded by the postal employees on official forms. After they have been completed, the alien must sign his name and swear to the truth of his answers. His fingerprints will be made at that time, too. He will not be cross-examined by anyone at the post office, but he will be expected to answer all the questions accurately, completely, and truthfully.

These signed questionnaires will be sent to the Immigration and Naturalization Service at Washington, where they will be filed, indexed, and cataloged to become a part of the permanent records of that Service. Where necessary, they will be checked against other records, and investigations will be conducted, if required, to determine the accuracy of the information thus obtained.

In due course everyone who registers will receive through the United States mail a registration receipt card. This will be his proof that he has registered in compliance with the law. This card should be preserved carefully, and it would be well to have it readily available because, though the law does not require an alien to carry it with him, it does require every alien to register, and this card will be his evidence that he has done so.

In order to make registration easier specimen forms of the questionnaire with full instructions as to each question and how it should be answered will be available at the various post offices well before the first day of registration, August 27. These instructions will contain an exact duplicate of the official registration blank, and it is urged that every alien obtain a specimen form as soon as possible, take it home and study it, and fill it out carefully. He should then take it with him to the post office when he goes to register, so that he can quickly and readily answer accurately and completely the same questions when asked by the registering officer.

And now a word about fingerprinting. Everyone should understand that there is no stigma of any kind attached to it. Hundreds of thousands of persons have had their fingerprints taken and recorded for identification purposes. The day has passed in this country when a fingerprint file is regarded in any sense as a "rogues' gallery." It is simply a modern means of identification. It is the most accurate way to keep records straight and to identify them. Names may be changed; faces changed or even lifted; signatures may be forged; but no two sets of fingerprints have ever matched. In the last war every man who served in the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps was fingerprinted. Thousands of people are voluntarily fingerprinted every year. All Federal civil-service workers, all Postal Savings depositors, and many other are fingerprinted as a matter of course. There is no disgrace to it, and no alien should have the slightest compunction in submitting to it.

Let me stress another point. The alien need not fear that the information he gives will be used by the Government to harass him, or will be available to others to annoy him or discriminate against him in any way. The law provides that the records shall be kept secret and confidential. Nobody may examine them except with the express permission of the Attorney General of the United States. All may rest assured that Attorney General Robert H. Jackson will see to it that these records will not become available except to those entitled to the information for legitimate needs of national defense and for other proper governmental purposes.

Another point which should be brought home to every alien, is that registration is absolutely free. No official fee of any kind is involved and no money need be paid by the alien to anyone. If doubt exists as to whether an individual comes within the provisions of the law, as, for example, whether or not he is a citizen, which is often a complex and difficult legal question, he should play safe and register. If he has any doubt as to how to answer some of the questions, he should go to the post office or to the nearest office of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and make inquiry. He will be furnished with all the help which it is possible to give him, and he cannot pay anything for this advice. Already there have been some complaints regarding persons who are attempting to take advantage of aliens and who pretend that they can "fix things" to avoid registration, or make things easier in answering the questions, or eliminate some of them. They offer this spurious advice in return for a fee. The alien should beware of the "registration racketeer."

Before I close may I direct a word especially to those of you who are citizens of the United States? You can be of great assistance in carrying out this phase of the defense program. Many of you have friends, relatives, or neighbors who are not citizens. You can help your country by helping them understand the purpose of the Registration Act and how its provisions will be carried out. You can tell them where to go to register and when to go. You can be of particular assistance to those who are not familiar with our language and who may have difficulty in reading and understanding the questions, and, above all, you can point out to your alien friends or acquaintances the necessity for them to register and can urge them to do so as soon as they can after the period of registration opens on August 27, so that there will not be a large last-minute rush when the period ends on December 26.

Above all, you can make clear to your alien friends that registration is intended by the Government for the protection of aliens as well as for the protection of our country.

Refuses To Support Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, September 18, 1940

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN EDWARD J. FLYNN AND LUTHER HARRISON

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Edward J. Flynn, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, to Mr. Luther Harrison, of Oklahoma City, and the reply of Mr. Harrison, which I think will be of interest.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE,
New York City, August 28, 1940.

Hon. LUTHER HARRISON,
Oklahoma City, Okla.

MY DEAR MR. HARRISON: Four years ago your efforts did much to sweep our great leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, into the White House. This year the cause is even more inspiring. America needs Roosevelt.

I invite you again to carry this message to your fellow citizens. Please fill out the enclosed sheet for the speakers' bureau and send it to me.

With kindest personal regards, I am
Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. FLYNN, Chairman.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., September 11, 1940.

Hon. EDWARD J. FLYNN,
Democratic National Committee, New York City.

DEAR MR. FLYNN: May I thank you heartily for your recent letter, in which you express your appreciation of the services I have rendered the Democratic Party in former campaigns and inquire if my services will be available during the current campaign.

Not once in 48 years have I refused to appear on the stump in behalf of the Democratic ticket in any State or National contest. My first oratorical effort was made in 1892, in behalf of the election of Grover Cleveland. In subsequent campaigns I have spoken (frequently at my own expense) all the way from the Carolina coast out to the foothills of the Rockies. Naturally, I am ready and anxious to take part in any campaign that involves Democratic issues and Democratic candidates.

In 1912 I took the stump at the request of the Oklahoma State Democratic Committee and spoke in every one of Oklahoma's 77 counties against Theodore Roosevelt and the third term. Following the termination of that campaign I received formal letters of thanks for fighting the third term heresy from Governor Haskell and Governor Cruce; from Chairman Tom Harrill, of the Democratic State committee; and from the Democratic county committees of Hughes, Seminole, and Woods Counties.

While I am getting somewhat old to prepare a new speech in its entirety, I still have a copy of the speech I made throughout the Southwest against Theodore Roosevelt and the third-term heresy in 1912; and if it meets with your approval and conforms to your wishes, I shall be glad to make that speech just anywhere in the United States that you suggest. I am still just as strong for the preservation of the third-term precedent as I was when I spoke against its violation in 1896, 1912, 1920, and 1928. Four times in the past 44 years I have fought under the Democratic flag as a recognized Democrat for a principle that was observed by Washington, vitalized by Jefferson, and religiously observed by Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson. And I am ready to make my fifth battle under the old Democratic flag for the preservation of a principle whose retention I consider essential to the safety of the Republic.

In the event you consider my 1912 speech undesirable, I shall be glad to make, any time and at any place, the speech I made in 1932 in support of the Democratic Party's platform promises to repeal the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, to balance the Budget, to reduce the expenses of Federal Government at least 25 percent, and to effectively prevent the return of the saloon.

If at any time during the present campaign you want me to deliver one of the speeches I made in 1912 and 1932, I shall be at your service and subject to your call.

Very respectfully,

LUTHER HARRISON.

Roosevelt Gains According to Gallup Poll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. SMATHERS
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, September 18, 1940

ARTICLE FROM NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD a clipping taken from the New York Times this morning under the heading of Roosevelt gains in three States.

The Gallup poll shows in this newspaper that since August 25 three States have moved from the Willkie column to the Roosevelt column—New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

The poll shows that my State of New Jersey is now 54 percent for Roosevelt. Four years ago no one, not even Jim Farley, claimed my State of New Jersey for Roosevelt until 4 or 5 days before the election. In that election the State gave President Roosevelt a 360,000 majority.

It is, therefore, refreshing to see that the Gallup poll today, 6 weeks before the election, claims the State for Roosevelt by a 54-percent majority. As we draw nearer to election day this percentage will increase.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROOSEVELT GAINS IN THREE STATES LISTED—HE NOW LEADS IN NEW YORK, NEW JERSEY, AND PENNSYLVANIA, GALLUP SURVEY FINDS—BUT RACE IS STILL CLOSE—SHIFT OF THE ADVANTAGE FROM WILLKIE TO THE PRESIDENT SINCE AUGUST 25 SEEN

President Roosevelt has gained and Wendell L. Willkie lost strength in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, controlling almost one-fifth of the electoral vote for President, since August 25, according to a survey of the American Institute of Public Opinion, announced yesterday by Dr. George Gallup, the director.

"Gaining four percentage points on Mr. Willkie in New York State, three in Pennsylvania, and five in New Jersey," Dr. Gallup writes,

"President Roosevelt has taken the lead away from the Republican candidate in these three States and buttressed his national position at this stage of the race, the survey shows.

"Whether or not President Roosevelt's gains in these States have been duplicated in other parts of the country remains to be seen. Returns from the institute's third State-by-State survey of Roosevelt-Willkie sentiment are being tabulated and will be reported Friday.

"What has happened in these three eastern States since the previous institute survey August 25 is sufficient to show the problem that faces Mr. Willkie on his present trip through the far West, however. As in the past, the intensification of the war in Europe has been followed by a rise in Roosevelt support. Mr. Willkie, whose active campaign is just beginning, must now attempt to overhaul President Roosevelt in States like New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, which the Republican candidate held during the first weeks of the campaign and which are probably necessary for his election.

"RACE IS STILL CLOSE

"The race in these three States is still close—as close as it was a month ago—but the advantage lies today with President Roosevelt instead of with Mr. Willkie, the survey shows.

"The State-by-State vote of those with definite choices at this time with the net change for Roosevelt since August 25, is as follows:

Electoral votes		Today Roosevelt	Today Willkie	Points of change for Roosevelt
		Percent	Percent
47	New York	52	48	+4
36	Pennsylvania	52	48	+3
16	New Jersey	54	46	+5

"In each of these States the institute survey found a substantial number of voters 'undecided' or without definite choices at this time—12 percent in New York, 11 percent in Pennsylvania, and 13 percent in New Jersey. Many of them still say, 'We don't know very much about Willkie yet; we're waiting to hear what he has to say.'

"The importance of New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey lies in the fact that together they account for 99 electoral votes, or almost one-fifth of the 531 in the electoral college.

"FIGURES FOR THIS CITY

"In New York City, where President Roosevelt registered 75 percent of the vote in 1936, he now leads by 67 percent. In Philadelphia, where Roosevelt received 62 percent of the vote 4 years ago, his strength today is at 60 percent.

"The trend since the August 25 survey is shown in the following figures:

	Percent Roosevelt	Percent Willkie	Gain for Roosevelt
New York City	67	33	+4
Up-State New York	38	62	+4
Philadelphia	60	40	+3
Rest of State, including Pittsburgh	49	51	+4

Invasions of England

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 18, 1940

LETTER BY RALPH LOZIER

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to me by Ralph F. Lozier, Esq., an attorney, of Washington, D. C., setting forth some interesting facts of history with regard to invasions and attempted invasions of Great Britain.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 11, 1940.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR TRUMAN: This letter is prompted by a desire to contribute something to correct a widely accepted fallacy which has no historic foundation, but which may directly, or at least remotely, have a bearing on the question of preparedness.

Since war broke out in Europe in all its frightful savagery, our newspapers, feature writers, publicists, and perhaps a few high-ranking military and naval authorities and experts have frequently asserted that Great Britain had never been invaded since 1066 when the bastard, William, Duke of Normandy, and grandson of a tanner of Faliase, invaded England and defeated Harold, the Saxon, at Senlac or Hastings, which event changed the racial complexion and the political institutions of the British Isles and mightily influenced future world events.

So frequent and so positive have been these claims as to the freedom of England from external aggression since the invasion by William the Conqueror, that millions of Americans readily accepted them without questioning their authenticity. And this fallacy that England had never been invaded since the time of William the Conqueror has, until recently, furnished a fatally false basis for the belief that England is forever immune from invasion. Indeed, the English Government and people, until a few months ago, complacently believed their insular position and preponderance of sea power would make impossible any invasion of the British Isles or seriously hamper their normal participation in world commerce.

To the end that we may not be misled by this myth that England has been free from invasion for 874 years, it might not be amiss to show it has no historic foundation. That the British Isles have been repeatedly invaded since the establishment of Norman supremacy in the eleventh century is convincingly and conclusively demonstrated by numerous historical authorities. One reference will suffice: Between January 22 and March 11, 1778, the English Parliament engaged in continuous debate on the state of the Army and Navy, the conduct of the war with the American Colonies, and the American conciliation bills. On March 11, 1778, the House of Commons went into a committee on the state of the nation in which Charles James Fox moved, "that the present state of the Royal Navy for the defence of Great Britain and Ireland is inadequate to the dangerous crisis of public affairs." Mr. Temple Luttrell opened the debate in an elaborate argument in support of the Fox motion and declared that the English Army and Navy were grossly inadequate for the defense of Great Britain and Ireland. In the course of his argument for a very substantial increase in the British Military and Naval Establishments, Mr. Luttrell said:

"Let those gentlemen who hug themselves with a comfortable persuasion of our entire security from invaders, because of our insular situation, and vigilance, or superior dexterity of our fleet, recollect how many invasions of these islands stand recorded in history. There have been, since the Norman conquest, 24 invasions of Great Britain or Ireland, 9 of which have been made good without any molestation on the seas and 7 have proved successful. Between 1685 and 1689, 4 invasions were effectuated. In May 1685 the Duke of Monmouth sailed from the Texel with 3 ships, and landed without resistance, after beating about in bad weather 19 days, in the English Channel, which then swarmed with cruisers dispatched to intercept his passage. In 1688 the Dutch Fleet, with the Prince of Orange aboard, afterward King William III, and which consisted of 54 men-of-war (besides transports and other vessels, about 500) sailed from Helvoet, and stretched for the Channel. Lord Dartmouth at that time lay with the English squadron of 61 ships of the line, at anchor in The Downs; the weather became thick and hazy, as is usual, with the wind to the southward of the east. The Dutch men-of-war were full 7 hours before they could all stretch to the westward of the English and extended several miles in length; yet the prince contrived to reach Torbay and land his whole army unopposed; though Lord Dartmouth got under way with the utmost expedition possible, and crowded sail to encounter the enemy. I am aware that some writers of that time have hinted strong suspicions against the loyalty and zeal of the British commanders; but the fact is they used their best endeavors, and once got within sight of the Dutch rear; but the wind shifting suddenly to the westward and coming on to blow fresh, just as the Dutch men-of-war had reached Torbay (or as some authors allege, overshot their destination in the night) they were enabled to fetch the landing place, while the ships in chase were forced, by the same gale, so far back as the Isle of Wight.

"The year after the abdication a squadron of 14 French men-of-war landed King James and several of his chief military officers at Kinsale, without meeting with the English squadron dispatched to prevent debarkation; and not long after a second French fleet met with the same facility of landing and put on shore a numerous foreign army for enabling King James to dispute the possession of that kingdom with his son-in-law. But, sir, this alarm of an invasion and the present debilitated state of Great Britain and Ireland will render it absolutely necessary that we reserve two-thirds of our present force for the heart of the realm. The noble lord (North) speaks in high tone and boasts of the 'vigour of our Navy'—being particeps criminis, I suspect, with the First Lord of the Admiralty, rather through mischievous policy than shortsightedness. Another honorable member (the Lord Advocate of Scotland) trusts much to the exertion of our superior naval armaments, 'with energy.' How, sir, can you spare one ship of the line from the defence of this country in case of a French and Spanish war? Suppose you had 43 of the line manned to their full war complement; this strength would scarcely suffice to cover your harbours and coasts; you would have no cruisers, no western squadron. What is to become of your West India islands, your Asiatic settlements, and the important fortresses of Gibraltar and Mahon? The foreign stations, for a defensive war only against France, will require nearly 50 sail of the line; and against the two houses of Bourbon united you cannot do with fewer of their services than 75 or 80. Your whole present extent of the line of battle would be little better than a Mediterranean command, with proper reliefs. When have you seen so few as 20 sail of the line on that service against the united power of Versailles and Madrid? In the reign of Queen Anne, Sir George Rooks and Sir Cloudesly Shovel commanded a fleet of more than 50 sail of the line in that sea; and the fleet of the enemy was full as numerous; they had 17 three-deckers.

"In the reign of George 1st, Sir George Byng had upward of 20 sail of the line of battle in the Messina fight; and his force was represented as inadequate to that station. In the late king's reign, the squadron under Admirals Matthews and Lestock consisted of above 40 men of war of the line; and the combined fleets of France and Spain proved fully their match. I shall perhaps be told that in 1762, when the French and Spaniards were united against Great Britain, we had few more than 20 sail of the line of battle in the Mediterranean, off Cadiz; and, notwithstanding which, we were too strong for the enemy; but let the gentlemen recollect, that the coup de grâce was given to the naval power of France the preceding summer; and the Spanish Navy was the only one we had to contend with, and near half their men of war of superior rates were on the continent of Spanish America or at Cuba, etc."

I am calling your attention to this widely accepted "historic fallacy," because experience of mankind demonstrates that nations, like individuals, are often victims of a false sense of security, and unintentionally and unconsciously lapse into a state of equanimity, self-satisfaction, and excessive self-confidence not always justified by swiftly changing world conditions.

I am one whose faith in our institutions is unimpaired. I still believe that no emergency is so great as to necessitate or justify an abandonment, abatement, or impairment of the principles, policies, and traditions which underlie, permeate, and vitalize our free institutions. I can conceive of no emergency or cataclysmic condition that cannot be successfully met and satisfactorily solved within the framework of our constitutional system by an accurate interpretation and wise application of the fundamental concepts on which our free Government rests. It is foolish to argue that a government, such as ours, cannot function efficiently, defend itself, or protect its interests in crises such as now confront the nations of the world. To argue that a democracy cannot function as efficiently as a totalitarian state in great national upheavals is tantamount to an ignominious confession that our form of government is a delusion and failure in any supreme crisis that may confront us. I have no doubt our Government and the American people will meet the present emergency with a spirit, wisdom, and courage comparable with that of our constitutional fathers.

Sincerely,

RALPH F. LOZIER.

Selective Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL, CHIEF OF STAFF

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I submit for printing in the RECORD a radio address delivered by Gen. George C. Marshall, the Chief of Staff, on the Selective Service Act.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This afternoon the President gave the final approval to the act of Congress creating a system of selective service for compulsory military training, a great fundamental stride toward the preparation of this country to defend itself, to protect its form of government and its compelling interests in the Western Hemisphere. This morning some 60,000 citizen-soldiers of the National Guard left comfortable homes, their families, and their jobs to fulfill their patriotic mission as members of the Army of the United States.

Within the next 10 days these troops will concentrate in divisional camps in New Jersey, South Carolina, Oklahoma, and the State of Washington to start on a period of intensive military training. Along the east and west coasts of the United States harbor-defense and other units of the guard will move into camps and commence their training in the handling of heavy seacoast guns and smaller weapons. Antiaircraft regiments will assemble at special firing centers to commence practical training in this vital service. National Guard air squadrons of observation planes will move to airfields to perfect their coordinated training with other branches of the Army.

I wish to emphasize the importance of these preparations. We are at peace with every nation in the world. Nevertheless, it is the feeling of the War Department that the next 6 months include the possibility of being the most critical period in the history of this Nation. Ordinary common sense indicates that our preparations should be made accordingly.

The situation today is utterly different from that of 1917. Then we were at war, but we foresaw small possibility of military danger to this country. Today such a possibility trembles on the verge of becoming a probability. Then we could proceed with deliberation. We could wait until we built cantonments, until we first trained officers later to train the men, until we were prepared to form a field army. We did not need to worry about arms, equipment, and ammunition—our Allies were prepared to supply these necessities.

Today time is at a premium and modern arms and equipment must be provided by our own industries, not by allies. We must be prepared to stand alone. We cannot depend on others for protection during a prolonged period of preparation.

Therefore the mobilization this morning of the first increment of the National Guard is the first long step in the preparation of an adequate army of citizen soldiers to man our defenses.

Testifying before a congressional committee last February, I made the statement that our preparations for defense should be carried out in an orderly, businesslike manner, proceeding step by step, in accordance with the major developments abroad; that if Europe blazed in the late spring or summer we must put our house in order before the sparks reached the Western Hemisphere. Even so, it must be admitted that I only partially visualized the full extent of the conflagration and the rapidity with which it was to overwhelm the continent of Europe, yet at the time there was severe criticism of that statement as being unnecessarily alarming.

Today the public and the press are demanding action, immediate and all-inclusive, and there is a more general appreciation of the hazards of our situation. But I fear that there is not so clear an understanding of just what is required in order to produce the desired results.

The time-consuming process in manufacturing materiél—planes, guns, tanks, and other munitions—is partially comprehended, though impatience and forebodings are productive of demands for miracles to overcome delays due to past public indifference; also, I fear that we expect too much of machines. We fail to realize two things: First, that the finest plane or tank or gun in the world is literally worthless without technicians trained as soldiers—hardened, seasoned, and highly disciplined—to maintain and operate it; and, second, that success in combat depends primarily upon the development of the trained combat team composed of all arms. This battle team is the most difficult, the most complicated of all teams to create, because it must operate on unknown ground, in darkness as well as in daylight, amidst incredible confusion, danger, hardship, and discouragements. It is a team of many parts, the decisive element of which remains the same little-advertised, hard-bitten foot soldier, with his artillery support.

From a foreign source, a veteran of the recent fighting, we get this comment: "Wars are still fought by men even though they use elaborate weapons. Troops of all kinds must therefore have physical fitness and toughness that will guarantee their vitality and endurance under prolonged strain."

A German general staff officer is credited with this summary of that army's recent success:

"Our success is due to close teamwork between the air force, armored troops, motorized engineers, and infantry. Of course, the infantry must finally hold the ground, but all others help to bring it up. Our methods are simple in the extreme; they are understood by every soldier in the army. Our foot infantry is the best in the world. Their principal job is marching, and the job of every other arm is to keep them marching forward into enemy land. * * * We move," he says, "on a broad front with armored divisions and air force. Where the initial resistance is too strong for the armored troops to penetrate, it is broken by dive bombers and additional artillery. The way must be cleared for the infantry, with whom the final decision lies. This requires perfect communication and coordination between arms; further, it requires a singleness of command and purpose." He is describing a highly organized team, a balanced team, in contrast to a few highly developed specialties, each operating somewhat according to its own theory of combat.

The War Department has carefully followed the development of the war in Europe for the purpose of analyzing the reasons for the success of one army or the failure of another. While the importance of specialized training is apparent to all observers, the tremendous importance of seasoned soldiers, welded into a perfect team, is the outstanding impression. There is no royal road to such training. It cannot be obtained by reading books or sitting in barracks. The only way we can prepare ourselves for the future is to get out in the open, in all kinds of weather, and take advantage of the lessons forced on nations who are less fortunately situated.

The original recommendation of the War Department that this first increment of the National Guard be ordered into active service last July, was based on the necessity for hurrying to develop a special seasoned reinforcement for the small body of mobile troops of the Regular Army available in continental United States. Today, the entry of this portion of the National Guard on active duty must also serve another purpose. These divisions, these regiments and squadrons that joined the active Army of the United States this morning, must prepare themselves as quickly as possible to receive and train their portion of the young men selected under the democratic terms of the new law just given force and effect by the signature of the President.

Both the troops of the Regular Establishment and those of the National Guard must absorb in their ranks the men of the Selective Service Act and give them their military training. Furthermore, thousands of officers of the Reserve Corps, mainly products of the R. O. T. C. in our colleges and universities, are either on active duty or are being called to such duty to provide the necessary additional leaders. In other words, the National Defense Act of 1920, the result of our experience in 1917 and 1918, is being put into effect in a businesslike manner. The Selective Service Act has added the final touch of authority to enable America to go to work effectively at the business of preparing herself against the uncertainties, the threatened dangers of the immediate future.

The consummation of War Department plans must be governed by the speed with which adequate shelter can be provided. Until funds were made available the Department could only plan for such important details. Now the problem is the completion of temporary hospitals, sewage and water systems, buildings and other necessities of healthful life. So long as the international situation permits, we will proceed only as rapidly as adequate shelter can be provided. In turn, the trainees under the Selective Service Act will be called out as rapidly as units of the Regular Establishment and National Guard are prepared to receive them—both from the viewpoint of training and of shelter—the first increment about the middle of November.

The middle of October it is planned to order a second increment of the National Guard to join the active Army—the Twenty-seventh Division from New York, the Thirty-seventh Division of Ohio, the Thirty-second Division from Michigan and Wisconsin, and air squadrons of observation planes from New York, Michigan, and Mississippi. The entire National Guard of Puerto Rico and Hawaii will be included in this increment.

For years the National Guard has been preparing for service in the event of a great national emergency. Today that emergency is recognized and the first of these troops of citizen soldiers have reported for duty. Their task is most difficult. They must establish themselves in camp and in the shortest possible time season and prepare their small nucleus of men—about 30 percent of full strength—to receive and train treble their number.

This means long hours of arduous work. For the officers and noncommissioned officers it means not only hard physical work but also intensive daily study of the manuals covering the latest technique in welfare. It is only through discomforts and fatigue that progress can be made toward the gradual triumph of mind and muscles over the softness of the life to which we have all become accustomed.

All this not only takes time but requires wholehearted effort. It demands a standard of discipline which will prevail over fatigue, hunger, confusion, or disaster. Given time to prepare himself, the American makes the finest soldier in the world, and for the first time in our history we are beginning in time of peace to prepare against the possibility of war. We are starting to train an army of citizen soldiers which may save us the tragedy of war.

If we are strong enough, peace, democracy, and our American way of life will be the reward.

Arkansas Democratic State Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PRENTISS M. BROWN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN E. MILLER, OF ARKANSAS

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER] before the Arkansas Democratic State Convention at Little Rock, Ark., on September 17, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and fellow Democrats, this is a notable day in the history of Arkansas democracy. You have gathered here to do honor to your incoming Governor and to plan with him for a great program of sound progress for the State which we love and serve.

You have done me a high honor in inviting me to be present on this happy occasion, and my appreciation is very great. I have no trouble in starting this speech, because the first thing I want to say is what you want to hear: The next Governor of Arkansas has two great gifts. He loves people and he loves to work at a hard job. Moreover, he has a genius for teamwork, and his administration is to begin at a time when all the energies of America will be harnessed under the leadership of other hard-working men and women who love this country and serve it with pride and devotion.

I intend no fulsome eulogy of our modest friend, but I would be disloyal to the dictates of my own heart if I did not put in the record now my high confidence in his character, his driving energy, and his independence of judgment, which he tempers with a sincere appreciation of the counsel of wise friends.

Yes, fellow Democrats, Homer Adkins is going to be a greatly beloved Governor because of his instinctive courtesy toward the great and humble, but he is also going to be a greatly respected Governor because of his unchanged simplicity of habits, his fidelity to his promises, and his firmness in saying "Yes" and "No."

The second thing I want to say is in the nature of a mild admonition to you and me and to all other citizens of the State. The functions of government have piled up enormously in recent years. The personnel of government has increased proportionately. Men of the generation of James P. Clarke or Thomas C. McRae would be amazed if they could look today on the complexity and magnitude of the chief executive's duties. For a conscientious man the Governor's office is an arduous task. Let us spare Homer Adkins as much of the wear and tear of routine problems as possible. Let us free him for the great problems and opportunities which confront him.

We who have so enthusiastically joined in electing our friend to the high office of chief executive of the State owe him loyal and unselfish support in the stirring and trying days ahead. He will need us then quite as much as during the thrill and excitement of the election campaign. One of the firsts tests of our forbearance and loyalty should be the realization that even Homer Adkins, the most patient and persistent job hunter for others the State has ever seen, can't appoint 10 men to a job that requires only 1 man.

An equally important test of the genuineness of our loyalty is in the quality of the men we endorse. Let's offer him the kind of men and women who will treat public office as a public trust. Let us help him fulfill his announced desire to establish the highest standard of public service in the history of the State. The statehouse will not be a comfortable spot for drones during the next 4 years. You can't stay in the same neighborhood with Homer Adkins without an honest expenditure of time and effort. But it is not enough that a leader of the people shall be a tireless worker, short on promises and long on performance, setting an example for steady devotion to the public welfare. The acid test of any leader in these grave days is his willingness and ability to cooperate with other public officials and with private citizens in great and critical matters affecting the national welfare and national defense on both the military and economic fronts.

I have said that the next Governor has a genius for teamwork and no one can doubt that he will be confronted with many opportunities to prove the high estimate of his friends from the first day he takes office. This Nation faces the most solemn crisis since the War between the States. But this is no hour for panic and alarm.

It is the genius of democracy that in a crisis free men voluntarily impose upon themselves the discipline necessary to meet the emergency. Sometimes this discipline has the outward appearance of dictatorship, and sincere men express anxiety for the permanent loss of liberty. But I believe history clearly shows that among free men the passion for freedom grows stronger when its loss is threatened by an aggressor from without. The real danger in a democracy is from an "inside job"—a soft generation which permits its precious liberties to be stolen while listening trustfully to the lullabies of demagogs and "fifth columnists." We cannot ignore the stern reminder of Webster: "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

In spite of certain evidences to the contrary, the prsent genration of Americans is not soft. And this is well, for the road ahead of us is hard. We shall learn anew in the decade we are entering that the American way of life is inexpressibly precious, worthy of great sacrifices, deserving of our strongest defense, a heritage which we propose to transmit unimpaired to our children, even though the price of the transfer shall be our "toil and sweat and blood."

I give fervent thanks that our Anglo-Saxon kinsmen are standing so stanchly against the cruel aggression of the European dictators. I am one who believes they are defending the cause of human liberty throughout the world. I acknowledge spiritual kinship with them and am glad that we are even now effective partners in the bitter struggle.

It will cost us infinitely less of blood and treasure to confront the foe by giving aid to Britain than to wait for him to establish bases in South America and the islands of the Atlantic as a preliminary to an attack upon us.

I deplore war. I pray for peace, but I want America hereafter to keep a loaded gun behind the door. My formula for peace is:

1. Complete military defeat for the dictators.
2. A just treaty of peace without vindictiveness.
3. A stern and continuing disarmament of the aggressor nations.
4. An impregnable navy and air force and an adequate army.

Arkansas has an important part to play in national defense. There are three principle contributions for us to make:

1. Manpower
2. Raw materials.
3. Machines and munitions of war.

In the first two brackets we are already doing a creditable part. I know you are proud that this State is among the first in the Nation in the percentage of volunteers furnished the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. But the volunteer system is not the wise, efficient, or democratic way to prepare for national defense.

The Selective Service Act is democratic, efficient, American. It establishes the high principle that every able-bodied male citizen shall be subject to a temporary loss of personal freedom in order to insure the future freedom of himself, his neighbors, and his children. There are those who say sincerely that this is a hard principle. I agree. It is hard, but it is necessary. It is hard, but it is glorious, when self-imposed by a free people who stand ready to defend their great heritage with their lives. Let no one doubt that Arkansas will furnish promptly her quota of troops for a great national army.

There have been some pessimistic prophecies from discouraged public officials that Arkansas will not share in the benefits of a stimulated war economy. In scores of materials this State already feels the first impulse of the slowly but steadily rising tempo of war purchases. Arkansas has always been one of the great suppliers of raw materials for the Army and Navy, but we are destined to have much greater demands in the years ahead for food and fiber, oil and gasoline, timber and minerals.

Arkansas bacon is part of the soldier's ration; Arkansas cotton is in his khaki uniform; Arkansas walnut is in his rifle stock; Arkansas bauxite is in the frame of his fighting plane; Arkansas gasoline is in the fuel tank and Arkansas lubricating oil in the bearings; Arkansas lumber by the million feet will shortly be going into cantonments, and Arkansas oil is driving the engines of great naval vessels.

But there is widespread disappointment in the minds of many citizens over our present inability to place an efficient industrial machine at the disposal of our country. Except for our woodworking plants, oil refineries, and garment factories, we are still undeveloped in the field of processing plants for war industries. Nearly everyone thinks first of our virtual domestic monopoly of raw aluminum or bauxite and vast deposits of other strategic and critical war materials, and asks why it is not processed at the mines. The answer to that is insufficient cheap power and discriminatory high freight rates. Indeed, this is the answer to nearly ever major industrial disappointment in Arkansas in recent years. There are other contributing causes now happily on the point of being dissipated under the leadership of a stable State administration, but we may as well face the stubborn reality that Arkansas will not make great progress industrially until our natural power resources are more fully developed and freight rates are lowered for manufactured articles moving out of Arkansas to other regions.

This is not a recent discovery with me, as the records of Congress will disclose. Indeed, much of my congressional life has been spent studying the watersheds of the rivers of Arkansas, and, while my initial proposals have been primarily aimed at flood control and soil conservation, the development of the T. V. A. long ago whetted my appetite for cheap and abundant power for Arkansas.

There is now an encouraging prospect for launching the first step in an early consummation of these plans. I came home 2 weeks ago to attend the hearing at Harrison on the Norfork Dam. I am confident the Army engineers will recommend the installation of full hydroelectric facilities in this first unit. I believe this will mark one of the great milestones in the industrial progress of our State.

Other projects will follow. No useful purpose would be served by reviewing the history of the long, hard fight that has been waged by many of us who envision Arkansas as an industrial and agricultural empire within itself. Suffice it to say that a new era is dawning, and one of the chief problems that the new State administration will have before it is to properly coordinate State functions with Federal functions to the end that the citizens of Arkansas may obtain full benefit of these developments without denying to the citizens of other States the benefits that will flow to them. Progress has been made in rectifying the freight-rate discrimination. Many of our citizens are fully alive to the situation that exists, and I am sure that Governor Adkins and the State administration will have the cooperation of every patriotic Arkansan in their fight for the industrial and agricultural development of Arkansas. The fact that the task is stupendous should not deter us. I know that your incoming Governor will tackle this problem with the same determination with which he has heretofore met every challenge, and I know with the help that you and other good citizens of Arkansas will lend to him that he can, with the cooperation of the Federal Government, make an unprecedented contribution to the removal of the obstacles now barring progress and can and will set in motion State machinery that will make the government of Arkansas an agency of service in all things that tend to promote the happiness and the welfare of her people. There is no profit in lamenting our past failures. If we have failed in the past, that is not any reason why we should continue to fail. If our forests have been denuded, that is no reason why we should not replant them. If our soil has been depleted and has washed away, we should embrace the opportunity to render assistance through State agencies to the owners of the soil who realize now as never before the terrible price that we have paid by permitting our soil resources to dissipate.

As good Americans and as good Arkansans we must press with all vigor for the development, the utilization, and conservation of all our natural resources. The accomplishments of the Federal Government in the Tennessee Valley can be duplicated in Arkansas in all its phases. Situated as we are there is no reason why Arkansas with her matchless citizenship cannot and will not become a priceless asset in the promotion of the national welfare and at the same time become a State second to none. It is a challenge to all of us for unselfish and patriotic service.

You and I realize that some good citizens look with sincere misgivings on the policies of this administration in its relation to private business. I am not one who will defend every detail of policy with the zeal of a partisan. I think mistakes have been made and I acknowledge that some plans, intrinsically sound, have been handicapped by inefficient administrators. But I have little patience with the Roosevelt haters who repeat their bitter refrain of personal abuse and blindly label every major policy as Federal interference.

What is Federal interference? Is it a parity price for cotton? Is it safety for bank deposits? Is it money for highways, bridges, and grade crossings? Is it a program of controlling floods and rebuilding soil? Is it work for men and women without jobs? Is it loans on easy terms for men to save their farms, their homes, their livestock, their stores, their mills, their banks?

What are some of the fruits of Federal interference in Arkansas? Let me call the roll of some of the great Federal agencies which have served the people of this State under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt. It is not feasible to name them all nor to attempt more than the briefest résumé of their activities:

HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

Ten thousand, three hundred and forty-four loans have been made in Arkansas by the H. O. L. C., amounting to $18,677,767, with a repayment record which stops criticism.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Since its inception in 1932, the R. F. C. has loaned more than $55,200,000 in Arkansas. Only $20,140,000 of this sum was unpaid on March 1, 1940. Additional disaster loans to the extent of $400,000 have been made. Losses will be negligible.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Funds are being used to aid approximately 22,000 aged persons, nearly 1,000 blind and more than 14,300 dependent children.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION

Loans have been made to 13 cooperatives and one private company and these loans financed the construction of more than 7,000 miles of power lines. Fourteen thousand or fifteen thousand farmers are now being served by these lines. Plans are being made for the construction of more than 2,000 additional miles of power lines with this year's allotment of funds.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Grants and loans for non-Federal P. W. A. projects in Arkansas total $22,652,668. These projects include 85 waterworks systems, 39 sewer systems, and 54 educational buildings. Some outstanding projects are the Little Rock and Fort Smith waterworks, 6 buildings at the University of Arkansas, 15 buildings at the State hospital at Benton, and important additions to the tuberculosis sanitarium at Booneville.

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

Loans by private lending agencies have been guaranteed by the F. H. A. for the construction, repair, and refinancing of homes and other buildings for a total of approximately $20,000,000. Here we have a fine example of effective cooperation between private initiative and government.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The A. A. A. has paid to the farmers of Arkansas in various types of benefits more than $129,000,000. Nearly 200,000 farmers are participating in the A. A. A. program and 83 percent of the crop land is covered. Approximately 95 percent of the cotton farmers in the State are participating.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

In the 75 days from January 1 to March 15, 1933, 76 banks failed in Arkansas. Since the F. D. I. C. became effective January 1, 1934, nearly 7 years ago, 5 insured banks have failed without the loss of a single dollar to any depositor who carried a balance of less than $5,000. More than 200 banks, or virtually all those in the State, are now insured.

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

1. Eight thousand five hundred and seventy-five Federal land-bank and land bank commissioner loans were made from 1933 to June 30, 1938. Few such loans have been made since that time.

2. During this time the Emergency Crop and Feed Loan Office has made 107,257 loans. These loans have also greatly decreased in volume.

3. Production credit associations made more than 48,804 crop and livestock loans.

Agricultural financing is rapidly becoming adequate and at the same time sound. Arkansas farmers are among the foremost in meeting their obligations.

FARM SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

The F. S. A. has aided more than 75,000 needy families in Arkansas. More than 45,000 have received grants and the rest have received loans. At the present time the F. S. A. is helping more than 20,000 families with loans. The tenant purchase division of the F. S. A. has made more than 800 loans to tenants for the purchase of farms.

SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE

Seventeen soil-conservation districts, covering approximately two-thirds of the State, are in operation. The new State administration must give consideration to further cooperation with the owners of the soil to prevent soil erosion.

CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Thirty-five C. C. C. camps are operating in Arkansas. Nearly 11,000 of the State's youths are enlisted in the Corps.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

Approximately 4,000 youths are receiving student aid, and about the same number of nonschool youths are employed on N. Y. A. work projects.

WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION

Total W. P. A. expenditures up to June 30, 1940, amount to more than $87,000,000. In the fiscal year 1939–40, $21,362,326 was spent. Of this sum $18,712,181 was spent for labor. Approximately 27,000 persons are now employed by W. P. A., but the average for last year was 37,000. W. P. A. accomplishments include:

(1) Repair and construction of 7,681 miles of highways, roads, and streets.

(2) Three thousand seven hundred and ten new bridges and 21,040 new culverts were constructed.

(3) Eight hundred and nine miles of roadside ditches were dug and 846 miles were improved.

(4) Seventy-three miles of paved sidewalks have been built.

(5) Seven hundred and seventy-three public buildings have been erected, 587 improved, and additions made to 45 others.

(a) Of this number 300 new educational buildings are included and 394 others were improved.

(b) The construction of 16 new hospitals and the improvement of 8 more are also included.

(c) Five armories were constructed.

(d) This quota also included 224 new recreational buildings.

(6) Thirty-four new stadia, seating more than 88,000 people, were constructed and 7 others, seating nearly 20,000 people, were improved.

(7) Five new sewerage-treatment plants were built and two others were improved.

(8) Three new water-pumping stations were constructed, two were improved, and two were enlarged.

(9) Nearly 50,000 sanitary privies were constructed; more than 63,000 acres of land were drained for mosquito control.

(10) Three thousand five hundred feet of airfield runways were paved and 4,600 feet of unpaved runways were constructed.

Who is there among us who can rightfully condemn these accomplishments? What is government anyway? Is it an agency to protect the strong from the weak, or is it an agency to give to the weak an opportunity to advance? During the last 7 years the national administration has proceeded upon the theory that government is an agency to help all and not a favored few.

Federal interference, my friends, is your interference. You are the people who elected and reelected Roosevelt; who returned Joe T. Robinson to the Senate to become the greatest legislative leader since Clay, Calhoun, and Webster; who have kept in Congress leaders loyal to the things he fought for. When I think of what this administration has done for Arkansas and its people I am not surprised at the many practical evidences of appreciation which you and other loyal Democrats have shown in the past.

In 1936 the Democrats of Arkansas gave probably the most noteworthy per capita financial support to the ticket of any State in the Union.

This year we have a strong leader in J. H. Graves, recommended by Mr. Adkins to the national committee and warmly endorsed by Senator Caraway, Colonel Barton, and myself. Already he has built a strong staff, and I am told several counties have accepted their quotas and are getting them promptly subscribed by loyal members of the party.

You will agree with me that this is a good year to do another great job for the national ticket. We owe it to Franklin D. Roosevelt. We owe it to Homer Adkins, the incoming chief executive and party leader of a great southern State, which has never faltered in its loyalty to Democracy. We owe it to ourselves as a testimonial of our faith in the program and policies of the party which has furnished the leadership for every great national crisis since Lincoln.

So, fellow Democrats, let us not only give our usual emphatic verdict in votes in November—let us give the national committee prompt and substantial support with our gifts.

There is but one major issue in the national campaign. It must be apparent to all that the Republican platform to a great degree and the Republican candidate to a greater degree have affirmed their faith in the principal policies of the Democratic Party.

The central issue is simply this: Does the Roosevelt administration have a record which commands greater public confidence than is inspired by the promises of the opposition? Shall the American people swap deeds already performed for pledges to perform the same deeds?

It is not a convincing indictment, as the result in November will again clearly show, to charge the President with Federal interference with business, arrogant disregard of State's rights, and maudlin concern for the poor and humble.

In a world-wide epidemic of terrible losses which touched every man in this auditorium, in some instances sweeping away our savings, our jobs, our homes, and the opportunities of our children, shall we, when some semblance of security has been won for ourselves, comfort the hopeless unemployed with denunciation of a national administration which still has the courage to fight for them as it did for every man in this room short months ago?

The third term is not a primary issue in this campaign. Like the President, I should have preferred that circumstances would have permitted him to lay down his heavy responsibilities at the end of his second term. But the American people will not have it so. In spite of the interpretation of the Chicago Tribune and certain other journals dedicated to the "destroy Roosevelt movement," the Democratic National Convention obeyed the overwhelming sentiment of the party in renominating the President to succeed himself.

The vessel of our national safety is caught in one of the wildest storms of modern history. But it is a stanch vessel and its crew is strong-hearted. The skipper of the vessel knows every bolt in the ship, every man in the crew, every foot of the perilous course. He is cool; he is daring; he is wise.

In this crisis, as they look with confidence at their intrepid captain, this is the prayer in the hearts of the American people:

"Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State;
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all its hopes for future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate."

Profits and "Paytriotism"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. RUSH D. HOLT

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a radio speech which I delivered on September 16, 1940, on the topic Profits and "Paytriotism."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROFITS AND "PAYTRIOTISM"

All loyal Americans believe in national defense. We know that our country must be defended, but there are at least two types of patriotism in this country—one that is spelled p-a-t-r-i-o-t-i-s-m and the other that is spelled p-a-y-t-r-i-o-t-i-s-m. I desire to discuss the latter class of individuals.

These patriots—and they love to call themselves such—are divided into two classes, the profit patriot and the political patriot. The first loves his country when the country gives him the opportunity to make more profits from national defense or war equipment. The second loves to beat his chest with his words of patriotism and at the same time to remind his listeners of his indispensability as a public servant in the crisis. The first class desires profit and more profit. They realize that hysteria causes the Government to spend more and more and to spend it so quickly that the proper safeguards for the protection of the people are not given. They say, "You better not quibble over price or contract, over labor conditions, over anything. You better get this built by us at once or the country will be destroyed by an invader." These patriots wave the flag with one hand while they stuff a big defense contract in their pocket with the other. He is the profit patriot. The second class realizes the spending of tremendous sums is of great value for pump priming, for spending in his State or his congressional district, and means more people working and more people who will vote to continue their jobs. They are reminded that Congressman X or Senator Y is responsible for the contracts. They know that hysteria will cause many voters to vote to continue them in power. When I say these things they are not phantasies but about actual people.

If one questions the profit gouges that are in store for the Government in some contracts, he is immediately labeled as a man who is slowing up national defense, even though the work would not start for many months. When one says, "Let's have some plan of defense, let's not just throw the money to the winds and hope that we will get a real national defense," he is labeled as one who wants his country invaded.

And may I say here, if the day would come that our country would fall, it will not be the day of invasion but the day when it is destroyed from within, from our own people, from our own borders. It will come when the American people fail in their vigilance to protect their own liberties.

This is an interesting incident that occurred with me in the last month. During my fight against conscription, I was attacked by a certain newspaper. Don't misunderstand me—I was attacked by many—but this incident is the one I desire to discuss. This paper had a right to attack my position but I thought I would look into the background of the ownership. What did I find? I found that a director was one of the main officials of a concern that had received a large order to manufacture shells; that owners of the paper had received dividends from their operations of business in the belligerent countries; that another director of the paper was also a director in a corporation which had gotten many millions of dollars in contracts from the Army and the Navy and had a large profit increase as a result of war orders. This is not an isolated example of what is going on in our country today. I have much more to give to the Senate in the next day or so.

Since the beginning of the war, we have had established many committees for involvement in the war. They do not state that as their aim but nevertheless, it is their purpose. One of the largest of these has some very interesting sponsors and I shall discuss some of them briefly.

One of the members of this committee is a director of an industrial corporation which has received contracts or allocations for defense items to the amount of more than $500,000,000.

Another member of the committee who is a little more outspoken than some of the others in that he advocates a declaration of war is connected with an aircraft investment corporation whose profits have increased at a tremendous pace since the start of war. Every time more orders are given, it means more dividends for him. But he is being asked to speak here and there as a disinterested, patriotic individual whose only interest is the saving of our country.

Let me go further. One well-known international banking house, who has one of its own family in a powerful political position as well as a member of this committee, has large international holdings, holdings in aircraft manufacturing, holdings in corporations doing war business. And while speaking of international banking, a recent newspaper advertisement appeared in many papers throughout the country advocating our more active involvement in the terrible slaughter abroad. I checked who paid for these advertisements, and I found every international bank in New York City, with the exception of one, having someone directly or indirectly connected with the financing of those advertisements. Such patriotism. Another individual who donated to the advertisement is a director in a corporation that is selling shells to be used in war and whose corporation has received a large order from the United States Government.

One of the most important national-defense officials of our country has a large sum invested in a large steel corporation and was one of its guiding lights. Members of the committee just mentioned a moment ago are on the board of directors. What do you think about the profits of this corporation? During the first 6 months of this year the profits were almost 3,000 percent higher than they were for the first 6 months of last year. The last 6 months of this year points to even greater profits.

Furthermore, some of these corporations who are getting large Government orders are donating money to the campaign funds. They are buying ads in political campaign books. Some time ago there was sold a certain campaign book for $2.50 an issue, but what did certain corporations with orders for our Army and Navy pay for this book? Here are some of them:

A steel company, $7,500.
An aircraft company, $2,500.
A builder of ships, $2,500.
A builder of tanks, $5,100.
A builder of engines, $2,700.

These are a few who paid those amounts for books that were being sold for $2.50.

Please do not misunderstand me. I have not nor do now indict all business with these statements, but I do say these practices should be stopped. Our national defense should not be victimized by those who are profiting personally by their so-called patriotism. I know many businessmen realize all business will suffer as a result of these infamous deeds. They know there is bound to be a reaction to such acts when the people know the truth. I admit it is hard to oppose some of these individuals who are in the most powerful positions in the whole business world where a word from them will cause vicious attacks to appear in newspapers, where a call from them will set in motion forces to destroy anyone who dares to tell the truth, but we must give the people the facts. Because they are powerful, because they are influential is no reason for a public official to refuse to do his duty as he sees it. The American people are going to pay for this mill; yes, a bill of billions of dollars, out of their hard-earned wages. It comes from you. I believe—yes; I know—that the American people are willing to spend whatever is necessary to give us a national defense which will protect us against any or all foes, but they have a right to get a dollar's worth of guns, of ships, of national defense for every dollar that is spent.

It has been said by the President that "no war millionaires will be created," yet they are being created and they will be created. Words, words, words will not stop their being created. It takes legislation with teeth in it to stop these war profits and we don't have it and we are in no prospect of having it.

They have passed conscription. Conscription to take the boys of this country and to force them into armed service. If a drafted boy earns $100 a month, the Government takes 79 percent of his wealth for 4 months and confiscates 70 percent for the next 8 months; yet some industrialists howl and howl when we try to limit profits to 7 percent on Government contracts. Yes; the National Defense Council, the Army, and the Navy have all sent representatives to Congress to protest against any law that would limit profits to 7 percent.

The last war gave us some startling information on war profits. Some of those who made millions then were in organizations at that time to promote war. Today they are in organizations to promote war, while making profits from death and destruction. One airplane company made $11,437,250 profit in 8 years on a $1,000 investment. Think of that! An eleven-million-dollar profit on a thousand-dollar investment. One company was charging England 54½ cents for powder and charged the United States Army 71 cents. And this company was not an English company but one in the United States. A steel bid showed a price of $560 a ton, yet the company itself admitted it cost but $350.73 to make a ton. They made $203 a ton, or 58 percent profit. Not bad when boys were having their lives confiscated.

Profit "paytriotism" challenges America. It has not only challenged it from the standpoint of finance but is paying campaign costs to promote those who will allow them to continue to gouge the American people.

That isn't the type patriotism that will defend America. We need a strong national defense, one to protect us from a foreign foe or from subversive forces within.

The New Deal and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. HAROLD L. ICKES, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered on September 15, 1940, by the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Harold L. Ickes, on the subject of the New Deal and national defense.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FORUM OF THE AIR

SUBJECT: THE NEW DEAL AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

(Remarks of Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes in discussion with Senator STYLES BRIDGES and others.)

Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to assist in bringing, at long last, the distinguished senior Senator from New Hampshire, the official spokesman for Wendell Willkie, and the Republican National Committee, before the microphone tonight. Recently I made a radio speech and Mr. Willkie announced in advance that the Senator had been detailed to reply forthwith. But when I had spoken, Mr. Willkie instructed the Senator not to reply and to cancel his "radio time."

Now this was a very hard thing for the Senator to do, because I understand that no radio time had been contracted for that he could cancel. It was just another bit of Mr. Willkie's showmanship. However, it was widely proclaimed by the partisan press that the nonexistent time of the Senator had been abandoned. Thus Mr. Willkie truly left his "BRIDGES" burning behind him.

The subject that we have agreed to discuss is The New Deal and National Defense. On this subject there is much misinformation abroad in the land. The Republican platform—do you remember it?—viewed with alarm the New Deal record on defense, and Candidate Willkie, the refugee from Wall Street, did likewise in his speech back on the farm at Elwood. Senator BRIDGES, or the Republican National Committee for him, promptly issued a supporting statement—if a declaration that is barren of truth can be said to be "supporting." I quote directly:

"Roosevelt slept as Germany armed. With $18,000,000,000 of blank checks, which he could spend wholly at his own discretion, he built with these funds not one battleship, not a plane, not an antiaircraft gun, not a single tank."

You will note that the Senator's criticism is directed at the 7 years prior to 1940. It has nothing to do with the present defense program, on which you are all so well informed that I could add little.

Fortunately, I can help the Senator tonight to clear away whatever confusion and misapprehension he may have caused. I am sure that he will welcome my efforts in this behalf. I can do this readily, because as Federal Public Works Administrator for 6 years I am personally familiar with the record.

First, let us take the statement that the President did not build a plane with these funds. I am sure, Senator, that as a patriotic American citizen you will be glad to be told that this is a total error, as you might have ascertained from detailed reports made to Congress and to the public. Nor are these planes "on paper," as your Mr. Willkie says; they are in commission right now.

You said "not a plane," Senator. As a matter of fact, fleets of planes for both the Army and the Navy were built with Public Works Administration emergency funds allotted by the President. With just one allotment, more than 100 planes, not to mention spare engines, parts, radio equipment, and bombing and armament appliances, were provided for the Army. With the same allotment, 130 planes, ranging from bullet-swift fighters to giant flying-boat patrols and bombers were provided for the Navy. This allotment was made by the President from P. W. A. funds in November 1933 at a time when Mr. Willkie, the "great utilitarian," considered it his most patriotic duty to devote himself to "the preservation of public utilities privately owned." Incidentally, Mr. Willkie's utilities are protected tonight by these very planes, while utilities in other lands, however owned, are being bombed.

Is it possible, Senator, that your chief, Mr. Willkie, who offers himself as an informed leader in these critical times, does not know this? Or is it possible that the statements attributed to yourself and to Mr. Willkie were made for political purposes with intent to mislead the country?

I might tell you also that President Roosevelt used emergency funds to build more than 50 military airports throughout this Nation. These funds were also used to construct naval aircraft carriers, to build hangars and production facilities all over the country, and to provide the vital instrumentalities of aeronautical research now serving so well at Langley Field, Va., and in other laboratories that have put American aviation out in front.

Let us continue, Senator. I remember one single P. W. A. allotment of $10,000,000 to begin the motorization and mechanization of our Army, including armored vehicles, thus actually laying the foundations for the motorized army that we are building today.

This $10,000,000 allotment was made in December 1933—years before German Panzer divisions showed the world the tremendous striking power of such equipment. I might also tell you that the same emergency funds helped to provide the Army with a network of 74,000 miles of strategic highways, vital to industrial and military mobilization and indispensable to a mechanized army, together with useful bridges, grade crossings, viaducts, and similar facilities.

In addition to airplanes for the Army and Navy, one single allotment of approximately $9,000,000 from P. W. A. emergency funds was provided by President Roosevelt in July 1933 for the manufacture and modernization of ordnance, the improvement of arsenals, and the renovation and preservation of ammunition. The President also made possible the reconditioning and modernization of our 75-mm. guns.

Don't they tell you these things, Senator? They report them in the papers. But we must be getting along.

You said, Senator, that the President had "$18,000,000,000 of blank checks, which he could spend wholely at his own discretion." That, Senator, is probably the most barefaced distortion of them all, and one which, as a Senator, you should have known better than to make. You know full well that, with few exceptions, the Congress dictated the purposes for which emergency funds might be spent.

As to the first P. W. A. appropriation in 1933, under the National Industrial Recovery Act, the President relied upon a permissive sentence and allotted funds for defense purposes. This action was met by a storm of criticism, much of it by the same newspapers and politicians who are now, as hindsighters, assailing the President for doing all that he could of what they now say he should have done more of.

As a result of this violent criticism, when another P. W. A. appropriation bill was before the Senate in 1935, an amendment, originally offered by Senator Borah, took away any possible discretion on the part of the President to make military or naval allotments. This is the distinguished body of which you are an energetic member, Senator.

The defense allotments that I am referring to were all made more than 5 years ago. Didn't you know that, Senator? Of course, it happened before you got here, but the proceedings of the Senate are not a closed book to you and you owe it to yourself to investigate the record to avoid making a misstatement of fact. In relation to total armament needs, of course a billion dollars may not now seem like a large amount for defense. But when it is considered that the President allocated this total amount out of funds originally intended principally for public works and work-relief projects, it is an outstanding accomplishment. So much so that the Senate saw fit to prevent similar expenditures from 1935 on.

As a matter of fact, Senator BRIDGES, if you had been a stickler for the truth, instead of saying that the President had $18,000,000,000 in blank checks which he could have spent for any purpose, you would have made it clear that, from 1935 on, Congress, by stipulation, amendment, and specific legislation, made it illegal for him to use some eighteen billion dollars of emergency funds for military purposes.

Five years ago your Mr. Willkie may have been so busy fighting the Government development of electrical power that now serves defense needs that he did not know what the President was doing in the way of building up the Army and the Navy, but you, as a Senator, could have told him the facts. You know because you have voted on some of these matters. In fact, Senator, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD discloses that you and your partisan associates, who are now supporting Mr. Willkie, voted regularly for laws and amendments to prevent, or reduce, or curtail, or restrict these emergency-funds appropriations. Inasmuch as you have fought against providing such funds in any form for the President, one is bewildered that you should now complain that more money was not spent.

But let us proceed, Senator. As I have shown, long before the world found itself in its present plight, President Roosevelt's foresight provided funds for military airports such as Mitchel and Randolph Fields; for engine-tooling; for arsenal tools, which today are being worked at top speed; for civil aviation, which is a vital corollary of military aviation; for naval shore works, such as bases, shops, water-front developments, piers, dikes, bulkheads, boilers, machine shops, cranes, storehouses, shipyards, and docks; for Army posts, National Guard armories and camps; for military and naval hospitals; for rifle ranges and proving grounds; and other defense purposes.

Senator, the fact is that, during the last 7 years, while President Roosevelt has expended over $1,000,000,000 of emergency funds in projects directly related to national defense, large additional sums were expended for facilities pertaining to defense, such as veterans' hospitals, railroads, drydocks, dams, and ocean terminals. And this is why, with no thanks to Mr. Willkie or his current party, tonight we have a stronger Nation, more capable of quick and efficient mobilization than if your personal theories of defense had prevailed.

But let us proceed, Senator. You said that the President, with these funds, had built not one battleship, nor could you find any other naval construction financed from emergency funds. Yet tonight on the high seas and at American naval bases are a whole fleet of vessels constructed with emergency funds. These naval vessels guard our shores in a world gone mad. They protect your and my democratic right to debate here tonight. They also make it possible for Mr. Willkie to stage his "Me, too, but—" campaign.

Let us name a few of the vessels that were built as part of this P. W. A. fleet. Included are the Yorktown and the Enterprise, laid down in 1934 and launched in 1936. Each is a 34-knot, long-range ship capable of carrying 100 aircraft. Each has 120,000-horsepower turbines, driving quadruple screws, and each is manned by 1,788 men of the United States Navy, ready to go anywhere at any time. In this P. W. A. fleet there are also 4 cruisers—the Vincennes, the Philadelphia, the Savannah, and the Nashville—in full commission; 4 heavy destroyers—the Porter, Selfridge, MacDougal, and Winslow; 16 fully armed, 1,500-ton destroyers; 4 submarines; 2 gunboats; and 18 cruising cutters and patrol boats.

In fact, Senator, this P. W. A. fleet was the largest single peacetime addition ever made to the United States Navy. From Harding to Hoover, Republican administrations sent American men-of-war scuttling to Davey Jones' locker. Today, thanks to the New Deal, we have the biggest and finest peacetime fleet in our history.

Despite this official record, Senator, you have charged that "Roosevelt slept as Germany armed."

Apparently, Senator, neither Mr. Willkie nor yourself has ever heard that the first emergency funds made available to Franklin D. Roosevelt after he became President were those in the original N. I. R. A. Act, which became law on June 16, 1933. And on that very day—in fact, simultaneously with the signing of this New Deal legislation—the President issued an Executive Order allotting $238,000,000 for the construction of the naval vessels that I have referred to. Here, Senator, for your information, is a photostat of that order.

Senator, I have stuck to the text. Mr. Willkie and yourself, and all of your king's horses at Republican national headquarters, couldn't find that a penny of emergency funds had been spent during the past 7 years for defense. I have shown you that a billion dollars were spent directly on defense while the Wendell Willkies of the United States were fighting against all emergency expenditures.

Senator, you have not merely missed the boat—you have missed the whole fleet.

Why I Am for Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement recently issued by me setting forth why I am for Roosevelt.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY I AM FOR ROOSEVELT

I am for Roosevelt because he saved American democracy from internal destruction and is now leading the crusade to save it from foreign aggression.

In nations abroad, economic chaos ended in dictatorship; America was saved from the same fate by the heroic measures instituted and carried forward by President Roosevelt.

As the European dictatorships progressively moved toward complete extinction of democracy it was President Roosevelt who first warned us that we were in danger.

He saw, clearly, that the conflict abroad was not merely a struggle between the haves and the have nots, but a revolutionary and world-shaking clash of opposing political and social philosophies.

While the rest of us were refusing to believe that fact, because we didn't want to believe it, he was courageously preparing to meet its challenge—laying down new warships, modernizing our armed forces.

On the domestic front, he rescued us from the economic abyss, and I doubt that there is any man anywhere in America today who can truly say, deep in his heart, that he is not better off, more secure, more hopeful for the future, than he was on that dark day of 1933 when Franklin Roosevelt first took the oath of office.

In the face of possible aggression from abroad, there is no citizen—except "fifth columnists" and blind partisans—who is not glad today that Roosevelt years ago began urging, fighting for, and getting, a more adequate defense.

Roosevelt has fought the enemies of democracy within and without. He is still fighting them. Through 7½ of the most desperate years in world history, when the bright flame of democracy was being extinguished in nation after nation, he has steadfastly held to the American ideal of human liberty.

No President since Abraham Lincoln has been so bitterly reviled by his enemies—as a would-be dictator when he was strong and unwavering, as a starry-eyed idealist when he sympathized with and fought for the "ill-fed, ill-clothed, ill-housed." Yet today he is stronger than ever in the affection of the people, for time in its own way has refuted his detractors.

After the 12-year spree of special privilege which left the Nation prostrate, he had the courage to assume and carry forward successfully the heartbreaking task of reconstruction; today he leads the people's fight to prevent the same privileged interests from recapturing control of the Government and resuming their looting of the Nation's wealth and resources.

As for the third-term issue, it exists only in the minds of political propagandists. The founding fathers specifically refused, Washington among them, to prohibit a third term. Jefferson wanted to establish a two-term tradition to prevent monarchy (hardly a threat today), but it died out after his hand-picked successors, Madison and Monroe, left office No two-term President after them expressed any objection in principle to a third term, and two of them (Grant and Theodore Roosevelt) took positive steps to get a third term, Roosevelt being defeated only because of a factional split in the Republican Party.

It would be a sad thing for the country if, in the midst of one of the greatest crises in history, the people were unable to continue in office the one man of proved ability and experience who is available to them, the one man who is their champion in the age-old conflict between the people and the privileged interests for control of the Government. It can't and it won't happen here.

At a time when influential leaders of the Republican Party are urging appeasement of the dictators, when Republican spokesmen are assailing on all sides the steps taken by the Government to defend our shores, it is time for the American people to serve notice that no Chamberlains need apply.

Because I'm for the Jeffersonian concept of human rights above property rights, I'm for Roosevelt.

Because I'm for government by the people rather than government by the utilities and other special interests, I'm for Roosevelt.

Because I'm for national defense, I'm for Roosevelt.

Because I'm opposed to appeasement of the dictators, I'm for Roosevelt.

National Tax Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR BALDWIN, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Raymond E. Baldwin, Governor of Connecticut, at the governors' dinner of the thirty-third annual conference on taxation of the National Tax Association, held at the Pennsylvania Hotel, New York City, on Tuesday, September 10, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Your invitation to me to come here tonight was accompanied by a copy of your conference program. I must confess that, as I studied this program and its contents, especially its lists of distinguished and erudite speakers, dismay mounted within me. I cannot claim to be a tax expert. I am doubtful of my right, much less my ability, to match my opinions with those of our own, Connecticut's own, Professor Fairchild, of Yale; your own Dr. Gerstenberg, or such other leaders in their respective fields as you have assembled here. You have summoned a mechanic to a conference of scientists.

What I can bring you are only the observations of a Connecticut lawyer, who, for a little time, has occupied the Governor's chair. And I shall have to admit, to begin with, that whatever I may say to you unquestionably is completely biased. That bias is the traditional American aversion to taxes, all taxes, any taxes, taxes of whatever manner, shape, or form. Taxes are an evil; a necessary evil, yes, but the power to tax is the power to destroy. And therefore it is my opinion that you cannot build a national economy, a sound national economy, upon taxes as we are now doing, as we have been doing.

You cannot build a sound thing upon a destructive principle. That has been the trend of our economy, that is our present-day economy. We have been proceeding upon the theory that taxes, tax spending, will provide the answers to all of our problems. The question here, of course, is not that of providing for the necessary services of Government. To that extent, taxes are, as I have said, a necessary evil. But let me say to you quite frankly that the demagogic politician is to blame when he leads the people, the taxpayers, to believe that taxes will bring more or greater results than they, the people themselves, are able to produce.

There is, to be sure, a certain advantage to be gained from collective or united effort. But this, may I remind you, presupposes that such effort is united and collective. Then the sum total of individual enterprise may indeed be bent to a single purpose, with surprisingly effective result. But it must be the sum total. Our tax problem is to prorate the burden of effort required to each man, to each woman, to each individual in our society, according to his or her individual responsibility for the collective welfare.

In this, I think, we have failed. We have failed because we have not set out to do it—I do not refer to you gentlemen here as having failed: I do not mean to infer that the principles in the various fields of taxation which you have worked out are erroneous; but by "we" I mean the body politic; we have failed.

If five men contribute, each in proportion to the measure of his ability, to the building of a boat, then all five may ride with equal right and privilege. But if one man of the five has been required or compelled to do more than his share, or if you introduce a sixth man who has contributed nothing, then you seriously disturb, if you do not completely upset, the entente. Certainly, in any event, no more has been produced than a boat. Your sixth man may be led to believe that he has obtained "something for nothing"—that government, let us say, has provided him with a boat out of thin air; but government has done nothing of the sort; it has simply taxed the energies, the resources, the abilities of the other five. Nothing exists that did not exist before.

Mind you, now, I find no fault in giving this sixth man a ride, assuming he is marooned, let us say, on an island in the depression. He must be rescued, of course; common humanity dictates it. But common sense forbids that we should base our national economy upon a never-ending series of "rescues." We cannot place ourselves in the position of professing to believe that the efforts of five men have produced as much as six. We cannot assume that the sixth man wants to continue indefinitely as a noncontributor. We cannot, we must not, believe that a redistribution of wealth will result in there being any more wealth in the aggregate.

Yet that is just what we have been assuming in our departures from the primary function of taxation. That primary function, as I understand it, is to defray the necessary costs of government. To that extent, there are five men building the boat, and five going to ride in it. But when government branches out into fields not strictly governmental—into competition with private enterprise, let us say, or, yes, even into fields of social services—I do not say that, in common humanity, in common justice, the "sixth man" should not have his ride in the boat, but let us be sure that the ride lasts no longer than is necessary.

Above all, let us be sure ourselves that a sound economy for five, all equally contributing, is not a sound economy for six, unless all six likewise are equal contributors. It is the primary function of government, I think, to enable all men to contribute. Let me say to you that this has been our basic thought, our basic principle, in Connecticut. No doubt we have been very unscientific about it in many respects, but we have felt that it is government's duty to save taxes as much as possible, rather than to spend as much taxes as possible.

I note that one of your talks here—that of your president, Dr. Gerstenberg—has been upon the subject of tax illiteracy. Let me tell you it is too easy to take advantage of the people's tax illiteracy. Politicians in government have traded upon that illiteracy for years. The unscrupulous politician would have us all believe that we are all sixth men in the boat; and we are asked to be duly grateful for the free rides conjured out of the thin air of government largess. It were time, I think, that we turned in the other direction. I can only report to you what we have found to be true in Connecticut, but it is rather indicative, and I hope may be helpful.

The problem, admittedly, has been complicated enormously by the present need for national defense. But the basic principles involved remain the same. Indeed, we are seeing now the vital need of a sound tax economy and a sound national economy. Such an economy can exist only upon the basis of production. Unless now we produce more, either the defense program will have to be curtailed or the standard of living lowered. We do not want either of those things to happen. The only answer is increased production. Our program must be a complete reversal of government's economic policies of the past several years—a program of plenty instead of the present program of scarcity. Our problem is the broad one of seeking the highest possible productivity of men and machines. National-defense needs must be filled in addition to, not by sacrificing, our present standards of living, and only through productive effort in all fields—not alone in the field of national defense—can we sufficiently broaden the base of national income to distribute the cost burden of national defense equitably.

In Connecticut we have a balanced budget; we have no State income tax, no sales tax, and no new taxes. When the present State administration took office in January 1939 it faced an indicated deficit in the State's treasury of $1,500,000. Today we have a million-dollar surplus. Yet I want to make this point very close to you: In order to do these things—balance our budget, avoid imposing any new taxes, achieve this million-dollar surplus—it has not been necessary to curtail any necessary State service. Indeed, some of our State services have been materially expanded. And in the field of relief, our relief payments today, per capita, are higher than they were ever before.

Let me say to you that what we have done is this: We have abandoned the apparently prevailing theory of "spend all the taxpayers' money you can." We have abandoned the theory that government—State or National—can snatch out of thin air, by mere tax spending, any lasting, or even real, benefit. Government, above all, must look not at the individual but at the whole body politic of individuals. A man is no richer for taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another. A man must produce; and it is government's highest function to help him to produce by making smooth the economic processes which assist, and which are vital to, production.

That is our meaning, in Connecticut, when we refer to "friendly government"—government friendly to business, to private industry, to labor, to agriculture—friendly in the sense that it is helpful, cooperative, eager to make the way smooth. Taxes don't make the way smooth, therefore we have no new taxes; we are trying to save, not spend, the people's money. Debt doesn't make the way smooth, therefore we have a balanced budget, and we are keeping it balanced; we are living within our means. An antagonistic attitude and "crack-downs" on business and private industry don't make the way smooth, therefore we have friendly government.

I wish that I could go into greater detail as to some of the ramifications of all this, explain them more fully, describe in detail to you the reaction, the immediate, heartening reaction, of our Connecticut people to this sort of program, but time will not permit. I want to mention just one thing, however, that I know will interest you as tax experts:

Though we have no new taxes in Connecticut, we have more taxes. That is the "why" of our surplus in the treasury; we have no new taxes but more tax money is coming in. Taxes represent the State's levy upon the production of its communities.

There are two ways of obtaining increased tax revenues: One, you can invent new taxes and raise already existing tax rates; the other, you can leave the rate structure alone, but increase production. It is this latter alternative that, to my mind, is infinitely preferable, for in it lie not only what additional revenues may be necessary to good government, but also the bases for a sound recovery and a sound national economy.

Terms of the Presidency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

STATEMENT BY JOHN W. DAVIS

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I shall ask unanimous consent to make an insertion in the Appendix of the RECORD, and in explanation I wish to say a few words.

This morning before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee considering the advisability of a constitutional amendment limiting the tenure of office of President there appeared a distinguished witness, Hon. John W. Davis, who made a statement which I shall offer for the RECORD.

To the 16 Democratic Senators, as well as to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who in 1928 voted their firm conviction that any variation from the two-term limitation on the Presidency was fraught with peril to this free Republic, I wish to add a word of caution. When they read the RECORD tomorrow—provided unanimous consent shall be given to print the statement of Hon. John W. Davis—I caution them to skip the pages containing this statement, because I am very sure that if any of the 18 distinguished Senators should read the statement he would have revivified in his heart the desire to stand up for his convictions as expressed in 1928. I know some of them do not desire to do so.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement of Mr. Davis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I welcome the opportunity which the committee has given me to appear in support of one or either of the constitutional amendments which you have before you with reference to the Presidential term. I say one or either because, as I shall point out later on, I would find either form acceptable, although I personally prefer Senate Joint Resolution 15 providing for the single term of 6 years. The underlying principle is the same in both, namely, that a period shall be set beyond which reelection is impossible.

No doubt before these hearings are concluded, the committee will have repeated to it what the founders and statesmen of the country have been saying on the subject for the last century and a half. I should suppose that there is no other single topic on which responsible opinion in America has been so nearly unanimous up to this time, as on the absolute necessity for rotation in the office of the Chief Magistrate. The traditional limitation of two terms of no more than 4 years each comes to us with the overwhelming endorsement of the patriots who have held the Presidential office and many lesser men who have considered the subject. Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Cleveland, Buchanan, William Henry Harrison, Andrew Johnson, Rutherford B. Hayes, William McKinley, Theodore Roosevelt, Taft, and perhaps other Presidents have spoken in its favor in no uncertain terms. It is clear from this roster that it has not been treated as a party question. The words, as well as the examples, of these men and those of many, many others have been or no doubt will be cited to you.

We have the right to believe that a tradition so long established and so universally accepted as this, has sound reason behind it. History and experience leave us in no doubt what that reason is. The one thing upon which those who founded this Government and those who have carried it on have all agreed, is that we should never risk the permanent control of our Government by any single man. One hundred and fifty years ago, men had never heard such terms as "Fuehrer" and "Duce," but they knew the hateful thing those words have come to signify. They called it monarchy and they would have none of it. So when the powerful office of the Presidency was created, they fixed for it only a 4-year term. True, they did not forbid a reelection, although I think they would have done so if the great figure of Washington had not dominated the scene. But his example, followed by that of Jefferson and endorsed by their successors, wrote the two-term tradition deep into the conscience of the country—so deep, in fact, as to make it a part of the unwritten, if not the written law.

Time and again when a constitutional amendment such as the one which you are now considering has been proposed, its adoption has been discouraged by the argument that the two-term tradition was too well settled ever to be disturbed, and that such a tradition is stronger than any form of words. This is not pure fancy, for tradition is a powerful force.

Many compulsions in our Government as well as in our daily lives are due more to tradition than to law. The action of an elector in the electoral college is an instance. Every member of the electoral college is perfectly free in law to cast his vote for any person he chooses, for the offices of President and Vice President. No provision of the Constitution, no statute, no personal oath binds him to the contrary. And yet, every elector holds himself bound to vote for the candidates designated by the party on whose ticket he has himself appeared. This is not merely as a matter of choice but because of tradition and the fear of the public reproach that a departure from that tradition would bring. And when one reflects upon the canons of conduct that control men in their personal affairs, it is amazing to find how many of them are rooted in tradition and tradition alone.

But those who have relied upon tradition to govern the length of the Presidential term, have left one dominating factor out of view; that is, the factor of human nature. It is the nature of the human animal, most human animals, to love place and prominence, adulation, and power. Some, of course, care for all this more than others.

Some love it so much that the power they have is never gladly or voluntarily surrendered. The appetite growing by what it feeds on becomes the master passion of their lives. Such men, even while they realize that some day their power must be laid down, can always find a reason why the fatal day must be postponed. In their minds there is always a crisis in which their services are indispensable; always some great work in hand which they, and they alone, can do. Outwardly they may pretend that they groan under the burden and would be glad to lay it down, but in their secret souls they cling to their places like limpets to a rock. Is not history full of just such instances? Need I resort to illustrations?

Moreover, there are never lacking around the throne those who inflame this deep-seated ambition to hold on. The friends and sycophants of the incumbent, whose political lives are linked with his, constantly assure their chief that the public good demands that he should not desert the ship. It is this sort of sweet music that is the curse of kings. While those who oppose him only arouse a dogged determination in his egotistic heart to choose his time and not theirs for disappearing from the scene. Is tradition powerful enough to hold spirits like these? Time, past and present, answers "No." And since it is not, let us fix a limitation by the law. "In questions of power," wrote Jefferson, "let no more be said of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution."

The tremendous power of the Presidential office must never be forgotten. With the exception of the dictators in totalitarian states, no chief of state in the world today has such power as the President of the United States. How greatly this power has been enlarged in recent years, I need hardly remind you. With billions of money to disburse at his will, with places by the hundreds of thousands for him to fill, with scores of discretionary statutes ready to spring into life at his word, with the Army and Navy under his control as Commander in Chief, and the conduct of foreign relations in his hands, where is there another ruler to rival him? Now, I lay it down as irrefutable that any President possessed of these powers, or even one-tenth of them, unless his administration has met with some crushing disaster, can cause himself to be renominated, not once or twice, but as long as he chooses, if the basic law does not forbid. With the two-term tradition broken down, and no law to take its place, we have every reason to dread a future occupancy of the White House limited only by the ambition or the life of the tenant.

I do not profess to a profound knowledge of history, but I do not recall a single case where a republic has survived, except in name, the coming of a permanent chief executive. The name itself counts for little. ."It is with governments," said Chief Justice Fuller, "as with religions; the form often outlives the substance of the faith."

There is an interesting example very near home which many people seem to have forgotten. Porfirio Diaz, a man of great force and ambition, was elected President of Mexico in 1876, under a constitution he had helped to frame, providing for a 4-year term and forbidding reelection. That was the slogan under which he came to power. When the 4 years were up he patriotically declared himself in favor of a strict observance of the constitution, and turned over the office, in 1880, to General Gonzalez, whom he had in fact selected to succeed him. In 1884 Diaz was reelected as he had planned. Thereafter, at each quadrennial election up to 1910 he was voted in without opposition. Opposition there was none, for all of his opponents had been most effectively purged. For 26 years, with the help of his army and lavish grants to his friends, he was the unchallenged dictator of Mexico, until in 1911 the revolution headed by Madero drove him out. To give his successive reelections the color of legality he forced through the Congress in 1887 an amendment permitting it. But of this one historian says: "Only those without principles, only those abject with adulation, could accept this procedure." And the writer adds, "What a price men and nations must pay that politicians be called great."

Men may differ in their estimate of Diaz and of what he did or failed to do in Mexico, but it would be absurd to claim that under him Mexico was a republic in anything but name, or that the Congress, permitted to hold their seats only so long as they agreed with him, were the representatives of a democracy. Mexicans are Mexicans, and Americans are Americans, you will say; but there is nothing in this particular episode that deserves imitation north of the Rio Grande.

I am for this amendment because I do not want to see our form of government Mexicanized.

Personal government is always and everywhere the death of freedom. Power too long continued is always abused for it works queer changes in the minds and morals of those who wield it. The only prophylactic is a wholesome and cleansing rotation in office. If this cannot be compelled by custom, it must be forced by law. For only so can liberty survive. There was never a finer phrase than that of Francis Lieber, who declared that men are "too feeble to wield unlimited power, too noble to submit to it."

The proposed amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 15, offers a 6-year term without possibility of reelection. Is this long enough? Too long for a poor President, perhaps; long enough, to my way of thinking, for even the best. I can imagine that lurid pictures will be painted of some present or future crisis when it will be hurtful to make a change. Not only do I think such pictures are highly imaginary, but the argument they are intended to support proves far too much. For, if it may be unfortunate to change at the end of 6 years, it may be equally so at the end of 8, or 12, or 20. To fall in with this line of reasoning is to abandon altogether the principle of rotation in office, and calmly contemplate the possibility of a permanent President. There is no stopping place.

I refuse, for my part, to believe that in this land of general enlightenment, any man in any post is ever indispensable. I would tremble for my country if such a thing ever came to pass. And I shall tremble quite as much if such an idea can find lodgment in the minds of the American people. It strikes at the root of all our national ideals, all our public professions, all of our boasted capacity for self-government. We have become sterile indeed if we cannot produce at any and all times the men we need to fill our public offices; so sterile indeed that we would then no longer deserve the liberty we would no longer have the will to protect.

Something can be said for a policy of granting two successive terms of 4 years each and no more, on the theory that the people should have the right to displace an unsatisfactory chief magistrate at the end of 4 years and that a President would be encouraged to effort by the prospect of earning an endorsement midway of his service. This, as you know, was the view held by President Wilson in a communication he made in 1913 to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives of which I happened to be then a member. In spite of my great respect for him and for his memory, I must be permitted to doubt the soundness of this reasoning.

The argument for an interim review of a President's service would have more force if ours were a parliamentary form of government carried on by a Prime Minister and his Cabinet, responsible at all times to a majority of the legislature. They are under a constant possibility of dismissal. But that is not our system. We think we do better if we employ our servants in the executive branch for fixed and certain terms. We want them to realize that what they do they must do within the allotted span of their official lives. We rely upon their zeal for the public good and their regard for their future standing before their fellow citizens and before posterity to spur them on in the discharge of their duties, rather than upon a prospect of continuous reelection. For experience proves, does it not, that when reelection is in view every act and decision—human nature being what it is—is colored by that contingency.

There is an argument in favor of the two 4-year terms as proposed by Senate Joint Resolution 289, which seems to me to have more merit, namely that of national habit. We have worked on that plan for 150 years and have grown accustomed to it. To continue it may be easier than to change, on the sound principle that it is always "wise to preserve what it is not necessary to destroy."

Yet if we are to go through the process of amendment, as I clearly think we must, I would prefer to do the best rather than the expedient thing. A single term would remove from any President the temptation to play for his own reelection. Six years is long enough in which to do all the good one man is likely to accomplish, if he thinks first of his country and not of himself. If his conscience and his zeal do not stir him to his utmost effort in that length of time, the hope that he will do better on a second trial is a vain illusion.

But the vital thing is that we set now a definite, fixed, certain termination to the length of any man's occupancy of the Presidency. If the day ever comes when we have, or imagine that we have, but one man fit for the position, we may as well give up our pretense of being a representative republic and install a permanent or even a hereditary head under any name we choose to give him. In the light of this fatal dawn the recording angel will write across the ruins of our vanished freedom that we had been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

I care not how others may feel, but for myself the man has not yet been born of woman—and I use that phrase because it includes both the living and the dead—the man has not yet been born of woman to whom I would entrust for more than 8 years at the most the vast, the expanding, the fateful powers of the Presidency of the United States.

Tribute to the Late Lillian D. Wald

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE EAST SIDE NEWS OF NEW YORK

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix an editorial from the East Side News of New York concerning the late Lillian D. Wald, founder of Henry Street Settlement. Miss Wald lived a life richer in satisfaction and achievement than any other woman of our time. What she has done for underprivileged men, women, and children—for better health, decent housing, and social welfare—has won the grateful thanks of millions in every walk of life. The mark she has left on our social institutions will never be erased.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the East Side News of September 7, 1940]

LILLIAN D. WALD—THE SOUL OF AMERICAN SOCIAL SERVICE STATESMANSHIP WHOSE NAME WILL BE CROWNED WITH AUGUST HALO OF IMMORTALITY

(By Harry H. Schlacht)

A great oak has fallen in the forest of our public life. The East Side bows its head in reverent sorrow at the death of Lillian D. Wald, the champion of the poor and needy, the naked and distressed, the prodigal and the brokenhearted. We loved and honored her because she was a woman of the broadest sympathies, whose heart was ever responsive to our own, because of her elegant scholarship which revealed itself in her public and private utterances, and because of her fiery zeal for truth, justice, and humanity which burned steadfastly at the heart of this lofty personality. Public fame has made it needless for me to add one laurel to her crown of achievements.

When the house on Henry Street opened its doors the East Side was the shore front to Ellis Island. Throughout the years Miss Wald had been in a special sense the friend of all comers. She faced a sequence of events for which her poise and steadiness were exactly fitted. The tumult of the times, with the complexity of its problems, enlarged her capacity for human service. She combined in one symphonic splendor the amazing units of discordant elements about her. The roots of her kindness struck daily deeper into the soil of our affection.

Just as she broadened the vision of statesmen, physicians, nurses, and teachers, she has stretched the imagination of her fellow Americans of older stock as the interpreter of the stranger within the gates; interpreter also of one race to another; of one generation to another; of one class to another. The common brotherhood of man was not a phrase to her; she knew people. She knew, moreover, the psychology of human conflict, from the class of the boys' gangs to age-long feuds between racial and religious groups. Her opposition to evils of the sweatshops, child labor, slum housing, war, and militarism had deep roots in her experience as a neighbor to all races on the East Side.

Lillian Wald was the soul of social-service statesmanship. She has made the world her debtor. She has procured for herself a niche in the temple of fame together with Jane Addams, her intimate friend; Florence Nightingale, Susan B. Anthony, and Louisa Lee Schuyler. She has truly bequeathed to posterity a mighty heritage. Her name will not only be engraved upon tablets of bronze and gold, but ever upon the fleshy tablets of our hearts, and her teachings will blossom in our lives with a supernatural beauty. The human race lost one of its noblest examples; and all the friends of humanity, in whose cause she lived and died, joined hands at her grave.

Heaven is richer—the earth is poorer.

Choice of a Candidate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. TOWNSEND, JR.

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the leading editorial published in the New York Times of today, in which it announces its support of the candidacy of Mr. Willkie for the office of President of the United States.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of September 17, 1940]

THE CHOICE OF A CANDIDATE

The New York Times supported Franklin D. Roosevelt for the Presidency in 1932 and again in 1936. In 1940 it will support Wendell Willkie.

It has made its choice, as all Americans must make their choice, in one of the great crises of this Nation's history. The liberties of the American people are in danger. A hostile power, openly proclaiming its hatred of the democratic way of life, has swept across Europe and is now battering at the gates of England, seeking to grasp the eastern approaches to that Atlantic world in which our own democracy has lived and prospered.

Both Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Willkie understand the critical nature of this threat to the United States. Both are citizens of the world. Both know that it is impossible to isolate ourselves from the consequences of a world revolution. Both know that we must take sides morally or count for nothing. Both are opposed to actual intervention in the war, but short of war both favor every possible aid that can be given to the one democracy in Europe that still stands in Hitler's path.

This agreement between the two Presidential candidates on the fundamentals of a foreign policy is a deeply fortunate fact for the American people. Without it we might now be involved in a bitter controversy which would wreck our unity. As matters stand, the choice before us has been narrowed to this question: In whose hands, Mr. Roosevelt's or Mr. Willkie's, is the safety of the American people likely to be more secure during the critical test that lies ahead?

We give our own support to Mr. Willkie primarily for these reasons: Because we believe that he is better equipped than Mr. Roosevelt to provide this country with an adequate national defense; because we believe he is a practical liberal who understands the need of increased production; because we believe that the fiscal policies of Mr. Roosevelt have failed disastrously; because we believe that at a time when the traditional safeguards of democracy are falling everywhere it is particularly important to honor and preserve the American tradition against vesting the enormous powers of the Presidency in the hands of any man for three consecutive terms of office.

Our readers are entitled to a statement of the reasons which, upon mature consideration, have led us to these opinions.

I. DEFENSE OF THE UNITED STATES

In the field of national defense we recognize that Mr. Roosevelt has taken a number of necessary steps, all of which have had our wholehearted endorsement, both before he was ready to take them and later when he had acted. He has recreated the Defense Advisory Commission and called some able men to Washington. He has recommended that Congress appropriate large funds for defense equipment. He has succeeded in negotiating leases for new naval and air bases which are of great potential importance to the defense of the whole North American Continent. He strongly urged Congress to adopt a system of compulsory selective military service.

But there are a number of other equally important steps which Mr. Roosevelt has not taken. He has withheld power from the Advisory Commission and made it a mere consultative agency, unable on its own authority to cut the endless red tape in Washington. He has kept power for himself, tried to be his own defense administrator and retained in his own hands control over too many details of a defense program which still lacks central planning. He has seemed to regard the whole business of defense as a side show to the ordinary activities of the country, requiring no fundamental change in the habits of the American people and no revision of any of the policies of his administration. We find Mr. Willkie's early call for sacrifice, for hard work, "sweat and toil," more reassuring than Mr. Roosevelt's cheerful confidence that we need not let ourselves become "discombobulated" by the task that lies before us.

But all these points, important as they are, only touch the surface of the matter. At bottom, adequate national defense means much more than airplanes, tanks, and cannon, even when all of these are actually on hand and not just "on order." It means a nation strong in its economic health and power, with a thriving industry, full employment, both of manpower and of money, new capital flowing vigorously into new channels of production. It means, in short, a nation with gigantic industrial force behind its army and its navy.

The record shows that Mr. Roosevelt has achieved least success in the solution of this very problem. He has failed to create the conditions for a confident and expanding business. It is a reasonable assumption that this same problem can be managed better by a man who understands business, who has the confidence of business, who has himself been a part of business, whose interest in business problems has been first hand and continuous rather than casual and intermittent, and whose experience includes a successful personal record in stimulating business and expanding industrial production.

In this field Mr. Willkie is the professional and Mr. Roosevelt is the amateur.

II. LIBERALISM AND REFORM

In the field of domestic policy this newspaper has recognized the need of the sound social and economic reforms of the two Roosevelt administrations. It has given its support to these reforms. Specifically, it has endorsed the purpose and the principle of the Social Security Act, the National Housing Act of 1934, the Slum Clearance Act of 1936, the Wagner Housing Act of 1937, the Soil Conservation Act, the Securities Act of 1933, the regulation of the stock exchanges, the supervision of investment trusts. The reforms at which every one of these measures aimed were long overdue.

Mr. Willkie has affirmed his own belief in the necessity of reform and his own support of the major reforms of the Roosevelt administrations. Because of this he has been attacked by the President's friends as a mere plagiarist who is now attempting to steal the New Deal's thunder, and an impostor who is trying to run "on the President's own program." This is a curious attitude for the President's friends to take. It is a curious attitude, because it suggests a belief that the New Deal has a monopoly on reform and wants nobody else to share in it. But the truth is that no faction and no party has a monopoly on reform in the United States; many men have shared in it and will continue to share in it. "Plagiarism" is beside the point. For 7 years Mr. Roosevelt himself has been making daily use of important reforms introduced by Republican administrations—among them the Sherman antitrust law, the Pure Food and Drug Act, the Children's Bureau, the Executive Budget, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

For ourselves, we welcome the fact that Mr. Willkie stands pledged to conserve rather than to destroy what is best in Mr. Roosevelt's reforms. We believe that these reforms would be safe in Mr. Willkie's hands, not only because Mr. Willkie is a man of good will but because his approach to the problems now before us shows him to be a liberal. He is enough of a student and enough of a realist to know that we are living in a changing time and that it is both necessary and desirable that the Government should take an increasingly active part in policing the financial markets, in safeguarding labor's right to bargain collectively, and in achieving social justice for underprivileged people.

More than this, we believe that Mr. Willkie could be relied upon not to make some of the mistakes and not to take some of the risks which Mr. Roosevelt has made and taken. For we believe that while Mr. Roosevelt has helped enormously to awaken the social conscience of this country, and that while he deserves lasting credit for this leadership, Mr. Roosevelt has also put his own reforms in peril. He has put them in peril by ignoring or by failing to understand the fundamental problem of increased production; by encouraging great numbers of Americans to believe that it is possible to grow richer by working less and producing less; by fostering the idea that there exists somewhere a great fund of wealth which has only to be divided more equitably in order to make everybody prosperous; by permitting important members of his administration to preach the doctrines of class jealousy and class hatred.

Mr. Willkie stated the case accurately when he said that "American liberalism does not consist merely in reforming things; it consists also in making things." It consists in expanding the production of the necessities and the good things of life. Wealth is only another word for production; and in the long run there is no other way to achieve a higher standard of living for the whole people of a nation than to produce goods in abundance.

We believe that Mr. Willkie understands this crucial point better than Mr. Roosevelt, and that he would be more likely to succeed in putting this principle into practice.

III. THE ROAD TO BANKRUPTCY

In the field of fiscal policy our dissent from the course pursued by Mr. Roosevelt dates from his first year in office. We expressed this dissent in 1936, even while supporting him for reelection, and ventured then to express the hope that he would pursue a more responsible fiscal policy during his second term in office. Unfortunately, his course during his second term has become still more reckless.

We cite evidence at three points to support this statement.

(1) The fantastic silver policy of the Roosevelt administration, scarcely begun in 1936, has now grown to almost incredible proportions. More than 2,000,000,000 ounces of a metal for which our Government has no earthly use—approximately a hundred times as much silver as all the silver mines in the United States produced in the year before this policy began—have been bought by the Treasury at overvalued prices in an artificial market. This policy makes no sense, except as a political maneuver to win the support of the so-called silver bloc. Otherwise its only visible results have been to drive off the silver standard the one important country which had previously been on it and to take from other nations useless silver in exchange for our own good wheat and oil and motorcars and other exports. There is only one way to describe such a policy as this. It leads over the hills to the poorhouse.

(2) The National Budget, which was originally to be balanced so courageously, has been continuously out of balance since Mr. Roosevelt entered office. The national debt has more than doubled in 7 years. It is true that the new defense program has now made a balanced budget hopeless at the moment. But even before this program was proposed the administration was operating under a gigantic deficit and spending far more money annually than had ever been raised by taxation in any year in the whole history of the United States. Moreover, the problem of the Budget is not less serious, but far more serious, because of the new difficulties presented by the defense program. For the sake of conserving the national credit in a time of danger, expenditures other than those for defense ought now to be cut to a point at which they balance tax yields. But the administration, with whom borrowing has become a habit, has not proposed a single important economy as an offset against its huge defense spending.

(3) The fundamental trouble is that the administration has thrown overboard the central fiscal theory in which it professed to believe even as late as 1936. It has abandoned the idea that the best contribution it could make to reemployment and recovery is to put its own fiscal house in order. It now believes, and the President frankly says this in his Budget messages, that when business is lagging the Government ought to go in debt deliberately in order to "create purchasing power" and "energize private enterprise." This is the perfect politician's paradise—a paradise in which public money is spent on a gigantic scale without any responsibility of raising an equivalent amount of money by taxation.

We believe that the results of a continuation of this policy will be precisely what Mr. Roosevelt himself said they would be in 1932—"If, like a spendthrift, a nation throws discretion to the winds and is willing to make no sacrifice at all in spending * * * it is on the road to bankruptcy." We believe that there is no real possibility whatever of checking the present trend toward bankruptcy so long as Mr. Roosevelt remains in office. It will be a desperately hard task at best. The only present hope lies in a change of administrations.

IV. THE THIRD-TERM ISSUE

We come, finally, in the choice before us, to an issue which has been defined by more than a hundred years of American history, by the deliberate decision of some of our greatest Presidents, and by the reluctance of many Americans today to surrender what they believe to be a safeguard of the democratic system—the issue of the third term.

From Mr. Roosevelt's own statement in his radio acceptance speech to the Democratic national convention the country knows that even as late as a year ago he had no intention of challenging the tradition against a third term: "Last September it was still my intention to announce clearly and simply at an early date that under no conditions would I accept reelection." This announcement was never made; when the President finally declared his intentions regarding the third term he did not say that "under no conditions would he accept reelection," but merely that he "had no wish to be a candidate again"—a very different statement. The practical effect of the postponement was to lessen greatly the chance of any other Democrat to receive his party's nomination. The practical effect of the change in the character of the President's announcement was to encourage the "draft," which some of the highest officials of his own administration had long favored and long worked to bring about. From these facts it seems to us that only one conclusion can be drawn. As the situation created by the war developed, the President came to regard his own personal leadership as indispensable and to believe that there was no other member of his party, however trusted, however close to him, however deeply in accord with his own convictions about the war or about domestic issues, who could safely take his place.

The doctrine of one man's indispensability is a new doctrine for this country. It is a doctrine which less scrupulous men in Europe have used to root themselves in power. It is a doctrine which we in the United States have good reason to question, particularly when we consider how the powers of the Presidency have grown, what immense patronage, what gigantic expenditures, what enormous power to perpetuate himself in office is now within the grasp of any President of the United States.

These considerations are especially relevant when the particular President who now chooses to remain in office for a third term is the same President who has never surrendered voluntarily a single one of the vast "emergency" powers which Congress has given him. He is the same President who has shown himself so impatient of constitutional restraints that he was willing to circumvent the Supreme Court itself by adding enough members to it to give his own opinions a majority.

In the defeat of Mr. Roosevelt and the election of Mr. Willkie there is an opportunity to safeguard a tradition with the wisdom of long experience behind it.

These are our primary reasons for supporting Mr. Willkie and for strongly urging his election.

In supporting him we do not intend to lose that independence upon which we have always put chief emphasis or to compromise our own convictions. We shall continue to support such of Mr. Roosevelt's views and acts as we find deserving of support. We shall criticize and oppose any of Mr. Willkie's views if they seem to us to lack merit. Above all, we shall do our best to keep our own part in this campaign free of personal controversy and focused on the great issues now before the country. In a time of danger the clearest duty of every good American is to help conserve that national unity which is our richest heritage.

Lillian D. Wald

REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, the untimely death of Lillian D. Wald has left a void in the life of the city of New York and the country at large, which will not be easily filled. Miss Wald's name will forever be connected with the elevation of the lives of the poor to a realization that all of us, irrespective of our wealth and social position can be made important and useful members of society.

Lillian D. Wald was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on March 10, 1867. Her grandfather, who came from Germany about 1848, started the family on this side of the ocean.

Miss Wald lived for many years in Rochester, N. Y., where she was educated at Miss Crittenden's School, "an English and French boarding and day school for young ladies and little girls." After an interval spent in the Middle West, she came to New York City to study in the Training School for Nurses of the New York Hospital and in the Women's Medical College.

In 1893 Miss Wald founded the Henry Street Settlement on the lower East Side, known in its early days as the Nurses' Settlement. The Henry Street Visiting Nurse Service now covers Manhattan, the Bronx, and Queens. The Henry Street technique, inaugurated and perfected by Miss Wald, has spread throughout the world.

The settlement conducts clubs for boys and girls as well as for the mothers and fathers of the neighborhood; classes in arts and crafts, pottery, dancing, English, citizenship, homemaking, first aid; clinics for the mothers and babies, the boys and girls; a music school in which courses are given in all phases of musical study; a theater and dramatic workshop; social events for the young people; and in the summertime, camps for the boys and girls, a daily play school, and day outings for the mothers and children of the neighborhood.

Visitors from the Near East and Far East—from all parts of the world—have come to Henry Street Settlement to call upon Miss Wald and to observe the work done there. The Prime Minister of England, J. Ramsay MacDonald; Governor Smith; President Theodore Roosevelt; Prince Kropotkin; Mme. Breshkovsky; and Signora Gina Lombroso Ferrero are only a few of the many well-known names signed in Miss Wald's guest book at Henry Street.

In an article entitled "Lillian D. Wald—Settler and Trailblazer," Paul U. Kellogg, editor of the Survey, said:

> Just as the pioneer woman of the West had the homestead as her stage, Miss Wald has had its counterpart—the settlement household. She brought to the movement in the nineties its most redoubtable reinforcement, linking with all the ancient concerns of womankind the skill of a new profession. From the outset she was an insurgent and innovator in that oldest of woman's functions, the care of the sick. Nursing training and service as carried on in the hospitals of the day were divorced from the lives of the families from which their patients came. Miss Wald went out into the homes. District nursing of the day was largely identified with religious bodies or charity clinics. She put it on the new basis, and by hourly service paid for by the family whenever possible, brought private nursing within the reach of those with small means or no means at all. From an agent whose presence proclaimed the family's poverty or its failure to give adequate care to its sick member, the nurse's presence proclaimed the family's anxiety to do everything possible for the sufferer. She gave nursing a new status. While the Henry Street nurses did not give treatment except under the supervision of a doctor, they responded to calls from the people themselves and from social agencies no less than to calls from physicians, and they were no longer bound to a single practitioner—changes which were supported by leaders in the profession but at the time brought down the wrath of quacks and sticklers. Doctors and nurses highly trained in hospital routine clung to institutional treatment, but the new practice proved that most children's diseases, for example, lend themselves to home treatment with a lowering of the death rate. The new nurses not only cared for the sick but instructed the mothers how to keep the families well—became, in truth, social workers. The tremendous field for such service is indicated by the fact that 90 percent of sickness is cared for in homes. * * *
> When the house on Henry Street opened its doors the East Side was the shorefront to Ellis Island. Throughout the years Miss Wald has been in a special sense the friend of all comers. Just as she broadened the vision of physicians and school teachers, so she has stretched the imagination of her fellow Americans of the older stocks as interpreter of the stranger within the gates; interpreter also of one race to another, of one generation to another, of one economic class to another. Avoiding partisan politics and the despair of the doctrinaire, she has won the hearts and understood the aspirations of Governors, and mayors, and police captains, and ward leaders, rabbis, and priests, and minister, revolutionists and push-cart peddlers, father and son, mothers and daughters.
> The common brotherhood of man is not a phrase to her; she knows people. She knows, moreover, the psychology of human conflict, from the clash of boys' gangs to age-long feuds between racial and religious groups. Her opposition to war and militarism had roots deep in her experience as a neighbor to all races on the East Side. Out of a conference at Henry Street during the first year of the World War grew the American Union Against Militarism, of which she was chairman, and which in the succeeding months, when some of the old-time peace societies fell by the wayside and the peace foundations went on the shelf, pressed the Government to make constructive use of its position as the one great neutral in a world at war. Later, after America's entry, a new organization of liberals, including those who had favored, and those who had opposed our entrance into the war, crystallized on a program of democratic war aims and peace settlement—the beginnings of the present Foreign Policy Association, of which Miss Wald is a member of the board.

Miss Wald was the first president of the National Organization for Public Health Nursing, and the plan of town and country nursing of the American Red Cross was her suggestion. In 1909, the New York State Immigration Commission, of which she was a member, created the State bureau dealing with the protection and distribution of immigrants. The Social Halls Association, organized to provide proper places for recreation and labor meetings, was started at Henry Street Settlement and Miss Wald was its first president. Miss Wald has been associated with numerous projects to provide recreation for children and adults, and she served on the original executive committee of the Outdoor Recreation League.

Her experiment with Henry Street nurses in the schools led to the appointment of public-health school nurses in 1902 in New York City. They were the first public-health school nurses in the world, and they are now found everywhere. Her interest in the children of the Nation was largely responsible for the creation of the Federal Children's Bureau.

Miss Wald has served on the executive committees of the Society of Friends of Russian Freedom and the New York Association for the Blind. In 1919 she attended the International Conference at Cannes, France, as a delegate sent by the Department of Labor, and in the same year she was appointed one of the three women representatives at the industrial convention called by President Wilson in Washington. In 1924 she accepted an invitation extended by the Commissar of Health of Soviet Russia to visit the country and advise on their children's problems. Miss Wald was a member of President Theodore Roosevelt's Conference on Child Health and Protection, and of a similar conference called by President Hoover in 1930.

Miss Wald is the author of The House on Henry Street and of numerous magazine, newspaper, and encyclopedia articles. She received the honorary degree of doctor of laws from Mount Holyoke College in 1912 and from Smith College in 1930. She received a medal from the National Institute of Social Sciences (1912), from the Rotary Club (1923), and one of the first three Better Times medals awarded in 1926, for distinguished social service. In January 1932, Miss Wald was the honored guest at a banquet of the society of the Genesee, the first woman ever so honored by the society.

Miss Wald was on the executive boards of the Foreign Policy Association, the Welfare Council of New York, Survey Associates, the Neighborhood Playhouse, the Vocational Service for Juniors, the American Association for Labor Legislation, the American-Russian Institute, the City Affairs Committee, the Citizens' Committee of One Thousand, the National Federation of Settlements, the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, the United States Committee on Cooperation in Pan-American Child Welfare Work; and on the advisory council of the City Housing Corporation, the Milbank Memorial Fund, the Lower East Side Community Council, and the Harmon Foundation for the Advancement of Nursing. Miss Wald had been an active member of the coordinating committee of the Welfare Council of New York City. She was also a member of the technical advisory committee of the League of Nations Association.

Life for her was an exciting pageant; each day brought its demands to meet new situations. Her first obligation was always to her nurses in blue carrying the bag which to many of us was the symbol of bringing scientific care combined with love and tenderness to the humblest in the city.

No. 265 Henry Street is an old red brick house with white facings, built after the War of 1812, when the neighborhood was fashionable. Its yard, fitted up with swings before the dawn of recreation centers, was the pioneer among playgrounds. Miss Wald had made her home there for 34 years, and the house is furnished with simple old mahogany and shining brasses from Grand Street. Two similar dwellings across the street were also restored by the settlement. One is occupied by Miss Elizabeth Farrell, an old companion in arms who introduced special classes for backward children in the public schools.

The other activities of Henry Street grew naturally out of the nurse's visits. Seeing children kept out of school by small ailments—or staying in school with big ones and giving them to other children—Miss Wald proposed having school nurses, and the city adopted the idea in 1902. She also suggested to President Roosevelt the establishment of a Federal children's bureau, and she became a die-hard opponent of child labor, because these things were forced on her mind by daily observations.

Later she helped to organize the Women's Trade Union League and the Joint Board of Sanitary Control. During the shirtwaiste strike in 1909–10, a Henry Street representative sat in court all day bailing out arrested pickets. In 1912 the Settlement was a headquarters of "fair consideration" for the unpopular side of the Lawrence textile strike.

Members of her board of directors pay tribute to her abilities in finance. It is fun to speculate also on her potentialities as a politician. She could have gone far in politics on her gift for remembering birthdays, alone. She remembered hundreds of them with ease, by a sort of supernatural endowment. That was one of her talents; another is summed up in the matzoth. These Hebrew ceremonial biscuits often appeared on her table, Miss Wald explaining cheerily: "Here is the unleavened bread which our neighbors eat at Passover. We like it so well we eat it with our salad." Such touches of local color went over immensely with visitors from uptown.

She administered a budget of $600,000 a year, but the night telephone rang at her bedside until a fellow worker forcibly removed it. Despite the enormous pressure on her time she managed to read a good deal and go to the theater, and whenever possible she retreated to her farmhouse at Saugatuck, Conn. The East Side was her hobby; she loved it; wanted to see its fine old houses rehabilitated, and was proud of her part in suggesting the huge new apartment block which was to go up at Grand and Broome Streets.

Miss Wald was always the friend of the under dog and was kind to all who came in contact with her. Although herself never possessed of great wealth she was a friend of some of of the wealthiest persons in the United States, and was able by the charm of her personality to divert some of this wealth to the uplift of the poor in whom she was always interested.

The Henry Street Settlement Visiting Nurse Service will be forever a memorial to Miss Lillian D. Wald and a tribute to her great and inspiring personality. The Henry Street service today operates a staff of 250 blue-uniformed nurses with headquarters at 99 Park Avenue, and 18 local nursing centers.

Miss Lillian D. Wald has now gone to the great beyond and thus undoubtedly will be numbered among the great women of her day. To us in Congress, and to me who had the privilege of knowing Miss Wald personally, she typifies that devotion to duty which has forever been the symbol of America and Americanism.

A Post-Primary Message to the People of My District

A CONGRESSMAN'S REFLECTIONS UPON CAMPAIGN ATTACKS

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, a heated attempt was made in the recent primary campaign in the Sixth Congressional District of Washington to discredit me because I voted and spoke and worked against the enactment of the Allen bill to deport Bridges. I am proud of that vote, and in no sense wish to make an apology therefor.

The American Bar Association, on September 10, explained that this measure was violative of American traditions and principles, was unconstitutional and unprecedented, and was altogether to be condemned. This is one of the most conservative and learned organizations in America. In addition to that fact, when one recalls that both the Attorney General of the United States, the Honorable Robert Jackson, and the Solicitor General, the Honorable Francis J. Biddle, have expressed themselves decisively and forcefully to the same effect with reference to this bill, it should give pause to those political opponents who, like a drowning man clutching at a straw, seize upon isolated and extreme examples in an effort to encompass one's defeat. The decisive vote given me at the recent Washington State primaries, in the Sixth Congressional District, is an indication of the devastating manner in which my home folks, who have known me and my family throughout my life, rebuked that form of political cavilling.

I defeated my Democratic opponent in King County by a margin of five to one. My vote exceeded the combined votes of all my opponents in the Democratic and Republican primaries by more than 5,000. Yet, this result was attained, Mr. Speaker, while I was remaining on the job in the national capital, in the Halls of Congress, more than 3,000 miles away from the district.

I do not exult or crow over this victory. I pay tribute to it only as an indication of the literacy and intelligence of my own people in the great and progressive State of Washington.

I did not at any time answer my opponents either by letter or orally in connection with their traducing attacks and carping criticism, or their mud-slinging references to my character, private life, or stand on public issues. I do not believe we should prostitute the high office of Congressman, nor lower it to the level of the hog wallow. A campaign for the office of Congressman should be maintained on a plane of dignity and decorum consistent with the status of the great office of Representatives in the Congress of the United States. That I depended upon the common sense and dispassionate judgment of the voters in my district was indicated and justified by the great vote given me by these home people.

I bear no grudges toward my opponents. A man should not be in public life unless his skin is fairly thick; naturally I resent lies and slanders, but I have learned to bear pin prickings with forbearance and good sportsmanship.

I go into the final campaign with renewed vigor and confidence, proud of the folks whom I represent, and glorying in their faith in me, which I do not propose ever to betray. I hope we can discuss campaign issues objectively and without emotional or personal biases—my Republican opponent and I. I have never felt it was sportsmanlike to attack an opponent in his absence or when his back was turned. Even the duck hunter will not level a shotgun at a duck until the bird is safely off the ground—in the air—and given a chance. However, I am not crying or complaining; the people have answered for me. The outstanding aspect of the primary result was that although the mud-slinging charges were reflective upon my patriotism and might have sounded plausible to the uninitiated and the politically unaware, my people entertain such confidence in my integrity, character, good judgment, and were so familiar with my record as a Congressman and with the more than 3,000 votes I have cast as such representative, they renewed their faith in me by the votes they cast in the September primaries.

I thank the people of my home district from the bottom of my heart; not only for my own sake but for that of my dear wife, Lillian Coffee, who is a product of our own State, and for my son, John M. Coffee, Jr., now nearly 12 years of age. Words fail me in attempting adequately to express with appropriate feeling the emotion which arises in me now, but my appreciation toward the people of the Sixth Congressional District is wholehearted and unreserved. I can only reiterate that I thank you voters of my State with every atom of my being.

MINORITY REPORT OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following minority report of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy, 1940:

MINORITY REPORT OF THE BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY, 1940

His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: I concur in the recommendations of the Board insofar as they go; however, I feel that the Naval Academy as at present organized is incapable of preparing to the maximum possible degree candidates for commissions in the United States Navy.

The Navy has become highly mechanized and requires of its commissioned corps highly specialized technicians, certainly afloat. Commissioned service in the Navy is a profession in every way comparable, in importance and necessity for adequate preparatory training, to law and medicine. In the case of both of the above professions the candidate is required to have completed his cultural academic education before he enters upon the professional training required by his profession. At the present time at the Naval Academy, we are endeavoring in a 4-year period to give young men their basic cultural education and at the same time their technical professional courses. The academic work completed at the Naval Academy by the midshipmen is comparable to that of a junior college, and the professional work is comparable to that of a junior course in a technical school. Naval officers, in the present day at least, should have an education and professional training comparable to that given in any of the other professions, not merely junior courses. It appears to me that it is utterly impossible to give a full collegiate course and an adequate professional postgraduate course in the limited time available of 4 years. The preparation of a naval officer also requires extensive training in what would be extracurricular activities at any college or technical school, such as infantry drill, boat drill, gunnery, etc. This necessity at the Naval Academy accentuates the situation in regard to lack of time to give the midshipmen the proper essentials of a cultural education and a technical training. The field covered at the Naval Academy should require, at a minimum, 6 years if proper emphasis were placed upon all of the courses attempted.

It is not merely desirable that the naval officer be equipped with a full college education, but this is essential as a preparation for proper assimilation of the technical subjects.

While I believe that today we have the finest Navy in the world and by far the finest corps of commissioned officers of any navy in the world, this situation will not continue unless we keep the preparation of naval officers abreast of material and technological developments.

I respectfully refer you to a number of reports of Boards of Visitors in previous years calling attention to this situation and urgently requesting consideration of this problem.

Each year that I have been a member of the Board of Visitors the civilian educator members of the Board have stressed deficiencies in cultural subjects in the curriculum of the Naval Academy At the same time naval officers appearing before the Board have stressed the necessity for more time for technical studies in view of the rapidly increasing technical development of the Navy. In my opinion, they are both right. Neither can be sacrificed without detriment to the other and to the ultimate results attained in the education of the naval officer. It would appear to me that the real mission of the Government and its responsibility for the preparation of candidates for commissioned service in the Navy is their technical training. Under this theory, and one to which I subscribe, the candidate should have his academic education before he is received by the Government for training. I believe that we should make the Naval Academy into a technical training school rather than a junior educational institution. Candidates for commissions should be college graduates and should go to the Naval Academy as a postgraduate school to take their technical, professional training.

Midshipmen are now taken into the Naval Academy too young to have absorbed the civilian point of view of our great democracy, and after entrance to the academy they are so closely cloistered that they have no further opportunity either to understand or to absorb the civilian point of view. This would be corrected by taking college gradutes into the Naval Academy for strictly professional training.

There is an average of over 20 percent of separations from the Naval Academy for academic failures and lack of aptitude for the naval service. This wastage could be saved if the candidates completed their academic education before they entered the Naval Academy. The saving could be put into extending the R. O. T. C. system, with great benefit to the national defense. If candidates for the Naval Academy were graduates of colleges and universities in R. O. T. C. courses, they would have had a splendid indoctrination into the naval service and a better concept of naval discipline; and those going to the Naval Academy would have selected the Navy as a career as a result of knowledge and genuine desire rather than through mere romance or desire for a free education and an assured job, as is too often the case today.

A most valuable byproduct of this system would be a substantial increase in the number of Naval Reserve officers graduating from the R. O. T. C. courses.

It also appears to me that we are training altogether too many midshipmen for the needs of the Navy. A substantial portion of the billets filled by midshipmen could be better filled by warrant officers and chief petty officers. If the number of midshipmen graduated at the Naval Academy and commissioned in the Navy could be regulated to that number needed for lieutenant commanders, with, of course, a proper allowance for normal attrition, a large part of the wasteful system of elimination that now exists in the Navy in the lower commissioned ranks would be done away with. This would have a decided effect in improving the morale of the entire commissioned officer corps of the Navy.

Should the above system not be adopted, it would seem desirable that at least midshipmen should have 1 year in the ranks as enlisted men immediately preceding their assignment to the Naval Academy. This could be accomplished by making the appointment of a midshipman for 5 years instead of the present 4. It would be a fine thing for the officer to have had experience in the ranks and to understand the problems and the point of view of the enlisted man. It would also give the officer a much better appreciation of his own problems. It is pointed out that this would also be accomplished, however, in a large measure by the candidate's spending 4 years as a member of a college R. O. T. C. system under the first plan herein suggested.

If the Naval Academy were a postgraduate technical school, the student could devote his undivided time and attention to his professional training. Naval officers could very properly teach many of the classes in such courses. Under the present system the majority of instructors in even the academic and cultural subjects are naval officers on temporary shore duty assignment. They are unprepared by training or experience to instruct. While the Naval Academy becames a splendid postgraduate course for the instructors themselves, this is accomplished at the expense of the midshipmen whom they are called upon to instruct. The first year that a naval officer spends at the Naval Academy as a member of the faculty he spends learning how to teach. The officer, it is true, learns a great deal from this. The benefit to the midshipmen in their classes in the meantime is questionable, however. There is no system in operation to train officers in instruction; in fact, no attempt is made at all to prepare or coach officers for instructing. Teaching is a highly specialized profession in itself and requires extensive experience to qualify top-notch instructors. Naval officers, without training for teaching and not selected for any particular ability as teachers, are detailed to the faculty of the Naval Academy merely because they are due for shore duty and must be assigned somewhere. If naval officers are to be used as instructors, they should be given systematic courses of training in teaching before being assigned to the classroom. It is hardly necessary, for instance, that an instructor in English literature or French should have recently returned from sea. This requirement might be desirable for instructors in navigation or gunnery, but is hardly essential to the cultural subjects.

It is pointed out that the untrained naval officer instructor receives a much higher pay than the experienced trained civilian instructor at the Naval Academy. The pay schedule for the civilian members of the faculty is definitely low that of our leading educational institutions. The Naval Academy should not be on a par with educational institutions that merely meet the minimum requirements. It should be brought up to a standard equal to our best civilian educational institutions. To attract educators comparable to those at our best colleges and universities we must bring our instructor compensation into line with that paid at such institutions.

If officers must be used as instructors in nonmilitary subjects, they should be recalled retired officers, who could stay on duty at the academy continuously without the necessity of periodic sea duty. Such retired officers would in the course of time, through experience, become reasonably competent teachers. This would also tend to ease the burden of an already overburdened retired list.

The Superintendent might well be a retired rear admiral, so that the tenure of the head of the institution could be long enough to give some continuity of policy at the Naval Academy by someone who could come to thoroughly understand the institution. The age of such retired flag officer would not be out of line with the age of many college presidents of our great civilian educational institutions.

CONCLUSIONS

It is recommended that the Naval Academy become a postgraduate technical school and that a requirement for admission be a college degree.

It is further recommended that the teaching staff in the nonmilitary subjects be composed entirely of civilians and retired officers.

It is also recommended that the pay scale for the civilian instructors be raised to that for similar instructors in our first-grade civilian educational institutions.

Bottlenecks in National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a radio address delivered by me over the National Broadcasting Co.'s national hook-up on Tuesday evening, September 17, 1940.

The address follows:

BOTTLENECKS IN NATIONAL DEFENSE

Through the courtesies of the National Broadcasting Co. I embrace this opportunity to discuss some of the bottlenecks in our national defense. Here in the Congress for months we have given the green light and full speed ahead to the preparedness program. In determining what is best to protect and preserve our country, partisan political considerations must not enter. It is a time when every American citizen, as well as aliens who are guests within our gates, must give unreserved allegiance to our country, and without hesitation or delay perform the services that will safeguard our country in this crisis. The House of Representatives, of which I have the honor to be a Member, has, as you have noted, given immediate consideration to every defense program and measure as soon as it came before us. Regardless of party, we in the House have all joined together in speeding this program to the earliest conclusion possible. This is evidenced by our consideration of the conscription bill, which was taken up almost immediately after being passed by the Senate, and concluded within a few days.

National preparedness, however, is an immense task. America is geared to peacetime pursuits. We are a nation of peace lovers. We want to see the whole world live together in harmony. In the past we have joined with other nations in formulating and concluding peace pacts providing for the settlement of the disputes between nations by peaceful means. While we abhor war, we will not hesitate to fight to defend ourselves. We have never shirked our duty to defend our country, its citizens, and their possessions by force of arms, when necessary. In the unsettled condition confronting the world today we cannot close our eyes to the fact that the world is an armed camp and that many peace-loving nations like ourselves have fallen beneath the path of devastating bombs and the tramp of invading armies. With modern mechanized armies, airplanes, and swift-moving watercraft, we are brought to the realization that our own safety and well-being—indeed, our preservation—may depend upon being armed and prepared to defend our shores and possessions against attacks from any and all invaders.

The Congress, regardless of party, has realized this impending emergency and has adopted such defense measures as will bring our armaments to such a state of perfection that we may successfully defend and protect ourselves. We have appropriated and authorized the expenditure of over $15,000,000,000 to build armaments and prepare defenses that will make America impregnable. As one Member of the Congress, without hesitation I have supported all of this defense program and will continue to do so. It is incumbent upon every one of us to make every sacrifice that this grim job of complete preparedness be done without any delay. We appreciate that time is a crucial element in this great program of national defense. Battleships require some 4 years for construction. Large numbers of bombing planes and aircraft require long periods of time for final completion. Land batteries and defenses, tanks, munitions, and mechanized equipment cannot be constructed without long, laborious application of trained, technical men in the formulation of plans and the production of material, plants, and equipment, and the final completion of the armaments themselves. Manpower is an important element in this construction process. It requires the coordination and mobilization of the great industrial enterprise of America, together with its technical, skilled, and common laborers. They must all work in unison for a common end. This, I believe, we are doing.

In this far-reaching program there are, however, certain bottlenecks which tend to impede progress and delay the day of final accomplishment of this great undertaking. In the short time at my disposal I can only touch upon a few of these hurdles which we will have to surmount.

When we shall have completed this immense construction program of airplanes, mechanized land equipment, water and undersea craft, we are confronted with an equally serious problem—that of providing the manpower with which to operate this mechanized armament. Modern warfare is conducted with technical, complicated machines, which require great skill and training in their operation. It has been the problem of Congress in the last several weeks to enact such legislation as will insure an ample number of trained personnel in our military, naval, and air forces. For 150 years during times of peace we have depended upon voluntary enlistments to secure this personnel. When war actually comes, we have in the past resorted to the draft. The problem with which we have been battling here in the Congress is whether or not now, while we are still at peace, it is necessary to invoke the draft method in order to secure an adequate supply of men for the manning of our immense armament machine. Many of us have felt that it was not in accord with the democratic processes of free America and not necessary to draft men in times of peace and force them into military service. However, both Houses of Congress, after long and careful consideration and debate, have now decided that, in order to protect our best interests in the world crisis and to preserve America as a nation in the event war comes, we should adopt the draft method at this time. This has been done. While I personally did not subscribe to this principle, now that the majority of the Congress has spoken, I believe it is my duty and the duty of every patriotic American to support the program as adopted, wholeheartedly and without reservation. That I am doing, and will continue to do. I do not want to see anything placed in the progress of this program that will delay or impede it. I want to see it put into effect, now that it is the law, at the earliest possible moment, so that the personnel of our forces may be adequately trained and increased to the full strength required, as determined upon by the chiefs of staff of our defense forces. It will require a considerable time to induct these new recruits into the service, prepare for their housing, equipment, and training, together with hospital facilities, and make them an integral part of our fighting forces. It is the plan of the chiefs of staff to put these men into existing units, rather than to segregate them. This, of course, means that immense quantities of clothing, equipment, housing, hospitals, and munitions will be required to augment existing supplies, in order to take care of this immense increase in the fighting forces.

Mistakes will occur, delays will take place, and we must be prepared to be patient with those whom we have charged with the responsibility of this immense undertaking for national defense.

I will now discuss briefly another bottleneck in national defense, namely, the lack of adequate quantities of the so-called strategic and critical minerals. The immense amount of mechanical equipment required for the armament program necessitates, first of all, securing large amounts of metals and nonmetals, not alone for building our factories and plants but also for furnishing material for the completed instrumentalities. The ability to secure metals and oil often determines the outcome of a war. America more than any other nation is self-sustaining in the most of our industrial needs. However, there are certain bottlenecks which may in times of emergency completely cut off our source of supplies for essential materials. There are 33 minerals included in the revised preparedness-materials list of the Army and Navy Munitions Board. Nine of these are strategic and 5 critical, and 19 essential. It will be of interest by reason of the common use of these terms to define them.

STRATEGIC MATERIALS

Strategic materials are those essential to the national defense for the supply of which in war dependence must be placed in whole or in part on sources outside the continental limits of the United States, and for which strict conservation and distribution control measures will be necessary.

CRITICAL MATERIALS

Critical materials are those materials essential to the national defense the procurement problems of which in war, while difficult, are less serious than those of strategic materials, because they can be either domestically produced or obtained in more adequate quantities or have a lesser degree of essentiality, and for which some degree of conservation and distribution control will be necessary.

ESSENTIAL MATERIALS NEITHER STRATEGIC NOR CRITICAL

In this classification are included those materials, essential to the national defense, for which no procurement problems in war are anticipated, but whose status is such as to require constant surveillance because future developments may necessitate reclassification as strategic or critical.

In February 1939 the staffs of the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines issued a report upon certain deficient strategic minerals. This report discusses the situation of the United States with respect to seven of the minor metals that are so essential in modern industrial activity that to do without them would require a drastic reorganization in present practices. These metals are manganese, chromium, mercury, tungsten, nickel, tin, and antimony. All of them are essential in peace and critical in war. In none of them is the United States self-sufficient. This situation is illustrated by the following table, which shows the percentage of the Nation's peacetime requirements produced from domestic mines during a recent 5-year period:

	Percentage
Manganese	5–6
Chromium	1
Mercury	40
Tungsten	50
Nickel	0.5
Tin	0.2
Antimony	10

These facts indicate a situation that requires the earnest attention of those upon whom falls responsibility for the national safety in any emergency that would cut us off from foreign sources of supply.

The Seventy-sixth Congress, at its first regular session, passed an act approved June 7, 1939, which directs the Secretaries of War, Navy, and Interior, after consultation with the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and Commerce, to determine the quantity and quality of the strategic materials needed to supply the Nation's industrial, naval, and military needs for common defense. The act authorizes the purchase of these materials through the Procurement Division. Such materials are to be stored at certain places the Secretaries may designate and may be rotated in order to prevent deterioration. It further authorizes an appropriation to be spent under direction of the Secretaries of War and Navy of $100,000,000, to be available from June 30, 1939, through June 30, 1943, and authorizes an appropriation of $350,000 for the Bureau of Mines and $150,000 for the Geological Survey, of the Interior Department, for use in determining the utilization of ores in the United States in relation to the common defense.

Since the enactment of this statute the Congress has made additional provisions for the acquirement of these strategic, critical and essential materials, and up to July 1, 1940, had purchased 64,500 long tons of chromium and 86,500 long tons of manganese, 11,800 pounds of quartz crystals, 6,124 short tons of pig tin, and 449 short tons of tungsten.

There are many virgin deposits within our own borders which, when developed, will supply many of these strategic, critical, and essential materials. Many of these deposits are in the Pacific Coast States and Alaska.

With new abundant, assured, low-cost hydroelectric power in the Columbia River projects, the mineral resources of the four Pacific Northwest States are now susceptible of aiding materially in obviating this bottleneck in our national defense program. The projects at Bonneville and Grand Coulee will provide by July 1942 over 600,000 kilowatts of electric energy. In addition, the total ultimate installations of both projects amount to over 2,400,000 kilowatts. The Columbia River area contains the Nation's greatest source of water power, being about 44 percent of the hydroelectric power of all the streams of continental United States. During the World War the shortage of electrical energy developed an embarrassing hurdle in the preparedness program. However, with the development on the Columbia River and T. V. A., there is no likelihood that such a condition will exist in our present emergency. The laymen may not appreciate that in order to capture these strategic and critical minerals from the original deposits in the earth, reduce them and process them for ultimate utilization in fabricating the mechanical war machines, huge blocks of low-cost electric power are necessary. The Pacific Northwest is not only blessed with having this huge reservoir of potential electric power but it also has large deposits of minerals and other materials which are necessary for carrying forward this undertaking. One of the chief metals required in airplane construction is aluminum. A new plant has just gone into production on the Columbia River, using Bonneville power, which will add materially to our supplies needed immediately in the airplane program. There are immense low-grade clay deposits in the West available for the production of aluminum. A new process has recently been perfected for extracting alumina, which is the essential material in making aluminum, from a common clay found in almost inexhaustible quantities in the Northwest and elsewhere in the United States. This new process, developed by John Henry Walthall, of the T. V. A. staff, was developed in the pilot plant of the T. V. A. and is reported to effect the increase manyfold of the sources of supply of this important metal. If these forecasts prove to be correct, the United States will be completely independent of foreign countries for its supply of this metal essential for airplane construction. At the present time our major supply comes from abroad, which may be cut off in time of war.

The Bonneville Administrator, in the report recently released by him, states that it is probable that the production of ferrochrome, magnesium, and chlorates may soon be initiated in the Columbia River area and that aluminum from Northwest raw materials is likely to be produced in the next few months. Chromium is found in various parts of the Columbia River area. The American supply now comes from Africa, Russia, Turkey, Cuba, the Philippines, and from other foreign countries. Bauxite deposits in the United States are small, but large reserves of the submarginal ores, leucite and alunite, exist in Utah, Colorado, Wyoming, Oregon, and Washington. Further development in technology is needed for the commercial development of these submarginal ores. Occurrences of bauxite in Oregon have been reported, but further detailed surveys are needed to determine the quality and extent of these Oregon deposits. The same situation exists as to nickel, 90 percent of our supply of which is now imported.

Forty-one mineral occurrences have been charted in the Pacific Northwest. This number includes 31 industrial metals, 9 of the 11 strategic metals, and 14 of the 24 critical metals. The extent and quality of all these occurrences has not been fully determined. Low-priced power for modern processes is available, and all that is needed to utilize these resources is an accurate inventory of quantity and quality of minerals and practical processes for beneficiation of the determined quality of the ores.

The progress of the national-defense program will, in a large measure, depend upon securing unlimited supplies of these and other essential materials. The present world war has definitely proven that the United States must develop sources of supply or substitutes therefor, for all of these strategic, critical, and essential materials within our own borders, in order to insure that there will be no interruption of our defense program. Many of the original foreign sources of these materials have now been cut off. We must, not only in the interest of national defense but also in order to develop our own resources, utilize the original sources at home available to us for supplying these most essential materials, not only in times of war but in peace. The Pacific Northwest stands ready to cooperate with the Federal Government in the development and utilization of this storehouse of essential materials lying within its borders.

Taking Stock of Our Foreign-Trade Position

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. HENRY F. GRADY, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an address by the Honorable Henry F. Grady, Assistant Secretary of State, at the final session of the twenty-seventh Foreign Trade Convention, at the Palace Hotel, San Francisco, Calif., July 31, 1940.

The address follows:

In taking stock of our foreign-trade position, it is important for all of us to realize that, from the national point of view, foreign trade is not an independent field of economic activity nor an end in itself, but an integral part of our national economy and of our international relations. It is in this broad perspective that the commercial policy of the administration was formulated and is being carried out. Its objective is to promote above all else the welfare of the Nation as a whole, which can be achieved in the fullest measure only under conditions of world peace. It was anticipated that such a policy, being based on the principles of reciprocity and equality of opportunity in international relations, would tend to reduce the causes of economic friction between nations and to make it possible for all nations to realize more fully their economic potentialities and would thereby facilitate the establishment of a sound and lasting peace in the international community.

Such a peace did not materialize. Our failure to adapt our commercial policy after the last World War to the change in our position from a debtor to a creditor country was in part responsible for the severity and long duration of the 1930–32 depression which affected the course of international events which followed. Our present commercial policy has been in effect for only 6 years and has in that short time contributed in an outstanding measure toward the restoration of sanity in international commercial relations. Nevertheless, owing to the direction which international developments had already taken by the time of its adoption, the cause of liberal trade was not advanced far enough to block the course of impending disaster. One factor making its progress less than it might have otherwise been was the strong opposition at home from those who regarded liberal trade principles as inimical to their privileges of exploitation under the excessive tariff of 1930. Furthermore, in its path lay a tangled undergrowth of false doctrines and blind prejudices deeply rooted in more than 50 years of American high-protectionist tradition.

Nevertheless, disaster having overtaken the world, our hope now is to pull through the troubled days ahead with strength to preserve for ourselves, if not for the world, the freedom and liberty which are possible only under the institutions of a democracy. That hope depends upon our subordinating immediate and selfish interests to the national welfare, of which all our interests ultimately depend, and viewing our domestic problems in relation to world problems of which they are a part.

I am sure that many people who have not realized the importance of this before, do now. The realization has been brought home to them suddenly by recent events in Europe and by their concern now for their country's security. The first hysterical impulse following such a belated realization is frequently to demand new and drastic measures. However, before throwing over basic principles, such as those embodied in the trade-agreements program, which have been tried and tested, we should consider what the situation calls for, especially from the point of view of war conditions, the requirements of national defense and the outlook for trade in the post-war period.

The war in Europe has had a pronounced effect on our foreign trade, as may be observed from official figures for the first 5 months of this year. Both our exports and imports greatly increased in this period compared to those of the corresponding periods of the 2 previous years. Large percentage increases in our export sales between the first 5 months of 1939 and 1940 were accounted for by the United Kingdom and France, 92 percent; Canada, 54 percent; and South America, 70 percent. One would not expect to find, of course, that these export increases occurred largely in respect of commodities on which concessions have been obtained abroad in peacetime as the result of trade agreements. As a matter of fact, our export trade with many of the countries in Europe with which we have trade agreements has been seriously disrupted by the war, and, in the case of the United Kingdom and France, the benefits of the concessions obtained from them have in a large measure been offset by wartime trade controls which are permitted under the terms of agreements in the event of a national emergency. The type of goods which has been exported in increased amounts to the United Kingdom, France, and Canada has been determined chiefly by their war needs and our increased sales to South America have consisted in a large part of goods which that continent previously purchased from Europe.

Nevertheless, trade agreements have been a factor of significance in our foreign-trade position under war conditions. It is important to note in this connection that, although our imports increased also in the first 5 months of this year over the corresponding period of last year, they have not increased as much as have our exports, indicating on the part of the foreign purchasers of our goods a drain on their sources of dollar exchange. This has in part caused the belligerents to limit their purchases from the United States to essential items in order to conserve their dollar funds for war materials. The American trade in agricultural products, many of which have not come under the category of essentials, has especially suffered as a result of this policy. Furthermore, the using up of dollar exchange now by the foreign countries concerned may mean, in the case of the belligerents, that their ability to buy American products required by post-war reconstruction will be impaired and, in the case of other countries, that we shall not be able to hold on to the trade gains which have been made.

The drain, however, on the dollar-exchange resources of foreign countries, the consequences suffered as a result thereof by American agriculture, and its possible effects on future trade might be greater than is now the case were it not for the existence of trade agreements. The lowering of our tariffs as the result of these agreements has afforded foreign countries the opportunity of exchanging larger amounts of their goods for American products than would otherwise be possible and thus has relieved in some measure the pressure on their potential dollar-exchange reserves.

In preparing in the present crisis to defend our interests, our homes, and our liberties, we must take into account the fact that foreign trade is regarded by totalitarian governments as a source, not of national prosperity, but of political and military power, and is employed as an instrument of aggression. Whereas we have sought in foreign trade a means for providing, reciprocally, for the fuller employment of labor and for raising living standards of the people in general, the dictators have used their trade bargaining power to increase the dependence of small countries on totalitarian economy in order that such countries might, one at a time, be isolated from their friends and neighbors and more easily brought under their domination. That we may not, as the result of such methods, find ourselves without friends among our neighbors in this hemisphere and surrounded on all sides by the forces of aggression, tyranny, and persecution, we must press forward vigorously, but calmly and sanely, with our good-neighbor policy in the Americas.

The chief source of livelihood of our southern neighbors is the production of raw materials for world markets. Nearly half of their exports in 1937 was sold to Europe, but that trade is now disrupted as a result of the war. If the burden on Latin America of accumulating stocks of export surpluses is permitted to grow, it may be expected that the resistance of the American republics to economic penetration from the Old World will be undermined and weakened. This problem of Latin American export surpluses is one of immediate importance to which, as you know, this Government is giving serious attention. Its solution is highly important to the security of this hemisphere.

The basic need, however, of the defense and prosperity of the Americas is the continued development of closer economic relations among the American republics. There is need of each opening wider its markets to the products of the other republics, of developing industries to supply those markets, and of lending financial and technical assistance for this and other purposes.

I am sure that you are aware of the marked advance which has already been made in this direction under the administration's good-neighbor policy. Of outstanding importance in this connection are the trade agreements which this Government has entered into with 11 American republics, containing mutual guaranties of fair treatment and providing reciprocally for increased market opportunities through a lowering of import barriers. Even opponents of the trade-agreements program who have shouted "wolf, wolf" the loudest have benefited from its stimulus to foreign trade and the resulting expansion of the domestic market for their products. Nevertheless, the opposition of sectional and special interests have constituted a serious threat to the very existence of the trade program. Thanks to their shortsighted greed and also perhaps to the activities of similar privilege-seeking groups abroad, the trade-agreements program has not been advanced as far in our relations with the other American republics as might be desired, especially in view of the present need of American economic solidarity which the protection of common interests demands. In this connection attention may be called to our prohibition, under the guise of sanitary laws, against meat imports from certain areas of South America not affected by the disease against which sanitary safeguards are sought. The failure of this Government to provide warranted relief from such sanitary regulations and the indifference which would appear to be evidenced thereby toward the development of closer inter-American relations do not inspire the cooperation which is necessary to the building up of an adequate hemispheric defense.

Although the people of this country are on guard against "fifth column" activities, they do not appear to be alert yet to the more subtle danger of the existence within our midst of a "sixth column" composed of special interests, who, out of blind selfishness, would sacrifice the common good for personal gain.

What the nature of our international trade relations will be after the war no one, of course, knows. We are in a position, however, to exert a positive influence on such relations in this hemisphere. If the divided interests of this country would realize that their welfare is basically dependent upon the welfare and strength of the Nation as a whole, and would by united, and vigorous efforts urge full cooperation with the other American republics, including reciprocal reductions in trade barriers and mutual assurances of fair and equitable commercial treatment, we should be able not only to lay the economic foundations of hemispheric defense but also to secure compensation in larger inter-American trade for ourselves and other American republics for possible losses in trade with other parts of the world.

The future of our trade with other parts of the world depends in part, it appears, on factors beyond our immediate control. Whatever the developments in this field may be, they are apt to bring home to the American businessman with a jolt the basic truth reflected in our trade-agreement policy, namely, that exports depend ultimately on imports.

For nearly 2 decades American business, representing both agriculture and industry, has been trying to increase its sales abroad while at the same time seeking to restrict its foreign purchases. One of the factors making possible our large excess of exports over imports in the decade of the twenties was foreign loans. In the early years of the thirties a large part of these loans were in default, and we virtually discontinued lending and investing abroad. We continued, nevertheless, to maintain an excess of exports over imports, and foreign countries were thus forced to balance their payments with us by large shipments of gold to this country until they have become largely drained of their gold reserves while we have accumulated a useless surplus.

If we are to receive payment from abroad on account of goods exported, services rendered, and funds invested, it appears that we must be prepared to receive a larger part of it in the form of goods for feeding, clothing, and sheltering our population.

The sooner we recognize that trade is essentially barter, an exchange of goods for goods, the better position we shall be in to safeguard our international commerce and protect American agriculture and industry whose prosperity is dependent on world markets and access to world supplies of raw materials. By what methods this exchange of goods is to be effected is, however, a matter of great concern to us. Shall it be conducted on a liberal most-favored-nation or multilateral basis, or on a preferential and restricted basis of bilateral trade-balancing? For instance, shall we, as has been possible under a most-favored-nation system of world trade, accept raw materials from Southeastern Asia as payment in part for our exports to Europe, or shall we, as a result of bilateralism, be forced to accept instead European products for which we may have less need.

I suspect that those who advocate the adoption by this Government of barter or clearing arrangements are really at heart high-protectionists who mistake such streamlined trade controls as miracle-working devices for promoting exports without increasing imports. If our trade with Southeastern Asia, for example, in which our imports far exceed our exports, were subject to such arrangements, efforts to bring about a more evenly balanced trade might conceivably result in a serious curtailment of our imports of essential raw materials. But assume for the sake of argument that we were able by such efforts to force Southeastern Asia to increase its purchases of American products. This would necessitate naturally a curtailment of its imports from other countries, especially European countries, whose purchases of American products exceed for the most part their sales to us. On the basis of actual experience of various countries with bilateralistic controls, it might be expected that the loss of European markets in Southeastern Asia would lead the European countries eventually to seek a more evenly balanced trade with us; in other words, to increase their sales in this market or to reduce their imports of American products.

Suppose that we should be trading after the war on a bilateralistic basis and should have open to us under a clearing arrangement a large European market for American products. Under such an arrangement the American exporters would receive, in payment for their merchandise, credits abroad in terms of a foreign currency. In order to convert the proceeds of their export sales into dollars, they would either have to use these credits themselves for the purchase of foreign goods for sale in this country or, directly or indirectly, sell them to American importers for the same purpose or to other Americans having financial obligations to meet abroad. But since the foreign funds could not be spent in any foreign market except the one employing the foreign currency in question, the American demand for the products available in that market or obligations to be met in that particular currency might not be great enough to provide for the disposal of the blocked funds. In order that the American exporters might finally obtain dollars for their goods, import duties on certain foreign products might be substantially reduced to encourage their sale in this country, or, if the American exporters were permitted to do so under the terms of the clearing agreement, they might sell their foreign credits to American importers at a discount, which would also stimulate imports, but at the expense of the exporters and domestic producers. It is more likely, however, that great pressure would be brought to bear on the Government to relieve the American exporters of their blocked funds and that the Government would come to possess a frozen supply of assets abroad in addition to its buried stocks of gold in Kentucky.

Even if our foreign trade, in order to meet the demand in some quarters for further streamlining, were turned over to a government-owned "Amtorg" corporation, or any other new-model trade set-up, the necessity of accepting imports in payment for exports could not be avoided. This necessity is the essence of trade, but if the exchange of exports for imports were effected through bilateralistic channels we should not be free to buy where or what we pleased; nor to buy nor to sell in the best markets. Consequently the benefits to be derived from such an exchange under bilateralism tend to disappear and trade, exports as well as imports, is discouraged.

Incidentally, I might point out that merely the administrative requirements and complicated procedures arising in connection with trade controls would in themselves constitute a heavy burden on foreign commerce. Many of you have probably shared with us the recent experience which throws some light upon the nature of the administrative and regulatory problems which stem from any measure of trade control. I refer to the problems which attended the setting up of the export licensing system required under the National Defense Act which went into effect at midnight, July 4, 1940, to control exports of military equipment and munitions and certain related manufactures and materials, which might be needed for our own defense purposes.

I can well understand the difficulties which faced those of you who had to obtain at short notice licenses to cover shipments about to be loaded aboard the steamer; perhaps you can understand the difficulty which faced the administrative officials in dealing with a sudden flood of thousands of applications at the very time that the entire set-up for examining applications and issuing licenses had to be thought out and organized. Many of these problems are, of course, solved after the initial period is passed and the system settles down to a routine operating basis, but let me remind you that each new control and each new regulation involves, firstly, some initial period of confusion and, secondly, additional routine and the inevitable prospect of recurrent problems of definition and interpretation, all of which is reflected in delay and expense.

Control over the exports of a limited number of products for national-defense purposes is a comparatively simple matter. You can well imagine how complicated and burdensome the administrative problems and regulations might be in the event that our trade were conducted on the basis of barter transactions, clearing agreements, or exchange control.

It is not because of fidelity to noble sentiments or of an allegiance to so-called old-fashioned doctrines that we must continue to uphold the multilateral principles of the trade-agreements program, but because practical considerations and hard-headed business sense leave no other course open. The basic proposition underlying our commercial policy is that foreign trade is a vital factor in the prosperity, strength, and peace of the Nation; our policy is to foster such trade. So long as we hold the national interests above those of any economic group or section of the country, no change in that policy is possible.

We must, of course, be prepared to effect any adjustment in our trade program or to adopt any supplementary measures which conditions in a war-torn and chaotic world may require; and, possibly, as in other fields of our national life, to resort temporarily to measures for which we basically have no liking. A realistic approach, however, to emergency problems of international commercial relations should not obscure from view the importance of taking now whatever action is possible to preserve and strengthen the principles of liberal trade.

The trade-agreements program is at this time a factor of vital significance to the future of our economic relations with the other countries of this hemisphere and also to the New World defense of freedom and democracy. As long as we remain a free people the question of whether this program shall be relegated "to the heaven of lost causes" will be decided not by Mr. Hitler, but by you, through the democratic right to vote, to make representations to your Government, and to speak freely. I cannot believe that the cause of liberal trade is lost any more than that the cause of liberalism and democracy itself is lost. It is my conviction that, notwithstanding the machinations of special interests, whether represented by petty lobbyists or power dictators, democracy will finally triumph in its struggle for prosperity, equality, and freedom.

Politics in Relief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, again I want to call attention of the Members to the political manipulations and favoritism being shown in the administration of W. P. A.

In January of 1940 Indiana had a quota of 70,000, but only 62,344 were employed; the quota remained at 70,000 for February and March, but less than 65,000 were employed during these months. The quota was gradually reduced until in August it was 44,000, but in that month only 41,552 were employed. There has been great suffering in Indiana by many people who could not get employment on W. P. A. during the past year, during which time those administering the law could have employed thousands more than were employed. W. P. A. had the money to employ the full quota. During this time there were thousands duly certified for relief work who could not get employment. Why was it that the full quota was not employed? Was it because W. P. A. officials wanted to hold back the number employed so as to be able to gradually increase the number to be employed just before election, as was done in 1934, 1936, and 1938? The facts seem to prove this to be the reason. Already the number employed is being increased, and at this time I understand they are over the current quota. This increase will probably continue until after election, and then they will again begin laying men off as they did in 1934, 1936, and 1938. It is peculiar that in the nonelection years of 1933, 1935, 1937, and 1939 W. P. A. found no reason to gradually increase the number employed just before November. W. P. A. does not seem to realize that people need work as much in the nonelection years as they do in election years, and that they get just as hungry and need clothes and fuel as much after an election as they do just before an election.

In 1933, a nonelection year, the number employed on relief work declined 15.4 percent from June through October, although industrial production reflecting employment declined 16.5 percent. In the election year of 1934 the number employed on W. P. A. increased 11.6 percent from June through October. In 1935, a nonelection year, relief rolls declined 9.5 percent from June through October. In 1936, an election year, W. P. A. employment increased 14.4 percent, although unemployment had been reduced 13 percent. In 1937, when there was no election, the relief rolls showed a decline of 16.9 percent from June through October, although production declined 10.5 percent in that period. In 1938, an election year, the relief rolls were increased 19.2 percent, although unemployment declined 9 percent. In 1939, when there was no election, the number of W. P. A. was reduced 25.5 percent.

I wrote the W. P. A. officials protesting unwarranted and unreasonable lay-offs and received a reply saying—I quote:

> The relative-need basis that you refer to was not considered in these reductions. * * * The selection of the people for these reductions was made in the district office by the employment staff composed mostly of young ladies who did not know whether a man was white or black, married or single, or any other circumstance about him.

Just think of great numbers of needy people being laid off of W. P. A. without the question of need even being considered, when relief work was started and has been maintained for the sole purpose of providing employment for those in need. Without need there would be no W. P. A., and the money appropriated for relief work should be expended to employ those needing relief. It seems very queer that the young ladies in the district office were permitted to select those to be laid off, and that when selecting those to be laid off managed to avoid laying off any of the nonrelief workers.

May I ask, Why should young ladies in the district office, who had no information about the men, be permitted to select those to be dismissed from work? It is a sorrowful situation when those administering W. P. A. continue to handle it on a political basis. The principle of W. P. A., that of emergency relief, is good, but in the hands of unscrupulous politicians has been used, not for the benefit of those needing relief but in an attempt to perpetuate those administering the law in power.

There is no good reason why so many have been left unemployed for several months just in order to place great numbers to work immediately before election for purely political purposes.

The way W. P. A. has been administered is another link toward regimentation and toward the totalitarian form of government some would like to see established here. Some people are required to be absolutely poverty-stricken, to dispose of every kind of property they have, before they can get employment, while others who do not need relief are employed steadily. In one case in my congressional district a man with a large family was refused employment because he owned a hog. In other words, in many instances a man is driven to complete destitution before he will be given employment and then he is told that if it were not for the present administration he would starve, and the claim made that if the present administration is defeated he will not receive any further work. Of course, this is not true and is the lowest kind of political tactics.

Too much W. P. A. money is being expended for large salaries of administrative and nonrelief employees. Many W. P. A. State administrators receive larger salaries than the governors of their States. Too much money is being wasted in paying exorbitant salaries to white-collared workers and to many nonrelief workers employed at high salaries. There are thousands of men who are unemployed and who are well qualified to hold any position in the entire relief set-up, who need the work, and they should be employed to fill these positions.

Now as the election draws near W. P. A. workers are being told that the reason they have not been employed was because Congress did not appropriate enough money and that Congress only appropriated money for 8 months, beginning with July 1, 1940. The fact is that Congress appropriated every penny that the President and Colonel Harrington asked for the year beginning July 1, 1940, and then Congress gave the W. P. A. officials the authority to spend the whole amount appropriated for the year in 8 months if the W. P. A. officials desired to do so. The workers are also being told that the Republicans are responsible for the 130-hour workmonth and for abolishing the prevailing wage rate. This is absolutely untrue. Such stories are not being told by Members of Congress but by politicians "back home" who apparently do not know and do not want to know the facts, and are being told solely for the purpose of misleading the W. P. A. workers in an attempt to get their votes on election day. Members of Congress know that Colonel Harrington asked for this, I quote from Colonel Harrington's testimony before the Appropriations Committee, which appears on page 20 of the hearings. He said:

> It is my recommendation that persons employed on projects of the W. P. A. be required to work 130 hours per month, and that the earnings of such persons be on a monthly basis, with the requirement that substantially the present national average labor cost be maintained.

The committee reporting this bill has many more Democratic members than Republican members and they reported the bill carrying the provision requested by Colonel Harrington, who said he made the recommendation after discussing it with the President and having his approval. When the bill came on the floor of the House for consideration I was one of those who opposed the 130-hour work-month provision and the abolishment of the prevailing-wage rate, but there were not enough of us to prevent these provisions from being in the law.

Oh, our Democratic friends would like to dodge responsibility for putting these provisions in the relief legislation, but there is no way they can do so. There are 69 Democrats in the Senate and only 23 Republicans. There are 260 Democrats in the House and only 167 Republicans so it is apparent that the Democrats have an overwhelming majority in both the Senate and the House and they pass the legislation they want to pass in whatever form they desire. There are not enough Republicans in Congress to pass any legislation. Everyone knows that 23 Republican Senators cannot outvote 69 Democratic Senators, and that 167 Republican Congressmen cannot outvote 260 Democratic Congressmen. And then, the President can veto any bill, the provisions of which he does not approve, but he did not veto the relief bill with the 130-hour work month and the abolishment of the prevailing-wage provision in it. He approved it and he signed it. Our Democratic friends cannot escape their responsibility for the legislation passed by Congress.

To use the oft-repeated saying:

> They have the knife and they have the cheese and they are cutting it to suit themselves.

Surely politics and favoritism are the only things which could cause W. P. A. to employ 185 relief workers and 864 nonrelief workers on a project. On another project 265 relief workers were employed and 189 nonrelief workers. On another 221 relief workers were employed and 171 nonrelief workers. Even on the W. P. A. building at the New York World's Fair only 17.7 percent relief workers were employed and 82.3 percent nonrelief workers. The hearings are full of such instances. What could cause this except politics and favoritism? Does not this show conclusively that W. P. A. is not being administered in the interest of those needing relief? The purchase of supplies and equipment shows great waste of large sums of money. If the money appropriated for relief work were expended properly and to employ only those needing relief, many thousands more could be employed, and they could be paid better wages. Everyone knows that it is impossible for a person with dependents to live according to the American standard on wages paid by W. P. A. Those working on W. P. A. and those unemployed want to see America put back to work. They want real jobs where they can receive regular American wages and live and enjoy an independent life. For 7½ years they have had no opportunity of regular employment and it must be apparent to all that this administration cannot solve our unemployment problem.

The only thing they have to offer is a continuance of the politically manipulated relief set-up. There are 93,500 nonrelief employees on W. P. A. who are employed in administrative or supervisory positions at salaries of over $1,200; some range as high as $10,000 per year. Many more thousands of nonrelief employees are employed in supervisory positions at salaries less than $1,200 per year. W. P. A. has even spent $178,000 to make a moving picture for propaganda purposes and did not employ a single relief worker. They have refused to make public or to advise Congress of the total number of nonrelief employees or the amount of relief money expended upon nonrelief employees. It is high time that Congress stopped this mismanagement of relief work and the waste of relief money. We know those administering relief will do in the future as they have done in the past and are now doing. They have caused many of our citizens, both young and old, some with large families, to go without work and to suffer for months in order to load the relief rolls just before election. This is not right and should be stopped. Even after the exposé of political manipulations, favoritism, and waste and extravagance of the W. P. A., it continues now as in the past. This shows conclusively that they intend to continue relief administration from a purely political viewpoint.

I tell you that the man and woman needing relief work cannot be longer fooled. They are rightly demanding that money appropriated for relief work be used to employ those needing relief; that the employment of nonrelief workers stop; that favoritism, waste, and extravagance be stopped, and that politics be taken out of relief. I am going to continue my efforts to bring this about. We still have 10,000,000 unemployed in spite of the national-defense program. Many of us do not believe in this administration's views that millions will never have anything except a W. P. A. job. If we are to continue under our system of government and the American way of living, we must provide regular jobs for our unemployed. This can and will be done. Great efforts are being made to divert people's attention and thoughts to foreign matters in order to get them to forget our domestic problems and the failure of the present administration to solve these problems. Each day these failures increase and the administration becomes more confused.

Our national debt has increased to upward of $60,000,000,000.

Agricultural problems have not been solved; business and industry are in bad condition; unemployment remains about the same; and great sums of relief funds are being diverted from their rightful use and wasted.

The administration of W. P. A. stinks to high heaven and is a monument of everlasting shame in the political history of our country.

How long do you think the people can and will stand for this and how long do you think our Government can exist if we continue on the same road as the last 7½ years?

W. P. A. should be continued as long as it is needed and under conditions which will furnish those working on W. P. A. an opportunity to live and to support their dependents, and our efforts at the same time should be centered upon the solution of this unemployment problem; of greater production in the United States whereby these men can secure employment in this increased production. The war hysteria which has been created and the appropriation of some $14,000,000,000 for national defense will naturally bring about the employment of many people and might give an apparent feeling of prosperity. A prosperity built upon war or on the preparation for war, is a false prosperity; there is nothing permanent about it. History teaches that the backwash after such a false prosperity leaves a condition worse than when this sort of prosperity began.

What we need is a real prosperity, not a false prosperity; a prosperity which gives every citizen an opportunity to have regular employment at regular American wages. A prosperity that will permit our citizens to live a free and independent life, free from all coercion and regimentation. Our people want, and are entitled to, real jobs with real wages and not a permanent continuance of relief-work jobs at starvation wages.

Willkie, Utility Magnate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS F. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, Wendell Willkie was recently made a member of the board of J. P. Morgan's First National Bank of New York, known as the bank of bankers. So far as I know, he still is on that board. He has been throughout his career a lawyer for special interests, a lobbyist for the Power Trust, a promoter of the type of big business that looks to stock-market manipulation and speculation for the enormous profits that are divided among the little clique at the top.

And yet we hear honest people saying that they may vote for Willkie because he has been and is a businessman who can be depended upon to persuade business to cooperate with the Government. The reverse is true: This utilities promoter can be depended upon, in all positions and at all times, to use his influence to force the Government to cooperate with business, even in the very activities that the great majority of American voters deplore and condemn. No one objects to honest business. Most of us object to exploitation and speculation by business. No one really mistakes a promoter for a business man, if he knows the facts.

LED FIGHT ON WHEELER-RAYBURN BILL

Wendell Willkie first came into national prominence in 1935, when the holding-company bill was being considered by Congress. This bill had for its purpose the stopping of the outrageous cheating of the public through the organization of giant holding companies. These companies made their enormous profits through the watering of stock and other dishonest practices. A holding company is a corporation which is organized principally to own securities issued by other corporations. In the utilities field holding companies were organized in the gay twenties through the purchase of small, independently owned electric companies, which were reorganized and recapitalized, at the public expense.

The Wheeler-Rayburn bill aimed to put a stop to the dishonesty, while leaving untouched holding companies that could show that they served a useful purpose. Never in the history of Congress has a bill been so maliciously attacked.

It was Willkie who led the fight against this bill. It was he and his coworkers who had an avalanche of telegrams and letters sent to Members of the House and the Senate. Many of the names signed to the telegrams were forged, being signed without their owners' knowledge or permission. The drive was overdone; the Members of Congress were not deluded by it. A majority stood pat and voted for the bill.

In 1927–28 we find Willkie in Washington lobbying against the Walsh resolution authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the utility industry.

In 1929 he moved to New York as general counsel of the Commonwealth & Southern. A few years later he became president of Commonwealth & Southern.

WILLKIE FRONT MAN FOR UTILITIES

He is not a businessman, not an industrialist. He has never produced anything. His career has been that of lobbyist, lawyer, and front man for the utilities, an outstanding leader in the use of those shady practices, that exploitation, that disregard for the public interest that has distinguished the large utilities.

He has always been on the promotion and public relations field, never on the operating or production field.

In 1929 Willkie was general counsel for the Commonwealth & Southern, a holding company created by J. P. Morgan & Co. in that year. First listed in May 1929, the stock soared in October to $24.75 and then fell to $10.

A Federal Power Commission report shows that the write-up by the Commonwealth & Southern of the valuation of the merged companies was $531,205,571.

Thus the investing public was defrauded by paying for a half billion dollars of water in the stock, and the consumers were defrauded by having the book valuation increased as a base for higher rates.

Willkie, the general counsel for the Commonwealth & Southern, approved of this; he expanded under the success of the manipulation; and doubtless wisecracked at the slick befooling of the public.

While Willkie was president of the Commonwealth & Southern, that company became a participating member of the committee of public-utility executives, organized in 1935 to lobby against the holding-company bill.

PARTICIPATED IN RAISING SLUSH FUND

This committee admitted spending $350,000 in opposing the bill. The Commonwealth & Southern was one of the three highest contributors. This money was gotten from the unwilling public which was forced to pay high rates for their light and power.

Willkie was the witness in opposition to the bill before the House Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Willkie is in reality a utilities tycoon who has consistently worked with the Morgan interests and who has consistently and successfully played the Wall Street game. He has personality, driving force, great cleverness. Planning as he did to try to steal the Republican nomination, as predicted by the gentleman from Mississippi, Representative RANKIN, in a speech made May 23, 1939, he began a build-up that has never been equaled in American politics. Publicity men of highest ability were busy for weeks and even for months in the preconvention Willkie propaganda. Since the Republicans had no strong candidate for the nomination and since many of the leaders agreed that only Hoover had the experience and the understanding of foreign affairs essential to the Presidency at this time, Willkie had his big chance.

Quick to take advantage of the situation, and past master of the art of propaganda, he used every method that an ingenious mind backed with barrels of money could devise. Newspaper publicity, the formation of Willkie-for-President clubs through paid advertising, direct contacts with willing workers everywhere were the prelude. Prior to and during the Republican convention came the avalanche of letters and telegrams from seemingly unorganized citizens to the convention delegates. All urged that the convention abandon the candidates approved by the organization and vote for the young Lochinvar from Wall Street. The galleries are said to have been packed for the occasion. At any rate, the galleries responded to the excitement and the fireworks. So did the delegates. And thus Willkie was nominated and the Republican Party lost the slim chance it had of electing a President.

The real drive back of Willkie is from Wall Street. It is a drive for the control of government by the big corporations—banking, utility, industrial. It is, in reality, a Fascist system they are planning, though only a very few realize it.

WILLKIE'S ATTITUDE SMACKS OF FASCISM

However, Willkie some months ago in an unreported speech so vehemently praised the control by the big financial and industrial leaders that the word "fascism" passed from mouth to mouth.

He is clever. Yes; too clever. For instance, he said away back in 1933 to the Military Affairs Committee of the House that his company favored the program for the development of the Tennessee Valley; but—and here is the crux of the opposition—he opposed the building by the Government of transmission lines or distributing systems. Of course, the profit and the profiteering come from the distributing systems through the sale of power and light to the consumers and through stock manipulation.

And this is the kind of "business" Mr. Willkie and his Wall Street backers want and will have—if they can get it. They are making their last stand now. If they can befool the public into electing Wendell Willkie President, Wall Street will once more control the Government, and the public can once more be damned.

BOASTED OF $9,000,000 HOLD-UP

In the sale of the Tennessee Electric Power Co. properties, a subsidiary of the Commonwealth & Southern, the Tennessee Valley Authority, Willkie asked $100,000,000. The T. V. A. offered $55,000,000 but found it necessary to raise the offer to $70,000,000. Finally it was found impossible to negotiate on that basis and the price paid was $79,000,000. Willkie is said to have remarked that he had bilked the Government—that is, the people of the United States—out of $9,000,000 on that deal.

While all informed people deplored the hold-up we who have fought for the T. V. A. for many years realized that we must get rid of the destructive opposition of this Willkie corporation in order to develop the project for the benefit of the public.

The Federal Power Commission report shows that in 1929 the 25 largest electric utility holding companies had sold securities to the public having a nominal market value of $19,245,157,757. At that time the total capital of all electric and power companies, privately owned, was estimated at $12,000,000,000. In other words, 25 of the largest holding companies had sold securities at prices about 60 percent above the value of all such securities.

Now note that the market value of securities of the 25 leading companies had fallen from over $19,000,000,000 in 1929 to $2,879,000,000 in 1933, before the Roosevelt administration came into power. This loss of over $6,000,000,000 was largely sustained by trusting investors who were advised by banks controlled by the house of Morgan.

The fact is that all of Mr. Willkie's companies were doing more business and making more money in 1938 than in 1933.

These companies have been forced to adopt the Government plan of lowering rates and extending business. Nevertheless Willkie has lead the pack that has attacked the Democratic policies and charged that these have destroyed the utility market.

One of the Willkie companies, the Tennessee Electric Power Co., admitted in 1938 that its net earnings had increased 34 percent since 1933.

But—and here is the rub—the opportunity to promote and speculate, to issue and sell watered stock to the public, to profiteer through pyramiding holding companies, have been curtailed if not entirely stopped.

LIBERTY LEAGUER

Willkie is a member of the Liberty League, along with Al Smith, Lewis Douglas, and other representatives of special privilege, and has stood with the league in opposition to the New Deal.

Willkie refused to register the Commonwealth & Southern with the Securities and Exchange Commission, as required under the Holding Company Act, stating that he was protecting his stockholders' rights against "an unconstitutional process of control and destruction." After the Supreme Court declared the act constitutional Willkie continued to attack it. His main argument has been that this act prevented the utilities from expanding and investing, which the record proves to be untrue.

HIS LABOR RECORD

Willkie poses as a friend of labor. He recently stated that he favors collective bargaining. He did not state that the brand of bargaining he favors is that by company unions, organized by the company executives, to control the employees while nominally representing them. We must judge him by his record, not by the kind words he is now uttering in regard to labor.

These are harsh words. But they are based on the record of the Commonwealth & Southern under Willkie's leadership. This record is written in the history of the Commonwealth & Southern and is available to the public in the La Follette Civil Liberties Committee records and in those of the National Labor Relations Board. These records prove that Mr. Willkie's company has promoted company unions, used spies, has played with tear gas, and has flagrantly violated the workers' rights by fighting the free organization by its employees.

Here is what R. J. Johnson, president, United Auto Workers convention in St. Louis, who referred to Mr. Willkie as "a streamlined version of Herbert Hoover—slicker, more clever, and more charming, but underneath his sympathetic build-up there is still the mind and outlook of public-utilities manipulation and an enemy of labor."

Our Idiotic Monetary System That Is Costing the Taxpayers Over a Billion Dollars a Year

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, now is the time to change our monetary system. If it is not changed, a few large banks will receive more money each year by reason of our national-defense and preparedness program than a million men who serve in the ranks will receive. The money that these few banks will receive will be for no service whatsoever. It will be a bonus or a subsidy because they are now using, and will continue to use if the law is not changed, the credit of this Nation absolutely free of charge. It is not right for the Government of the United States to pay interest to these few big banks for the purpose of using the Government's own credit. Any system such as our own, which requires the people to pay more than a billion dollars a year in taxes to be paid in interest for the use of the Government's own credit is idiotic and should be changed.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON THE PUBLIC DEBT AND MONEY

1. Question. What is the amount of the gross public debt?

Answer. At the beginning of September 1940 the gross public debt was $43,905,240,096.48. On the 14th day of September, it has increased $6,000,000.

2. Question. How much gold does the United States own?

Answer. As of September 14, 1940, the United States had in its possession $21,050,970,488.76 in gold, being 601,443,513.8 ounces. It is enough, which if properly used, to eventually pay our entire national debt and finance our national defense and preparedness program.

3. Question. Where is this gold located?

Answer. Seven billion one hundred and twenty-nine million nine hundred and fifty thousand six hundred and fifty-five dollars and twenty-five cents of refined gold has been transferred to the Fort Knox bullion depository. Postal fees amounting to $1,283,391 have been imposed for transporting this gold by mail to Fort Knox. The remainder of the gold is in charge of the Federal Reserve bank in New York and other depositories and assay offices for the Government.

4. Question. Does the United States Government or the Federal Reserve banks have title to this gold?

Answer. All the right, title, and interest in and to all gold in the United States is in the United States Government, and no part of it is owned by a Federal Reserve bank. This answer is confirmed in the Federal Reserve Bulletin for September 1940, page 939. A law passed by Congress is very plain on this subject and there can be no doubt about the Government owning the gold and having complete title to it. Any statement to the contrary cannot be true.

5. Question. Where does the Government get the money with which to buy the gold?

Answer. The Treasury usually has a large amount in the general fund which is subject to check. On September 13, 1940, the Government had on deposit in the 12 Federal Reserve banks $795,719,152.21. In addition, the Government had in special depositories throughout the country over $700,000,000, and in all, on this date, the Government had in its general fund more than two and one-half billion dollars. If the Government purchases a million dollars worth of gold, the Treasury gives a check on the general fund for a million dollars to pay for the gold. This general fund is built up by credits originating in the receipt of taxes, fees, fines, and so forth, and from the sale of Government obligations.

6. Question. How does the Treasury subsequently recover what it has paid for the gold?

Answer. The Treasury issues and deposits gold certificates with the Federal Reserve banks and receives credit therefor in its balance on the Federal Reserve banks' books. This credit replenishes the Treasury's balance and offsets the debit occasioned by the gold's purchase.

7. Question. What was meant by sterilizing gold?

Answer. At one time, it was the policy of the Treasury to pay for gold, but not issue gold certificates to get its money back, or to get credit from the Federal Reserve banks for the amount that had been paid for the gold. This was called sterilizing the gold. This caused the national debt to increase by the amount of the gold purchases and did not result in increasing the banks reserves. This policy was abandoned some time ago and now when gold is purchased, gold certificates are immediately issued and turned over to the Federal Reserve banks where proper credit is given to the Government for the amount of the gold purchases.

8. Question. How is silver purchased?

Answer. It is purchased in practically the same way as gold. When the Treasury buys the silver, it issues silver certificates for which it receives credit on the books of the Federal Reserve banks.

9. Question. How much silver does the Government own?

Answer. On September 13, 1940, the Government owned 1,059,585,993.2 ounces of silver, which was carried on the books of the Treasury as being worth $1,369,969,769. In addition, the Treasury held for the Government 384,639,233.3 ounces of silver dollars, which were worth $497,311,319, or a total of $1,867,281,088.

10. Question. Suppose one in this country produces gold; how does he obtain United States money for it?

Answer. Gold is usually produced by a mining company and it is delivered to the nearest mint or United States Assay Office, where United States money is obtained for it.

11. Question. How is gold purchased by our Government from abroad?

Answer. Practically all of it is sold by foreign treasuries or central banks to our Government. Whether the gold is purchased from the domestic producers or from foreign governments, the effect, eventually, if not immediately, is an increase in bank reserves and bank deposits.

12. Question. If gold were coined and permitted to go into circulation, would it be generally used by the people?

Answer. Any answer to this question will almost be a guess. However, we know that people generally prefer to use bills or paper currency and deposits in banks which are transferable by check instead of either gold or silver. Therefore, if the people were permitted to get gold any time they wanted it, only a relatively small amount would likely remain in circulation. It would be deposited in the banks and would finally find its way back to the Federal Reserve banks or to the United States Treasury.

13. Question. How much money is in circulation that has been issued by the 12 Federal Reserve banks?

Answer. $7,883,000,000 at the end of July this year.

14. Question. What did this money consist of? What kind of money was it?

Answer. It consisted of $66,000,000 in gold certificates; $46,000,000 in silver dollars; $1,565,000,000 in silver certificates; $1,000,000 in Treasury notes of 1890; $386,000,000 in subsidiary coin, such as dimes, quarters, and half dollars; $172,000,000 in minor coin, such as pennies and nickels; $249,000,000 in United States notes; $5,212,000,000 in Federal Reserve notes; $22,000,000 in Federal Reserve bank notes; and $164,000,000 in national bank notes.

15. Question. Is all this money used by the people; in other words, is it in actual active circulation?

Answer. We know that the gold certificates are not in circulation, and it is very doubtful that any of the Treasury notes of 1890 or the Federal Reserve bank notes are in circulation, as they are being taken out of circulation as they are turned in to a bank. The same applies to the national bank notes. Eventually, practically all of our money will be Federal Reserve notes if our system is not changed. The total amount of money in circulation presumes that all the money that has ever been issued by our Government is still in circulation. The fact is that much of it has been destroyed by fires. Some of it has been buried in the ground or stored in lockboxes and other safe places for future use; some of it has been sent to, and remains in, foreign countries; some of it has gone down in shipwrecks; and much of it lost or destroyed in other ways.

16. Question. How much money is supposed to be on deposit in the banks of the country?

Answer. As of March 26, 1940, the 15,000 banks of the country were supposed to have had on deposit $59,017,000,000.

17. Question. How is it possible for the banks to have on deposit $59,000,000,000 when the Government only has outstanding at this time less than $8,000,000,000?

Answer. The difference of $51,000,000,000 is bookkeeping money, sometimes referred to as fictitious money, which is created by our banking system. It is not real but serves the purpose of money.

18. Question. How is money created by a bank?

Answer. Simply by a bookkeeping transaction. A customer gives a note to the bank. The bank gives the customer a deposit slip which shows that he has on deposit at that bank the amount of the note. Under our system, strange but true, someone must go into debt in order for our country to have a sufficient circulating medium with which to transact the business of the country. Our monetary system is based on debt. If all debts were paid, we would not have money to do the business of the country.

19. Question. Suppose all the depositors should demand their money at once, how would the banks get the money with which to pay their depositors?

Answer. The local bank can put up collateral that it has, and especially United States Government securities, which it owns, with the Federal Reserve bank in the district in which the local bank is located and obtain Federal Reserve notes, 100 cents on the dollar. In this way it would be possible for the local banks to pay the local depositors 100 cents on the dollar by obtaining Federal Reserve notes for that purpose.

20. Question. What are Federal Reserve notes and by what authority are they issued?

Answer. Practically all the paper currency that is used is Federal Reserve notes, except the silver certificates in the smaller denominations. A Federal Reserve note is issued by a Federal Reserve bank by virtue of authority that has been granted by Congress.

21. Question. Is a Federal Reserve note an obligation of the Federal Reserve bank issuing it?

Answer. No; a Federal Reserve note is not an obligation of a Federal Reserve bank. It is an obligation of the United States Government. The paper note says on its face that "The United States of America Will Pay to the Bearer on Demand _____ Dollars." It is not a promise of a Federal Reserve bank to pay. It is a promise of the United States Government to pay. It is the same as a blanket mortgage on all the property of all the people in this Nation.

22. Question. Is the Federal Reserve bank issuing this blanket mortgage on the property of all the people owned by the Government of the United States?

Answer. No, part of its stock is owned by the Government or by the people. It is owned solely by the private banks and their investments in the system is practically nil when compared with the enormous business transacted on the credit of the Government.

23. Question. Do you mean to say that the private banks of the country use the nation's credit at will in this way?

Answer. Yes, that is true and without limitation, except such limitations as are imposed by the Federal Reserve Board and by law, which still leaves them enormous powers.

24. Question. Do private banks pay the Government for the use of this great privilege?

Answer. No, the private banks do not pay the Government anything for the use of this privilege. They use the Government's credit free of charge. They only pay the cost of printing the bills which is from 27 cents to 30 cents a $1,000.

25. Question. Is it right for the private banks to use the Government's credit free of charge?

Answer. It can be justified for private transactions, but to my mind no one can justify the Government itself paying the banks interest for the use of its own credit. The local bank is a very necessary, desirable, and helpful institution, and should be encouraged, but not to the extent of a Government subsidy.

26. Question. Suppose a bank in Dallas, Tex., purchases a million dollars in Government bonds from the United States Government, does it actually deliver to the Treasury $1,000,000 in cash?

Answer. No; the Dallas bank gives the Treasury credit for the $1,000,000 and receives $1,000,000 in United States bonds. The United States Treasury issues checks on the Dallas bank to pay the postmaster, the city and rural carriers, all of the Federal officials residing in that area, and such debts as are owed by the Government in that locality. The people receiving these checks do not demand the money on them. They keep the amount on deposit, either with that bank or some other bank in that area, which is the same as keeping it on deposit with that particular bank.

27. Question. Suppose that bank should be in need of money; how could it obtain money on the Government bonds that it had purchased?

Answer. By merely delivering the bonds to the Dallas Federal Reserve Bank. The Dallas Federal Reserve Bank would require the local bank to pay 1-percent interest on the Federal Reserve notes that it had advanced on the Government bonds, but if the Government bonds draw 3-percent interest, the local bank would be privileged to collect the difference of 2 percent. That is the way it works, but in practice there are very few such loans. They are not necessary.

28. Question. How many Federal Reserve banks are there in the United States that enjoy this great privilege?

Answer. Twelve. They are located at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Richmond, Atlanta, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Kansas City, Dallas, and San Francisco. They serve their respective areas.

29. Question. Can the people or private corporations do business with these 12 banks or either of them?

Answer. No. Only the private banks that are privately owned and are members of the System.

30. Question. Do the 12 Federal Reserve banks buy United States Government obligations?

Answer. Yes. The 12 banks now own two and one-half billion dollars in United States Government securities. This does not include the billions of dollars of Government securities held by member banks.

31. Question. What did these banks pay for these Government securities?

Answer. They paid Federal Reserve notes, which are obligations of the United States Government.

32. Question. When a Federal Reserve bank buys a Government obligation and pays for it with another Government obligation, does the Government continue to pay interest on the Government obligation purchased?

Answer. Yes. Although it was purchased with Federal Reserve notes, which are obligations of this Government, the Government continues to pay the Federal Reserve banks interest on the bonds that they so purchased.

33. Question. What is the present interest-bearing debt of the United States Government?

Answer. It is more than $43,000,000,000.

34. Question. How much interest is paid by the Government on this debt each year?

Answer. Much more than a thousand million dollars a year.

35. Question. When additional bonds are issued to carry on our national-defense program, will they be interest bearing, too?

Answer. If our present system is not changed, the Treasury will continue to issue and sell to the banks interest-bearing obligations of the United States Government, or Government bonds. If the interest rate is 2 percent, the American people will have to pay $20,000,000 a year interest on every billion dollars that is borrowed until it is paid back. If the interest rate is 3 percent, the people will have to pay $30,000,000 a year on every billion dollars borrowed.

36. Question. What were the views of the famous Thomas A. Edison on this question?

Answer. About 20 years ago Mr. Thomas A. Edison was inspecting Muscle Shoals. He remarked that the Government should operate that great project in the interest of the people. He was asked if he favored the Government borrowing the $30,000,000 necessary to make repairs. His answer substantially was: "No; why should the Government borrow its own credit? If it issues tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds and sells the bonds to Wall Street bankers to get the money, by the time the bonds are paid the bankers will have collected as much in interest as the Government received on the bonds. In other words, the bankers who will not furnish an ounce of material or a lick of labor will get as much out of it as the men who do the work and furnish the material." Mr. Edison also said at the same time: "Any government that can issue a dollar bond, interest bearing, that is good can issue a dollar bill, non-interest-bearing, that is good; the only difference is the bill is easier to redeem because it does not draw interest." No one can answer Mr. Edison's argument. This same argument can consistently be made on our preparedness program.

37. Question. Do those in charge of the Federal Reserve Banking System dispute what you have said about banks creating money?

Answer. No. Chairman Marriner S. Eccles, the top authority of the Federal Reserve Board here in Washington, testified before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House during the hearings on the Banking Act of 1935, on private banks creating deposits and thereby becoming virtually private individual mints, as follows:

> In purchasing offerings of Government bonds, the banking system as a whole creates new money or bank deposits. When the banks buy a billion dollars of Government bonds as they are offered—and you have to consider the banking system as a whole, as a unit—the banks credit the deposit account of the Treasury with a billion dollars. They debit their Government-bond account a billion dollars, or they actually create, by a bookkeeping entry, a billion dollars.

By a sort of magic the money is created.

In like manner, as the banks increase their deposits or create new money through the purchase of Government bonds, the banks also create new money—increase their deposits—by buying notes and other commercial paper from their customers.

IMBECILIC SYSTEM

I repeat that it is not right for the Government to pay the private banks of the country a bonus of a billion dollars a year in order to obtain the funds to carry on our preparedness and national-defense program. It is not right.

Now is the time to change this idiotic, imbecilic system that requires the Government to pay such enormous sums of money for the use of its own credit. We should no longer permit the abuse of the Government's credit in any such manner.

A LAW WITH 100 WORDS CAN MAKE THE CHANGE

This Congress can pass a law of 100 words, which would at the same time carry out a constitutional mandate to Congress, that would entirely change this system and save the people from $1,000,000,000 to $2,000,000,000 a year on interest that they are now being required to pay, and will soon be required to pay, for the use of their Government's own credit.

It is the duty of Congress to make this change.

CONSTITUTIONAL MANDATE

The framers of the United States Constitution, in article I, section 8, very wisely said:

> Congress shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

This provision of the Constitution is mandatory. All Members of Congress are sworn to uphold the Constitution. Why has this provision never been carried out? The answer is simple. In the early days of our national existence the people were deceived into believing that the subject of money was so mysterious and intricate that only a few of the financiers understood the subject, and therefore the great privilege of issuing and distributing money should be farmed out to them. This was done, and it has never been changed, except to give them more power and authority. The strange part of it all is that the ones who are the beneficiaries of this great privilege are not even charged with the duty of furnishing the people a sufficient circulating medium.

What Are We Doing About Narcotics?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, at the meeting of the Opium Information Committee of the League of Nations, in June 1939, a resolution was passed which, in effect, endorsed the Coffee narcotics investigation resolution, in that it called on the nations of the world to make an investigation of the legal and economic aspects of the narcotics question.

The resolution was introduced by the representative from the Netherlands, who, it was authoritatively announced, was led to take action by the statements as to conditions made in a book in which my argument was reproduced from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is clear, therefore, that such an investigation as the resolution calls for has international approval.

WHY SHOULD THERE BE OPPOSITION TO THE COFFEE NARCOTICS INVESTIGATION RESOLUTION?

The American Commissioner of Narcotics naturally enough opposes such an investigation. He argued before the Geneva committee that the narcotic addict is a criminal, not a sick man, and should be treated as a criminal. The European sponsors of the investigation replied that the United States Government obviously did not support this view, since it had built hospitals—at Lexington, Ky., and Fort Worth, Tex.—for the treatment of narcotic addicts.

The Commissioner, however, holds persistently to his view in opposition to all recognized medical authorities and to the opinions of humanitarians in general. He has repeatedly characterized the narcotic addict as the major criminal of America.

In support of this strange claim, the Commissioner advances a curious argument. He cites fingerprint records which show more recidivists among narcotic-law violators than among any other type of criminals. This, in his view, establishes the narcotic addict as the major criminal of the country. If you accept this reasoning, the same table reveals vagrancy as the second major crime, with prostitution, drunkenness, and suspicion bracketed in the same category; while by the same standard or test such crimes as rape, other sex offenses, arson, and criminal homicide are of minor significance—homicide, for example, showing only 24.1 percent of recidivist fingerprints, against 63.2 percent of narcotic-law violators.

TELL THE TRUTH ABOUT ADDICTS

The valid interpretation of the table is not that the narcotic-law violator is a major criminal, in any proper sense of the word—the contrary being the fact accepted by all competent criminologists—but that addicts are arrested again and again for purchasing the drug that their infirmity makes essential to their well-being; and that dope peddlers violate the statutes with every sale. The crimes, other than the purchase of drugs, committed by addicts are, with very rare exceptions, minor thefts, the forgery of prescriptions, and any and every type of petty peculation to secure money for the purchase of the—to them—all-essential drug.

Even so, the relation of all narcotic drug law offenses to other offenses against State laws and municipal ordinances is shown in true light—in contrast with the misleading fingerprint table—on another page of the Report of the Narcotics Bureau, page 55, Report for 1939, where it is stated that—

> The general relationship of narcotic drug law violations to the general crime picture in the United States is approximately by the following figures:
> Arrests for all offenses, 554,376; of which narcotic drug offenses numbered 4,164.

A COMPARISON OF THE DIFFERENT CRIMES COMMITTED

That is to say, 4,164 narcotic law offenses against more than half a million offenses of other types; less than one case in a hundred. Otherwise stated, 99 arrests for all manner of crimes, from drunken driving, to rape, arson, and murder, for every single arrest for the "major" crime of selling or buying a few grains of a narcotic drug.

We must at least commend the candor that impelled the Commissioner to publish the refutation of his own absurd fingerprint deductions. Unfortunately, many people hear of the farcical "major criminal" pronouncement, where one sees or hears of the undramatic factual data which show narcotic-law violations in true perspective—as of almost negligible importance in the general crime picture.

The oft-cited statistics showing more than 2,000—2,275 in 1938—narcotics prisoners in Federal prisons are altogether misleading, insofar as they are presented or interpreted as suggesting that the use of narcotic drugs conduces directly to the arousing of antisocial instincts and the commission of crime.

PHASES OF NARCOTIC ADDICTION

The truth is that narcotic drugs—and in particular opium and its derivatives, the ones chiefly involved—are, almost by definition, sedatives. In Dr. Kolb's words, they tend to produce "mental and physical lethargy." It has been cogently, if facetiously, suggested that one way to diminish crime would be to induce opium addiction in habitual criminals. Note that Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, in his book Persons in Hiding, finds no occasion to name any narcotic addict among the major criminals whose records he presents.

The narcotics prisoners in the Federal prisons are of two types: (1) smugglers and dope peddlers, most of whom are not drug addicts; (2) addicts who patronized the dope peddler because they had no other possible source of supply or who committed petty thefts to secure money to pay for the drug.

It cannot be too often repeated that there were no narcotics prisoners in Federal prisons until the narcotics authorities misinterpreted the Harrison Act; nor were there any dope smugglers or peddlers. There would be none now if the law were not persistently misread by the narcotics authorities.

TRUTH ABOUT REDUCTION OF NARCOTIC ADDICTION

Reference should be made to another pronouncement of the Narcotics Bureau that is equally misleading and even more ridiculous. This is the assertion that the number of drug addicts in this country has been reduced to an astonishing degree in the past 15 years or so.

This appraisal might be dismissed with the statement that no one else who is entitled to an opinion on the subject pretends to have any accurate knowledge as to how many addicts there were 15 years ago or how many there are now. Perhaps it is worth while, however, to examine the Commissioner's claims in brief detail, because he appears to regard the alleged reduction in the number of addicts as giving strong support to the methods of operation of his Bureau, which we have criticized—and which we continue to criticize.

It happens that two official reports bearing directly on the subject are available: One expressing the opinion of perhaps the foremost authority; the other giving the result of an actual canvas of the addict population of the State of Washington, made officially by another expert who has devoted many years to the study of drug addiction.

The first-mentioned report is in the form of a letter dated February 19, 1940, signed by Dr. Lawrence Kolb, Assistant Surgeon General, Division of Mental Hygiene, of the Public Health Service.

DR. KOLB GIVES HIS OPINION

In this letter, Dr. Kolb quotes the estimate of the Bureau of Narcotics, that there are 1.53 addicts per 10,000 of the population (or about 20,000 addicts all told), and adds that, whereas no survey available is absolutely reliable, "from the information we do have, I am inclined to believe that we still have at least 100,000 addicts to the various opium preparations and cocaine." That would be, at least five times the number estimated by the Narcotics Bureau.

Please note the "at least." Recall, then, that Dr. Kolb's well-known estimate of 1924, which placed the number of opium and cocaine addicts in the country at from 110,000 to 150,000, is the oft-cited basis of official estimates of the addict census of 15 years ago. It is obvious that the Bureau's claim of an 85-percent reduction in addict population in that period has no standing in the eyes of the physician who, because of his long familiarity with the subject and his recent experience in charge of the Federal Narcotic Hospital at Lexington, Ky., may be regarded as the foremost authority in this particular field.

STATISTICS ON NARCOTIC ADDICTION IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON

Our second official report, dealing with addiction in the State of Washington, was made by Mr. Everett G. Hoffman, recently official State investigator, who for many years has been closely associated with the American White Cross Association on Drug Addictions. Mr. Hoffman's report gives names and addresses of about 3,500 drug addicts in the State of Washington who are known to the police officials or to the White Cross authorities. We may fairly assume that there are many other addicts whose names were not listed; but we need not go beyond the actual list for our present purpose—which is, to compare this actual record with the theoretical estimate of the Bureau of Narcotics.

Fortunately for our purpose, it happens that the Bureau, in its report for 1938, lists the 15 States whose addict population "compiled after thorough investigation of every known source of information," furnished the basis for their estimate of the total addict census. Among these States is Washington, which is credited with only 250 addicts, whereas Mr. Hoffman's official report gives names and residences of 3,500, or 14 times the number estimated by the Bureau.

If we assume that the Bureau's estimate of the addict population of the other States was correspondingly defective, the 2,000 addicts, multiplied by 14, become 280,000.

Rather curiously, this estimate of 280,000 is precisely the figure obtained if we assume—as is altogether probable—that the addict population of Washington is just about the same, proportionately, as that of other States; for Washington has about one-eightieth of the total population of the United States, and if we multiply Mr. Hoffman's 3,500 by 80, we have 280,000; the same number arrived at, as we have just seen, by a different channel of reasoning.

It would appear, then, that, so far as the evidence goes, the addict population, instead of being reduced by 80 percent since 1924, has advanced by more than 100 percent—taking the mean of Dr. Kolb's figures for 1924 as the basis; Dr. Kolb's estimate being, in fact, the one cited by the Bureau of Narcotics as basis for its claim of 80-percent reduction.

One may surmise that what really happened in the office of the Commissioner was the chance shifting of a decimal point—changing a conservative estimate of 200,000 addicts to 20,000. Why the Commissioner failed to note the error, and so was led to make his ridiculous statement—spread broadcast as a news item, and even cited by periodicals that pride themselves on accurate presentation of current events—would perhaps be more difficult to explain. Suffice it that this flagrant misrepresentation is of a piece with other pronouncements—as to criminality of addicts, cures of addicts, and so forth—that have come from the Bureau.

WHAT OF THE CURABILITY OF ADDICTS?

As to the matter of the curability of addicts, and false reports as to results attained, something more should be said since this is pertinent to the question of reliability of the Bureau of Narcotics, though not otherwise a subject with which this legislative body has any direct concern.

FEDERAL NARCOTIC TREATMENT HOSPITALS

The reports of the Bureau of Narcotics point with satisfaction to the achievements of the unique State hospital for the treatment of narcotic addicts, at Spadra, Calif., and the Federal hospital, at Lexington, Ky. The impression is given that highly satisfactory results have been attained at Spadra, and that about 34 percent of permanent cures have been effected at Lexington.

The facts are that the institution at Spadra, so far as its main purpose of curing addiction is concerned, is officially conceded to have been an almost complete failure. So large a proportion of the addicts that came before the courts were found to be incurable that the institution was almost never filled to capacity; and the results attained even with the supposedly curable cases, those of recent origin only, were so meager and discouraging that the institution has ceased to be conducted as a narcotics hospital exclusively, and has been officially opened to other types of patients.

THE LEXINGTON (KY.) HOSPITAL

The Federal Hospital at Lexington is magnificently equipped, and conducted by physicians of the finest type and the most ample qualifications, headed until recently by Dr. Lawrence Kolb, whose authoritative work in this field was previously referred to. But the results achieved, as recorded by Dr. Kolb, in the Annual Report of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, are very different indeed from what the references of the Commissioner of Narcotics—who has no official connection with the institution—would imply.

From Dr. Kolb's report we learn that, of the 1,110 prisoner-patients discharged during the year, no fewer than 412 were classed as "cured." But it is instantly made clear that this only means that these patients were not taking drugs when discharged—somewhat as a duck kept in a dry pen is not swimming. And, qualifying the word "cured", we find the curious term "prognosis good", "prognosis guarded", "prognosis poor", and "prognosis very poor."

PHASES OF PROGNOSIS

The word "prognosis", as used by physicians, means, of course, "prospect" or "probability"—good or bad—of outcome of an illness. "Prognosis good": the patient will probably recover. "Prognosis bad": the patient will probably die. But in the present case the usage of the word is altogether exceptional, not to say contradictory. In effect, it implies that the word "cured" is not meant to be taken at face value, because in every case there is a question as to whether the "cured" patient is permanently freed from the drug "habit"—whether the duck, liberated from the pen, may not return to the water.

So great is the doubt in the mind of the hospital physicians that we find only 31 patients among the 412 discharged or conditionally released as cured who are listed as of "good prognosis," which is to say that there is reason to hope that these 31 patients will not return to the use of narcotics. In a second group of 124 probationers, there are 24 of these hope-inspiring cases. A third group of 279 voluntaries—not prisoners—shows 9 hopefuls.

So we have, all told, among the 1,110, a list of 64 patients who, having been forcibly deprived of narcotics for the term of their incarceration, are hoped to be permanently cured. All the others, to the number of 1,037, are classed as of "guarded prognosis" at best—meaning "we do not expect them to make good"—to "prognosis very poor"—meaning "we know they will soon be back on the drug."

Otherwise stated, there are no cases discharged from the hospital—after having all the advantages that the most scientific treatment known can give—who are unequivocally cured, in the proper sense of that word; that is, made well and insured against recurrence of their infirmity; and only a little over one-half of 1 percent—0.57 percent—of those discharged are regarded as having a really good chance of permanent recovery.

Six-tenths of 1 percent is rather different from 34 percent, is it not? Well, that represents the difference between the optimistic appraisal of the layman who conducts the Bureau of Narcotics and the appraisal of the physicians of the United States Public Health Service, who expertly conduct the splendid hospital at Lexington, as to the curability of the disease, narcotic addiction.

Let me repeat that this legislative body has no direct concern with the question of curability of disease to which we have just adverted. What does concern us, however, is the fact that the United States Government in establishing the hospital at Lexington, and a second one at Fort Worth, Tex., as authorized by action of the Congress, recognizes narcotic addiction as a disease, subject to medical treatment. It is perhaps immaterial, but not without interest, that the Supreme Court has explicitly voiced the same view; whereas the Commissioner of Narcotics holds stubbornly to the view that the addict is not a sick man, but a criminal, and by his rulings makes it impossible for the medical profession outside institutions to offer treatment or aid to victims of the officially recognized malady.

NARCOTIC ADDICTION IS A DISEASE TO BE TREATED; NOT A CRIME TO BE EXPIATED BY IMPRISONMENT

That, I say, is the salient fact which is of interest and concern to this legislative body. That anomaly is my excuse for introducing this bill. Questions of the number of addicts, the criminality of addicts, the curability of addicts, are matters for the statistician, the Department of Justice, the medical profession. But the matter of flouting Federal law—the supplanting of statutes enacted by the Congress with rulings of a minor Bureau of the Treasury Department—is something of vital concern.

That the edicts of one man should take precedence over congressional enactments and clear decisions of the Supreme Court is an anomaly worthy of attention.

But does such an anomaly obtain? I answer, unqualifiedly, yes. That is the actual situation which has obtained throughout the 10 years of the existence of the Bureau of Narcotics. One man, the Commissioner in charge of that Bureau, has persistently interpreted the Harrison Special Tax Act, the statute governing the distribution of narcotic drugs, in a way clearly at variance with the terms of the act itself, and in defiance of the interpretation of the Supreme Court of the United States.

THE HARRISON NARCOTIC ACT IS ERRONEOUSLY ADMINISTERED

The Harrison Act provides in set terms that there shall be no interference with the prescribing or distribution of narcotic drugs by physicians to their patients in the course of their professional practice.

The Supreme Court has declared—Linder case decision, unanimous, 1925—that:

> The Harrison Act makes no mention of narcotic addicts or their medical treatment. They are diseased, and proper subjects for such treatment.

Another decision— Nigro case, 1928—declares that the Harrison Act is a tax measure or it is no law at all.

The Linder decision was cited and quoted in the Butler Mills decision of 1936 to the effect that the Federal Government has no control over the practice of a profession.

Let it be recalled that the Linder case decision, thus cited as basic law, was rendered—unanimously—in reversing a Federal court conviction of a physician for alleged violation of the Harrison Act—the alleged crime consisting in the dispensing to an addict patient of tablets of narcotic drugs—morphine and cocaine.

The Supreme Court decision explicitly affirmed the right of a physician to treat the narcotic-addict patient—"they are diseased and proper subjects for medical treatment"—at the same time declaring that Federal law has no control over the practice of medicine—this being solely a State function—and that if it were assumed that the Harrison Act was designed to exercise such control the act would be invalid and could not be enforced.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION MENACED

No language could be more unequivocal. Yet the narcotics authorities—the Assistant Prohibition Commissioner, followed by the Commissioner of Narcotics—have persistently flouted these decisions, and, in the name of law, controlled the practice of medicine, as to the administration of narcotic medicines, so effectively that today no physician who has any regard for his own safety dares to accept a narcotics addict as a patient or to attempt to treat the malady for the treatment of which the United States Government has established the hospitals already referred to.

Incidentally, it may be noted that the two Government hospitals have a capacity of about 2,000 patients—1 in 50 of the addict population by Dr. Kolb's minimum estimate. Since a year is a minimum period for institution treatment, 50 years would be required to handle the present coterie of addicts, even if cures were 100 percent instead of a fraction of 1 percent. The province of these hospitals is to make scientific study of the disease narcotoxia—drug addiction—and to make results known to the medical profession, in whose hands, in the nature of the case, the treatment and attempted cure of this malady must rest.

This function of the Federal hospitals—commonly referred to as narcotic farm hospitals—is explicitly recognized in the terms of the congressional act—Porter bill, 1928—which provided for their establishment.

But of what avail is this provision if the medical profession is denied the right to receive narcotic addicts as patients and treat them by the only known method—reduction and substitution—that gives any hope of success?

THE STATUS OF PHYSICIANS AND NARCOTIC ADDICTS

There was a time when physicians were permitted to treat the victims of narcotics-addiction disease just as they treated the victims of tuberculosis, syphilis, diabetes, or any other malady. But for 20 years this right has been absolutely denied the medical profession—not by law but by bureaucratic edict; with the result that the present generation of physicians has, for the most part, no practical knowledge of the malady and no opportunity to acquire such knowledge.

During the 10-year regime of the Commissioner of Narcotics upward of 10,000 physicians, legally qualified to practice their profession, have been "reported for criminal violation" of the Harrison Act, their crime being the prescribing or administration of the most indispensable of all medicinal agents to persons suffering from a malady for which the Federal Government provides hospitals, and which the Supreme Court declares a proper subject for medical attention.

A large proportion of the physicians thus arraigned have been persuaded to purchase immunity from prosecution, though charged with a felony; but upward of 1,000 have been indicted, haled to court, and prosecuted with all the cunning that years of experience have developed for the narcotics authorities and made available for United States attorneys, who gain credit and prestige directly in proportion to their record of convictions attained.

CERTAIN DOCTORS SINGLED OUT

So helpless have been the arraigned physicians—and so ignorant of the law and of Supreme Court decisions their lawyers—that conviction has been almost a foregone conclusion, for all physicians who were foolish enough to decline to be legally blackmailed—for the law permits the farcical tribute-paying. And the mandatory penalty provided by law is either fine, up to $2,000 on each count, or imprisonment, up to 5 years, or both.

I could name you a physician of my State who is today serving a 9-year sentence in a Federal penitentiary—coupled with a $10,000 fine; whose crime was the administration of hypodermic injections to two patients in his office, in precise accordance with the earlier decision of a Federal judge that any person who came to a physician's office for treatment is ipso facto, a patient, and that a physician is entitled to treat a narcotic addict, according to his own best judgment, precisely as he treats any other patient.

Just what influenced the Federal judge who made the decision just quoted, to reverse himself subsequently, sustain a grotesque jury verdict, and pronounce the incredible sentence of $10,000 fine and 9 years imprisonment—for doing what the jurist had declared legally permissible—just what led to this volte face is a question that might well be given consideration in the course of the congressional inquiry which I am advocating.

THE CASE OF THE LOS ANGELES CLINIC

Another subject that I wish to propose in the same connection is the cause celebre which the Commissioner of Narcotics is quoted as declaring to be the most important case that ever came before the Federal narcotics authorities, namely, the case against a very distinguished physician of Los Angeles, the purpose of which was to close the narcotics clinic conducted at the Los Angeles County Hospital, under auspices of the county medical association and the local board of health.

I shall not claim time here to give any details of this celebrated case. Let me say merely that the trial lasted 6 weeks—followed by 7 weeks of further consideration—and resulted in the most incredible verdict perhaps ever rendered in a court of alleged justice; a verdict pronouncing a distinguished psychiatrist guilty of violation of the Harrison Act, when his sole act in connection with the case was the examination in his office of a patient sent him in consultation.

The specific count on which he was convicted charged the writing of a certain prescription. Yet the jury that rendered the verdict had in their hands the prescription in question, signed by another physician, and it had been stipulated by the prosecution in the course of the trial that this prescription had never been seen or heard of by the clinic physician until it appeared in court; it also stipulated that this accused physician had neither prescribed nor administered any treatment whatsoever in connection with the case.

Such a verdict seems incredible. But even more incredible is the fact that the Federal judge sustained the verdict after 7 weeks of debate, though he himself had declared in open court at the moment the verdict was presented that it was of very doubtful legality.

The judge had previously declared in court, but not before the jury, at the close of the presentation of evidence that no case had been made out against the clinic physician; yet he later effectively charged the jury to convict. He refused a mistrial when the prosecuting Federal attorney caused publication of false statements issuing from the Bureau of Narcotics in a newspaper—scareheaded across the front page—that came into the hands of the jurors. And he subsequently connived at delay in filing of appeal papers, in contravention of rules of the Supreme Court, and thus prevented the appellate division from reviewing the case.

This is but the barest outline of the misconduct of a case designed to overthrow a benevolent and beneficent clinic, the closing of which would, of necessity, throw a group of patients back into the hands of the dope peddlers and restore the illicit traffic worth millions of dollars to the racketeers.

In concluding this discussion, I would call attention to the charges made in the earlier discussion—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 28, 1938—where it was stated that the Commissioner of Narcotics is the costliest man in the world, and that the narcotics racket, unconsciously encouraged by his attitude, costs the country at least a billion dollars a year.

THERE'S NEED FOR AN INVESTIGATION

The present discussion merely presents other aspects of the same problem, leaving many salient aspects unnoticed. But enough has been said to make it clear, I hope, that the bill as presented does not contemplate a mere investigation of the number of drug addicts; nor such puerilities as the question of the addict's medical status. What it does contemplate is an investigation of the conduct of the Commissioner of Narcotics; his alleged disregard of statutes and Supreme Court decisions; his relation to the illegal arraignment of physicians, on the one hand, and to the colossal narcotics racket, on the other; in a word, the investigation of the origin, development, and continuance of a billion-dollar racket, which would disappear almost overnight if the Federal narcotic laws were permitted to function as they were designed to function, and as the Supreme Court declares they should function.

Lest the validity of the closing statement—that the racket would disappear if the law were permitted to function—be questioned, let me ask a simple question: Would there be any market for illicit drugs if the drug addict were permitted to receive what he needs, legitimately, under proper limitations, and at negligible cost?

END THIS RACKET NOW

The question answers itself. If, then, the medical profession were permitted to treat drug addiction—as syphilis, diabetes, tuberculosis, and the rest are treated—no single addict would go to a dope peddler, and the billion-dollar racket of smuggler and peddler would be eliminated. It was precisely because the clinic of the county medical association at Los Angeles was giving an object lesson in the possibility of suppressing the drug racket, while at the same time accomplishing a humanitarian purpose, that the narcotics authorities stepped in to close the clinic—by unfair means, since they knew that they had no legal right to interfere in any way.

Why the Federal narcotics authorities are eager thus to support the racketeers, in contravention of law and humanity, is, essentially, the gist of the question that the proposed congressional investigation would seek to have answered.

An investigation that failed to probe this matter would be merely farcical. The problem for investigation is not a problem of drug addiction, as such; but of the ascribed illegalities of a bureau that has persecuted drug addicts and the physicians who have dared to solace them.

If such persecution has not been instituted and conducted in the interests of the dope smugglers and peddlers, it is for the commissioner to make clear what has been the motivation of his baleful activities.

Please, Mr. Willkie, Quit Misrepresenting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in the making of rash and unsupportable statements, Mr. Wendell Willkie, Power Trust candidate on the Republican ticket, is going from bad to worse.

He is naively trying to impress the country with the idea that President Roosevelt knows very, very little about foreign affairs, but that he, Mr. Willkie, knows all about them. Therefore, forsooth, Candidate Willkie blandly asks the voters to move Mr. Roosevelt out of the White House so he may move in.

Informed people cannot help but wonder where Mr. Willkie is obtaining this supernatural knowledge of foreign affairs which he would have the people believe is so superior to that of the President. For the latter has been kept fully and constantly advised by hundreds of honest, upstanding diplomatic and consular officers who report almost daily to him from the capitals of every country in the world.

CANDIDATE WILLKIE TOO BUSY A MAN TO KNOW MUCH ABOUT FOREIGN RELATIONS

I, myself, am one of the skeptical ones. For I know that for years Mr. Willkie has been a very busy man, what with fighting labor, manipulating stock markets, managing billion-dollar public-utility corporations, watering stock, fighting Congress and the Securities and Exchange Commission in Washington, and with raising millions to bring about his nomination at Philadelphia. And still more recently with his day and night conferences with Republican leaders and Wall Street interests trying to devise ways and means to have himself elected President of the United States.

WILLKIE'S STATEMENTS SO WILD AND UNTRUE SECRETARY OF STATE HULL HIMSELF FELT OBLIGED TO ANSWER

Mr. Willkie's misrepresentations have gotten increasingly worse and more reckless. At Joliet he declared that President Roosevelt had "telephoned" Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini "and urged them to sell Czechoslovakia down the river." This statement was so palpably a blunder that Willkie's own press secretary felt obliged to issue a statement to the effect that the Republican candidate had not intended to say what he did say, but had meant to say something else. Willkie's misrepresentation was so glaringly incorrect that Secretary of State Cordell Hull, who seldom engages in political riposte, felt compelled to issue a statement in which he said that Willkie had made it "evident that he is grossly ignorant of the history of the last few years," and continued:

> The President has never communicated by telephone with either Premier Mussolini or Chancelor Hitler. All the President has ever urged upon the nations involved has been in accordance with the provisions of the Kellogg Pact which provides for pacific solution of controversies as they arise.

EQUAL STATUS URGED

In September 1938 he specifically urged in messages made public immediately that a peaceful solution be found through negotiations in which all the nations involved be represented, including Czechoslovakia, and that such negotiations be undertaken by all nations on an equal basis with none of them under the threat of aggression.

Mr. Speaker, from conversations I had with the President myself before and during the Munich Conference I know personally from first-hand knowledge that he did as much as anyone could have done without involving this Nation in war to save the independence and liberties of Czechoslovakia, Poland, and all of the other nations that were subsequently overrun and destroyed by the Nazis.

TRUTH DOES NOT BOTHER UTILITY CANDIDATE IN THE SLIGHTEST

Mr. Speaker, from the very first Mr. Willkie has persistently, shamelessly, yes, and knowingly, misrepresented the true facts about the ever-increasing rise of prosperity, production, profits, and employment under the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Let me cite just a few of the score of such incidents.

At Coffeyville, Kans., September 16 he declared the President was incompetent "to deal with American industry" and charged that "in 7 years of accumulating power he could not make one man a job."

In an article in Printer's Ink he charged the administration had "hampered the functioning of industry." In accepting the Republican nomination August 17, he said:

> For the first time in our history American industry has remained stationary for a decade. * * * As a Nation of producers we have become stagnant.

At a banquet in New York, attended by the publishers of the country's richest newspapers, he again attacked the administration and declared it had "drained the vitality and confidence from industry." About the same time, addressing a Republican gathering at Somerville, N. J., the Republican nominee still again repeated the charge that the New Deal had "thwarted the energies of private enterprise" and "stopped the wheels of industry."

I arise, Mr. Speaker, to denounce each and every one of these statements as entirely inaccurate, maliciously untrue, and as unworthy of a candidate for the great office of the Presidency. I here and now challenge Mr. Willkie to keep on repeating these same unadulterated misrepresentations in every speech he makes from now until election day. If he does, a mass of facts to the contrary will make him appear in the end the sorriest-looking Presidential candidate any political party ever placed before the American people. His reckless and wholly unjustified exaggerations will snow him under.

FACTS, NOT LIES

Practically every line of business in this country is today, and was at the time these reckless and untrue statements were made, more prosperous than ever before. Increased production, increased business, increased net earnings, increased employment, and increased social security is the true story of the accomplishments of the 7-year Roosevelt administration, and it is a record that neither Candidate Willkie nor any of his followers will be able to erase from the American mind. A boom that will smash all records lies ahead for American industry.

In the last 2 weeks I have come across the following actual headlines, and hundreds of similar ones, in such strongly prejudiced Republican newspapers as the Tribune and Wall Street Journal, and such fair, impartial, and accurate independent dailies as the Christian Science Monitor of Boston:

> Car loadings rise 13.7 percent for a new high.
> Jobs upswing sets high for year—Largest steel output since 1929 is forecast.
> Cash farm income above same month in 1939—Net profits of 100 largest manufacturers up an average of 60 percent.
> General Electric reports big sales jump.
> Construction awards up sharply in July.
> Chrysler has biggest sales week in history.
> Employment up 1,000,000 over 1939.

Mr. Speaker, the foregoing headlines, all copied by me verbatim from the journals indicated, tell their own story of Roosevelt prosperity beyond the ability of any and all Republican spellbinders in this campaign successfully to deny.

ALL BUSINESS WAS HANGING ON THE ROPES WHEN ROOSEVELT TOOK OVER

Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary to recall to this House, for every Member knows it as well as I do that when Franklin D. Roosevelt was sworn in as President on March 4, 1933, every form of business enterprise in the United States was at the lowest ebb in history. The tide changed for the better with the very beginning of the new administration.

Prosperity is no longer "just around the corner." It is here, in the United States, now, today. Note, for instance, this Associated Press dispatch appearing in the Washington Star:

THREE HUNDRED COMPANIES REVEAL EARNINGS UP 37 PERCENT

NEW YORK.—Profits of the first 300 companies to report for the second quarter of 1940 were 37 percent greater than a year ago.

The gain was made in the face of increased taxes for defense purposes, and despite the fact that most leading corporations charged added taxes for the entire first half of the year against April-May-June earnings.

INCREASED EARNINGS OF AMERICAN BUSINESS UNDER ROOSEVELT

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the fairest way of judging what this administration has accomplished for business is by comparing earnings of American businesses for the first 6 months of 1933 with those for the first 6 months of 1940. This I shall do. I hardly expect that Mr. Willkie or any other Republican orator in this campaign will read this table to an audience of American voters, although any or all are quite welcome to do so, I assure them:

	Net profits for first 6 months, 1933	Net profits for first 6 months, 1940	Percent increase
General Electric	$5,953,695	$25,871,572	334
United Fruit	5,073,000	9,379,000	85
Republic Steel Co	2,929,019	6,449,453	120
Atlantic Refining Co	1,002,000	5,266,000	425
Libby-Owens-Ford Glass	2,157,083	5,176,748	140
Caterpillar Tractor	470,765	3,509,514	646
American Brake Shoe & Foundry Co	241,486	1,266,636	425
Beech Nut Packing Co	744,487	1,461,018	96
Kimberly-Clark Corporation	311,511	1,373,651	340
Container Corporation of America	240,177	1,128,735	369
Hanna (M. A.) Co	394,909	1,104,307	179
Eaton Manufacturing Co	31,253	1,908,348	6,054
Borg-Warner Corporation	335,172	2,830,983	747
General Cigar	441,058	574,068	30

American industry, Mr. Willkie, is neither "drained," "thwarted," "stagnant," nor in any manner in the doldrums, as you have been asserting in your speeches, and you know it better than anyone else. It was, however, all those things under Herbert Hoover in 1932, as you also know, but it is not today under Franklin Roosevelt. Therefore, please, Mr. Willkie, stop misrepresenting.

INCREASED PROSPERITY WAS HERE LONG BEFORE OUTBREAK OF EUROPEAN WAR

The above concerns are not principally "war babies." They embrace, in fact, nearly every type of industry from cigars to fruit, confectionery, glass, hardware, notions, to the heaviest construction steel. But the first hue and cry that the people may expect to be raised in rebuttal by the always-prejudiced Wall Street financial wolves and the always-biased Republican orators, none of whom have even been willing to accord the Roosevelt administration due credit for any of the good that it has accomplished, will be falsely to claim that the increases revealed in the foregoing table are due to recent war profits exclusively. This is absolutely erroneous.

The fact of the matter is, there has been a gradual and constant increase in net profits throughout the 7 years of the Roosevelt administration. Take the Caterpillar Tractor Corporation, for instance: The above table shows that the increase in net profits of this organization for the first 6 months of 1940 as compared with the first 6 months of 1933 is 646 percent. The first thought of the Republican campaign managers will be to allege that this tremendous increase is due entirely to European war profits. That this is not so may easily be demonstrated by the fact that the increase in the earnings of this corporation for the first 6 months of 1940 over the first 6 months of 1939, amounted to but 51 percent. The other 595 percent of the 646-percent total increase since this administration has been in power was the accumulation of increases during the 6 years previous to 1939, when there was no European war. So much for that.

SMALL BUSINESSES HAVE PROFITED AS WELL AS LARGE

Though I have thus far referred to the increased net profits of only 300 corporations, the facts are that they represent in like proportion or percentage the profits of 98 percent of the smaller businessmen and manufacturers of the Nation. The stocks of the small manufacturer or businessman are not listed on any exchange and the Wall Street Journal and the prominent financial writers do not take the time to compile and tabulate the profits of the smaller corporations and companies. But I know hundreds of the smaller manufacturers and businessmen, wholesale and retail, who have stated to me that their business is steadily increasing.

REASONS WHY THE MAN NOW IN THE WHITE HOUSE SHOULD BE REELECTED

Mr. Speaker, permit me now to cite some more comparisons between the old deal and the New Deal:

Dividends received by individuals—1932, under Hoover, $2,745,000,000; 1939, under Roosevelt, $4,253,000,000; gain under the New Deal, 55 percent.

Cash farm income—1932, under Hoover, $4,682,000,000; 1939, under Roosevelt, $8,519,000,000, which includes Federal benefit payments of $807,000,000; gain, 82 percent.

Exports—1932, under Hoover, $1,611,000,000; 1939, under Roosevelt, $3,179,000,000; gain, 97 percent.

Wages and salaries—December, 1932, under Hoover, $2,403,000,000; December 1939, under Roosevelt, $3,888,000,000; gain, 62 percent.

Nonagricultural employment—1932, under Hoover, 27,245,000; 1939, under Roosevelt, 34,940,000, exclusive of about 3,000,000 taken care of by the C. C. C., W. P. A., and N. Y. A., which properly should be added to the 1939 figure; gain, 28 percent.

National income—1932, under Hoover, $40,000,000,000; 1939, under Roosevelt, $68,000,000,000. I predict that for 1940 the national income will reach, if indeed it does not exceed, $90,000,000,000; gain, 70 percent.

Weekly pay rolls of factory workers—December 1932, under Hoover, $80,000,000; December 1939, under Roosevelt, $197,000,000; gain under Roosevelt, 146 percent.

Production index (by Federal Reserve Board)—1932 average, under Hoover, 64; 1939 average, under Roosevelt, 105; gain, 64 percent.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit to each and every American voter that even the most rabid Republican has no right justly to complain about the achievements of President Roosevelt in the face of a record like the above.

TOM GIRDLER'S NOTORIOUS REPUBLIC STEEL REPORTS A 495-PERCENT INCREASE OF NET PROFITS

Mr. Speaker, practically all lines of American industry report increased business, increased employment, and increased profits. The average increase of net profits of 100 leading American corporations for the first 6 months of 1940 over the first 6 months of 1939 reaches the astounding figure of 60.5 percent. The very corporations whose officials have been most critical of the New Deal have made the largest profits. For instance, the increase of net profits of the Republic Steel Co. in the period above indicated was $6,449,453 for 1940 as against $1,083,311 for 1939—an increase of 495 percent. Yet Tom Girdler, the president of Republic Steel, has been denouncing the Roosevelt administration with a venom and bitterness that has not been equaled by any other critic.

Throughout the Roosevelt administration the cry of Wall Street men like Mr. Willkie has been: "Unshackle us. You have us tied hand and foot. Remove the fetters that are holding us stagnant and we will show you what we can do." A hundred times—yes, a thousand times—in the last 7 years I have heard the same cry go up on the floor of this House from the spokesmen here for the great industrialists of the Nation. One might imagine from all this wholly unjustified criticism and misrepresentation that the great overlords of American industry had been bound, gagged, and hog-tied in cellars for the last 7 years. But the tremendous increases revealed in the above table indicate otherwise. Rescued practically from bankruptcy which faced all of them at the conclusion of the Hoover administration, the big manufacturers who are now endeavoring to substitute Mr. Willkie for the man who saved them have made, and are today making, greater profits under this administration than they have ever made. If Tom Girdler is not satisfied with an increased net profit of 495 percent, one cannot help but wonder how much increased profit he would really require in order to be completely satisfied and quit kicking.

TOM GIRDLER AND ERNEST WEIR WORST OPPRESSORS OF LABOR IN AMERICA

Mr. Speaker, let us now turn our attention to another side of this picture, revealing an even more sordid, greedy, and unforgivable view of the men who are fighting our President, and whose insatiable appetite for profits and ever still more profits seems to have no bounds of decency.

Have these great tycoons of industry been willing fairly to share their enormously increased net earnings with their workers? They have not. Not only that, but they have fought and maligned the President and this Congress for every high-minded piece of relief and social-security legislation that we have endeavored to enact into law for the benefit of the working class and the needy.

I do not intend to mince words as to exactly whom I have in mind. I am referring to the two most vicious oppressors of labor in America—Tom Girdler, president of Republic Steel, and Ernest T. Weir, of Weirton Steel. The latter, by the way, is chairman of the Republican Finance Committee, and is now engaged in raising a huge campaign fund for Mr. Willkie. The National Labor Relations Board has, after long and careful investigation, found these notorious labor haters guilty of using espionage, propaganda, and spies in their brutal effort to create wholesale terror among their employees. But their attempt either to coerce or purchase the labor vote for Mr. Willkie will be in vain.

WHY UTILITY AND POWER CORPORATIONS ARE BACKING WILLKIE

Mr. Speaker, the Republican candidate, Mr. Willkie, will not want for campaign funds. Every important utility and power corporation in the United States as well as every other form of big business is backing him to the limit. He has been connected with big corporations all his adult life. He left the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. in Akron, Ohio, to go with a firm of local corporation lawyers.

In recognition of his great service as chief labor "trouble shooter" for various power, utility, and other corporations from 1917 to 1926, the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation took him over. This corporation controlled the Alabama Power Co., the Georgia Power Co., and many others, of which Mr. Cobb, of the Hodenpyle, Hardy Co., was the controlling figure.

When the ambitious Mr. Willkie landed in New York on the morning of November 4, 1929, to become counsel and later president of Commonwealth, he looked about the imposing Grand Central Station and, much impressed by its richness and grandeur, is credited with having turned to his wife with the comment:

Hell, mother, we'll take this town like Grant took Richmond.

No doubt he figures on taking the Presidency in the same stride.

Immediately he became popular among the sharps of Wall Street and the stock exchange and was soon hailed as one of the bright boys of the house of Morgan.

The specialty of these gentlemen who took him to their hearts is watering stock, scattering holdings, and corrupting public officials. Theirs is the most crooked form of gambling ever devised. The use of marked decks and loaded dice is a commonplace. Millions of investors, large and small, have been robbed of their life savings through the machinations of this gentry.

Among the outstanding villains in the history of America's greatest stock-market swindles were Howard C. Hopson, head of the Associated Gas & Electric, Samuel Insull, and a few others. The country cannot have forgotten the vicious and corrupt fight against the so-called Holding Company Act that was waged right here in Washington by this unscrupulous group, affiliated with whom, but from behind the scenes, was this same man, Mr. Willkie, now the Republican candidate for the Presidency of the United States. A Senate committee headed by Senator Black, of Alabama, now a member of the United States Supreme Court, developed testimony concerning the Hopson crowd that shocked the Nation. Hopson admitted having spent $2,000,000 of the Associated stockholders' money alone, and this without their knowledge or authorization, to bring about the defeat of the so-called death-sentence feature of the Holding Company Act. Mr. Willkie, by the way, has been given credit in Wall Street as having been the shrewd author of the catchy phrase, "death sentence."

The bill was eventually passed. Has it destroyed any company? The fact is the power companies are still increasing their business and making enormous profits, far more than they should, due to the fact they were able to weaken certain provisions of the bill.

WHY WILLKIE TURNED AGAINST THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Willkie was terribly angered by the action of the Securities and Exchange Commission in enforcing the law. This is one of the reasons why he turned against the New Deal, the reason that in this campaign the great utility corporations will leave no stone unturned to get Mr. Roosevelt out of the White House and to put their fellow operator and comrade, Mr. Willkie, in. He pretends to believe the Roosevelt administration sought to strangle liberty through the S. E. C., but all the S. E. C. wanted to strangle was the power of the Willkie-Insull-Hopson crowd and their kind to make wildcat investments with other people's money.

Another thing that made Mr. Willkie angry was the fact that the Government's T. V. A. power plant came into competition with some of his Commonwealth & Southern properties. But he got even there, for he managed to extract from the Government for some of the properties of which he was nominally the president $78,000,000 in cold cash, which was a good many millions more than they were actually worth.

The national income for 1939 was $69,000,000,000, and for this year promises to be $90,000,000,000. Mr. Willkie is telling around that if a Republican can be elected—meaning himself—it ought to reach $125,000,000,000. But his party did not make a very good record when last in power. In 1932 Mr. Hoover, try as he would, could not get the national income above $40,000,000,000.

WHY ONE COLUMNIST WILL "SUPPORT" WENDELL WILLKIE

Jack Raper, famous columnist of the Cleveland Press, has the following to say on the subject of Mr. Willkie's candidacy:

We believe we'll back Wendell Willkie, supermagnate of utilities, for President. Willkie helped organize, and is president of, the Commonwealth & Southern, which has outstanding 33,673,328 shares of common stock, more than twice as much as any other utility holding company.

In 1929 it sold as high as $30.50 a share, a total value of $1,037,036,504. Today (about the 1st of June) it is selling at around 75 cents a share, a loss to common-stock holders of $999,531,508.

Unless you can show us where there has been a bigger and a better loss, we will stand by Willkie. He's the man to restore confidence and make America safe for "free enterprise."

CANDIDATE WILLKIE'S OATH OF ALLEGIANCE TO PUBLIC UTILITIES PRIVATELY OWNED"

Mr. Speaker, the Republican Presidential candidate is interested in one subject above everything else on earth, and that is "public utilities privately owned." It is his hobby, his passion, his everything. He has said so himself, many, many times, not as a candidate for the Presidency, of course, but most often in secluded banquet halls of New York's great hotels, with fellow rich men, power magnates, great utility moguls, big stockholders, investment brokers, bankers, as his enthusiatic, wildly applauding listeners.

Yes; Mr. Willkie assured these sympathetic friends that he considers service to the cause of "public utilities privately owned" as on a par in patriotism with service in a foreign war or any other ultrapatriotic or high-minded endeavor.

In an address now suppressed for the duration of the campaign, before a joint meeting of the Economic Club of New York City and the Harvard Business School Club on January 31, 1935, Mr. Willkie—probably with little thought then he would ever be a candidate for the Presidency—poured forth his very soul on the subject of "public utilities privately owned." Here is the drift of it:

> They seek to paint us who represent private enterprise in the utility business as antisocial, unpatriotic, and the despoilers of men. * * *
> I do not like to make personal references, but I want to say to you that no duty has ever come to me in my life, even that in the service of my country, which has so appealed to my senses of social obligation, patriotism, and love of mankind as this, my obligation to say and do what I can for the preservation of public utilities privately owned.
> All that I have observed, all that I know, and all that I read teaches me that I could do nothing nobler for the future financial stability and political good of my country or the social and economic well-being of my fellow citizens than to stand firm and unafraid against this foolish fad and fancy of the moment.

Mr. Speaker, this being the state of Mr. Willkie's mind, one cannot help but wonder whether, if he were to become President, he would be found on the side of his beloved "public utilities privately owned" or on the side of the gas and electric consumers and the taxpayers of the United States.

Millions of robbed depositors and overcharged gas and electric consumers viewed Sam Insull as the greatest scoundrel that ever trod shoe leather. But Wendell Willkie, as stated by him in this same soon-to-be-famous economic club speech, saw him only as a "forceful, dynamic, and attractive figure."

POWER TRUST INTERESTS HATCHED PLOT TO NOMINATE WILLKIE NEARLY 2 YEARS AGO

The story that went out to the country from the Philadelphia convention to the effect that Willkie was nominated as the result of the spontaneous popular demand of the Nation was all hooey. The Power Trust had been planning to "put him over" for more than a year and a half. If anyone doubts this he has only to refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 23, 1939. As far back as that date the gentleman from Mississippi, Congressman JOHN E. RANKIN, tried and true friend of electric consumers, and worthy foe of the Power Trust for many, many years, in a speech on the floor of the House, exposed the hatching of the plot to bring about the nomination of Willkie for President. He said, in part:

> Mr. Speaker, from the press reports we learn that there is a new candidate for President on the Republican ticket, Mr. Wendell L. Willkie, president of the Commonwealth & Southern, who has been referred to as the fashion plate of the Power Trust.
> Of course, if he is nominated, little will be said by the Republican press about his connection with the utilities. He will probably be heralded as a friend of the farmer—the farmers' candidate.
> There is one thing about it if he should be nominated and elected, the country would then have a President who can teach the American farmers how to water the stock and shear the sheep. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this Power Trust that groomed, nominated, and is now running Wendell Willkie for President is the most ruthless and the most corrupt combination of wealth and power this country has ever known. It is the greatest racket of modern times. It is collecting in overcharges right now more than $1,000,000,000 a year in tribute from the light and power consumers of the Nation.

DISASTER FACED THE NATION WHEN ROOSEVELT TOOK OFFICE IN 1933

In order to further bring home just what President Roosevelt has accomplished for the country, I desire here to review, very briefly, the terrible conditions that existed when he took office on March 4, 1933. Most of the banks were closed or insolvent. Life and other insurance companies were also insolvent. There was despair in every face. Insane asylums were overcrowded. Men, women, and children throughout the Nation were undernourished, without necessary clothing, one-half the population poorly housed. Thousands upon thousands were living in dugouts and shacks on the city dumps; soup kitchens and bread lines were everywhere. All these poor were utterly ignored by Hoover. All he could say was: "Prosperity is just around the corner."

Business was hanging on the ropes; 75 percent of factories closed; those still open working but 2 or 3 days a week; wages as low as $1 a day. Vagrants in large cities asked to be arrested so they could get something to eat and keep from freezing, but had to be refused because jails were filled to overflowing. World War veterans, half frozen, standing on the street corners at Christmas time selling apples at 5 cents apiece to save themselves from starvation.

Such were the terrible conditions existing on March 4, 1933, which Mr. Willkie and his corps of shrewd Republican campaign managers are now conspiring to have the American people forget. But, in spite of their efforts, millions upon millions will remember that President Roosevelt kept his New Deal promise of seeing to it that hereafter no person in this rich Nation shall starve for the want of food nor freeze for the lack of clothing, heat, and shelter.

REEMPLOYMENT GOING UP AND UP AND UP, UNEMPLOYMENT DOWN

When Mr. Roosevelt took over, 16,000,000 to 18,000,000 were unemployed. Ten million of these have been reabsorbed, either by industry or C. C. C., W. P. A., and N. Y. A. There are today 1,100,000 more persons employed in private industry alone than a year ago, and more and more are being employed daily, not at starvation wages as under the Hoover administration, but at better wages and under improved working conditions.

During June, for example, 235,000 unemployed workers found jobs in the nonagricultural industries. This is a favorable development, since factory employment usually declines in that month. The steel industry took on 25,000 additional workers; electrical machinery, 3,000; woolen producers, 7,000; clothing trades, 7,600. In some lines the increased employment for June, as compared with the same month of 1937, ran as high as 58 percent, and is still going up with every passing month.

And yet Candidate Willkie, in his Coffeyville, Kans., speech had the audacity to say of President Roosevelt that "in 7 years of accumulating power he could not make one man a job." How can the people, in view of this rank falsehood, believe anything whatever that the Republican candidate may say?

WE MAY BE IN THE GRAVEST OF DANGER

Mr. Speaker, this raving madman Hitler may conceivably win the war. It may be hard for us to envisage such an atrocious calamity, but we would not be intelligent men or intelligent and patriotic legislators, in the knowledge that the fate of 130,000,000 people rests in our hands, if we fail to look the facts in the face.

Consider the tragic situation of the British nation. Hitler has his dagger, already crimson red with the blood of 10 murdered nations, pointed at the very heart of England. At this very hour he is saying to Great Britain, "Surrender, or I will destroy your cities and blow your helpless civilians, even your women and children, to eternity." And there is not the slightest doubt in the world but that he would do it. If Great Britain does not get help—and we are the only nation that can give it—it would not be inconceivable if in the end England would be forced to surrender.

WHY AMERICA SHOULD AID GREAT BRITAIN

That is the explanation of why the nations that have already given in, did so, one after another. Mr. Speaker, I hate to concede that armed strength alone controls the destinies of nations. It is contrary to all my life-long hopes and convictions. For, until the last 4 or 5 years, I have been against big armies and big navies—a pacifist. I have believed that love and righteousness and square dealing were stronger and more lasting than sheer military power. But in the light of what we have witnessed in Europe in the last 2 years, I have been obliged to surrender all these feelings and convictions, and it has not been easy for me, but hard, very hard. However, I have been finally forced to the conclusion that Napoleon—or whoever it was—had something, right or wrong, when he said "God is on the side of the army that has the most cannon." I reluctantly yield to this view, and want this country to get on the side of the most cannon, the most bombers, the most battleships, and to get on that side just as quickly as it is possible to do so. I am in favor of giving Great Britain all the planes, munitions, and help that we can—everything under the sun save men.

Shall we, can we, trust Hitler and make the mistake that Chamberlain made, and now regrets? No, no, no. God forbid.

THIS NATION IS WORTH SPENDING ANY AMOUNT OF MONEY TO PERPETUATE FOR POSTERITY

It is quite true that this Democratic Congress has appropriated a lot of money, but it was necessary to do so to save the Nation when in 1932 and 1933 it was on the very verge of revolution and disaster. But we have appropriated it for a country that is worth spending any sum whatsoever to save. This country, our own United States of America, is the last bulwark of real democracy in a world controlled by dictators bent on destroying every remaining nation that dares to stand for the principle of government of the people, by the people, for the people. Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin, and the Japanese war lords do not want peoples to control their own governments through ballot boxes because they want to control them all themselves—for themselves—through coercion backed by swords and cannon, bombs and bombers.

But while we have spent a large sum of money, I defy anyone to show that it has not been disbursed efficiently, or that the taxpayers have not received their money's worth in the form of a country that is a far better and safer place in which to live as the result of these expenditures under the administration of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

How, and for what purposes, have we appropriated these vast sums? The people have a perfect right to know. Speaking for myself, I am glad to tell them, for I am proud of this administration, this Congress, and the things we have tried, with the executive and legislative branches working in unity and cooperation, to accomplish for the people of the United States.

First of all, let me say that a very large part of the appropriations have been, or will be, expended in a preparedness program aimed at making this country safe from attack from any quarter. We do not positively know that we will be attacked; of course we all hope we will not be, but it would be criminal, if not actually treasonable, for us under existing circumstances to take any chances. Preparedness appropriations are unavoidable; we have no alternative.

Secondly, we have felt obliged to spend generously of the public funds to feed and house those deserving poor and needy among us that this rich Nation simply cannot ignore and permit to starve or freeze.

THE AMERICAN YOUTH DESERVE A HELPING HAND FROM UNCLE SAM

A third thing we have done, and I am especially proud of this, is to take care of millions of our youth through the Civilian Conservation Corps and the National Youth Administration. When the young reach an age where they feel that life owes them the right and opportunity to work to sustain themselves, to make their own way in the world on their own, and are everywhere turned down, they present the most pathetic of figures. No one may blame them if at last they become discouraged, hopeless, and in the end perhaps even vengeful toward the state of affairs, and the Government that permits it. Since no one else will do it, the National Government must go to their assistance. So here again, as in the matter of preparedness and relief, we have no alternative. Having been born into the world, our poorest youth have, as well as the rich, the right to live, and therefore the right to look to the Government for a helping hand. So long as I remain in Congress I shall vote to give it to them in every practical and feasible way. I do not want, of course, to put them on doles, merely to help them help themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to state that the C. C. C. is at least one New Deal agency that has never been criticized. Here is a record of C. C. C. accomplishments that speaks for itself, and what father or mother in this broad land will not be as proud of it as I am:

Two million five hundred thousand American boys or young men enrolled.

Five hundred and ninety-three million dollars sent home by enrollees to needy dependents.

One billion eight hundred and sixteen million trees planted.

One hundred and thirteen thousand miles of truck trails or minor roads built.

Forty-three thousand bridges built.

Seventy-eight thousand miles of telephone lines constructed.

Five million six hundred and one thousand and fifty-six man-days spent fighting forest fires.

Five million two hundred thousand erosion-control check dams built.

Three million six hundred and twenty-five acres of forest stands improved to aid growth.

Some people are under the impression the C. C. C. is under Army management. This is not the case. President Roosevelt picked as its head Robert Fechner, a labor man then serving as international vice president of his organization. He was the idol of C. C. C. camps. If you had a boy there, you did not have to worry about him.

BILLIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS NOT EXPENDED BUT LOANED ON GOOD SECURITY

Mr. Speaker, a very important point in regard to these huge appropriations that I very much fear the Republican orators may neglect to tell the voters is that billions of the moneys we have appropriated are not for expenditures in the generally accepted meaning of that word but for loans, which will be returned to the Treasury, with interest. I refer now to the enormous sums we have loaned the small home owners to save their homes from foreclosure, to the farmers to save their farms, to the farmers to plant and harvest their crops and tide them over from perhaps a period of drought or other hard luck, to all forms of legitimate business, ranging from the very smallest of businesses to the great railroads, banks, insurance companies, and so forth.

TO MR. WILLKIE'S STUMP SPEAKERS: HERE IS WHERE SOME MORE OF THE MONEY WENT—$3,000,000,000 DISTRIBUTED BY SOCIAL SECURITY SYSTEM

Mr. Speaker, I would like to state for the further information of Mr. Willkie's stump speakers that the Roosevelt administration's social-security program, 5 years old last month, has distributed $3,000,000,000 to the Nation's aged and unemployed workers and to widows, orphans, and the blind.

To celebrate its anniversary the Social Security Board drew up a statistical picture of its vast operations to show that some 50,000,000 workers—count them, Willkieites, 50,000,000—have been enrolled in the program since President Roosevelt signed the act in 1935.

Established after a long study of European experiences, the social program pours its benefits through a half dozen outlets which are either exclusively Federal enterprises or joint undertakings of Nation and State.

Its insurance benefits for the aged and unemployed are financed by pay-roll taxes, while direct grants from Federal and State treasuries sustain the public-assistance features for the young, the old, and the helpless in need.

PROVIDED FOR 1,983,900 AGED, 807,900 CHILDREN, 48,000 BLIND

At the top of the program is the old-age and survivors insurance system, which pays out monthly benefits to workers who retire at 65, and to their wives, widows, and orphans. Up to June 30 this system paid $38,000,000 to 102,941 persons.

Unemployment compensation, which gives insured workers a moderate weekly sum during a limited number of weeks of joblessness, has distributed more than $1,000,000,000 in benefits.

Of the more than 28,000,000 commercial and industrial workers covered by the insurance, about 1,500,000 new jobless are drawing unemployment compensation.

To find jobs for the insured idle, the social-security system has taken over the employment service. It has filled 5,000,000 jobs during 1939 and the first 6 months of 1940.

The public-assistance program aids some 3,000,000 persons every month, among them 1,983,900 aged, 807,900 children, and 48,000 blind. The expenditure for this part of the system has totaled about $1,900,000,000.

Mr. Willkie has frequently sneered at what he terms the "social laboratories" of the Roosevelt administration. In his acceptance speech, Candidate Willkie promises, if President, "to spend as little money as possible." Social security is the key arch of this so-called social laboratories system, and costs a lot of money.

Those who would starve were it not for the New Deal's financial aid have plenty of cause to ponder over that Willkie promise "to spend as little money as possible." If elected, will Mr. Willkie scrap the whole social-laboratories idea? If so, what, if anything, does he plan to give these 1,983,900 aged, 807,900 children, and 48,000 blind in its place? For, Mr. Willkie, the aged, the children, and the blind cannot work. And they must not starve.

FARMERS OF NATION NOT OVERLOOKED—HENRY A. WALLACE SAW TO THAT

Mr. Speaker, although I personally do not represent an agricultural district, I can assure the farmers of this country that their problems and welfare have not been overlooked by the great man who sits in the White House. Even if he had wanted to do so, which he did not, being that he takes pride in considering that he is something of a real dirt farmer himself, there was a man sitting in his Cabinet who would never for a moment have permitted it. I refer to his great Secretary of Agriculture, one of the best and most loyal friends of the farmer that this Nation has ever had—Henry A. Wallace.

It was because of his appreciation of the fact that his Secretary of Agriculture not only understood and loved farming from a practical as well as scientific viewpoint but that it seemed almost his sole interest in life that Mr. Roosevelt chose him as his running mate for the position of Vice President.

Of the moneys appropriated during the 7 years of the Roosevelt administration, to which I have already alluded, the President and Mr. Wallace saw to it that the vast sum of $7,078,914,124 went for agriculture, or, in other words, for the benefit of the farmers of the Nation.

The appropriation for 1940 alone was $1,370,394,305. Contrast this with the last year's agricultural appropriation of the Hoover administration, $111,661,603, and the farmer may judge for himself whether it would be to his interest to turn the Government back to the Republicans.

Breaking down the 1940 appropriation of $1,370,394,305, we find that some of the worthy purposes for which various sums are to be expended are the following:

Loans, relief, and rural rehabilitation, $161,838,567; agricultural conservation program, $559,556,740; disposal of surplus commodities, $205,677,564; farm-tenant loans, $40,939,511; Farm Credit Administration, $44,604,788; Rural Electrification Administration, $42,698,425; Federal Crop Insurance Act, $5,923,200; parity payments, $225,000,000; and soil-erosion-control program, $22,422,374.

VETERANS HAVE BEEN PROVIDED FOR BY THIS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Speaker, our World War veterans no longer plan marches on Washington. They may no longer be seen selling apples on the streets at Christmas time. This administration has seen its way clear to take care of those real, 100-percent Americans who were willing to lay down their lives in defense—not only of a great principle—but in defense of the greatest democracy the world has ever seen. What we have done for the veterans of all our wars we will do for all those, and their dependents, who patriotically participate in the great preparedness program that will soon be in effect throughout these United States. We are agreed in the desire never to send another American soldier beyond the seas, but those who loyally assist in preparing a defense of our democracy and our own shores against any possible would-be invader will never be forgotten by this Government.

WHAT PRESIDENT, MR. SPEAKER, HAS OR WILL COMPARE WITH THE PRESENT ONE?

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, was there any real, honest-to-God, humanitarian legislation enacted under the Harding, Coolidge, Hoover administrations? Where did the laws for the feeding of the poor and for their protection come from? Every decent piece of social-security legislation ever placed on our statute books came under the administration of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Without him we would have today none of the fine laws that protect those who are the very life's blood and backbone of our great Nation—the workers in the mills and factories, the men who operate the trains, busses, airplanes, the men who handle the Nation's mail with 100-percent efficiency, the men who go down in the mines to produce our coal and other minerals, the farmers who produce our daily bread without which none of us could exist.

There is one very important reason why Franklin Roosevelt will be reelected. The poor are for him. He has been for them throughout his entire service in the White House. And now they are for him, and all the Willkies in creation will not be able to take them away from him. And since in this, as in every other country on earth, there are more poor than all the other classes of society combined, his reelection is certain.

AMERICAN NAVY TODAY MOST POWERFUL IN THE WORLD

When President Roosevelt took office our Army and Navy was in its weakest and most dilapidated condition. In 1920 we had had a splendid Army and Navy, with tremendous surpluses of war materials. During the 12 years of Republican rule these surpluses had been disposed of, much of it for a song, and the Navy ruined by virtue of the Kellogg Pact and the nine-power treaty. In 7 years President Roosevelt has brought into being the largest navy in the world, and the largest Army that we have ever had outside of a war period. Though he has been strenuously opposed he has developed an air force 20 times as large as that in existence when he entered office. And his program of preparedness will provide us with a defense on land, sea, and in the air, aimed at making the Nation safe from any kind of attack from any source.

GOVERNMENT'S CREDIT IS VASTLY IMPROVED

Though cities, counties, and States, and even the Federal Government, were on the verge of bankruptcy in 1933 their financial condition, the same as that of the banks, has tremendously improved. There is more money in the banks, and the Government has more gold and silver, in fact, about 80 percent of all the gold in the world, than at any time heretofore. Our American dollar will purchase more today in the United States and throughout the world than ever before.

Government credit, notwithstanding the huge sums expended for preparedness and relief, is the best in our history. In fact, the Government can borrow all the money it needs at less than one-third, and in some instances one-fourth, the interest demanded previous to the Roosevelt administration.

ROOSEVELT ONE OF THE GREATEST OF ALL OUR GREAT PRESIDENTS

Mr. Speaker, I have served under seven Presidents—Theodore Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson, Harding, Coolidge, Hoover, and Franklin D. Roosevelt—and nine Speakers of this House, having seen 34 years of consecutive service. When I add that I have reached and passed my seventy-fourth birthday, you know the inevitable answer. I can no longer look forward with too great expectations. I can only look backward over the road I have traveled. This Nation has been good to me, and I have tried sincerely to show my appreciation by loyally serving here its ideals as best I could.

I am familiar with the history of our country. I know and appreciate the immortal services rendered the Republic by such outstanding Presidents as Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, down to "Teddy" Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson. It is my sincere belief that the great man today in the White House possesses within himself all the fine qualities that inspired these greatest Presidents of American history.

THREE FINAL BIG REASONS WHY I AM FOR REELECTION OF FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

I have known Franklin Roosevelt for 26 years, have been in close contact with him for 15 years of this period, for 8 years under Wilson and 7 years of his own administration. I know from first-hand knowledge that he loves America and this democratic form of government above his own life.

In this grave hour when our liberty and freedom is hanging in the balance, he is the one man in all the world who stands out as the ideal man to lead us safely through our difficulties.

I am for his reelection because he has given us the most advanced social-security program the world has ever known, because he has restored the prosperity that was destroyed by Republican misrule, and because he is determined to make his country safe from attack by any foreign foe. Make no mistake about it, Franklin Roosevelt will go down in history as one of the most humane and greatest Presidents of this the best and mightiest Nation of free men today existing on earth.

EDITORIALS FROM THE UNION FARMER

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks by including two editorials which appeared in the September 1940 issue of the Union Farmer, the official publication of the National Farmers Guild. The editorials follow:

[From the Union Farmer of September 1940]

M'NARY ACCEPTS

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY formally accepted the Republican Vice Presidential nomination in a speech at Salem, Oreg., Tuesday, August 27, 1940.

The acceptance speech was American in tone, forceful, and it clearly defined vital American issues. More important than all else, Mr. MCNARY recognized that his nomination and that of Mr. Wallace, the opposing candidate for the same office, makes an answer to the farm price problem the major issue in this presidential campaign.

Strangely, the vast but futile efforts at "farm relief" by Mr. Wallace was the controlling factor in MCNARY'S nomination. MCNARY, the early leader and the present champion of the "two-price system," nominated for the Vice Presidency by the Republicans, forced the nomination of Wallace as the opposing candidate. It is thus that agriculture becomes the major issue with both parties. The public is realizing that the final decision on November 5 actually rests with the farm voters and will be made in the rural counties of the North and Middle West.

While other truly important national issues were discussed by Mr. MCNARY, we shall confine our comment to the main issue on which attention is focused by the two opposing Vice Presidential candidates with opposing principles, with opposing philosophies—the one for price—the other for crop control. The one for more production—the other for less. One demands an American price at home—the other the world's price at home. MCNARY comes out for a 100-percent market price—Wallace for a 69-percent price. It is not hard to distinguish between the opposites.

"The prosperity of agriculture should be the first charge on the attention of any administration," said McNary. Then he proceeded to advance the reason why the farm problem is by no means the exclusive worry of the farmer by citing the example:

"Statisticians find an uncanny correspondence between gross farm income and industrial pay rolls in a given year. When, as in 1929, farm income rose to $12,000,000,000, factory pay rolls also were $12,000,000,000; and when in 1932 farm income dropped to $5,000,000,000, industrial pay rolls fell off similarly.

"A substantial solution of the farm problem may be resolved into a question of markets. Any rational plan must assign the American market to the American farmer. Besides being far and wide the greatest market, it is the only one we may hope to control. The farmer is, at least, entitled to that, and no Treasury benefits can compensate for its loss."

No farmer will overlook the force and the logic of that statement. Alone it is incomplete, but Mr. MCNARY goes on to suggest the remedy by saying:

"For years I have advocated a two-price system—a system enabling the United States to export without injuring the domestic price level. The McNary-Haugen Act, which looked to that end, was twice vetoed by a President. Although conditions have altered radically since the bill was last rejected, I have maintained with undiminished faith that some such formula must still be sought."

The restoration of the agricultural empire as a great American issue in a great American presidential election has come about because of the failure of the vast Wallace schemes to find the answer to price and income and because McNary would lead and fight for the right answer.

The Presidential candidates, Willkie and Roosevelt have approved the agricultural pronouncements of their running mates. We may rejoice that the agricultural issue is made so clear and that the farmers will play so large and so important a part in the November 5th decision.

WALLACE AGAINST HITLER

Henry A. Wallace's formal acceptance of the Vice-Presidential nomination on the Democratic Party ticket gave one the definite impression that he was running for office in the United States against Adolf Hitler, of Berlin, and against Herbert Hoover, of 1932.

In his acceptance speech he mentioned the name of Adolf Hitler at least 25 times. There were 132 column lines in the newspaper copy of the speech devoted to Hitler and the Nazi policies.

While Mr. Wallace may have felt that he would thus strike a sympathetic chord in the hearts of the American people by this appeal to base prejudice and overwhelming fear, we, nonetheless, have a right to believe that we in the United States are running our own election and that we don't have to ask Hitler or Churchill or Mussolini or any other foreign potentate what we shall and what we shall not do. We need not care a damn whether we please or displease a foreign ruler in exercising our choice at the ballot box for President and Vice President in the November elections.

If this theme of the Wallace acceptance speech were to be accepted as the issue in this campaign, then Hitler in fact would be running this Government and determining its policies—which is not true.

The people of the United States are making their own decisions. We shall be concerned only with our own national welfare, the good of the Nation as a whole, and the best interests of our own people. This will guide us in making our decisions on November 5—and the head of any foreign government can like it or not.

There seems to be a strange idea emanating from some Americans who regard this Nation as unusual in the family of nations. They think of it as a satellite, which is foreign to our idea and conception of our own independence. A satellite is something that streams in the wake of its parent sun, which gets its light and takes its course from an external force. To every real American the United States of America is not a satellite nation.

On the whole Mr. Wallace's speech was defensive. He defended the farm program solely on the basis of a comparison with the lowest farm prices of 1932. He made no reference to the success of the program, which he has administered, compared with the standard of "parity prices." He justified a 69 percent price on a 75 percent production on but 5 out of 71 farm commodities on the basis of world conditions, not on the basis of any control we might or should exercise over our own economic destiny.

Mr. Wallace has established a new low in subservient statesmanship. Subservient not to the national welfare but subservient to internationalism.

When Mr. Wallace deplored the fact that this was a presidential campaign and an election year he made the wierdest and most contradictory statement that ever came from the lips of a professed exponent of democracy and a candidate for the high office of President or Vice President of the United States of America.

This is what he said:

"The fact that our presidential campaign and election come now is most welcome to the dictators. They hope to get rid of the unyielding Roosevelt.

"They know that a political campaign is distracting to our people. And they know that in the many months that would elapse before a new administration could act effectively they might have their chance.

"I do not wish to imply that the Republican leaders are willfully and consciously giving aid and comfort to Hitler. But I want to emphasize that replacement of Roosevelt, even if it were by the most patriotic leadership that could be found, would cause Hitler to rejoice."

The oath which Mr. Wallace was required to take as a Cabinet member, and the oath which the Vice President must take upon assuming the office of Vice President, admits of no compromise or qualification in swearing to protect and defend the Constitution of the United States, which provides for the election every 4 years of a President and Vice President, regardless of whether a part or the whole of the rest of the world is at war or at peace.

It is not up to Mr. Wallace to apologize to us or to any foreign ruler for our celebration of independence or for the Constitution of the United States.

Guayule Rubber Seen as Defense Product

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of September 12, 1940:

[From the New York Times of September 12, 1940]

GUAYULE RUBBER SEEN AS DEFENSE PRODUCT—AKRON MANUFACTURER URGES THAT PLANT BE CULTIVATED HERE

Cultivation of guayule rubber for national defense as a national domestic substitute for imported rubber was proposed yesterday by William O'Neil, of Akron, Ohio, president of the General Tire & Rubber Co., 32-year veteran of the industry.

The guayule plant, resembling milkweed, grows profusely in Texas and other Southwestern States and Mexico, he said, and has properties equal to the foreign product. It has been used for years by rubber manufacturers, he explained, when prices of Malaysian crude rubber rose to 60 cents a pound or more.

"Why copy Hitler with costly synthetic rubber? We can grow guayule here in the United States," Mr. O'Neil said in an interview in the Hotel Lexington before departing today for Akron. Tire prices, he estimated, would double with the use of synthetics on a large scale.

As a member of the crude rubber committee of the Rubber Manufacturers Association, Mr. O'Neil attended in Washington recent sessions of the National Defense Advisory Committee's section of raw material, at which it was proposed to spend $150,000,000 to develop a 300,000-ton annual production of synthetic rubber.

Cost of guayule Mr. O'Neil put at 25 cents a pound, against 20 cents at present for the product imported from Dutch and British possessions, the main suppliers. Synthetic rubber now costs 70 cents, he said.

Not Government, but Farming, Business, and Industry Have Made This Country Great

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. CHESTER H. GROSS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

EDITORIAL FROM THE GETTYSBURG (PA.) STAR AND SENTINEL

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following editorial appearing in the Gettysburg (Pa.) Star and Sentinel of September 14, 1940:

[From the Gettysburg (Pa.) Star and Sentinel of September 14, 1940]

"NOT GOVERNMENT, BUT FARMING, BUSINESS, AND INDUSTRY HAVE MADE THIS COUNTRY GREAT"

Our first thought, when we consider one of Wendell Willkie's apt phrases, is that a word or two might be added to define possible shades of meaning. However, a characteristic of the anti-New Deal Presidential candidate is that he speaks in clipped sentences which can be taken in only one way. The mailed fist is not concealed within a glove of smooth, radio-tuned words.

The man on the street gets Willkie's meaning because he does not have to parse and analyze the sentence. Such a phrase was this emphatic statement by Wendell Willkie:

"Farming, business, and industry have made this country great—not Government."

A political writer or speaker would have said: "Farming, business, and industry have made this country great under our constitutional, democratic form of government."

But no political writer edits Wendell Willkie's speeches. No. Willkie used the word "government" with the exact shade of meaning President Lincoln had in mind when he said:

"In every case and at all hazards the Government must be perpetuated."

In that emphatic statement, Lincoln meant but one thing: "The form of government" under which we had been living since 1787.

Everybody knows what Lincoln meant by "government." He lived his patriotic life and he died a martyr for that "Government." He saw in that form of government the true principles of individual human existence, of liberty and the pursuit of happiness for all. Lincoln meant that "Government" must be perpetuated not for the dominance of the Government but for the people who live under that Government; those who under it are privileged to live by farming, or by business, or by industry.

When we ponder the full force of the words "Government by the people" we revert to the question: Shall the people rule over their governmental agencies or shall their governmental officers rule the people? Under our form of government a public officer, and even the Government itself, is merely an agent engaged to do the will of the people. The Constitution was so framed that the Government, under that Constitution, should obey and serve the will of the people without violation of the letter or spirit of the Constitution.

There is no conflict here. Both Willkie and Lincoln expressed the same thought.

As Willkie said: "Farming, business, and industry have made this country great—not Government." Individual and free farmers, businessmen and industrialists, and employees not only made this country great, but they also made the Government.

Thus far it has not perished, although it has passed through many crises. The New Deal has done its utmost by deceit, by subterfuge and belittlement of that same form of government, to pave the way for a New Deal dictatorship. But the time has come when farming, business, and industry will call a halt.

At the election next November there can be no leaning away from the spirit of the Constitution. The men and women of the farms, the businesses, and the industries will turn the New Deal out of power and this Nation can then resume its progress in the American way.

Do we want a restoration of the "American way"?

Resolutions of the Western Association of State Game and Fish Commissioners

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT ASSOCIATION MEETING AUGUST 22–23, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks by including copies of several resolutions adopted at the meeting of the Western Association of State Game and Fish Commissioners, held in Seattle, Wash., on August 22 and 23, 1940.

The resolutions follow:

Resolution No. 1

Whereas there has been presented a resolution asking that there be set up one Federal conservation organization to handle all wildlife matters; and

Whereas this proposal is of such importance that it is the belief of the Western Association of State Game and Fish Commissioners that it should be given further study: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Western Association of State Game and Fish Commissioners in session in Seattle, August 22 and 23, 1940, does hereby request that an interim committee be appointed to study thoroughly the probable results of such a reorganization and that this committee be prepared to report the results of the study at the annual meeting in 1941; and be it further

Resolved, That this same committee be instructed to investigate the feasibility and the desirability of formulating a Western Federation of Wildlife Interests and to ask all sportsmen's groups and others who are interested in the development, protection, and management of the wildlife resources of the West, to join in one consistent effort to demand that the public lands of the West be conserved in a manner that will accomplish the most good for the greatest number of people and that the exploitation of the public resources of the West for private profit be curtailed; and be it further

Resolved, That if, after direct contact with the sportsmen's groups of the West, it is found to be advisable, an invitation be extended to all wildlife organizations in the West to meet with the Western Association of State Game and Fish Commissioners at its next annual meeting for the purpose of discussing this very important matter and setting up an organization that will have for its purpose the accomplishment of the above; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of this organization be authorized to expend not to exceed $200 in the year 1940–41 for his expenses in carrying on the business of this organization.

Resolution No. 3

Be it Resolved, That the Western Association of State Game and Fish Commissioners go on record as endorsing the passage of S. 3739, introduced in the third session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, which has been passed by the Senate, May 29 (legislative day, May 28), 1940, and is now in the Committee on Agriculture in the House of Representatives, which bill reads as follows:

"An act to amend the act providing for Federal aid to the States in the establishment of wildlife-restoration projects to be owned by the respective States and maintained by them in accordance with the provisions of their laws.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 8 of the act entitled 'An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in wildlife-restoration projects, and for other purposes,' approved September 2, 1937, is amended to read as follows:

" 'SEC. 8. Title to any real or personal property acquired, constructed, or improved by any State through the use of funds paid to it under the provisions of this act shall be vested in such State; and it shall be the duty of each State to maintain, in accordance with the provisions of its laws, any wildlife-restoration project established in such State with the use of funds paid to it under the provisions of this act.' "

And that the Representatives from the States which are members of this association be requested to use every influence in securing the passage of this bill in the House of Representatives.

Section 8 of the original bill reads as follows:

"Sec. 8. To maintain wildlife-restoration projects established under the provisions of this act shall be the duty of the States according to their respective laws."

Resolution No. 5

Whereas the United States Government has, at great expense, built what is known as the Bear River migratory-bird refuge in Utah; and

Whereas it is the hub of migration of most of the migratory birds in the western flyways; and

Whereas there is a great amount of water passing through the spillways and into Great Salt Lake during the spring run-offs; and

Whereas if this water is stored during the spring season, it will supplement the water supply for this refuge2 to2 the2 extent that 50-percent additional duck feed can be developed and will be a factor in the elimination of western duck sickness, and will tend to make this refuge operate as the builders desire; and

Whereas there is now pending in the United States Congress H. R. 5236, which calls for appropriations to build a dam in the Bear River for the purpose of accomplishing the above; and

Whereas it seems that the resolution in Congress is not being given the proper consideration: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Western Association of State Game and Fish Commissioners, in session in Seattle, August 22 and 23, 1940, does hereby ask, in the interest of all the States benefited by the western flyways of migratory wild fowl, that the appropriation be made in order that the Fish and Wildlife Service may have funds available for the development of the Deweyville Dam to supplement the Bear River bird refuge water supply; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of the Department of the Interior, Chief of the Fish and Wildlife Service, and to all Congressmen and Senators of the 11 Western States.

Resolution No. 9

Whereas Senate bill No. 2576, granting to the Federal Government the right to receive all moneys collected for such activities as haying, grazing, trapping, etc., on wildlife refuges under the administration of the Fish and Wildlife Service, has been introduced in the Senate of the United States; and

Whereas there are many wildfowl refuges located in the various States on which there have been in the past and are now fur bearers that are held with title vested in the several States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Western Association of State Game and Fish Commissioners, in session in Seattle, August 22 and 23, 1940, does hereby protest the taking of fur bearers on the above-mentioned areas except in accordance with the State laws or in cooperation with the various States after a memorandum of understanding has been mutually agreed upon; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of the Department of the Interior, Chief of the Fish and Wildlife Service, and to all Senators and Congressmen of the 11 Western States.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 13, 1940

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I quote from the American Federationist, an official publication of the American Federation of Labor. Mr. Harold D. Jacobs, Assistant Administrator, Wage and Hour Division, United States Government, has written some trenchant observations relative to the "fifth column."

Mr. Jacobs pointed out that the real danger to our country arises from the discontent growing out of poverty, unemployment, and lack of opportunity. The real menace in our midst is the political candidate or the pseudo-patriot who arrogates to himself the sole and exclusive properties of Americanism and who uses an emergency as an excuse for advocating the abolition of democratic processes. Beware of him! Up and down our land today are marching the forces of special privilege wrapped in the American flag, many of them running for political office, chorusing alike, although in different language, a demand that we crack down upon free speech, free assembly, and organized labor.

Here is the declaration of Mr. Jacobs, which I think eminently worthy of study:

There has been a good deal of talk about the "fifth column"? What is the "fifth column"? It is an organization of the disaffected who at the appointed hour would open the gates to the enemy. But there has been some loose thinking about this. I do not think we have much to fear from the enemy who comes among us to preach disaffection. We know how to deal with him. We have much to fear from the enemy within who, often posing as a 100-percent patriot, would fertilize the soil in which discontent can take root and flourish by emptying democracy of its meaning. He is the man who, in the pretense of protecting our liberties, would crush our liberties. He is the man who, on the pretext of national necessity, would stamp out free speech, the free press, the right of assembly, the right to unite with our fellows to promote our collective interests. He is the low-wage payer and the exploiter of labor. He is the fellow who thinks 10 cents an hour quite enough for the support of a workingman's family, who thinks that it is perfectly all right to work labor 60 or 70 hours a week without being restrained in any manner by the necessity of having to pay for the overtime. I do not know of any instance in history in which a well-fed, well-clothed, well-housed, and contented people have succumbed to strange and desperate remedies for imaginary ills.

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the House the name of a man who has distinguished himself by rendering a great service to his country. I mention him only because he typifies a corps of America's new unsung heroes.

For the past 8 years, day and night, he has been in action on the firing lines of our dangerous un-American front. He was the first official soldier appointed by the congressional body to combat America's "fifth column." As chief investigator of the McCormack Committee on Un-American Activities, he and his capable battery of assistants tracked down volumes of evidence that even today would shock the American public. It is all a matter of congressional record dating back over 6 years ago.

In 1934 he furnished his congressional superiors with an accurate blueprint of "fifth column" planned destruction of American democracy. Not only did he trace the origin and current activities of these subversive groups, but he identified the perpetrators as well. He furnished definite proof of deliberate acts on the part of a foreign government to incite treason against our Government. The mechanics of the vicious underground and its fantastic plans painted an almost unbelievable picture then. But to our sorrow it has all proven too unvarnished and matter of fact in its graphic detail today.

Ever since then, 5 years ago, when he completed his work for the committee, this man has and still is, engaged in fighting its enemies within our borders. His is a perilous job both physically and mentally, and so often incurs personal sacrifice.

It is therefore fitting that I call the name of Richard Rollins to the attention of this distinguished Congress as a symbol of reward for a patriotic American who has placed honor for his country above worldly goods. Without his help and the help of an army of unsung other American patriots and patriotic organizations, these findings would still be a hidden time bomb set to explode on a peace-loving Nation with all the fury that was recently unleashed in Kenvil.

No Faith In Volunteering?—Army Planned Elaborate Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE BY BRUCE CATTON

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, during the general debate on the Burke-Wadsworth bill, I took the position that the voluntary enlistment system for the United States Army had not been given a fair trial.

On the basis of 3-year enlistments with a base pay of $21 monthly, the strength of the Army has been increased to 315,000 men as of September 14, 1940.

It is interesting to note that on the above date with partial reports available for August a total of 38,333 men are listed as recruits for last month. When the final reports are received for August the total is expected to pass the 40,000 mark.

I am inserting herewith a very timely article written by Bruce Catton, well-known Washington columnist, in which he reveals some interesting sidelights on the controversial topic of conscription.

Possibly Mr. Catton's article fully explains the position of the Honorable Harry Woodring, former Secretary of War, who, on June 20, 1940, at Topeka, Kans., declared:

How any fair-minded Member of Congress could say that we have given the voluntary system of enlistment with the United States Army Service a fair trial, and that it has broken down, and therefore we need the compulsory service, is beyond my understanding.

Mr. Catton's article is as follows:

BRUCE CATTON IN WASHINGTON

NO FAITH IN VOLUNTEERING?—ARMY PLANNED ELABORATE CAMPAIGN

WASHINGTON.—Now that the smoke has settled over the scrap on the draft bill, a couple of extremely odd things about the whole business remain to be examined.

First is the matter of voluntary enlistment as a means of filling up the ranks of a greatly enlarged Army.

During debate on the bill, administration spokesmen said over and over again that the War Department had absolutely no faith in volunteering as a means of getting a lot of men in a hurry. They also asserted that to try to combine volunteering and conscription—as contemplated in the Fish amendment—would simply mean delay and confusion. Lastly, it was asserted that in the World War the United States was never able to raise more than 40,000 men in 1 month by volunteer enlistments.

Planned to recruit 790,000 men

Simple fact, however, is that the original protective mobilization plan of the War Department—the Army's official schedule for war, until the present draft bill came along—set up a scheme very much like the Fish proposal for raising a wartime army.

Furthermore, this scheme called for raising the Army to war strength pending application of the draft by enlisting—not 400,000 men, as the Fish amendment would have provided, but 790,000.

It's all set forth in a pamphlet called American Selective Service, prepared under the supervision of the Joint Army and Navy Selective Service Committee and issued in October 1939.

At that time the Army did not dream of getting a draft law in time of peace. All the figuring was done on the idea that a draft law could be passed only after war broke out, and that it would be at least 60 days before drafted men would start coming into camp. During those 60 days, it was proposed to get at least 790,000 recruits for Army, Navy, National Guard, and Marine Corps.

Extensive drive outlined

A gigantic enlistment campaign to accomplish this was envisaged. Each Governor was to set up a drive covering his own State, reaching down into each city and county, all of which would be allotted their quotas of men. Civilian committees would be set up to see that the quotas were met.

"The promotional work to accomplish this result in each community," says the pamphlet, "is similar to other drives the mechanics of which are easily understood and frequently employed."

This whole procedure was almost exactly like the procedure called for by the Fish amendment, except that it was aimed at getting twice as many men. Just incidentally, the pamphlet reveals that in the first 60 days after we entered the war in 1917 all arms of the service took in 290,000 men by voluntary enlistment.

Last June: "Nothing to do"

Another odd point is that only 3 months ago the administration was trying hard to get Congress to adjourn—on the ground there was nothing more for it to do.

Joint Republican and rank-and-file Democratic opposition killed this move. Congress stayed on the job. Since then it has passed the two-ocean Navy bill, the National Guard mobilization bill, and the Draft Act, and has taken on the excess-profits tax in addition. If the administration had had its way last June, none of these acts would have been put through.

Federal Pensions

LETTER TO PAWTUCKET (R. I.) TIMES

Mr. RISK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter appearing in the Pawtucket (R. I.) Times, relative to Federal pensions, signed by Mr. John Bradbury, of Pawtucket, R. I.:

[From the Pawtucket (R. I.) Times]

THE TIMES LETTER BOX—FEDERAL PENSIONS

EDITOR OF THE TIMES:

On Wednesday evening, September 11, in Washington, D. C., President Roosevelt addressed the delegates of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Stablemen and Helpers' convention, and the address was broadcast over the radio. I quote the following from his address: "Our progress must continue to be a steady and deliberate one—we cannot stand still, we cannot slip back. We must look forward to certain definite things in the future. For example, the benefits of social security should be broadened and extended, unemployment insurance should cover a larger number of workers. Our old-age pension system should be improved and extended, the amount of pension should be increased, and above all, these pensions must be given in a manner which will respect the dignity of the life of service and labor which our aged citizens have given to the Nation. It is my hope that soon the United States will have a national system under which no needy man or woman within our borders will lack a minimum old-age pension which will provide adequate food, clothing, and lodging to the end of the road—without having to go to the poorhouse to get it. And I look forward to a system which in addition to this bare minimum will enable those who have faithfully toiled in any occupation to build up additional security for their old age which will allow them to live in comfort and happiness."

What beautiful words and what beautiful thoughts were expressed by our President; and as they came over the radio with splendid intonation of the President's well-modulated voice, what inspiration it must have given our elderly and middle-aged citizens to know that their President said it was his hope that soon we would have a national system in operation that would provide for an adequate pension that would allow them to live in comfort and happiness.

If President Roosevelt is sincere in bringing his hope to a reality as he expressed it to his audience, he can do it before this present session of Congress adjourns. There is a bill now before Congress known as the General Welfare Act (H. R. 5620) which aims to amend the present Social Security Act so as to embody the changes that the President hopes for. The bill is now before the House Ways and Means Committee, and was sponsored by one of his own political party, Congressman WARREN G. MAGNUSON, of the State of Washington. It has a sound tax base which was suggested and recommended by Dr. Paul Studenski of New York University, the tax expert called by the House Ways and Means Committee to analyze the tax bases of measures of this type.

The Magnuson petition, No. 15, to bring this bill out on the floor for debate carries the signatures of 205 Congressmen, and only needs 13 more signatures at this date. We fully understand the necessity of appropriations for national-defense purposes, but we must not forget that our first line of defense is happy and contented population in which the seeds of fascism, communism, or "fifth columnists" could never be sown.

If President Roosevelt is sincere in his hopes for an adequate pension, as he expressed in his address referred to above, all he has to do is to use his influence with Congressman ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, and 13 more Congressmen to sign the Magnuson petition, No. 15, to bring the bill out on the floor of the House for debate.

Let us hope the President will prove the sincerity of his hope for a real social security. Actions speak louder than words.

JOHN BRADBURY.

Forty-fifth Annual Encampment of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES F. RISK

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

SPEECH OF GOV. WILLIAM H. VANDERBILT, OF RHODE ISLAND

Mr. RISK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech of Gov. William H. Vanderbilt at patriotic services on board the U. S. S. Constitution, Sunday morning, September 1, 1940, at the forty-fifth annual encampment of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States:

I am particularly happy to have this opportunity to participate in the forty-fifth annual encampment of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States. It seems to me particularly appropriate that in this time when religious and political persecutions have swept the Continent of Europe almost bare of democracies that the State of Rhode Island, where was established the first government in the world to guarantee to its citizens complete civil and religious liberty, should participate in these exercises. The land of Roger Williams has, since its inception, stood for the freedoms and the rights upon which our Nation is based. It has been peculiarly free in its ideas and peculiarly outspoken in its beliefs. While being the first State to declare its independence of England, it was the last to join the Union, and only did so after the adoption of the first 10 amendments—better known as the Bill of Rights. Rhode Island has been and is a particularly independent State—a fighting State—ready to risk everything for the liberties and freedom it holds so dear.

It is fitting, too, that these exercises should be held on the deck of the U. S. frigate Constitution—"Old Ironsides"—the second oldest ship in the United States Navy, which has come to symbolize the enduring qualities of our American democracy. This ship was one of the most important defense units during those critical days following our successful war of independence. In 1798 the Constitution helped to clear our coast line and the West Indies of French privateers. From then until 1805 it saw service in Tripoli against pirates, and during the War of 1812 she was the pride of our Navy and one of the prime factors in our naval victories. In the almost 150 years since the launching of the Constitution from nearby Hartt's shipyard, ships and sailors and naval strategy have changed, yet this ship bears a record which any unit of our modern fleet would be proud to emulate.

While our dreadnoughts of today, our fast cruisers and destroyers, our airplane carriers and submarines, and all the other units which go to make up our present Navy in no way resemble "Old Ironsides," a link does exist between this wooden ship upon whose deck we stand this morning and the ships of steel which comprise our modern battle fleet. This ship, the Constitution, was built in the hour of need of a very young and struggling republic. The ships which are leaving the ways today and which will soon join our modern Navy are being built in the hour of need of a great republic—grown to manhood. National defense was the cry of nearly 150 years ago, national defense is the cry and the vital need of today. Our Constitution, our way of life, our very thoughts and ideas are perhaps more seriously challenged today than ever before in the history of this Nation.

Only a few months ago, many of us in this country labored under the comfortable illusion that 3,000 miles of Atlantic Ocean and four or five or six thousand miles of Pacific Ocean afforded us unassailable security. Our national energy was directed toward solving great constructive needs, stimulating industry and agriculture, finding jobs for the unemployed, promoting better housing, encouraging social advance. We are still interested in doing all that we can in those directions, but we have come to realize as a result of the events we have witnessed abroad that our conception of security was false. We saw free and democratic nation after nation disappear from the continent of Europe. We saw the tide of totalitarianism engulf one nation after another, and we began to realize that our only security lay in being so strong ourselves that no other nation would dare challenge us. We realized that preparedness for war was our only chance for peace. As this realization has grown, we have painfully, slowly, begun to undertake the greatest peacetime program of national defense in our history.

Something over $14,000,000,000 has been authorized to raise our air, naval, and military forces to unprecedented strength in times of peace. Let us only hope that our awakening has not been too late and that we can shake off the lethargy, which has bound us, in time to be ready for any challenge we may have to face.

For many years veteran organizations, yours among them, have demanded a more adequate national defense. You, as veterans, appreciated the necessity of national defense and as fellow veterans I believe you will agree with me that every man is a better man in war and a better citizen at peace for having had a certain amount of military discipline.

I believe wholeheartedly in the free processes of our democratic form of government. I believe in the full discussion by our representatives in Congress of all measures affecting our lives as citizens, but I must admit that at times I grow impatient at the apparent endless bickering and useless waste of time—at times I question the sincerity of some who seem to use their prerogative of discussing only for the purpose of obstructing. I am impatient of the tactics of those men of both parties who have by one technicality or another delayed final consideration and passing of a compulsory military training law. There should, of course, be careful consideration and free discussion of such a measure, but stalling methods and partisan political considerations should play no part.

I believe that the immediate passage of a selective military service bill is essential to our national defense, and, furthermore, I believe such an act is entirely in keeping with our democratic form of government.

I believe that the vast majority of the people of this country feel as I do and that they are prepared to lend all aid short of war to Great Britain in her struggle against the totalitarian states. I feel that these things are steps which, if taken before it is too late, will do more than anything else to keep this Nation at peace.

We do not want war, but at the same time we are determined to protect our way of life, our form of government, our freedom of the press and speech, our right to worship according to the dictates of our own conscience, and all other rights and privileges, no matter what the cost may be.

The war that is going on in Europe today is not simply a war between nations. It is a war of two opposite and diametrically opposed philosophies of life. On the one hand, the philosophy of the State where the individual counts for nothing except where he or she may be used as a small cog or part of a machine—a totalitarian machine. On the other hand, a belief in the dignity of man, of individual rights, liberties, and choices—a democratic nation. We, because of our background, our history, our progress, because of the very things that have made us a great Nation, are inevitably and irrevocably committed to the democratic side. It is a time in the world when we here in America should take our democracy down off the shelf and study it anew, when we should refresh our memories and brighten our appreciation of what our form of government really means to us as individuals. It means that we can have meetings such as this one this morning, attended by men and women of every race, creed, and color, and we can if we wish discuss at this meeting matters pertaining to our political and social welfare, that we can criticize our Government, that we can advocate candidates of our own choosing for various offices, that we can go to any church or no church as we may see fit, that we can read any newspaper we like, listen to any radio broadcast we like, see any movie or play we like and live in peace and tranquillity with our families free from unreasonable search and seizure. It means that we have fair courts to which we may appeal for justice and where regardless of our social, financial, or religious standing we will receive it. It means all those things and many others, none of which we could enjoy in a totalitarian state. Those are the things which we are determined to defend; those are the things for which we are willing to spend our money, our time, and, if necessary, our lives because those are the things which make life worthwhile to us.

Our Nation today is aroused to the necessity of preparedness and national defense. At the moment we are floundering. We, as a Nation, have not found our feet and placed them on the direct path which is the shortest route to national defense. I say this not in a spirit of criticism, but it is a fact that we are going through a period of lost motion, wasted effort, and we lack coordination and direction. Time—valuable time—is being lost. Perhaps this is inevitable in the transition period between the lethargy of the past and the activity of the future, but if we are to make our form of government work in competition with the world of totalitarian states, we must cut this lost motion to a minimum. We must prove that we, as a democracy, can function adequately, sufficiently, and promptly. We must not forget that totalitarian states, by means of agents cleverly placed in this country, will strive to do all in their power to increase our confusion and our delays. We know that we have Trojan horses and "fifth columnists" within our gates. It is time we took off the kid gloves of diplomacy and dealt with these people with the bare fists of Americanism.

We must preserve our democracy and at the same time we must inject into it more coordination, more efficiency, more speed. I have every faith that we will do this; that we will emerge victorious, whether in peace or in war, but we have no time to lose and no time to waste on the man or woman of whatever party who plays politics with national defense, which is another way of saying our liberty, security, and our personal freedom.

Fair Labor Standards in the Federal Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. FRIES
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. FRIES. Mr. Speaker, I have been a Member of this august body for almost 4 years and have served on the Committees on Labor and the Civil Service.

During this time I have become increasingly aware of the close relationship between working conditions of Federal employees and workers outside the Government. Establishment of a good working policy in the Government and a few organized industries eventually results in similar policies for all industry generally. And, similarly, I am convinced that any break-down in conditions of work in the Federal service will have an immediate effect on workers throughout the country.

The Federal Government is the Nation's No. 1 employer, and if it permits decent labor standards within its own bailiwick to be smashed it will be setting a dangerous precedent and a bad example for all the employers of the Nation.

In the last 8 years the Congress has enacted laws designed to further and protect decent standard working conditions. It has made specific requirements of industrial leaders. Specifically, the maximum number of hours, the minimum wages, and assurance of collective bargaining in good faith are required of all employers in private enterprise. Those who violate these provisions are prosecuted by our Government. Now it would be ironic and inconsistent indeed if the prosecutor were guilty of the same practices as the violator. It could not help but create dissatisfaction, which would be completely unfortunate in these times when national unity is so very important.

SERIOUS THREAT

Right now a serious break-down in labor standards in the Federal service threatens. It should be prevented in the interests of the well-being of the United States.

I am informed that the Bureau of the Budget has informally requested nondefense departments of Government to save approximately one-tenth of their appropriations for the current fiscal year, allocated by this Congress for specific use. The savings are to be made arbitrarily, and the money is reportedly to be used for defense purposes.

Now, as one of the many Americans who served his country during the last war, no one is more deeply interested in an adequate national defense than I. I do not want to advocate anything that would be detrimental to that objective. I am sure that every Member of this body shares my position on this matter. But I insist that if these savings are made at the expense of our loyal Government workers it will be harmful to our national-defense program.

Every single worker in the Federal Government is an American citizen. All of them have taken an oath to perform their duties faithfully and loyally. I have a statement here from the President of the United Federal Workers of America, an organization of Government employees, which expresses clearly the attitude of these faithful public servants. I quote:

> Federal employees are completely willing to bear their just and proportionate burdens in America's national-defense program, and are in fact doing so.
> Like other citizens, they are contributing to the welfare of the Nation in the form of increased taxes, and higher living costs. In addition to these burdens of citizenship, they are making special contributions in the form of uncompensated overtime, stepped-up production, curtailed leave, and virtual elimination of merited promotions and earned wage increases.
> President, United Federal Workers of America.

Mr. Baker is right. Government workers are not only shouldering their just share of the defense program; they are in fact carrying more of the burden than the average citizen. For instance, in private industry the workers are compensated for overtime pursuant to the Wage and Hour Act, but in the Wage and Hour Division, which administers the law, employees get no overtime pay.

If the Bureau of the Budget is permitted to carry out its so-called economy plans, even greater hardships will face employees in the Federal service. To achieve its purpose, the Bureau is using its well-known procedure of setting up reserves for each department. The savings contemplated are larger than ever before. Conservative estimates place the total amount at $400,000,000. This sum of money will be saved at the expense of the worker. The Bureau cannot touch fixed funds and trust accounts.

I want to outline in part what these reserves will mean to the affected agencies and their employees.

First. One of the effects of the appropriations cut will be that vacancies as they occur will not be filled. This places an extra burden of work on the remaining employees. With a smaller staff sharing the same or an even greater work load, output will necessarily fall off, efficiency will slump, and morale of the personnel will be undermined.

Second. If this policy is pursued, added overtime will follow with the result that there will be a break-down in the hours established for the Federal service. This, too, would affect output, efficiency, and morale.

Third. There is a distinct possibility that under the Budget Bureau's plans a slash in salary will result. The effects of this on Government workers and on those in private industry need no comment.

Now, if we disregard completely the welfare of Government workers, it is still of the utmost importance to this country that the Bureau of the Budget's plans be checked.

In these days when democracy is on trial, it would be fatal to have a government whose day-to-day functions floundered in inefficiency. These day-to-day functions are the heart of Government operation. These operations are tremendously important. If these functions are impaired, the entire defense program will be impaired. It is extremely important that our Federal service should continue to operate smoothly and effectively. To do this, we must have competent, well-trained personnel. We must have loyal, devoted employees.

This Government has gone to considerable lengths to train its personnel to do a competent, thorough job. We should not tolerate any practice which would hinder the smooth operation of government; nor any policy which would result in trained workers, who represent a Government investment and a national asset, leaving the Federal service to seek fields where returns are richer and treatment more considerate.

We must give deepest attention to the elements of morale and loyalty in government. The loyalty is there, but the Government should not deliberately set out to undermine these highly essential qualities. If we permit such practices, then the Government will inadvertently become its own "fifth column."

The Bureau of the Budget has refused to give simple public assurance that it does not plan through fiscal legerdemain to lower labor standards in the Government service. On Labor Day, President Roosevelt declared that labor's gains will not be lost. But no assurance has been given to Government workers that their labor standards will be protected. If labor standards are smashed in the Government service, it will only signify the beginning of a Nation-wide deterioration in labor standards for all American workers. The Government must not, unwittingly or otherwise, permit or encourage this to be done.

There is only one other point I should like to make. It seems to me that this body is competent enough to study the fiscal needs of government and to make proper recommendations and appropriations. But apparently the Bureau of the Budget disagrees with me.

The Appropriations Committees of both the Senate and the House gave careful scrutiny to the fiscal estimates for Government agencies at public hearings. The Bureau of the Budget appeared before these bodies. Departmental administrators prepared careful estimates and presented briefs, and citizens, civic bodies, and employee groups also gave their views. On the basis of these presentations and its own deliberations, this Congress voted for appropriations for all departments of government, defense and nondefense. It allocated funds to each according to its best lights.

Now, I am informed that the Bureau of the Budget apparently does not think that the best lights of this august body are bright enough. They are implying that we appropriated $400,000,000 too much for nondefense and were short by that amount for defense purposes. If that is their position, let them appear before congressional appropriations committees and state their case.

Granting that the Bureau of the Budget has the right to shift funds about in the interest of better administration, as need is demonstrated, they are overstepping their bounds when they reappropriate funds in such staggering amounts as $400,000,000, earmarked by Congress for specific purposes. If there is any reallocating to be done in such quantity, this Congress should do it. I cannot approve of this fiscal chicanery. Therefore, it is my strong feeling that the Bureau of the Budget be called upon to explain just what they are doing and what they intend to do with moneys appropriated by Congress, to the satisfaction of Congress.

Since the Bureau of the Budget will not apparently give public assurance that there will be no break-down in labor standards in the Federal service, I consider it the duty of Congress to do so. It is our public responsibility to encourage American workers and to give recognition for efficiency and loyalty—particularly to Government workers who are right now vested with all-important functions. This is not a hard thing for Congress to do and if it is done, it will yield large returns in production, loyalty, and efficiency and will set an example fit for private employers to follow.

Opposing Philosophies

EDITORIAL FROM THE GRAND RAPIDS HERALD

OPPOSING PHILOSOPHIES

Wendell Willkie, in his Coffeyville speech, the first of his real campaign for election, hit exactly the correct diagnosis of what this campaign is all about—what the issues are in it. It is useless for the two antagonists to argue about foreign policy or national defense. The whole Nation, after long slumbering, now seems united behind the defense theory and is not too technical as to the means for preparing this country to meet successfully any possible foe. The issue of this campaign is, Which of two philosophies of government do the people prefer? Upon their choice hangs the fate of the Nation and of their own liberties.

These two philosophies are Roosevelt's demand for an unprecedented third term or Willkie's pledge against perpetuation in office.

Do we want Roosevelt's secrecy of the affairs of Government or Willkie's frank report to the people who are the Government?

Shall we choose Roosevelt's theory of centralizing greater and greater powers in Government or Willkie's pledge of giving the Government back to the people?

Shall we have Roosevelt's regimentation of all people or Willkie's encouragement of individual initiative?

Shall we have Roosevelt's constant harassment of business and wealth-producing industry or Willkie's pledge of freedom for private enterprise?

Shall we have Roosevelt's economic system of vast spending, continual deficits, pyramiding debt, and mounting tax burden, or Willkie's ideal of economy in Government, balanced budget, reduction of the national debt, and eventual lower taxes?

Do we choose Roosevelt's theory of supporting the idle by Government dole financed by the thrifty and hard working, or Willkie's pledge to provide work for all who will at private industry?

Do we prefer foreign commitments secretly made by Roosevelt or Willkie's ideal of perhaps the same commitments made after the public has been informed of the intent to make them?

Shall we choose Roosevelt's evasion of the Constitution and the law, attempts to pack the Supreme Court to gain the desired ends, or Willkie's pledge of observance of the letter and the spirit of the basic principles of the American Government?

Shall we choose government by the New Deal and its agents indefinitely or Willkie's pledge of government by the people in accordance with the laws and traditions of the United States?

Those are the issues in this campaign as laid down by Wendell Willkie. They are the very basis of what the people must decide when they go to the polls. That was Willkie's Coffeyville speech.

HON. EDWARD W. CREAL
OF KENTUCKY

ADDRESS BY HON. J. DAN TALBOTT

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following brief address of Hon. J. Dan Talbott at a patriotic meeting at Bardstown, Ky.:

ADDRESS OF HON. J. DAN TALBOTT AT BARDSTOWN, KY., AUGUST 29

I heartily approve of your meeting and I hope that it will convince our people of the emergency and extremity confronting us, and of the necessity for immediate and sound action in governmental affairs. America must be placed in a position where her women and children cannot be murdered and her people enslaved, as so many already are in all of the democracies of Europe.

We Americans instinctively hate war, but as much as we hate it, we must not forget that the freedom we now enjoy was fought for by our ancestors and purchased by them at a great price. They fought for it when our country was weak in manpower and wealth, and won it for themselves and for us. If it is not sacred enough for us to fight for now, should the occasion demand, when we are strong in manpower, resources, and wealth, then we must be prepared to lose it.

As the greatest democracy on earth, populated by the freest people in the world, our Nation affords a choice prize in the eyes of the dictators of Europe and Asia. They hate and sneer at us, as they do at all democracies. They contend that all the democracies of the world are weak in determination, in judgment, and in their ability to defend themselves. To a great degree they have demonstrated their argument in Europe, and it now remains for American democracy to disprove their contentions.

Today everything pertaining to liberty and independence is at stake. The right of free speech, religious freedom, and every principle of independence which was established by our forefathers is being challenged—not only challenged but in most parts of the world is being utterly destroyed. Today Great Britain alone stands between us and the horrible tyrant who is running mad upon the face of the earth.

Hitler, by force and with utter disregard for pledges solemnly made, has taken charge of one country after another in Europe. His powerful war machine has destroyed every country which has dared to oppose him, with the single exception of Great Britain. Hitler has no fear of foolish talk. He understands and respects only those who have the courage and the ability to whip him at his own game. With Great Britain destroyed, his armies will control the entire world, with the exception of America; and when that time comes—when Hitler controls most of the wealth and commerce of the world and enslaves most of the people—what respect will he have for America and her rights as a Nation, if we are woefully and pitifully unprepared to demand our rights and defend ourselves with arms?

The peoples of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Holland, Belgium, Norway, Denmark, and France have been, and the people of England are now being, murdered because for years they were indifferent and lacked foresight. Surely their predicament should be our solemn lesson and warning, but strangely, with this horrible example before us, Congress still debates, week after week and month after month, whether America should prepare to protect herself from wholesale murder and enslavement. England, the last hope of democracy in Europe, for 10 years wasted her time and energy debating instead of preparing for the inevitable, and now her vast empire stands likely to be destroyed and enslaved.

The situation in the world today is not of the American people's making. Only a few years ago a majority of us would have said it could not happen. Today we all know it has happened, and we should be sensible enough to realize that what has happened in Europe and Asia can happen in America unless we immediately build the greatest naval, armed, and air forces in the world, to be manned by properly and competently trained personnel.

A little more than a century and a half ago, when our country was weak and the prey of stronger nations, our forefathers fought for and obtained freedom and national independence. Then they gave us the system of government we so happily enjoy today. God forbid that we, while Hitler is attempting to prove that all democracies are weak and inadequate, shall become soft and let our freedom slip away from us.

I hope your meeting will go on record as asking Congress to furnish England with every ship and plane we can spare without impairing our safety at the present moment; that all food supplies necessary to feed the English people shall be made available to them while they fight their battles for a cause not alone dear to them but to all true Americans as well.

I further hope that the people of Nelson County, in their meeting, will adopt a program of extending to the children of the British Empire refuge in their homes as long as necessary to protect them from the murderous German bombs and machine guns.

Benefits of Prohibition Repeal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. ARTHUR ANDERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the fallacy of prohibition was amply proven years ago. Our Nation still suffers economically and socially from the effects of this unwise experiment.

Many of us here were law-enforcement officials prior to our election to Congress. As such we came to know first-hand the power and the wealth that came into the hands of gangsters and lawbreakers because they were able to maintain traffic in illicit liquor in spite of the strictest enforcement.

Every living American knows that repeal of prohibition has improved the economic, social, and moral structure of our people. Proper enforcement of law has been made easier and the millions of dollars that formerly found their way into the hands of bootleggers and criminals trafficking in liquor now flow into the hands of honest, hardworking laboring men and into the United States Treasury.

The distillers and brewers of this country are deserving of our highest commendation for their fine cooperation during the past 8 years in educating the people of this country in the quality and virtue of temperance.

I ask unanimous consent to bring this brief statement to an appropriate conclusion by extending in the RECORD at this point a brief article from the American Brewer for August 1940.

FROM THE EDITOR'S WORKBENCH—"MEDICINAL LIQUORS" IN BONE-DRY COUNTIES

The victories of the prohibitionists, as reported from time to time, never tell the whole story. The reader is left to infer that because a certain area voted against liquor and beer licenses then that area is dry, and nobody drinks.

Such, however, is not the case. The first indication of the real condition is usually an exposé of some well-organized bootleg syndicate. Less spectacular, but more definite, are the records of the drug stores.

The Texas Brewers Institute, through its official publication, Beer, publishes a tabulation of 90 bone-dry counties in the State that sustain medical permits authorizing the sale of liquor for medicinal purposes. The average per capita consumption of liquor for 3 months was 0.73 pints. In 22 counties where beer is sold for beverage purposes the sale of liquor under medical permits was 0.51 pints per capita. In 3 wine-and-beer counties the average for 3 months was 0.286 pints per capita.

With fine irony the institute's publication says:

"But temperance weeps while sickness stalks abroad and disease overshadows those counties. Records reveal that those areas present a grave problem to the public-health service. During the first 3 months of 1940 there were 89,073 cases of illness in Taylor County. At least that many prescriptions for liquor were written out by physicians and filled. * * * (It is unlawful to fill a prescription for beer in dry areas.) This was almost 8 pints of hard liquor in 3 months for every man, woman, and child in Taylor County. * * * During the same 3 months the State average for the whole of Texas was 1.32 pints per capita.

"Lubbock County showed a health condition that looks very bad for the great school located there. The doctors found 100,144 cases of the disease that called for prescriptions of hard liquor. The per capita consumption in 3 months was 2.06 pints.

"Every one of the 20,189 inhabitants of Hale County must have been sick two or more times to require 40,872 hard-liquor prescriptions, for an average consumption of 2.02 pints per capita during the 90-day period.

"In Yoakum County the condition must be dreadful. The estimated population is 2,050, and it took 21,262 pints of hard liquor to relieve the sickness there during January, February, and March. That is an average of 10.37 pints—about 8 times the State average. But that county is bone dry. * * * The prohibitionists won a great victory when the county refused to legalize beer last spring by 582 for prohibition and 277 against."

Why do the people in the United States still accept the fallacious belief that legislating against beer licenses and liquor will put a stop to drinking? What usually happens is that a dry area raises a new crop of hypocrites.

Highway Bridges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, today this House adopted the conference report on the Mackinac Straits bridge bill, very much in accordance with a bill which I introduced last year by which this Congress grants consent to the State of Michigan to bridge the Straits of Mackinac. The State can, of course, and is expected to, delegate this authority to some State agency. By an act of the 1934 State legislature, the Mackinac Straits Bridge Authority was created to study this question and to construct such a bridge. Therefore, I expect that the State will unquestionably designate the authority as its agency.

Many arguments have been advanced for and against the Mackinac Straits bridge. Many facts and figures have been submitted. I feel, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that no study of this question would be complete without the figures which I append herewith secured by one who has long been deeply concerned with the crossing of the straits, one who was among the first to advocate the establishment of the State ferries, and one who, realizing the total inadequacy of the State ferries to cope with the situation, has long favored a permanent bridge. I refer, of course, to that grand old man of Northern Michigan, our former Governor, Chase S. Osborn. His editorial appeared in the Sault Ste. Marie Evening News, September 9, 1940.

[From the Sault Ste. Marie (Mich.) Evening News of September 9, 1940]

HIGHWAY BRIDGES IN FLORIDA

(By Chase S. Osborn)

The State of Michigan is a summer Florida and the State of Florida is a winter Michigan. In other words, they are both greatly interested in visitors, especially those called tourists, and both offer superb attractions.

When it comes to bridges, both have similar interests also, but Michigan is yet without the vision of Florida. We are just beginning to awaken. Florida has a billion-dollar tourist industry in the winter. Michigan can have the same in the summer.

The State of Florida has 156 miles of bridges according to records compiled up to December 31, 1936. There have been some built since then, but they are inconsequential.

The longest single bridge in Florida, on the Key West extension, is 7 miles in length and extends from Marathon on Key Vaca to Big Pond. There is a drawspan on this bridge at Moser Channel. This bridge is 4 miles longer than the proposed Mackinac Straits structure. The Straits Bridge proper will be 3 miles long, and it will not be weakened by an open span.

The total length of bridges alone, on the Key West extension in Florida, is 19.7 miles out of a total length of 120 miles, the distance of the highway from the mainland to Key West. The Florida objective is nothing compared with that of the Mackinac Straits Bridge. The latter not only gives access to the Upper Peninsula, the playground of Michigan all the year, but also opens a shorter route to the entire Northwest.

Most of the bridges and ferries in Florida are public. However, there are 11 ferries and bridges that are privately owned. These have tolls that are regulated by the State and are reasonable.

The State of Florida has only two toll bridges and one toll ferry. On these the rates are negligible, such as 25 cents over the public ferry that crosses Crooked River, 6.1 miles northerly from Carrabelle. It is free in the daytime but there is a charge of 25 cents at night.

The only public bridges that charge tolls are those 37 miles northeast of Key West and 2 miles east of Lillian.

This information was obtained officially by me from the State road department at Tallahassee, Fla., where Hon. Clyde J. Baser is director of public relations.

It has been stated that the bridges of Florida have cost more money than those of Michigan, even including the one at Mackinac Straits.

I hope those few people who have so little reason to be opposed to the Mackinac Straits Bridge will consider these figures.

RADIO ADDRESS BY EARL GODWIN

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Mr. Earl Godwin:

This is Earl Godwin speaking to you from Washington, to supplement the bulletins announcing the death of WILLIAM BANKHEAD, Speaker of the House of Representatives, with a word picture of the man from one who from the press and radio galleries watched the entrance, the work, the triumph of a truly great American statesman.

I knew and loved WILLIAM BANKHEAD, and I deeply respected him because he was an American in every thought and act. He was a member of a family deeply rooted in Americanism. I remember the day he was sworn into the House, because there was a new man in the House whose father was at the same time in the Senate from Alabama. His father had been a Confederate officer (4 years' service and three wounds). Incidentally, how many times have I heard Mr. BANKHEAD'S close friend and coworker, Representative SAM RAYBURN, of Texas, leader of the majority, say these words, "The best men these United States have ever produced were those fellows who came out of the Civil War." Incidentally, the House cannot function for a minute without the Speaker, and so, in all probability, Mr. BANKHEAD'S friend, SAM RAYBURN, will be elected Speaker tomorrow, at noon. WILLIAM BANKHEAD'S brother, JOHN, is now in the same seat his father had in the Senate, and the late Speaker is the only man to have been chairman of the powerful Rules Committee, floor leader for his majority party, and also Speaker.

There have been times that the best way to address him was by the name his close friends had for him, just plain Bill. The Speaker of the House rates, always rates the proper and dignified appellation Mr. Speaker. I recall very well the occasion of the first day of the present session of Congress. I was at the microphone in the House describing the scene. Mr. BANKHEAD was to come on immediately, I to introduce him, and with a great deal of nerve I said:

"I will introduce him to you of America by the great title of the completely democratic office he holds, which is Mr. Speaker, but I can best describe his homespun character when I say that to those who love him he is still BILL BANKHEAD," and do you know, he loved it, and said so.

Here was a man who was completely a democrat in his philosophy of life and government; and he stuck to it; and did not compromise. A progressive Democrat; and a Democrat who thrilled thousands upon thousands who heard him speak on hundreds of occasions in his long colorful life, and as democracy progressed WILLIAM BANKHEAD progressed. He was genuinely in tune with the progress of his party. When anyone questioned that in late years he would always say with gentle emphasis "I am a new dealer," and the New Deal owes it to Speaker BANKHEAD that many a time he helped them in a tight spot on Capitol Hill.

Southern Members of Congress have a way of staying in Congress; the constituents take the view expressed often by the late Champ Clark of Missouri—a great Speaker, too—which was that once a district finds a good man it is to the interest of the constituents to keep him in office. He grows in experience and grows in value to Nation, State, and district because with his passing years he steps upward in Congress. BANKHEAD increased in the wisdom of his counsel and the weight of his influence.

Coming from the agricultural South, the years of his service have had great impact on farm legislation in such fundamentals as aid to farm tenants in the owning of farms. Throughout the administration, particularly in the years of his leadership and Speakership, he had been one of the small coterie of experienced lawmakers who have made the House conspicuous for its teamwork. And in this present session especially notable for the fact that its leaders laid down a program of legislation and carried it through almost on the minute. The old football team training no doubt, for BILL BANKHEAD was fullback at Alabama University. He and I were swimming in the Chesapeake Bay 3 weeks ago and he pointed out the effects of an old knee injury, which he contracted as he plunged through the line without interference.

We were guests of a prominent Washingtonian at this swimming party, and as we sat down to dinner the Speaker arose and said to his host, "May I ask you to indulge me in a family custom from time immemorial; may I ask a blessing on this meal?" And as we bowed our heads the Speaker asked God to bless the food before us. And he carried that principle through life. He believed in God.

A good judge of human nature. We were speaking together once of a man of high prominence, but doubtful reputation, "I have never spoken to him," said Mr. BANKHEAD, "but I don't have to learn of his character from others. I have seen him, and you know, God has a very effective way of writing character in a man's face."

He was a tremendous believer in the House of Representatives, in which he served so faithfully, so conspicuously, for all but a quarter century. Sitting with him in the House lobby a few days ago we were speaking of the great American character of that body. "Inside those doors," said he to me, "is the heart and soul of this Republic. America will not go wrong as long as we keep it that way."

He was true to his friends and they were and are true to him. He believed earnestly and sincerely that he had no right to give up his fight for the Vice Presidential nomination at Chicago, and it was his loyalty to his friends that took him a few days ago to Baltimore to address the great meeting at which he was scheduled to speak. He was in pain, but he said, "As long as I am able to stand on my feet I will make that speech, and I will not let those friends of mine down." And he gritted his teeth and went ahead until sheer pain rendered him unconscious and he could not make the address.

Nor will he make another in this material world. But there will remain in the memory of Washingtonians, in the memory of the great army of statesmen who served with him, in the memory of visitors to the galleries—there will remain in the hearts and minds of newspapermen and radio correspondents who were admitted to gallery privileges under the Bankhead regime the vigorous, vibrant, meaningful tones of Speaker BANKHEAD as daily he mounted the rostrum and brought down the gavel at noon with the words:

"The House will be in order."

ARTICLE FROM THE DENISON (TEX.) HERALD

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I submit herewith an article concerning Speaker SAM RAYBURN.

This article appeared June 23, 1940, in the Denison Herald of Denison, Tex., and was written by Mr. George W. Stimpson, formerly president of the National Press Club of Washington.

It pays a beautiful and well-deserved tribute to the Speaker of the House, and will also be of interest since it is from the pen of one of the most popular and much beloved members of the press gallery.

The article follows:

[From the Denison (Tex.) Herald of June 23, 1940]

SAM RAYBURN IS LAUDED AS MOST VITAL MEMBER OF CONGRESS

(By George W. Stimpson)

(To get an intimate glimpse of Representative SAM RAYBURN, of this (Fourth) congressional district, the Denison (Tex.) Herald asked one of the best-known Washington correspondents to write the story. George W. Stimpson, author, correspondent, and former president of the National Press Club, responded with the following story. Mr. Stimpson describes the Bonham Congressman as "the leader and most vital and important Member of the Congress of the United States."—Editor's note.)

Without SAM RAYBURN the great Red River project would not now be in process of construction.

Without SAM RAYBURN there would not be a lot of other good things in the world.

The Fourth Congressional District is to be congratulated in giving the Nation a public servant of the first order and at the same time having a Congressman ever on the alert to serve the best interests of his district.

His fellow Congressmen say in Washington that SAM RAYBURN is level-headed and has his feet on the ground. We newspaper correspondents think he is the salt of the earth.

To understand SAM RAYBURN you should know something of the long, hard struggle that has brought him from a 40-acre cotton farm in north Texas to a seat in the high councils of the Nation.

PICTURES ARE INSPIRATION

On the mantelpiece in SAM RAYBURN'S office in the National Capitol are two pictures. One is that of an elderly man, with a beard, sharp, firmly chiseled features, apparently tall and spare, sitting informally in a chair, perhaps in his own yard. The other is that of an elderly woman, with white hair, classic features, a firm but kindly face, bespeaking strong character.

These are the father and mother of SAM RAYBURN, the leader and most vital and important Member of the Congress of the United States, responsible for making the laws that govern more than 130,000,000 people.

SAM RAYBURN often looks longingly at these photographs of his pioneer parents, who gave him life, who reared him, who molded his character, who made him what he is today—a leader among leaders in one of the most critical periods of American history.

"Their lives are a source of continual inspiration to me," he once said, half to himself and half to me. "It is good for us to ponder on the part these pioneers played in the building of our country."

SAM RAYBURN'S people lived in the hill country of eastern Tennessee and were of Anglo-Saxon stock who migrated westward from the Atlantic seaboard. His father, William Marion Rayburn, was orphaned and was brought up by a kind uncle. At the outbreak of the Civil War William Marion Rayburn enlisted in the Confederate Army and rode with the legions of Lee to the bitter end of that struggle. His popularity among his comrades is evidenced by the fact that he was chosen captain of his company, an honor which he declined.

HIS FATHER A CONFEDERATE

When the Confederacy collapsed and General Lee rode to Appomattox Courthouse to meet Grant, the hearts of 50,000 southern boys beat with new hope because of the liberal terms of capitulation. Grant, noticing Lee's dress sword at his side, wrote into the articles of capitulation a provision that the officers might keep their side arms. But what was more important, the liberal conqueror agreed that the southern soldiers might keep their horses. After years of near famine, they needed those horses to put in the spring crop.

Like thousands of others who had followed the fortunes of Lee and the storm-cradled nation that fell, William Marion Rayburn started back on his dappled-gray mare to the hills of east Tennessee. The war was over and he had only one thought in mind—to hurry back to the little bottom-land farm on Clinch Creek and to provide for his widowed mother. He had his horse and there was still time to plant corn.

But at Knoxville a thing happened that the paroled soldier never forgot nor forgave. The incident so embittered the youth that he remained an unreconstructed rebel and Yankee-hater to the day of his death nearly 50 years later. The Federals took his horse away from him in violation of Grant's promise.

CHALLENGE IS ACCEPTED

Tired and footsore, he walked the rest of the way to what had been his comfortable home in the Clinch Valley in Roane County. His mother was safe, but nearly all the property had been destroyed by bushwhackers and guerrillas who fought for neither side but plundered both. But William Marion Rayburn accepted the challenge and went to work.

The greatest event in the life of the former Confederate soldier occurred shortly afterward when he was married to Martha Waller, a descendant of an old Virginia family. Children came along in due season. Ten of them were born to William Marion and Martha Rayburn on Clinch Creek—seven boys and three girls. The eighth child was christened SAMUEL TALIAFERRO RAYBURN. We know him by the short and simple name, SAM RAYBURN.

The Rayburns were healthy, industrious, thrifty, and upright folk, and in spite of the many mouths to feed they prospered in a small way on the little corn farm in the Tennessee hills. But opportunity was limited on the bottom lands, and in 1887, when Sam was 5, William Marion and Martha Rayburn decided to sell their place and go to Texas. Texas! All Tennesseans of those days who went anywhere went to Texas. That decision, hard to make, was an important one, because it made SAM RAYBURN, a Texan.

Sam has only a hazy recollection of his childhood life in Tennessee. He can still smell the leather-coat apples from trees that grew near the house. The steamboats, carrying farm produce up and down the Clinch, made an indelible impression on his boyhood mind. The tall smokestacks, with their ruffle-like funnels, fascinated him. To this day he is thrilled by the sight of a steamboat.

THE FAMILY TO TEXAS

The great Norris Dam, keystone of the national power arch, is within a few miles of the birthplace of SAM RAYBURN, author of the Utilities Act.

The long journey from Tennessee to Texas can be better imagined than described. Most of the trip was by train. There were two babies younger than 5-year-old Sam. A family of 12—father and mother and 10 children—with all their personal belongings, had pulled their very roots out of the hills of Tennessee and were off for Texas.

William Marion Rayburn must have been a remarkable man, but Martha Rayburn must have been an even more remarkable woman. It took strength and courage and vision and mother love to take 10 children to a far-away and to them unknown country in the West and start life anew.

The destination was Fannin County, where the pioneers arrived safely, after the long journey, in early spring. With all his earthly savings in his pocket, William Marion Rayburn began to look for a farm. He bought 40 acres of black land and the large family moved into a little frame house, which continued to be the home of the parents and some of the children for more than a quarter of a century.

In Tennessee the Rayburns had been corn farmers. Now they planted cotton, a new crop in north Texas. They knew nothing of raising cotton; neither did anybody else around Windom. The first year the rain fell in torrents and flooded the black land; bollworms, tasting cotton for the first time in that region, followed the rain. William Marion Rayburn made only two and a half bales that first year. It was tough going, with a family of 12, but there was no thought of turning back.

INTERESTED IN PUBLIC AFFAIRS

Another son was born in those early days in Texas. An uncle came to live with the family. There were now 14 members of the family under that one little roof. Providence smiled on the Rayburns, and the farm prospered. The father became a great reader, keenly interested in public affairs. He loved horses and was a fine horseman. I have heard Sam say that his father could drive a team faster than anybody he ever knew.

Sam got his elementary schooling in a two-teacher country school in the neighborhood. But he yearned for a better education. We suspect that even then he had an itch to get into politics. This was easier thought of than done, because no one of the name had ever run for anything. Besides, there was the difficult problem of going to school and improving himself.

"Father, I would like to go away to school."

The very suggestion required courage, as the father and son stood in the cottonfield one summer day 40 years ago.

There was cotton to pick—Sam was good at it—and there were 11 children in the family, and 40 acres of black land was not producing enough to send them all to college. In all things the Rayburns should share equally.

YOUNG SAM PERSISTS

But Sam persisted that day in the cottonfield. He told his father that he did not want money. There would be no trouble with the cotton picking, he thought, and he would manage somehow to pay his expenses at college. He only wanted his father's permission to go.

In the end the boy won the argument. There in the cottonfield with his father, with the door of opportunity opened before him; there on the black land of north Texas, where he had grown almost to manhood under the stern guidance and loving care of his pioneer parents, SAM RAYBURN vowed that he would always stick with his people, and his friends and neighbors know that he has kept that vow.

W. L. Mayo, a truly great educator, was then operating the East Texas Normal College at Commerce, some 14 miles from the Rayburn farm. There boys and girls, with little preparation, could obtain an education at small cost.

William Marion Rayburn hitched his horses to the old buggy and drove Sam to Ladonia, where they took the train for Wolfe City. As Sam climbed up the steps of the coach his father handed him $25. Nobody knew better than Sam what that $25 meant to his father.

Mayo (Sam never speaks of him except with a sort of reverence) gave him credit for a room in a dormitory. He got a job ringing the college bell. Another student and he formed a partnership to sweep up one of the school buildings, for which they received $8 a month. Sam's share, as junior partner of the firm, was $3.

He studied hard, read many books on biography and history, and was given a teacher's certificate at the end of the first term. To earn money to go back to school he taught in Hopkins County a year and returned to Commerce for a B. S. degree. Another year he taught in the little two-teacher school in Fannin County where he had first gone to school himself.

Sam continued to make his home under the family roof on the farm. One of his brothers had died. The rest of the family clung pretty close together. William Marion Rayburn liked to have the whole family at home at the same time. Those were happy days, but Sam was impatient to start out on a public career. He did a lot of reading those days, mostly about the great men who made America.

A LEGISLATOR WHEN 24

In 1906 he decided to try for the legislature. He rode all over Fannin County on a little brown pony, seeing the voters, talking politics and farming with everybody, and making friends wherever he went. At 24 he found himself a member of the legislature, where he made good from the beginning. While a member of the house down at Austin he studied law a year at the university and was admitted to the Texas bar in 1908. The same year he hung out his shingle in front of a little office in Bonham.

Service at Austin presented opportunity for development, for growth, for study, for the acquisition of knowledge of men and measures. In 1911, at the age of 29, he was Speaker of the House and his fame was spreading over the State far beyond the confines of Bonham and Fannin Counties.

He had been think of running for Congress as far back as he could remember and he decided that his time had come. He had no organization. He just ran. There was no particular issue agitating the people at the moment. He wanted to go to Congress and he told folks so. At 30 he was a Member of Congress.

ON A POWERFUL COMMITTEE

That was in 1913. President Wilson, whom Sam saw inaugurated, called a special session and the House organized immediately that year. The young Member from Bonham was assigned to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, which had just been made an exclusive committee. He never served on any other standing committee from that day until 20 years later when he became its chairman. In 1936 he left that committee to become Democratic majority leader.

Sam struck up a close friendship with JOHN N. GARNER, who already had served in Congress 10 years when SAM arrived on the scene. They had grown up in the same kind of country in north Texas and they had many things in common. Both were honest, straightforward, square shooting, and believed in reaching their goals by patient, hard work and by mastering the problems and situations with which they were confronted. Both built on a solid rock foundation and both succeeded in winning the complete confidence and respect of their colleagues.

A GREAT AMERICAN

I have related these details because I think they are an essential part of the portrait of this great American. The long road of struggle and hardship of his family are part and parcel of the man.

SAM RAYBURN is of the very soil of north Texas. His attitude toward his own people shows it. The Rayburns still meet whenever possible at the homestead near Bonham. Two brothers, Tom and Will, and a sister, Miss Lou, still live on the farm. There are nine beds in the house and plenty to eat. SAM RAYBURN, like his father before him, would rather be at home than any other place on earth.

Last summer I received a note from him, which read: "I am having a great time on the farm, riding horses some, fishing some, sleeping long. I do trust you will come this way while I am home. The door is wide open and the chickens' legs are yellow."

Only one familiar with the strenuous life he lives in Washington can appreciate what it means to SAM RAYBURN to be among his own people.

He likes to relax from his nerve-racking labors in Washington by talking with his family, his neighbors, his friends, and those he has known from boyhood; by looking over his white-faced cattle and his registered prize Jersey bulls; by taking early morning rides to the river ranch; by fishing in his well-stocked small lake—the things that make life worth while. Greatness has never spoiled SAM RAYBURN.

A NATURAL LEADER

Equipped with natural ability, poise, dignity, and the qualities of leadership, the majority leader of the House has been an effective Member of Congress from the beginning. During the 27 years he has been in Congress he has become familiar with the procedure, has acquired wide experience as a legislator, and has steadily grown in the esteem of his fellow Members.

I had intended to list some of the important laws on the statute books for which he was primarily responsible. But I find it would require two or three newspaper columns merely to name them.

Many people love SAM RAYBURN; everybody respects him who knows him, because he is honest, able, true, and will not lie. He plays square with both his constituents and his colleagues in the House, and they know it. He never indulges in demagogic speeches. He has been an outstanding New Deal and administration leader and his counsel is continually sought by President Roosevelt. Perhaps the greatest tribute that can be paid to his integrity and judgment is the simple fact that he has the complete confidence of all factions of the motley group known as Democrats in the House.

PILOTS VITAL LEGISLATION

Even as chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, before he became majority leader, he did more than almost any other Member to promote New Deal legislation in the House. He piloted through such legislation as the Railroad Act, the Stock Exchange Act, the Communications Act, the Electrification Act, the Motor Carriers Act, and the Holding Company Act.

A farmer by birth and blood, he has taken a keen interest in the farm program. In fact, he looks at the general welfare of all classes and conditions of men and strives to accomplish the greatest good for the greatest number.

He was one of the first to advocate an intelligent long-range flood-control, power, and water-conservation program. Long ago he saw that the waters of our great rivers are blessings if they can be harnessed so as to serve instead of destroy. Years ago he pointed out the importance of building dams and reservoirs on the upper reaches of rivers to protect our fertile land, to prevent floods, to conserve water, and to produce power.

THE BEST REPRESENTATION

SAM RAYBURN has a high sense of his responsibility as the leader of the majority party in Congress, and he believes it is his duty to get things done. Long experience in public life has developed his powers as an able speaker, good parliamentarian, and keen observer of men.

He has a rare sense of humor and gets many a chuckle out of his work; but at bottom he is serious, and on occasion he gets downright mad, but usually only when he has a good right to. He rarely goes out socially if he can avoid it. His life at Washington is as simple and unostentatious as his life at home.

The people of the Fourth Texas Congressional District have a right to be proud of their Congressman. By sending SAM RAYBURN to Congress all these years they have given the Nation a great leader and themselves the best possible representation in Washington.

The Voice of Experience

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, September 14, I placed in the RECORD an article which I had prepared entitled "Caught in the Draft." This article has received widespread acclaim, and every mail brings many more letters adding additional evidence of the need for the sort of thing which I sought to do for the benefit and protection of the draftees and volunteers who are about to be taken into the armed forces of the United States.

I hope the advice it carried and also the information contained in the two following letters, which come as a voice out of the experience of the past, will be given widespread circulation and that errors of the sort recited and which all ex-servicemen know so well are all too true will be eliminated as far as possible in the present engagement.

The letters referred to are as follows:

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read in the September 14, 1940, issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in the Appendix part, the extension of your remarks under the title "Caught in the Draft." And also that you say you were a veteran of the first World War, 1917–18.

What you said about service men of those days is only too true; of records being lost or in some way misplaced, and soldiers having a hard time to remember or find and prove former disabilities in service and all those related matters we went through. I know of myself, I was only too anxious to get home to bother much about nervous and shellshock disabilities. I never thought of trying for a pension at all at that time; "home" was all I thought about.

Today, as I face the half-century milestone of my life, I feel I ought to have a pension. I've tried several times to get service-connection, even nonservice, too, but never succeeded. I don't even know if my war record is in Washington today. There's always so much "red tape" to prove service and so little I can prove today, as I cannot locate officers and men—for reasons hereafter listed—who knew me in the Regular Army outfit I was a soldier in in 1918, with the A. E. F. All are now either dead or scattered to the four winds on earth. I have no family, am single, and all relatives and both my parents dead these many years. There's not a person living today of either friend or relative that could help me prove war service. Because of this fact, I have made no effort to try to get on the pension rolls. My nervousness has prevented me from work and it is nearly 20 years since I held a job. Neither am I eligible for Social Security because of this. If it were not for the fact of a trust fund left me my my deceased parents I'd be penniless and likely an inmate of some poor farm, or maybe even dead. But this was not my reason for writing you at all. As I can't prove war service, why try, when there are so many worse off than I that deserve it more?

You spoke of some advice to young 1940 draftees in that they should keep diaries. That is good advice when service is to be only in the U. S. A. and its possessions. But what about foreign shores?

I started and kept a diary and the names and addresses of many buddies of the first World War, and my officers as well, even the doctors, but when I reached France and had been there about 3 months in the training camp, school of artillery, and on the range, one of my division officers, a general (I believe his rank was Brigadier General Haan (I never knew his initials) came through inspecting us and happened to catch me in quarters writing in my diary just personal items that would not have benefited an enemy if one had seen the diary or I had been captured or killed and it found on me.

I never spoke in it of anything military. Even my Army officer ratings were as "Mr. So-and-So." Never his rank. But to make a long story short, this General Haan "blew up like a 75-mm. field piece." Boy, I've never forgotten his words nor facial expressions. I all but landed in the guardhouse and he actually ordered my arrest and trial by drum-head court martial. I fully believe if it had not been for my good record as a soldier and the fact that my lieutenant, Soper, had not interceded for me, I would have been court-martialed and shot the following day. General Haan cited a dozen reasons and rules against carrying any papers, diaries, etc., on one's person within the war zone of France, each ruling with a penalty of disgrace and death. He said I was "aiding and abetting" the Germans by having a written diary on my person, and so ordered my arrest to quarters. If I could only locate some of the men and officers of my old outfit I'm sure they would remember that incident, which can still make me shiver a bit to think how close I came to a dishonorable discharge and shot at sunrise.

This ruling may not have been so in many of the outfits, but it was in ours, and there were quite a number of such books and papers destroyed when my "disgrace" became battery news, many being burned in the cook-shack stove that same night, so my buddies told me.

So if this is the case in a future war of such personal papers "aiding and abetting an enemy," would not it be just as well not to suggest such things to younger minds?

Of course, I understand these names, etc., would be of great service in case of war wounds, but if the penalty for keeping such on one's person was court martial and death, what then?

I hope you'll excuse some mistakes I've made in writing. I can't see as well as I used to, and forgive the liberty I've taken, too, in addressing this letter to you. 'Twas only meant in good part.

I wish for you good health and good fortune, and thank you, sir.

Sincerely,

CHARLES TALMADGE COBB.

COLLINSVILLE, ALA., September 16, 1940.

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES, DEPARTMENT OF MISSISSIPPI,
Jackson, Miss., Sept. 17, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ALEXANDER: I read with much interest your remarks as they appeared in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 14, 1940, under the heading "Caught in the Draft." I want to say that you have probably thrown more accurate light upon the veteran's plight than has ever appeared before in any official publication.

I cannot remember offhand whether or not you are a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation in the House of Representatives. But, no doubt, you will be interested in a tabulation of Mississippi Army veterans during the World War which appears at page 124 to page 128 of the printed hearings before that committee beginning February 1, 1940. The hearings are in book form.

This tabulation shows that of 15,904 Mississippi white veterans who served overseas during the World War, 466 were found disabled to some degree at time of discharge.

The significant feature of this showing, it appears to us, is the discrepancy in the ratios between the Mississippi veterans' records at time of discharge and the ratios in the whole United States Army, as recorded officially.

In other words, there were 53,000 men killed in action during the World War and 201,000 wounded, a ratio of 1 to 4. But, if these same ratios held good for Mississippi, with 300 killed in action, then it appears that 1,200 Mississippi overseas veterans should have been found disabled to some degree at time of discharge from wounds alone.

As it was, only 466 were found disabled from all causes.

I have also heard numerous veterans who did not have overseas service complain of the same lack of official records. They are usually among men who were shifted constantly from one outfit to another, with consequent periods when there was a lapse in the official records.

All the boys compliment you on the substance of your remarks, and feel that possibly many of those who may now enter the Army will now benefit from our experiences in the World War.

At least you have given them the information. It is up to them to profit by it.

With best wishes from all, I am,

Respectfully,

T. K. STAPLETON,
Department Liaison Officer, V. F. W., Jackson, Miss.

Southern Indiana Labor Day Association Meeting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SHERMAN MINTON
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 20 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. SHERMAN MINTON, OF INDIANA

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by me before the Southern Indiana Labor Day Association at Mount Carmel, Ill., on September 2, 1940.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, 2 years ago I met with you in Boonville. Then, there was no war. We could turn our attention almost exclusively to the consideration of our domestic problems. We breathed the air of free men, and we turned our attention to the solution of problems that had to do with the right to work; the right to be protected in health, and the security of that job and fair wage and hour standards for those who worked. Although there was an unfortunate division in the house of organized labor at the time, there was no one but what believed that soon that division would be solved and the united front of organized labor would present the case of the workers and justice would be done. Unhappily, that division has not yet been overcome, but I believe we can fairly say that it is well on the way toward a favorable termination.

Men and women within the sound of my voice have lived through this long, hard fight for the right of labor to bargain collectively by representatives of their own choosing. Today all parties admit the right of labor to bargain collectively. There are men here today who had to fight a long and bitter struggle to gain recognition of that fundamental right. No one in this democratic country of ours has the hardihood to say that labor shall not have the right to bargain collectively, but it is only within the past 5 years that a government in power in Washington was brave and honest enough to guarantee that right to bargain collectively, by writing it into the law of the land, that you workers could organize and select your own bargaining agents, and no employer would be permitted to wreck your organization, or compel you to sign and work under a yellow-dog contract.

I am proud to say that within my political lifetime in Washington your Magna Carta, the Wagner Act, was placed upon the statute books of the Nation. I voted for that law, and I intend to do what I can to see that that law is not emasculated and destroyed by the interests that sought to prevent its enactment. You may have some differences of opinion among you as to some changes that ought or ought not to be made in that act, but there is no difference of opinion among you as to the preservation of the act.

Much criticism has been heaped upon the Board charged with the administration of the act. Some of it is justified, but that act has never had a fair chance to work unhampered. It has never been accepted by some employers as the law of the land, although the Supreme Court upheld the law 3 years ago. You all remember how employers rejected the law and refused to obey it because some Liberty League lawyers had told them it was unconstitutional. The first 18 months of that law's existence just one order of the Labor Board was obeyed. One hundred injunction suits were field against the Labor Board and the rights of labor so persistently denied by employers in defiance of the law of the land that labor, as a last resort and as its only weapon, had to resort to the strike. But now, since the law has been upheld, most employers have obeyed it. And today, because labor has a tribunal to protect its rights, there are fewer strikes than ever before; 94 percent of all labor disputes arising under the act are now settled amicably by the parties themselves agreeing or the Labor Board dismissing the proceedings. Only 6 percent of the complaints ever come to trial, and of these the employers win almost half. So, as the act is accepted and the Board is freed from harassing opposition, the problems work out more smoothly.

I am willing to meet the problems that are presented, which reveal the need of some amendments to the act, but I want the amendments to come from labor and the friends of the act, and not from its enemies. The Wagner Act is here to stay. Collective bargaining is no longer a theory; it is a practical, just method that workers insist upon as their right. It has been a long hard fight against strikebreakers, spies, tear gas, machine guns, blacklists, and the "yellow dog" contracts, but the victory is yours.

Another bit of legislation in protection of labor has also been put upon the statute books during my senatorial lifetime. I refer to the wage and hour legislation. For years we have heard the doctrine preached in this country that we had to have a high tariff wall to protect labor against the cheap labor of Europe and Asia, while at the same time the business concerns that profited by the tariff were importing from Europe and Asia this same cheap labor to be exploited right here in America. That wasn't all. While the tariff wall may protect us from the cheap labor of Europe and Asia, it was not possible to enact a tariff wall that would protect us of the North against the slavery economy of the South that still existed, although the Civil War was supposed to have abolished it. The war did free the Negroes, but it didn't abolish slavery. It did not abolish the sweatshop of the East and the North. I had a manufacturer of furniture in southern Indiana tell me that he was paying his spray-gun operators that spray the varnish upon the furniture 40 cents an hour for an 8-hour day, while his competitor in Memphis, Tenn., was hiring colored women at 8 cents an hour and working them 10 hours a day. Obviously this northern manufacturer found it difficult to compete with the low-paid labor of his competitor. It wasn't cheap labor from Europe and Asia he needed protection against; it was cheap labor practices in America.

Organized labor has insisted with Abraham Lincoln that this Nation cannot exist half slave and half free, and organized labor demanded, and we passed, the wage and hour legislation that outlawed the sweatshop, child labor, and slavery economy. I know that this law has not reached the smooth operation that assures us today the goal that organized labor has set for wages and hours to the workers of this country, but we will not turn back to the old days that permitted the unrestrained exploitation of labor through poor pay and long hours.

The American worker is a free man, entitled to a free man's heritage, the right to work reasonable hours for a fair wage.

In addition to the wage and hour legislation and the Wagner Act, factory and mine safety, sanitation, and workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance, and old-age pensions have protected and been assured by the law of the land to the workers. These things did not just happen; they were brought about by the splendid labor organizations of this enlightened and free country. Today you have the right to organize, to bargain, and to receive a fair wage for a fair day's work. Your labor unions are the citadels of your freedom. Thank God that freedom of workers to have the protection of their labor unions is still permitted the workers of America.

I am sorry to say that such is not the condition of the rest of the world today. In Europe, outside of England and little Switzerland, there are no labor unions. All of Europe, except England and Switzerland, is dominated by Hitler and his fellow dictators. Hitler came to power in Germany on his promise to the businessmen that he would destroy the labor unions. Big business in Germany financed the political party of Hitler and built him up with his political goons until they were able to keep their promise with business to destroy the labor unions, and then, to show who was boss, Hitler ran out of the country many of the great industrialists like Fritz Thyssen, who had financed him.

Until recently the International Labor Office in Geneva, Switzerland, represented over 25,000,000 organized labor workers throughout the world. The United States contributed $250,000 a year to the support of that office. Now the office is closed and what is left of it has been moved to America. Trade-unions have been stamped out all over the continent of Europe that Hitler occupies or dominates, and the organizers of labor in these countries were thrown into concentration camps or shot. That is the picture in Europe today. Trade-unionism destroyed, collective bargaining gone, wages and hours are considered not at all in a land of forced labor and concentration camps.

"What has that to do with us?" you say. "That is Europe, this is America. What happens over there does not concern us." Let me direct your attention to the days first following the last war. The war was over and we were told that we could forget the war and turn our attention to the peaceful pursuits on the road back to normalcy. We did. We ignored Europe, and one nation, a defeated nation, being a nation of brave, smart, and enterprising people, bided its time and started to pay attention to war, while we were fed up on war and had turned back on the road to normalcy. That nation that prepared for war built the greatest military machine the world has ever seen. Let us get the picture. I don't like it any better than you do, but we must face the facts. I don't like Hitler any better than you do, but he has enslaved Europe and he commands the greatest military machine in all history. He has conquered nation after nation, stamping out labor unions as he goes on to enslave the people he conquers. Today he controls most of the greatest industrial plants and regions in the world. He controls most of the shipbuilding yards and an enormous merchant marine. He has millions of men under arms and millions more engaged in the war industries. If he should quit making war tomorrow, what would he do with his millions of demobilized soldiers and his idle workmen, turned out of his munitions plants? Europe could not provide work for them. Consequently, Hitler has got to make war and tap the rich resources of the other nations. He would have to support his teeming millions. Where better could he turn than to the rich storehouses, fertile fields, and mines of this hemisphere. I don't want to appear as an alarmist. I want to be sane and realistic, if I can. Especially, do I want to be sane when I talk to you, the workers of the country, because upon your backs rests the burden of the Nation, whether at war or at peace. It is your sons who always fight the wars. It is in the sweat of your faces that wars are paid for. It is your sons, more than any others, who make the sacrifices on the fields of battle.

We don't want war. We want peace. We want only to be let alone to live our own life in peace and on decent relations with our neighbor. But the choice of peace or war does not always lie with us. Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Poland, Czechoslovakia, all wanted peace. Some of them, like Norway, Denmark, and Holland, thought they knew the way to everlasting peace. They thought that all they had to do was mind their own business, and be unprepared, and ask to be let alone. This, they thought, would bring them peace; but there came a day of rude awakening. They discovered that although they had committed no offense, except to stand across the path of a ruthless, brutal, ambitious man, war was made upon them. They stand today conquered, enslaved, and a subjugated people; conquered by a man who hates democracies and has repeatedly said they ought to be destroyed and has set himself the task to destroy these democracies. His task is about complete in Europe. Only England stands out against him, and I devoutly pray may ever stand against him, but I fear she cannot. I fear she must inevitably succumb before the might and terrible force of this monstrous military machine.

In this world at war, what is our duty? Can we take the chance of assuming that Hitler, who hates democracies and has set himself the task to destroy them, will leave us, the richest and most desirable of all the democracies, severely alone? Can we safely assume that this modern descendant of Attila the Hun, this modern Alexander the Great, will rest on his arms when there are yet worlds to conquer? Can we safely assume that we have nothing to fear from this scourge of free peoples? I do not think we can. We are not going to go over there to fight in Europe's war. No one wants to do that. On the other hand, we have got to be prepared to defend the shores of America, the finest land that free, God-fearing men have ever called their home. It is our precious home, and we cannot afford to have it exposed to the greatest threat that humanity has ever faced in man's long history. We want to be strong enough to defend America's shores, even against the hordes of Hitler, the most brutal, evil genius in human history. We want to be so strong in our defense preparation that he dare not attack us.

When Hitler's great military machine crashed across Europe, through the Low Countries and France, destroying with the fury of an earthquake these countries, America stood aghast and unable to understand the power of this incredible military machine. When the import of what had happened gradually dawned upon America, our people, with almost one voice, shouted for preparedness. Some wanted to know why we were not better prepared, some were critical of this administration because the country was not better prepared, forgetting that in the 1920's, when we were on the road back to normalcy, we had, in accordance with treaties we made in those years, sunk our Navy and permitted our standing Army to fall to the lowest figure in modern times. The truth is that this administration has done more to build up our defenses than any other. But as Hitler rolled over Europe America yelled and screamed for preparedness. The Congress, yielding to what was a universal demand for preparedness, authorized the appropriation of ten billions of dollars with which to purchase battleships, airplanes, tanks, guns, and equipment of all kinds. We then summoned to Washington Messrs. Knudsen and Stettinius, and others—the great industrial leaders of the country—and set them to work upon the task of organizing the industries of the Nation to produce the defense weapons we needed. That program is well under way. Congress did not know how many, or what kind of ships, airplanes, tanks, guns, etc., to provide for our defense, and we had to call in the experts of the Army and Navy to tell us what we needed. These experts were to have the responsibility of preparing our defenses and using the weapons, if the time unhappily ever came to use them. These same experts whom we relied upon to advise us about the defense weapons we needed also had the responsibility of training and directing the men in the use of these defense weapons. They told us that in order to carry out an efficient training program they would have to have men in large numbers and the volunteer system would not produce the men in the quantities when they needed them, to enable them to carry out an efficient training program, and they had to have some kind of compulsory military training.

I know how repulsive to Americans it is to require them, or compel them to do anything. Traditionally, we have always had a small Army and, of course, had not had to resort to conscription. Military life is repugnant to the American sense of freedom and independence, but in a world whose life is ruled and dominated by war, and threats of war, we have to accept the ways of war. After authorizing the appropriation of ten billions of dollars with which to buy defense weapons, it was perfectly obvious that we had to have the men to use the weapons. I did not feel justified in appropriating billions of dollars for defense weapons, and then not providing the men to use them. I did not feel justified in taking expert advice from our Army and Navy staffs about the weapons, and then reject their advice about the men. So, it became necessary to consider the recommendations of the Army as to how many men they needed and when they wanted them. They advised Congress they wanted to build up the Regular Army and the National Guard to wartime strength, and to provide a million two hundred thousand men, for a reserve, for this establishment. They wanted the first 400,000 in camp this fall, and 400,000 next April, and 400,000 more about 6 months later. These men were to receive a 1 year training, and then go home and remain on reserve. The Army staff advised us they could not get these large numbers of men all at once under the volunteer system, and we would have to have compulsory training to get the men.

The bill now under consideration provides for the registration of all men between 21 and 31 years of age. It is estimated there are between twelve and thirteen million men of that age. After weeding out the physically unfit, those with dependents, and those in key industries, including agriculture, it is estimated there would be about 4,000,000 men in class A. So, it may be seen that a man's chances of ever being called are about 1 in 10, and if he is a class A man, without dependents, physically fit, and not in a key industry, his chances of being called are about 1 in 4. Thus, we see that the likelihood of the draft disrupting industry is remote. Men will be selected in the most democratic way, and the rich man will have to go the same as the poor man. The burden will not fall alone upon the workers. The law provides that if men, when drafted, are employed, their employer has to reemploy them when they come back. That, briefly, is the plan for conscription and the necessity for it.

If you think America is not in danger, then, of course, we don't need any army. We have never had an Army bigger than a police force. If we aren't in danger, why enlarge it? If you don't think we need be prepared to meet and defeat any possible enemies in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, then we don't need a two-ocean Navy.

I don't think you want your country to be unprepared. You love America, just as I do. I think it's worth fighting to defend, but you cannot fight to defend America if you haven't the modern weapons and the men trained to use them. I know you believe in preparedness—so do I. We cannot take a chance with our Nation's safety and the future happiness of your children and mine. I hope we won't need or have to use our armed forces. I would rather have them and not need them than to need them and not have them.

There is one thing more that is essential to preserve this land of ours and the homes of free workers. Not only must we have the weapons and the men trained to use them, but we must have the spirit of the men of Valley Forge, Gettysburg, San Juan Hill, and the Argonne. Yes; and back of them must be a united people, with a united purpose. There must be no "fifth column" in America. The greatest weapon Hitler has used in the destruction of the countries he has conquered is the weapon of the "fifth column," made up of unpatriotic, treasonable men and women who betrayed their country. When the forces of Hitler marched through Denmark the way had been prepared by the "fifth columnists," and not a finger was raised against them. Indeed, when Hitler's hordes marched into Norway, the betrayal was so great, and the deception and confusion so complete, that the police of Norway's capitol escorted their conquerors into the heart of the capitol. Brave France, that stood at Verdun "as walls of granite and gates of brass, and cried out to the world, they shall not pass," was by treachery and treason in the army and in civilian life, made the victim of the foulest betrayal in human history.

Today we are advised there is more "fifth column" activity in the United States and our neighbors to the south of us than any place else in the world. Today there exists in this country an organization that dresses in the uniform of Hitler's storm-troopers, wear upon their uniforms the insignia of the swastika, and carry the Hitler flag alongside the Stars and Stripes, while the membership give the Hitler salute and take an oath, recognizing Hitler as their leader. Only a few days ago this organization met in the State of New Jersey. Cooperating with this Hitler organization is an organization of "black shirts" that owe their allegiance to Mussolini, although they live and have their homes in America. Here is what they teach their children to recite:

"When I grow up, when, at least, I am a soldier, I shall fight for Italy, my fatherland, and I shall win. I shall take from the enemies flags and prisoners, and I shall earn many medals of valor."

That is the recitation for children of the "black shirts" in America, not Italy. Not a word about America, that gave them home and opportunity. Not a word about democracy, whose liberty lets such an organization exist at all.

Cooperating with all of them, only to confuse and in the hope that in the end they may encompass the destruction of our form of government, our religion, and our personal freedom, are the Communists, who bear allegiance not to America but to Russia; not to democracy but to Stalin, the dictator.

How can liberty and freedom survive from such threats from without and within? Let us not despair. It can be done. We, who love America and democracy, are the overwhelming majority in the country. We will not let our liberties and our freedom perish. We will prepare to defend them by standing on the shores of America to drive the invader into the sea. Standing on our free soil, in the sight of our homes, our schools, and our churches, we will stamp out the traitors to our cause.

This is America's hour of crisis. This is labor's hour of crisis. Stand fast and guard your sacred heritage as free men who have always known that liberty and freedom were worth fighting for. Pray for peace, but keep the gun loaded and your hearts steeled to the task that calls men to fight sometimes that men might live in peace.

"To every man upon this earth, death cometh soon or late;
But how can man die better than facing fearful odds
For the ashes of his fathers
And the temples of his gods?"

Present Campaign Is Struggle Between Two Opposed Theories of American Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 11 (legislative day of Monday, August 5), 1940

ADDRESS BY SOLICITOR GENERAL FRANCIS BIDDLE AT SEATTLE CIVIC AUDITORIUM

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting address delivered by Hon. Francis Biddle, Solicitor General of the United States, at the Seattle Civic Auditorium, Seattle, Wash., on August 24, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a particular pleasure for me that I am making my first speech in this campaign in Seattle, in the heart of the great Northwest, where the issues seem to me to be outlined with sharp clarity, and where you people understand exactly what they are. I tried to get my friend Judge CHARLES H. LEAVY, who represents you in the Fifth Congressional District, to come out with me, but he's too busy in Congress just now to bother with politics. But he and Senator BONE told me about some of the campaign issues that you were facing out here, and the facts behind them. And I realized that the facts here were only a variation of what happened in Oregon, in Missouri, in Tennessee, in Georgia, in Alabama, in New York State—through and across the country wherever the power controversy exists. And as I thought about our national problems and pondered them against the light of the flaming homes abroad, burned for no other crime than that they held the democratic faith, I realized that power is but one facet of a far greater issue, the issue of American democracy. This I shall now discuss.

For I sincerely believe that this campaign is a struggle between two basically opposed theories of American democracy. The struggle has continually recurred in our history. It is inherent to the eternal vigilance which is the price we all too casually pay for the freedom we have achieved. It immediately found expression in the battle between Hamilton and the Federalists, on the one hand, and Jefferson and the Democrats, on the other. Andrew Jackson dramatized it in his successful fight against Nicholas Biddle and the United States Bank. And, finally, Franklin Roosevelt, carrying on the liberal tradition of the Democratic Party, perfectly expressed it, and realized it when he defeated Hoover—the embodiment of Republican conservatism—in 1932. For the President believes, as Carl Sandburg has said, that "the durable culture of any nation rests on the mind and genius of its common folk, the masses of the people."

Expressed in terms of political faith, the philosophy of the Democratic Party has identified itself with the outlook of the man on the street, the small and independent merchant, the wage earner, and the farmer. Of these, Hamilton and the Adamses were distrustful; they feared and distrusted the people; they disliked direct action, and thought that the guidance of the country's affairs should be more safely entrusted to the class that someone has referred to as "the great washed." Their spiritual and political successors—Harrison, McKinley, Harding, Coolidge, Hoover—shared this skeptical conservatism. Good conservatives, they believed in the tariff for specially favored manufacturers. They disliked disturbing the status quo, and had a religious worship for what they liked to term the rugged individualism of the American businessman.

A misreading of American history is to imagine that this struggle (in general outline) took the form of a conflict between Federal and States' rights. When usurpation of power by the Federal Government seemed dangerous to the leaders of Democracy, as it did in the early days, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, their memories fresh from the tyranny of the power of the King, insisted on States' rights. But, when it became apparent that oppression of the people's economic interests came not from the States, powerless to cope with the situation, but from the vast conglomerations of private capital, which knew no State bounds, it was natural that the Democratic Party should turn to the Federal Government to find means for building effective curbs on the greedy and ruthless aggression which only too often characterized the march of our commercial and mechanical age. That is exactly what the New Deal has done.

Perhaps it is that which makes old-time Bull Moosers, like Harold Ickes and myself, feel so perfectly at home in the New Deal. For the Progressive movement of 1912, in which we were active, represented the same revolt against the placid indifference to crying evils characteristic of President Taft's 4 years in the White House. I never thought of Teddy Roosevelt as belonging to the Republican outlook of cautious conservatism. He had the restless impatience of the reformer with glaring social ills. And when he ran for a third term, as a Progressive, he was defeated not only because Woodrow Wilson was a more profound and consistent liberal, but because Roosevelt's own party, always pretty timid, became terrified at his moderate show of reform, and, under the gavel of Elihu Root, thought it necessary to steal the nomination from this dangerous radical who had raised his voice to protest against the system.

And therefore I say it is a real pleasure to me to talk here in the vital young State of Washington, where party lines have never been very rigid, and where the liberals and progressives pretty generally seem to line up together. Here the citizens are imbued with the aggressive and progressive ideals of the pioneer and the cooperative spirit of their Scandinavian background. The rank and file have struggled for 50 years to devise the most practicable and equitable means to live with their fellowmen rather than off them. From the fierce struggle against extravagant exploitation of natural and human resources has been born the most liberal legislation of almost any State in the country, aimed at one objective—that the resources of the State belong to all the people of the State rather than the special few. And so the New Deal ideals have found inspiration in the accomplishments of such States as Washington. For your State ranks highest in the unencumbered home ownership. It is one of the highest in literacy and lowest in illiteracy in the Union. It was one of the first States to provide comprehensive community-property laws; to grant equal woman's suffrage; successfully to obtain a minimum-wage law for women. Cooperatives have been the established way of life of the Washington farmer for years. There are 31 telephone cooperatives, all organized and operated through private local initiative. The largest telephone cooperative in the United States is now successfully operating in Skagit, Whatcom, and Snohomish Counties. Through producer, marketing, and consumer cooperatives thousands of families have learned to reduce their costs and increase their services. The Grange Cooperative Wholesale has operated among the rural areas since 1919, and the Pacific Supply Cooperative since 1933. These 2 wholesale groups have 150 combined affiliates, serving thousands of rural families.

This crisis tends to divide the country into actual lines of liberal and conservative. Could the conservatives have a more competent spokesman than the recent president of the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation, himself a shining exhibit of big business at its very biggest, the knightly champion of the utilities protesting but a little while ago—not, it must be admitted, very successfully but still protesting with all the power of his lungs—against what the Government of the United States was trying to do for the people of the United States through the Tennessee Valley Authority, through the Grand Coulee, through Bonneville?

I suspect that Mr. Willkie knows that it is difficult for the country to think of him as a liberal. They think of him as he is—a successful businessman. If you analyze his acceptance speech you will find that it is largely devoted to saying that he, Willkie, is a liberal. "I was a liberal," he cries, "before many of those men had heard the word. * * * I learned my liberalism right here in Elwood. * * * I am a liberal because I believe that in our industrial age there is no limit to the productive capacity of any man." And why should Mr. Willkie wish to make it appear that he is a liberal? Why not frankly say he is a businessman who doesn't like government regulation and therefore hates the New Deal? It is because Mr. Willkie knows that the voters are in no mood to hear the New Deal reforms attacked. And so, after stating the basic principles of his foreign policy by quoting the President, and saying he was in agreement with the President, he hastily reads a creed which sounds like a summary of New Deal legislation. It starts with these sentences, extraordinary only because they come from the lips of the former head of the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation: "I believe that the forces of free enterprise must be regulated. I am opposed to business monopolies." And thereupon he states his belief in the basic New Deal policies—collective bargaining; minimum wages and maximum hours; Federal regulation of utilities, securities markets, banking; old-age and unemployment insurance.

But words do not make a man, and if Mr. Willkie says now that he is a liberal he has never acted like one. His role is not an easy one. He will, I predict, go on fulminating against the New Deal in general terms of Republican hatred, and specifically approve its program of social betterment as he did in his acceptance speech. He will not dare to be consistent but will talk untrammeled free enterprise to the businessman, and say in the next sentence, as he did at Elwood, 'We all know that such concentration of power must be checked." The Weirs, the Pews, the Grundys, the Girdlers will not fear him because they know his record, and they know that a little mild liberal talk on the side is perfectly all right in a political campaign. Willkie will be a liberal all right, but, as he says, he will "do it by spending as little money as possible." He will be all things to all men. He will do his level best to have his liberal cake—and to eat it.

And when he is talking liberalism let us remember what he said in an address before the Economic Club of New York on January 21, 1935, as reported in the Electrical World for February 16, 1935: "I do not like to make personal reference, but I want to say to you that no duty has ever come into my life, even that in the service of my country, which has so appealed to my sense of social obligation, patriotism, and love of mankind as this—my obligation to say and do what I can—." For what? Now, get this—"for the preservation of public utilities, privately owned."

It is normal and healthy to have conservative Democrats like Al Smith, Senator Burke, and ex-Senator Reed, of Missouri, line up with the Republicans in 1940. They hated and deserted the New Deal in 1936; 4 years more of the New Deal was hardly calculated to bring them back when the great issues are up again, far more intensified than ever. No wonder the ex-president of the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation welcomed them to the ranks of the reactionaries.

I am not saying this in any flippant spirit. Firmly I believe in the two-party system. I am certain that it functions better on the realistic division of conservative and liberal, representing roughly the difference in the outlook of the possessing class—who naturally wishes to conserve what it has to keep the economic forces as they are; and the farmers and workers and smaller businessmen for whom changes in the system seem essential to a better life. Each outlook tends to balance the other, and the result should be a middle road between left and right.

And I am convinced that both groups today sincerely desire to defend and sustain the American way of life. But how to preserve it? There the approach is as wide apart as the ancient struggle for power which has not yet ceased, between those who wish to make Government an instrument toward obtaining what all of us want—jobs and homes and enough to marry and rear children who will grow up with some chance of making good; and the men who are still honestly convinced that business should be let alone. Somehow they feel the sacred law of supply and demand will create jobs and rectify unemployment. They hold that it is against the law of God and man to interfere, by social legislation, with the hallowed rights of property. Their dream of the Constitution—a dream realized from the Civil War until not so very long ago—is that it protects corporations by the magic of the due process clause from the inroads of Federal and State regulatory power. Is it surprising that the National Manufacturers' Association and big business in general are squarely lined up behind the ex-President of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation, as once they were extending a helping and hopeful hand to Mr. Hoover and to Mr. Landon? They have sensed a man after their own heart, after their own pocketbook, and they are trembling with a fresh and feverish excitement. For this newcomer is no politician, but one of them, a man they can understand, who speaks the language with which they are familiar; and yet streamlined, a 1940 model, dressed, of course, in the overalls of a tousle-headed American farm boy from Indiana, but holding in his hand the full dinner pail of that maker of Republican Presidents—Mark Hanna.

But we want more than the ancient political shibboleths. For times have changed in 8 years, and we have seen in that time what the government of a country can do for its people. The platform of the Democratic Party in its preamble eloquently expresses that change. I quote:

"The world is undergoing violent change. Humanity, uneasy in this machine age, is demanding a sense of security and dignity based on human values. * * * What the founding fathers realized upon this continent was but a daring dream, that men could have not only physical security, not only efficiency, but something else in addition that men had never had before—the security of the heart that comes with freedom, the peace of mind that comes from a sense of justice."

And in a larger sense the defense of our American dream, its realization, is not only a defense against the immediate threat of totalitarian arms but the re-creation of that dream as a reality in a more decent life here today for all of us. We cannot ask our youth to fight for a dream that is not translated into the terms of their own needs. We must give them a share in work and in creative energy, a stake in our resources. Unemployment, insecurity, the thin misery of migratory populations, racial hatreds—those things do not stir men to rally behind a tradition which has permitted their growth in the cruel indifference of the modern machine age. Faith without works is not enough. As the preamble to the Democratic platform continues: "To this generation of Americans it is given to defend this democratic faith as it is challenged by social maladjustment within and totalitarian greed without. * * * No nation can be strong by armaments alone. It must possess and use all the necessary resources for producing goods plentifully and distributing them effectively. It must add to these factors of material strength the unconquerable spirit and energy of a contented people, convinced that there are no boundaries to human progress and happiness in a land of liberty."

"Producing goods plentifully and distributing them effectively * * *." We new dealers believe that we have made a beginning in that direction. We ask the country to continue us in power for another 4 years to complete what we have begun. And so let us pause to look at the record, for you will hear this record attacked in the next 10 weeks by experts in the art of misrepresentation.

You will find a consistent pattern in the legislation which expresses this record, which, for simplification, may be gathered under four headings: The farmer, the industrial worker, the businessman, and the consumer.

First, then, the farmer. The farm program has been far more ambitious than any ever attempted in this country. It is based on the fundamental truth that prosperity cannot be one-sided; it cannot exist in any single group, but must be balanced between farm and city, for if the farm income shrinks, the market for city goods closes up, and, by contrast, the jobless wage earner cannot buy the products of the farm. During the depression, which immediately preceded the launching of the New Deal, the income of farmers had shrunk relatively far more sharply than the income of wage earners. The first necessity, therefore, was to restore parity between them. And this has been to a great extent established. Since 1932 farm income has been doubled; the farm debt and interest rate on farm debt have been reduced; farm foreclosures curtailed; and the farm surpluses distributed to the hungry through the food-stamp plan and through relief agencies. The tools have been subsidies, conservation payments, marketing facilities, low credit. The rural electrification program is at last bringing cheap electricity to the farmers.

But that does not begin to tell the story. It is the American farm epic, the winning back to ourselves the land which we ourselves have so largely destroyed. It is soil conservation, stream purification, replanting the forests, arrest of the waste of our topsoil washed down the great rivers each year, conservation of water resources, cheap fertilizers. This means the reconquering of a continent; it demands immense research and laboratory work through the land-grant colleges and in the experimental stations. It has taken shape in the program for the coordinated development of our river basins for irrigation, flood control, navigation, power. It was foreshadowed in President Roosevelt's vision when he said, at Portland, Oreg., on September 21, 1932, during his first campaign: "This vast water power can be of incalculable value to this whole section of the country.

"It means cheap manufacturing production, economy, and comfort on the farm and in the household. * * * Here you have the clear picture of four great Government power developments in the United States, the St. Lawrence River in the Northeast, Muscle Shoals in the Southeast, the Boulder Dam project in the Southwest, and, finally, but by no means the least of them, the Columbia River in the Northwest." Seven months later, on April 10, 1933, in a message to Congress, he advocated the passage of the Tennessee Valley Authority bill, as follows: "In short, this power development of war days [he was referring to Muscle Shoals] leads naturally to national planning for a complete river watershed involving many States and the future lives and welfare of millions. It touches and gives life to all forms of human concern." For our administration realizes, as the Democratic platform succinctly puts it: "The well-being of the land and those who work upon it is basic to the real defense and security of America."

I can find almost nothing in the agriculture plank of the Republican platform into which you can sink your teeth. There is a beautiful, glittering sentence which reads: "The Republican Party will put into effect such governmental policies [I wonder what], temporary and permanent, as will establish and maintain an equitable balance between labor, industry, and agriculture by expanding industrial and business activity, eliminating unemployment, lowering production costs, thereby creating increased consumer buying power for agricultural products." Isn't that a mouthful? Farmers, please copy.

Recently we read in the newspapers of a great deal of activity on the part of Mr. Willkie in connection with the farm problem. He conferred with farm economists, leaders of farm organizations, farm politicians, and even regular dirt farmers. The farmers were holding their collective breath. What plan would Mr. Willkie bring forth? Something big must be in the wind. * * * And then the oracle spoke. He gave the New Deal farm program a clean bill of health. He would keep the New Deal farm program, he said, until somebody evolved a better plan. Thank you, Mr. Willkie.

I continue with our record: The industrial worker. I list three liberal statutes under this head. First, the National Labor Relations Act, introducing into industry as a whole the principles of self-determination for labor unions, their recognition by employers, and the basic right to collective bargaining, which had already for some years been applied in the field of railroad management. The Democratic platform says: "We pledge * * * to maintain the principles of the National Labor Relations Act."

The Republican platform reads: "Recent disclosures respecting the administration of the National Labor Relations Act require that this act be amended in fairness to employers and all groups of employees so as to provide freedom for and orderliness in self-organization and collective bargaining." I don't know what that means—"all groups." It sounds like an opening for company unions to slide in. That would be an end to collective bargaining. But, whatever it does mean, it is significant that the Republican Party at last bends the knee to another New Deal principle—collective bargaining. Do you remember how only 5 years ago the National Manufacturers' Association and the Liberty League—do you remember those eminent corporate lawyers of the league telling the world the act was unconstitutional, though the Supreme Court of the United States didn't follow their advice; do you remember how these august bodies talked personal liberty and rugged individualism? And now these rights created by the act are accepted as a matter of course.

And we put on the books the Wage and Hour Act and the Federal Bituminous Coal Stabilization Act to bring about, as our platform puts it, "stability of production, employment, distribution, and price indispensable to the public welfare." Child labor in factories has been successfully outlawed; the Walsh-Healey Act insures prevailing wages to workers employed on Government contracts. The Republican platform talks about the Democratic—I quote: "Regime of regimentation which has deprived the individual of his freedom." Perhaps these acts represent to the Republicans the regimentation they have in mind. But the trouble is they don't specify. The Republican platform at no point suggests the repeal of any piece of New Deal legislation. Well, possibly in two instances—they want to give relief back to the States—do you remember the dole?—and they want to have reciprocal-trade agreements approved by Congress, or, in other words, to turn them back into the good old back-scratching, logrolling methods familiar in the days of Smoot and Hawley.

Or regimentation may mean the way we've handled Wall Street, which brings me to our treatment of the businessman. I cite the huge operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in underwriting railroads, banks, insurance companies; the banking laws to insure deposits, to improve the Federal Reserve System; the devaluation of the dollar to prevent the cruel spiral of deflation which the depression threatened. Perhaps the Republicans by regimentation had in mind the Holding Company Act, which forever broke the corporate pyramids which Mr. Insull had made popular, when prosperity was just around the corner, or the Securities and Exchange Commission Act to protect investors in securities. And we have not only protected investors, we have started the wheels in motion for the protection of consumers through a policy of enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law which recognizes the American consumer whose interest has been too long forgotten. Our enforcement of that act is aimed at cutting down the costs of housing, food, drugs, fuel, fertilizer, spectacles, and other necessities, where arbitrary prices have in effect been a system of private taxation on low-income groups. We have not used the Sherman Act to interfere with the efficiency of mass production when that efficiency is passed on to the farmers and to the housewives of America. But we have begun to attack on a Nation-wide scale the bottlenecks that interfere with the distribution of goods in a free market. The antitrust laws are being used to break down the trade barriers erected by private groups which make the cost of living higher and thus reduce the real income of the vast mass of our people. We are giving the antitrust laws a significance as an aid to the distribution of goods which they never had before.

President Hoover had called a home-building and home-ownership conference in 1931, which lasted for weeks, and filled 11 impressive volumes with discussions and recommendation. In 1932 came the Federal Home Loan Bank System, with authority to make direct loans to stay the mortgage panic. But although many thousands of application were received, only three loans were made, totalling $9,000.

When President Roosevelt assumed office in 1933 the foreclosure on urban homes had risen to 1,000 a day. This was the highest record ever made in any country in the world at any time. On the President's recommendation Congress passed one of the first and most urgent New Deal relief statutes, creating the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which had power to take mortgages which were in default and where families were about to lose their homes. Now listen to this record, for it is the story of saving homes. Over 1,000,000 loans were financed, totaling $3,100,000,000, the defaults averaging over 2 years on principal and interest, and over 3 years on taxes. In taking over these mortgages cities and towns were paid over $300,000,000 in taxes, and $100,000,000 was spent in repair and modernization work on the houses. One hundred and ninety-one million dollars in loans have been paid off in full; and, in addition, a billion and a half dollars have been paid to the Government against principal and interest.

Through the Public Works Administration and the Work Projects Administration we have helped municipalities build roads and hospitals, airports, schools and playgrounds, docks and tunnels, thus giving millions of unemployed work in place of direct relief; we have cleared slums and built low-cost houses for the poor; we have trained more than two and a half million youngsters in the C. C. C. camps, and have found work for and given education to more than 2,000,000 young men and women through the National Youth Administration; we have brought security for unemployment and old age by the Social Security Act, which we propose to extend, saying in our platform: "We pledge to make the Social Security Act increasingly effective, by covering millions of persons not now protected under its terms; by strengthening our unemployment-insurance system and establishing more adequate and uniform benefits, through the Federal equalization fund principle; by progressively extending and increasing the benefits of the old-age- and survivors-insurance system, including protection of the permanently disabled; and by the early realization of a minimum pension for all who have reached the age of retirement and are not gainfully employed."

And last, but, I take it, not least important to this audience, we have brought cheap power to millions of consumers from the Central Valley of California, from the Columbia River, from the Tennessee Valley.

This doubtless is what the Republicans mean by—I quote from the platform—"the relentless expansion of the power of the Federal Government over the everyday life of the farmer, the industrial worker, and the businessman." Doubtless social security, work relief, old-age pensions were what they had in mind when they talked about—I quote again from the platform—"seducing our people to become continuously dependent upon government, thus weakening their morale and quenching the traditional American spirit."

And now for power.

It is unnecessary to remind this audience that the State of Washington has led the country in a successful fight to bring cheap power to her people; that the municipal plant of the city of Tacoma is as old as the State itself, each having begun in 1893; that soon after came Seattle; that before the days of the Rural Electrification Administration the State ranked fifth in the Union, being 47.5 percent electrified; and that today over one-third of the people of the State are served by their own electric systems at the lowest rates in the country. This, of course, will be enormously increased when the proposed transmission lines are built to Bonneville and Grand Coulee. But I wish to emphasize the point that the men of the Northwest have been leaders in the movement to own and control their own resources, power particularly, and have achieved cheap power without outside help through their own initiative and enterprise.

I have attempted to describe some of the more recent manifestations of the struggle of the American people to make a living reality out of the old American vision, the vision of a democracy, which sees the people sharing the wealth of the country, sharing the natural resources of the country. Many of these have been wasted; many are under the control of monopolistic corporate organizations whose operations do not produce goods plentifully and distribute them effectively.

Mr. Willkie said in his acceptance speech last week, after adopting the major New Deal reforms, "But I do not make my claim to liberalism solely on my faith in such reforms. American liberalism does not consist merely in reforming things. It consists also in making things." Of course it does but the making of things, production, responds to the consumers' demand for them, and factories contract and close when the income of the masses of the people shrinks to a point where they cannot buy the things the factories make. Mass purchasing power is necessary to mass production, and the purpose of the New Deal program, consistently and on the whole successfully carried out, was to increase that purchasing power. Mr. Willkie seems to miss the very point of such reforms, speaking of them as if they bore no relation to production.

Electric power is one of the resources I have just spoken of. "The power of falling water," say the Democratic platform, "belongs not to a privileged few but to all the people, who are entitled to enjoy its benefits." Your Democratic State platform, adopted at Yakima on June 15, 1940, contains this plank: "We go on record as favoring public ownership and distribution of all electrical power; therefore we oppose initiative No. 139. We believe that the people of the Northwest should receive the benefits of such power developments as Grand Coulee and Bonneville. We are opposed to turning over the distribution of this power to private interests * * *." That's pretty definite; and cheap electric power does not only mean cheap services to the consumer—light, electric ranges, washers, water heaters, radio, farm implements; it means the development of the resources of your State, your low-grade metals—iron, magnesite, copper—by the use of cheap industrial power.

Now, I'll come to 1939 in a minute. But first let me speak of the pattern which the private utilities—the Power Trust—pursue more or less everywhere. I saw it at close range in the Tennessee Valley when, 2 years ago, I was counsel for the joint congressional committee investigating the Tennessee Valley Authority, and, under specific mandate of the Congress, investigating also interference by the private power companies with the effective administration of the T. V. A.

The committee spent the summer of 1938 in Knoxville, Tenn., investigating conditions on the spot; held further hearings in Washington, D. C., in the autumn and winter; and, finally, made a detailed report of 259 pages on April 1, 1939, based on over 15,000 pages of testimony. Of the joint committee of 9, 3 members, all of them Republicans, dissented in minority reports. On the committee's staff of engineers, headed by Tom Panter, of Los Angeles, were James I. Metcalf, now manager of the Consumers Non-Profit Public Power Corporation, and Paul J. Raver, now administrator of Bonneville.

The pattern, as I say, is the same everywhere. First, incessant litigation to block the Government hydroelectric and multiple-purpose projects. Finally, the projects are built, and in the name of economy and efficiency the power companies demand the right to buy the power at the gate and distribute it to the municipalities and cooperatives or in their own markets. They have no objection to cheap power if they are buying and not selling. So here the Electric Bond & Share and Stone & Webster have endeavored to obtain the benefit of Grand Coulee and Bonneville, just as in the Tennessee Valley the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation, through its operating company the Tennessee Electric Power Co., wanted to distribute T. V. A. power. Thus Mr. Willkie, the president of the Commonwealth & Southern, said in his opening statement before the investigating committee, on November 23, 1938: "* * * It is my personal belief that the T. V. A. should go out of the power business. * * * It is my view that the soundest solution both for the Government and the utilities would be for the T. V. A. to dispose of the power generated by it to the utilities at the switchboard. The utilities would then distribute it to consumers under State and Federal regulations." I wonder if he still holds that view? I do not know, because he doesn't mention power, or T. V. A., or Bonneville in his acceptance speech. He evidently doesn't think they're worth mentioning.

On November 25, 2 days after Mr. Willkie's statement to which I have referred, the New York Herald Tribune, which then was, and still is, a great admirer of Willkie, said in an editorial: "Wendell L. Willkie, president of the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation, came to be accepted by the virtually unanimous consent of his associates as the unofficial spokesman for the power industry." Perhaps Mr. Willkie would now disclaim that leadership.

Failing to secure power from the Federal projects, the utilities next devote themselves to preventing the formation of or destroying markets for public power. The methods are well-known—building spite lines, pouring money into elections, high-pressure propaganda, the introduction of crippling legislation.

I'll give you some examples of Mr. Willkie's operating company in Tennessee, the Tennessee Electric Power Co. I can summarize what the company did in two brief paragraphs found on page 199 of the committee's report. I quote: "In January 1935 the Tennessee State Legislature passed a statute authorizing Chattanooga to purchase or construct a municipal distribution plant, provided the voters of the city should approve the project in a referendum.

"Prior to the referendum the Commonwealth & Southern, and its operating company, the Tennessee Electric Power Co., carried on an active though unsuccessful campaign to defeat the bond issue. A so-called citizens and taxpayers association was formed Its president has since acted as attorney for the Tennessee Electric Power Co., and its treasurer was connected with an underwriting concern which actively handled securities of the same company. The total funds used by the association in campaigning against the bond issue amounted to $22,265.45. Of this $20,000 was contributed by Commonwealth & Southern." The day after this evidence was introduced on the record a statement of Mr. Willkie's was published in the New York Times on August 24, 1938 (p. 2704), in which Mr. Willkie said: "The only regret the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation has is that if a larger contribution could have overcome the propaganda and contributions of the Federal Government and the Tennessee Valley Authority that it did not make such additional contributions." The Tennessee Corrupt Practices Act made it a crime for the officers of any corporation doing business in the State to spend money in influencing a public election in Tennessee. But the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation was a Delaware corporation. It was a mere holding company. It did not do business in Tennessee, according to Mr. Willkie. It would, of course, have been a crime for the Tennessee Electric Power Co. to have spent the money to kill public power. But there was no reason why its holding company should not make a sizeable contribution to get the same result. And Mr. Willkie's only regret was that he hadn't spent more.

And now Mr. Willkie talks about obeying the spirit as well as the letter of the Hatch Act.

I will not stop here to describe to you the committee's other findings on this utility's activities in the Chattanooga election; the use of power company employees by the taxpayers' association; the preparation by power company officials of the association's propaganda; instructions to employees to canvass the voters, and the purchase and use of two vacant lots to "qualify" out-of-town employees.

And this is not a thing of the past. The huge slush fund in the Union Electric Power Co. case in Missouri ran over half a million dollars, never reflected on the company's books, but in kick-backs of lawyers, equipment salesmen, and insurance companies. The money went into the campaign funds of candidates for every office from alderman to governor. The lobbyist kept his list of bribed persons and bribe prospects under a carpet in his office. He went to the penitentiary 4 months ago. Following his conviction United States District Judge George H. Moore, on August 4, 1940, sentenced Frank H. Boehm, former executive vice president of the Union Electric Co. to 5 years for perjury, saying in open court: "Not only members of the legislative bodies were tampered with, but members of the county courts, and a judge of the circuit court was paid a salary larger than the salary paid him by the State. * * * Since the days of the Whisky Ring fraud case * * * there has never been anything I know of in this court in any criminal prosecution that revealed the shocking, sordid details of corruption shown in this case."

And now for initiative 139. Can't you see the same pattern in Washington as was used in Tennessee? It's an old stunt. Here the taxpayers' association becomes the "Let the People Vote League." Sounds kind of American and democratic. But somehow we don't know very much about the people who organized the "Let the People Vote League," or who pays its expenses. People don't just spontaneously uprise like this, particularly in favor of a move to curb their own power. And their propaganda is the same propaganda that was used in the Chattanooga election—that revenue bonds, in your case the revenue bonds of the public utility districts—are the same as general obligation bonds, thus representing direct obligations of the taxpayer. The taxpayer is led to believe that his taxes are being vastly increased. This, as Senator BONE has so clearly pointed out in his series of five public letters, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is of course false and misleading. Revenue bonds are paid only out of power revenues, and are not obligations of the taxpayers.

I suggest that it would be healthy to know who are the contributors to the league. Did the citizens flock to its support in the same sort of way that the taxpayers flocked to the association in Chattanooga? There the citizens put up one-eleventh and the power company ten-elevenths of the total. What happened here? I understand that it has been established that one large contribution was made by a taxpayers' association, which itself received a very substantial contribution from one of the operating power companies. Perfectly all right, but let's find out who is behind this People's League.

Your Democratic State platform is squarely on record against initiative 139. As the party favors the extension of public power, I don't see how it could take any other position; for 139 is obviously aimed to cripple the acquisition of power systems by the public-utility districts. If this initiative were genuine, if its sponsors were really worried about democratic control of public indebtedness, the legislation would be directed to all municipalities, not merely public-utility districts.

And, finally, the bias of No. 139 is made doubly clear when we come to the provision that "the total vote cast on such proposition shall exceed 50 percent of the total number of votes cast within such district at the last preceding biennial general election at which State and county officers were elected." Everyone knows that you just won't get out the vote at these special elections, particularly when a lot of people who stay at home and thus kill the proposal do so because the particular system to be acquired or built may not be in their part of the county, so, of course, they don't vote; yet they nevertheless kill it by staying at home. The sponsors of initiative 139 know that and know that such a proposal is found in no other law of the State dealing with elections. Obviously it is intended to hamper the fight for public power in the State of Washington, where is found nearly a fifth of all of the potential hydroelectric power in the United States. And, of course, it has the support, open or tacit, of the private utilities who are opposed to public power.

You won't have an easy time hooking up your P. U. D.'s to Bonneville and Coulee; you've had a taste of the fight that's ahead of you. I know what it is. After 15 years of opposition and struggle the first public-utility district law in the country was passed in 1931. I need not rehearse to you the struggle in the courts, the taxpayer's injunction suit against the Grays Harbor Public Utility District to prevent the purchase by it of the electric facilities within the county, financed by the utilities, and finally culminating in the unanimous decision of the State supreme court in favor of the district; the court holding, among other things, that revenue bonds to be valid need not be referred to a vote of the people. And now, beaten in the courts, the utilities are making a concealed flank attack and, in the name of democracy, are trying to persuade the people themselves to adopt initiative No. 139, themselves to defeat the spread of power systems owned and operated by the people.

I saw something of the same fight in the Tennessee Valley when Willkie was trying to stop the cities getting their power from T. V. A.

According to the report of the committee investigating T. V. A. (I refer to pp. 62–69), the Authority made a total direct expenditure of $518,159 in defending the constitutionality of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act in 57 cases brought to block the Authority. The committee, pointing out that the Authority estimated that the losses caused by "delays in the consummation of contracts for the sale of power * * * by litigation and injunctions," both to the Authority and to consumers, were $13,545,903, said, in conclusion (I quote): "The committee believes that a substantial part of the legal obstruction of the Authority's program has not resulted from an effort to protect rights which litigants believed themselves to possess. Rather an effort has been made to smother the Authority with duplicating cases and multiplied attacks."

What shall I say in closing? I have not spoken of the foreign war, or much of national defense, except as all the things I have talked of may be considered a part of that defense. In times like these only great leadership is adequate, and the President is a very great leader. The people love him. He understands them, and for 8 years he has fought their battles. Because we are threatened with the horror of war in this crisis is not, I suggest, a reason for abandoning our efforts to make our democracy more effectively decent, but rather we should build more mightily than ever, to create something our boys can fight for with a passionate faith in their hearts for the American land—their land. I do not believe that Wendell Willkie, whose training and brilliant success has been with this great utility holding company, is fitted by experience or outlook to undertake this leadership. He has always been on the side of the utilities, never on the side of the people. And if now he professes to like the New Deal platform and the New Deal laws affecting labor and the farmer, his profession that he would administer them better than those who put them on the books is one which I think you voters will take with a pretty big grain of salt.

For "Democracy," as the Democratic platform says, "is more than a political system for the government of a people. It is the expression of a people's faith in themselves as human beings." That faith has been restored to us under the President's creative spirit. We need it now more than ever. And the people, sensing that, and necessarily uncertain of the future, trusting Roosevelt, knowing him, certain of him, the people will reelect him in November

W. P. A. Work in Texas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 19, 1940

LETTER FROM H. P. DROUGHT

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, the Texas delegation in the House, on September 13, met to consider the question of the allotment of W. P. A. funds to the State of Texas, and also with reference to the sewing-room projects of the W. P. A. in that State.

Col. F. C. Harrington, Commissioner of the Work Projects Administration, was invited to be present, but being ill, sent as his representative Mr. Howard O. Hunter, Deputy Commissioner of the Work Projects Administration. Also present, by invitation, was Col. Lawrence Westbrook, regional director of the W. P. A., and Mr. Harry P. Drought, State administrator of the W. P. A. for Texas.

After a full discussion of the matter was had, it was the sense of those present that Mr. H. P. Drought, State administrator, be requested to write a letter to me, as chairman of the Texas delegation, giving the facts relating to both of the subjects discussed at the meeting, and the delegation instructed me to insert the same in the RECORD, and under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I submit herewith Mr. Drought's letter.

FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY,
WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., September 16, 1940.

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON, M. C.,
Chairman of the Texas Delegation in Congress,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN JOHNSON: Pursuant to a request made at a meeting in Washington on last September 13 between 16 Members of Congress from Texas and representatives of the Work Projects Administration to discuss the W. P. A. program in that State, the following statement is given you:

W. P. A. EMPLOYMENT IN TEXAS

The Congress has appropriated for W. P. A. employment throughout the country during the current fiscal year the full amount requested by the President. The Work Projects Administration makes every effort to weigh carefully the factors of population, need, unemployment, and emergency relief situations in determining the employment authorizations for all States, and it is believed that on this basis the employment authorization in Texas represents at least that State's fair share of the funds available.

In June 1939 W. P. A. employment in Texas was 3.81 percent of the national total and the State ranked eighth in the number employed. In August 1940 the Texas percentage of W. P. A. national employment had increased to 4.60 percent and the State's rank had risen to sixth. This indicates clearly that consideration has been given to the dislocation of markets for agricultural products and to the increased unemployment among farm tenants and sharecroppers caused by reductions in cotton acreage.

This month there are employed on W. P. A. projects in Texas about 75,000 persons. The factors mentioned will continue to receive consideration in determining the State's W. P. A. employment and it is expected that a substantial increase in this employment will be provided during the winter months. Indeed, Texas' W. P. A. employment in October will probably advance to about 83,000 persons.

It is well known that the need for W. P. A. employment in Texas by able-bodied destitute persons unable to find work is not fully met by the number of jobs provided. But similar situations exist in all of the other States. There are actually 150,000 destitute Texans on the W. P. A. rolls and there are W. P. A. jobs now for only half that number. However, other States have provided general relief programs for their destitute unemployed which, of course, Texas has not done.

In Texas the only provision made for the destitute unemployed who cannot find work on W. P. A. projects is through the distribution to them of food and clothing made available by the Federal Government through the Federal Surplus Marketing Administration. These Federal commodities are used in other States merely to supplement general relief provided by the States themselves. In Texas, with the exception of two or three local relief programs, they are all of the general relief provided.

Of course, any provision for general relief in Texas to supplement W. P. A. employment and the commodities provided by the Federal Government would have to be made by the Texas Legislature and not by the National Congress.

W. P. A. INTAKE IN TEXAS

In every State in the Union it is the recognized right and responsibility of the State and not of the Federal Government to determine which persons are entitled, on the basis of need, to W. P. A. employment. This administration has safeguarded this right of the States. The determination is made in each State by a State or local agency. In Texas it is made by the State department of public welfare. However, the State of Texas has not provided the funds necessary for the discharge of this responsibility—for an adequate system of referral of needy persons to W. P. A. Therefore the counties in Texas, in cooperation with the State department of public welfare, are trying to provide this W. P. A. referral or "intake" service. Some counties are able to do this adequately but most counties, because of restrictions imposed on their financial operations by the State government, are able to provide only an inadequate intake service. The result is that in many localities in Texas needy persons applying for referral to W. P. A. must wait weeks and even months before a county case worker can interview them.

If this situation is to be corrected and an adequate W. P. A. referral or intake system provided in Texas, the correction must be made in Austin—it cannot be made in Washington.

W. P. A. SEWING ROOMS

Under a provision of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act, W. P. A. nonlabor expenditures on projects in any State may not exceed an average of $6 per worker per month. In the operation of W. P. A. sewing projects in Texas, all the necessary textiles were formerly purchased with Federal funds, and the quantity of those textiles used caused the W. P. A. nonlabor expenditures on such projects to exceed substantially this statutory limit.

In addition to this, the production of clothing on W. P. A. sewing projects in Texas, while enormous, did not meet the tremendous need of the destitute for clothing. Moreover, many women, unable to master the intricacies of making entire garments, can do efficient work in sewing parts of them. Therefore to provide more clothing for the destitute and to enable more women in need to qualify for sewing-room employment, a modified line production system was installed in W. P. A. sewing rooms. The increase in production thus obtained is resulting in the use of more textiles than formerly.

As substantial W. P. A. nonlabor expenditures are also required on other projects, it has been found that such expenditures cannot be held sufficiently below $6 per worker per month to offset the amount that must be spent in the purchase of all textiles needed on W. P. A. sewing projects.

The Work Projects Administration in Texas will continue to expend $6 per worker per month in the purchase of sewing-project textiles but, as stated, it cannot now exceed this limit. Therefore, the counties and cities sponsoring W. P. A. sewing projects have been asked to provide the funds required for the purchase of textiles in excess of the amount that can be purchased with W. P. A. nonlabor funds within the statutory limit.

Counties and cities in Texas apparently have had little difficulty in providing nonlabor expenditures on construction projects such as roads, streets, bridges, municipal and school buildings, and so forth, in excess of the $6 statutory limit on nonlabor costs. It is thought that these cities and counties can also provide substantially the same expenditures for W. P. A. sewing projects.

That they can provide these expenditures seems to be demonstrated by the fact that Texas cities and counties, according to the latest report available, are now sponsoring W. P. A. sewing-room projects for the employment of more than 11,000 women, while projects formerly sponsored by cities and counties which, because of the requirement mentioned, have refused to continue such sponsorship, employed hardly 2,000 women.

Despite this, it would be unfair to the cities and counties of Texas to assert that their sponsorship of W. P. A. sewing rooms does not present serious financial difficulties. Other States assist their cities and counties in this respect, but Texas not only gives no such assistance but the State has retained restrictions on the financial operations of its political subdivisions which make W. P. A. sewing-room sponsorship a problem hard for them to solve. Only the State government can give this assistance and relax these restrictions.

In this connection it should be noted that the Legislature of Texas has not provided a program of aid to dependent children which has been made available to the State by the Federal Government. Thousands of women now working in W. P. A. sewing rooms in Texas would be eligible for this assistance should the State provide it. The people of Texas have adopted the constitutional amendment necessary to accept this program, but the legislature has not enacted the law required.

CONCLUSION

When it is considered that Texas is receiving its share of W. P. A. employment, that other States, through a general relief program, provide for their destitute unemployed citizens who cannot obtain W. P. A. employment, that other States have provided an adequate W. P. A. intake service by which their citizens in need can gain admittance to the W. P. A. employment rolls, that other States have likewise assisted their counties and cities in the sponsorship of W. P. A. sewing projects and have lightened their burden in this respect by adopting an adequate program of aid to dependent children, it seems obvious that it is the legislature of Texas and not the Congress of the United States from which assistance must be sought in the solution of the problems discussed above.

The unfailing interest of the Texas Congressmen in the W. P. A. program in their State, and their constant aid and invaluable advice have been of the greatest importance in enabling the Work Projects Administration to be of assistance to Texas' needy, unemployed citizens.

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours sincerely,

H. P. DROUGHT,
State Administrator for Texas.

Constitution Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 20 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

[Address by Attorney General Robert H. Jackson for the Constitution Day celebration sponsored by the Cleveland Bar Association and read by Hon. Matthew F. McGuire, the assistant to the Attorney General, over radio station WOL, Washington, D. C., Tuesday, September 17, 1940, at 11:30 a. m., Eastern Standard Time, on a coast to coast hookup. The Attorney General was unable personally to deliver the address as scheduled because he was among those who went to Alabama to attend the funeral of Speaker Bankhead.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD an address by Attorney General Jackson intended to be delivered before the Cleveland Bar Association on Constitution Day, which he was prevented from delivering at Cleveland, but which he did deliver over the radio, and I wish to have it in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Under the leadership of the Cleveland Bar Association we are making this anniversary of our Constitution a day of dedication to it and to the spiritual affirmations of free government which underlie it.

One hundred and fifty-three years ago today George Washington, as President of the Constitutional Convention, sent to the old Continental Congress a new Constitution. His claims for the document were modest. He said that "it is liable to as few exceptions as could reasonably have been expected." But he expressed a wish "that it may promote the lasting welfare of that country so dear to us all, and secure her freedom and happiness."

Our history has fulfilled Washington's wish for our freedom and happiness. But we cannot assume that they will remain secure just because there is a parchment here in Washington on which words are written to describe the framework of a free government. That security is found, rather, in the minds and hearts of our people, in their convictions that a free government is the best way of life, and in their devotion to maintaining it. It is this spirit which gives our old Constitution its continuing youth and vitality. Countries which substantially copied our Constitution as their own have failed to achieve real democracy wherever their people have failed to catch its spirit. To a renewal of that spirit of free institutions in our own time we consecrate ourselves today.

I know that you hear the soothing phrases of freedom over and over again, until they resemble a drowsy ritual. But make no mistake about it, democracy is a fighting faith. Our Government rests on great affirmations, and each generation must fight the fight to keep the faith a living one.

We affirm the inherent dignity of the individual, and his right, just as a human being, without any property qualification or test of birth or pedigree, to vote—to influence the course of his Government and the destiny of his race. We affirm his right to an economic order that will let him win a place for himself in accordance with his natural endowments and character. And when age or unemployment disable him, he still has minimum requirements which organized society must not deny him. Before the processes of government, whether in making of laws or administering laws, or in courts of justice, men must stand, as in the eyes of God, equal. And we affirm the right of every man to invoke those great basic freedoms enshrined in our constitutional Bill of Rights which keep inviolate the personality and the conscience and the civil liberties of men.

Even if faint hearts or mistaken judgments keep us from reaching these ideals, as we must confess they often do, our way is not to abandon the ideal but to embrace it more firmly.

We recall today with reverence those bold-minded men—our forefathers—who proclaimed this new pattern of government in the face of a hostile world. They made a solitary venture in government by consent of the governed at a time when every world power was a monarchy. They dared to set up a republic for their scattered seaboard settlements when they were surrounded on their very borders by kings. Canada remained a possession of George III; Louisiana and the West were for years traded between the King of Spain and the King of France; Florida and the islands were outposts of the King of Spain. And these kings did not appreciate the strong doctrines of equality found in our Declaration of Independence. They hoped to crush the idea of democracy lest it cross the Atlantic and undermine their thrones.

Most of the world which in 1787 was under the thumb of a hereditary monarch is today under the heel of a self-constituted dictator. Many countries of Europe have merely completed a cycle and are back to where they were. Some of them, meanwhile, have toyed with forms of self-government but somehow failed to catch, or later lost, its spirit. We stand now as we stood in 1789, outstanding in the support of free institutions. Twentieth-century dictators, like the eighteenth-century kings, fear the contagion of our democracy.

If they should challenge us on our own continent, as kings challenged our forefathers here, they will find our relative strength and resources to have increased manyfold. And day by day our strength grows while theirs is being exhausted. A European foe, to reach us, must cross our Atlantic threshold, and only this month we have boldly picked up that Atlantic threshold and moved it 500 miles to new outposts in the sea. Only this month we call upon our young manhood—not to go abroad to fight, there is no thought of that, but to train, to harden the muscle, steady the hand, and sharpen the eye. Our superb manpower will master techniques of our defense and come to know modern weapons, as Jackson's pioneers at New Orleans knew their rifles. So, if any foe, in a delirious moment, should cross our new-laid threshold of defense, he will find a warm reception awaiting him.

I think that our preparation for the entertainment of our enemies will make it very unlikely that they will pay us a call. They will, of course, continue to crush out democracy in Europe where they can reach it, but where it is beyond their reach they will try to divide its people, confuse its counsels, discredit its leaders, and imperil its security from within. They hope to undermine our tolerant and warm-hearted way of life. They sneer at our justice and deny our collective competency to order affairs with efficiency and dispatch. But America wants none of their sadistic nazi-ism, nor of their swashbuckling fascism, nor of their deceptive communism which would embrace liberty only to smother it.

We lawyers know from the history of liberties that there is a way of fighting these ideas better than mob violence or persecution. If suppression would really work, czarist Russia, with its spy system and Siberian exile, would not have been the first country in all the world to be overturned by communism. Dictators have yet to learn that a concentration camp cannot kill an idea any more than it kills a typhoid germ.

It is the basic assumption of our free Government that, in the long run, free discussion will kill untruth as sunshine will kill germs. If this is not true, then we have built our house upon the sands. But a century and a half of experience confirms our faith that truth will triumph over error in minds that are free and that our house stands on bedrock.

There is less reason to doubt our internal stability today, because not one of the arguments made for dictator systems now—not a single one of them—is new. Their claims to excel democracy in unity of purpose and command, in swiftness of decision and efficiency of execution—these claims were all made against democracy long ago—in favor of monarchy. And some among our forefathers were won by these arguments and favored monarchy here or thought that it was inevitable elsewhere and so should be appeased. There are also some today who would copy the methods of the dictators, or accept them as inevitable and so to be appeased. But the overwhelming sentiment of our forefathers rejected, as the sentiment of America today rejects, all counsels that we compromise our own democratic way of life to appease foreign pressures or to escape foreign tensions.

The moral integrity of a people is its best physical security. The spiritual values of liberty and self-government will long outlast the bursts of power and speed and efficiency of dictatorships. We choose the ways of freedom, not because they are easy, but because we believe they are eternally right.

A Timetable of Dictatorship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PRENTISS M. BROWN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 20 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE DETROIT NEWS

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Detroit News entitled "Unspoiled by Defeat," regarding our colleague the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Detroit (Mich.) News]

UNSPOILED BY DEFEAT

Among the first political casualties of the season is one who has long been a favorite character of Senate fanciers, and, until lately, had enjoyed the uninterrupted favor of the Arizona voter—HENRY FOUNTAIN ASHURST. With his departure will go the lushest vocabulary in that body, and, as a best friend and candid critic once put it, there will end the "longest theatrical engagement on record." It began in March 1912.

At 19, while turnkey in the jail at Flagstaff, young Henry came upon a volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, and in no time was "throwing 56-pound words across the Grand Canyon. As a matter of course I went into politics." An actor and ex-Detroit newspaper man, C. N. Stark, furthered the comer's first designs on public office—a seat in the territorial legislature. There he opened a career as "silver-tongued sunbeam of the Painted Desert," the end of which is only now in sight.

In Washington he has always endeared himself to the discriminating by taking himself none too seriously. "There never has been superadded to these vices of mine the withering, embalming vice of consistency," he once said in accounting for a sudden switch in sides. "As is obvious to everyone who knows me, I suffer from an inborn, inveterate flair for the histrionic," he said in another moment of self-analysis.

He is the Senator who, when Huey Long had cowed the Chamber into a sort of helpless catalepsy, arose one day and dissected the Kingfish in what stands as the most polished and comprehensive verbal beating given one solon by another in our time. Never again did Huey seem to his colleagues as formidable a figure. He fought conscription, which may have had a bearing on last week's turn in his fortunes. "The perpetuity of our Government did not absolutely depend on the reelection of one ASHURST," he said, in comment on a result that may have been a shock to one regarded as a fixture in Washington but found him at no loss for the courtly and characteristic word.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY M. GILLETTE

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 20 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NATIONAL RECORD

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a news article from the National Record, of the issue of September 21, 1940, concerning Hon. Henry Wallace, the Vice Presidential nominee on the Democratic ticket.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the National Record of September 21, 1940]

HOW WALLACE BROUGHT THE FARMERS UP FROM RUIN—BALANCE BETWEEN AGRICULTURE AND INDUSTRY BROUGHT STABILITY—DOUBLED INCOME FOR AGRICULTURE

Before we tell you who Henry Wallace is, we'll tell you what Henry Wallace has done.

Cash income of American farmers rose from $4,606,000,000 in 1932 to $8,518,000,000 in 1939—and it's still going up.

That's Henry Wallace. That's his achievement, his biography, the basis of his right to stand before the American people as the Democratic candidate for Vice President.

Before we tell you who Henry Wallace is, we'll tell you the meaning of Henry Wallace's achievement.

FARM SYSTEM PERILED

Before the New Deal the free farmers of the United States—at once the most progressive and the most stable element in our society—were being debased into an unfree peasantry, victims of chaotic markets and mounting debts.

Bank and insurance companies were becoming the landlords of America—and under circumstances that were not too wholesome even for the banks and insurance companies.

Under three successive Republican Presidents the income of the American farmer declined. Corn was being burned for fuel. Potatoes were rotting in freight cars. There were farm riots—considered for centuries as a sure mark of deep-seated social disorder and disintegration.

PRICES STABILIZED

The Wallace policies, the Wallace administration of those policies, stabilized farm prices at a level where farmers could live. Wallace saved the American family-owned, family-operated farm, and in so doing deserves a share of President Roosevelt's credit as the greatest conservation of his day. They conserved the fundamentals of the American way by changing what are—comparatively speaking—details.

Every businessman, every factory worker, owes a part of that prosperity and security to the restored financial independence of 8,000,000 American farm families.

The Republicans cavil and jeer at crop control. The jibes stick in their throat. They know that Wallace succeeded where they failed; and that he succeeded without violating any essential principle of American democracy; that he succeeded with expenditures that seem small indeed compared to the result accomplished.

BORN TO THE TASK

The man who rescued the American farmer was born to do just that. His father was Henry C. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture before him. His grandfather was "Uncle Henry" Wallace, founder of Wallaces' Farmer, and a friend and associate of President Theodore Roosevelt.

Wallaces' Farmer championed the cause of the American farmer for years. Henry Agard Wallace, the New Deal Secretary of Agriculture, has taken the Nation a long way along the road to solution of farm problems.

The Vice Presidential candidate—President Roosevelt's personal choice for the job—was born October 7, 1888, on an Adair County farm in Iowa.

STRONG FOR HONESTY

Following the usual farm-boy life, plus years of boyish experimenting in cross-breeding of plants and seeds, Wallace entered the Iowa State College of Agriculture and Mechanical Arts, and promptly got into trouble because of his penchant for honesty and accuracy. Well versed in farming and plant genetics, he disputed a corn judge's assertion that a particular brand would produce high yields. Wallace proved that the corn was unfertile and almost got bounced. This demand for honesty and accuracy is a distinguishing characteristic.

Graduated in 1910, Wallace went to work as associate editor of Wallaces' Farmer.

HUNGER FIGHTER

But he was also winning a more desirable reputation as an agricultural expert, statistician, and economist. He was canonized by Paul de Kruif as a hunger fighter. His experimenting with cross-breeding and plant genetics produced a product that revolutionized corn growing.

During Coolidge's administration he came out strong for the McNary-Haugen bill (coauthored by his present opponent), and official Washington began to notice the farm editor in the Middle West.

The Wallace star began to shine brightly in 1932 when, despite his long Republican standing, he told farmers that a careful examination of both candidates convinced him that they "would have a chance under Roosevelt, but none with Hoover." He bolted his party, canvassed the State for Roosevelt, and was credited with bringing the first Democratic victory to Iowa in 40 years. When the new administration was organized, President Roosevelt drafted Wallace for the post of Secretary of Agriculture.

AT ROCK BOTTOM

And when Wallace went into office the farm situation was at rock bottom. Overexpansion and overproduction of farm products had glutted the market and ruined prices. Into this picture stepped Wallace and his hope for salvation, the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Wallace planned to retire from production some 50,000,000 acres, offering to pay farmers who would plow under their surplus crops and keep portions of their fields inactive. The money would come from a processing tax, applied to those who processed farm products for market use. Wallace's plan, in addition to saving a bad situation and increasing the farmer's income, would also rebuild the depleted lands that had been farmed to exhaustion.

Despite the objection of theorists to plowing under crops and murdering little pigs, slogans which foes of the administration were quick to capitalize, the vast majority of farmers were not to be fooled and entered enthusiastically into the new program.

PROCESS TAX FOUGHT

Not so the processors—the packing houses, the millers, and the countless industries which turn raw farm products into food for the table. They fought the A. A. A. with the best legal talent money could buy—even though they added the processing taxes to the prices of their products. Finally, months after the taxes had been paid by the public and farm income was on a definitely more equitable basis, the Supreme Court invalidated the A. A. A.

Undaunted, Wallace and his aides continued the fight. Under a soil-conservation program, a system of crop loans to sustain an ever-normal granary, and the food-stamp plan to absorb surplus commodities, they found new ways to equalize the farmers' income. The success of their efforts is indicated by the fact that today four-fifths of the commercial farmers of the Nation are cooperating with the A. A. A.

Wallace, the man, despite his 51 years, is still somewhat shy and boyish. Over the admonitions of his wife—his college sweetheart, Ilo Browne, whom he married in 1914—and a Negro valet, he tramps around Washington with baggy pants, crooked tie, and tousled hair. He's too busy to primp up. Farmerlike, he is at his best leaning back in his chair, feet propped up on his desk or on the rim of his wastebasket, having a heart-to-heart talk about farm problems with a seasoned "dirt" farmer. Washington avers that the farmer in Wallace hasn't been changed by his Cabinet post or by his nomination to the Vice Presidency.

SEVEN-POINT PROGRAM

Throughout his career Wallace has hewed closely to this seven-point program for the betterment of agriculture:

1. Farmers should have a fair share in the national income; that is, a share that will give the farmers as much purchasing power relative to the average nonfarmer as was the case during the 50 years before the World War.

2. The welfare of all farmers, and city people as well, demands that wide fluctuations in supply and price of major crops be evened out as much as possible by use of ever-normal granary and crop insurance.

3. People who live on the land must have security of tenure.

4. The soil must be used to meet the needs of the present but, at the same time, conserved for the future farmers and city people.

5. By means of cooperatives, farmers should control those processing, purchasing, and service functions which they can handle successfully and efficiently.

6. Family sized farms should have Federal support in the form of benefit payments and other aids to rural income.

7. Federal and State funds must continue to promote agricultural research and farm efficiency as an essential part of the whole program.

Farmer Henry A. Wallace is a farmer at heart.

Limitation of Presidential Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD R. BURKE
OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 20 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

STATEMENT BY VANCE C. McCORMICK, FORMER CHAIRMAN OF THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the statement made by Hon. Vance C. McCormick, of Pennsylvania, former chairman of the Democratic National Committee, before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on limitation of term of Presidency.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appreciate the opportunity to come before your committee to express my approval of Senate Joint Resolution 289, which limits the Presidency to the "whole or any part of each of two separate terms" of 4 years each.

I will not take your time in discussing the historical and constitutional background of the third-term tradition, as this has already been done by constitutional lawyers, eminent writers, and historians, and others much more ably and effectively than I could do it. I am here to give you simply the views of a newspaper publisher and businessman and one who has participated actively as an officer in the affairs of the Democratic National Committee. I am eager to do what I can to try to save that great party from the errors into which it is being led by its present leaders and to help to restore the principles of democracy as taught by its founders. On that basis I therefore desire to submit for your consideration some of my objections to the third term.

1. The third term is more than "just another tradition." For a century and a half it has had the disapproval of the American people. It was opposed by the early fathers for the same reason it is opposed today—the fear of perpetuation of a one-man government. The principle of limited terms in public office is recognized in the constitutions of 34 of the States.

Until this year the third-term issue never reached the people in an election. Hitherto it was rebuked before it reached that stage. The very fact that under modern conditions it has reached the people is evidence of the political power which can be generated under even the two-term Presidential term and suggests the greater political power of the Presidential office if it could be held for three terms by the same occupant.

2. An ambitious President, able to force his nomination for a third term and being elected, could not be trusted to stop then. His own desire for power or his perfectly sincere belief that he and his policies were indispensable for the welfare of the Nation unquestionably might seek a fourth term and a fifth if age and health permitted.

3. To accept the idea that any man is indispensable as the head of the Government of this Nation can only mean democracy has failed, because if there is only one man capable of administering our Government, his death or incapacity would mean the destruction of the Government. This, of course, is absurd.

That view of indispensability was shared by Mr. Roosevelt himself, who on November 3, 1932, declared, "To indulge in such a fantastic idea of my own individual importance would be to betray the common cause that has brought us all together this year. A great man left a watchword that we can well repeat: 'There is no indispensable man.'"

4. The argument against the third term is even stronger today than when the Government was in its infancy, had relatively few dollars to spend, and a small pay roll of Government employees to support. Today the situation is vastly different. Billions of dollars are being spent in salaries for more than a million Government employees, for grants to States, and to municipalities as subsidies, and fabulously large sums to agriculture and to industry. Add together these sums and the recipients of them and translate them into voting power and instantly we recognize the tremendous influence they could wield on election day. The power over the ballot which could be exercised by the beneficiaries of these enormous funds, along with their friends and relatives, is too tremendous to be left in the hands of any President for more than two terms. It would constitute a bureaucracy of such voting strength that it could perpetuate itself in office and leave the citizens of the Nation helpless to correct it.

5. It is greatly to be regretted that the attempt to break the third-term tradition should come at this particular time when the President and the State Department are exerting every effort to draw into closer union with this country the countries of Central and South America. The acceptance of the third term would be a most unfortunate example to the republics of these countries who in theory are operating under the democratic pattern of government. In the past in this country there has been frequent criticism of the dubious character of some of the democratic governments to the southward. It was often pointed out that democracy in certain of these countries was regarded more as a label than a fact. Claims were made that elections in these republics were conducted by bureaucrats and at the bayonet points of the soldiers of the ruling Presidents. There was no free choice, it was said, and the heads of the nations kept themselves in power by the use of their bureaucratic machines and military might.

The Presidency of Diaz in Mexico was an illustration, as were many others, who kept themselves in office not because of the wish of the great majority of their people but through the power of bureaucratic and military machines.

Up to this time the United States has been setting an excellent example before Central and South American neighbors of a democracy where no president has attempted to remain in office beyond two terms. If this process is reversed and the United States sets out to break the third-term tradition, it will be a vindication of the action of the dictators of Central and South America and a disappointment to the real democrats of those lands who have been looking to this Nation for leadership in the process of free government. Thus a third term here may jeopardize the concert and cooperation of all Central and South American nations which are today so urgently sought. Again, if the United States, by turning its back on the limited terms for the Presidency, sets such an example of Hitler ideology before Central and South America, these nations may conclude that as between totalitarian government in the Americas and in Europe there is no choice.

A 6-year term for the Presidency as against a limit of two terms of 4 years each is undesirable, in my opinion, because a 6-year term is too long for a bad President. Under present conditions, if the people have made an unfortunate choice of a President they can correct the error at the end of 4 years. Under the 6-year term the time necessary to effect a change might have disastrous consequences. If an able and worthy President is chosen and he is rendering satisfactory service to the Nation at the end of 4 years, he may be reelected for another term but beyond that the Nation has felt and feels now that there is danger.

In a previous hearing a member of your committee asked what answer could be given to the man who said he was against the third term in principle but that because of the present foreign crisis he felt the incumbent should be reelected because of his experience. To discuss or answer this question fully and frankly involves matters which some persons may regard as partisan, but with the committee's permission I will be glad to offer a few observations.

If experience itself is to control the election of a President, then, as has been pointed out recently, the argument leads to a perpetual Presidency because if, on account of experience, a two-term President deserves a third term then because of his experience he deserves a fourth more than a third and a fifth term more than a fourth, and so on, until our Presidents would serve for life.

But let us look at the record. What has this supposed experience accomplished?

CERTAINLY NOT NATIONAL UNITY

The great need of the Nation in these difficult times is a united people ready and prepared to meet any emergency. It is difficult to expect unity from a President under whose administration class has been arrayed against class and section against section. Until unity, goodwill and cooperation are reestablished in the United States no matter how many tanks and planes and battleships we have, we are not adequately prepared to meet future crises, nor will we be prepared so long as the National Labor Relations Board is allowed by the President to sow suspicion and discord not only among employers and employees but between employers and employees, preventing that complete cooperation in industry so essential to avoid bottlenecks in a preparedness program.

THIS "EXPERIENCE" CERTAINLY HAS NOT BROUGHT US PREPAREDNESS

For several years the world crisis has been developing serious threats for this country. With all his supposed "experience" the candidate for the third term has not heeded the warnings repeatedly given of the weakness of our national defense. A President with the right kind of foreign organization would have been advised of the critical situation abroad and the dangers facing his country. If the President had this knowledge and refused to share it with his countrymen because of the fear of political consequences, then, I ask, is he the "indispensable man" to lead his country further in this critical hour? This "experience," of which we hear so much, can rest only on such information as is furnished the Government by its diplomatic and foreign agents. That information would be available to any man elected to the Presidency.

It is pertinent to ask what record has the President made in his foreign relations and policies to create the impression that it could not be duplicated by Mr. Willkie or any other able man? The greatest need during recent years to protect this Nation and give it an effective voice in preventing a world-wide catastrophe was the building of a great Army and Navy. Until very recently when the country was bordering on hysteria, how much of an effort did the President make to bring this about? Furthermore, this belated effort, involving the spending of billions of dollars, was put forth unfortunately on the eve of an election.

As further evidence of the supposed "experience," what can be said of the President's desire in the early summer that Congress adjourn and go home? Does this indicate "experience" in the way of preparedness? The importance of keeping Congress in session is demonstrated in the fact that because it ignored the plea of the President and remained in session Congress has enacted such vital measures as a two-ocean Navy, a selective-service law, and appropriation measures to carry them out. Notwithstanding the importance of keeping Congress in session, the President continued to urge its adjournment but happily the pressure of public opinion prevailed in this instance as it did in the attempt to pack the Supreme Court and Congress stayed on the job to the great advantage of the country. Had the President's desires for congressional adjournment prevailed, the Nation would have lacked these essential measures in a preparedness program.

CERTAINLY THIS EXPERIENCE IS NOT MANIFEST IN BUSINESS MANAGEMENT OF THE NATION'S AFFAIRS, SO ESSENTIAL TO PREPAREDNESS AND DEFENSE

For 7 years of this administration this Nation has been beset with the problem of an industrial depression with widespread unemployment. It was a challenge to the business capacity of the Chief Executive of the Government. That problem has not been solved. How could it be under such contradictory policies as spending millions of public funds to irrigate tillable acres of which there was already a surplus and to spend millions more to withdraw still other acres from cultivation? The national debt of forty-seven billion is at its peak in the Nation's history, and more than 7,000,000 persons are still out of employment. What else can you expect when a government subscribes to the fantastic idea that a nation can spend its way out of debt, can distribute more by producing less, and pursues monetary policies which must lead to bankruptcy? A nation preparing its defenses must likewise prepare its finances. Under the New Deal that has not been done. And is that the kind of "experience" we need in a crisis? Is it reasonable to expect that a President who has failed in this challenge to his executive experience and business ability will succeed any better in carrying out the great task of national preparedness, and should he now demand the right to leave the problem in such hands?

As the case stands today, the issue is not one of so-called experience. It is one of retaining in office a man who claims he is indispensable and asks for a third term, thus raising this issue. The anxiety of the American people should not be over the consequences of "switching horses" at this hour but of what the Nation may suffer if there is not a "switch."

It is regrettable that the third-term issue in this election has arisen at a time when its seriousness may be befogged by the tension of a world crisis. The net result of such a crisis might be less devastating to this Nation and its way of life than the violation of an approved tradition like the third term with its encouragement of the very sort of one-man or totalitarian government under which Europe is suffering today. The issue is clear. Do the people want to abandon the American way of life for the sake of this so-called experience which has proved so costly to the country? The democratic way of living needs to be guarded vigilantly in America, and one of the best ways to protect it is to approve the resolution limiting the Presidential term to two terms, which would repudiate the third-term issue, thus settling this fundamental question for all time.

Voting Record of Senator Maloney on Labor Measures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 20 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

LETTER FROM WILLIAM GREEN

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] has received from Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, commenting upon Senator MALONEY'S voting record on measures of interest to labor.

It affords me pleasure to ask the publication of this letter, because it states that the record of the Senator from Connecticut is 100 percent favorable to labor.

I also ask unanimous consent that there may be published, in connection with this letter, a compilation of Senator MALONEY'S voting record on legislation in which labor has been interested.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., August 27, 1940.

Hon. FRANCIS MALONEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your letter of August 23, wherein you request a copy of your voting record on measures of interest to labor. I am glad to comply with your request, especially in view of the fact that your record is 100-percent favorable.

May I take this opportunity to express my true appreciation of your wonderful record built up over a period of years.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

H. R. 9007. On an amendment to this act decreasing the C. C. C. appropriation by $25,000 Senator MALONEY voted "nay."

Limitation of the Presidential Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD R. BURKE
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 20 (legislative day of Wednesday September 18, 1940

ARTICLE BY ARTHUR KROCK

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article written by Mr. Arthur Krock and published in the New York Times of September 18, 1940. The article discusses the testimony of Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary on limitation of term of the Presidency.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of September 18, 1940]

IN THE NATION—AN ELDER STATESMAN DISCUSSES THE THIRD TERM

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, September 17.—Personal and party considerations and the rules and traditions of the game of politics in the United States are responsible for the lamentable fact that many prominent and influential Democrats who oppose and fear a third Presidential term have not publicly withheld their support from Mr. Roosevelt in this campaign. Though by private expressions most of them have indicated reasons for opposition to him which approach, if they do not approximate, the reasons given by Mr. Willkie in Kansas yesterday, these Democrats are silent.

They have left the cause in which they devotedly believe, and the unfavorable outcome of which they deeply fear, to be fought by Republicans, a few well-known Democrats out of office, and by independent students of American history. This timidity in the presence of what these silent Democrats believe to be a very great threat to American institutions is typical of the effect of the political power which Jefferson suspected would be held by a third-term aspirant. It was one of the considerations which induced him to inaugurate the tradition that was inviolate until July 1940.

Among the thoughtful students of American history who have lately voiced the true feelings of these muted Democrats is Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, former Ambassador and president of Cornell University. He is a Republican by affiliation. But a glance at Who's Who and remembrance of sundry public services merit Dr. Schurman's listing as an independent political thinker. The other day, in his eighty-seventh year, he gave to the Senate Judiciary subcommittee, headed by Senator BURKE, an outline of his reasons for opposing a third term.

WHY NOT A THIRD TERM

The points made by Dr. Schurman condensed from his statement of them follow:

1. Of the three coordinate departments of the Federal Government, authority in only one—the executive—is vested in a single individual, the President. The life tenure granted by Great Britain to its sovereign is not an analogy because the British King no longer rules.

2. In Great Britain, further refuting the citation of its government form against the two-term tradition, the legislative branch, through the Cabinet, has over the years absorbed the executive department; also, Parliament can challenge any action of the Cabinet at any time, and, by withholding a vote of confidence, can turn out the Government at any time. Furthermore, the Prime Minister and his associates must face the Commons for questioning on any subject at any time.

3. Ancient Rome and modern Germany illustrate the "constitutional" ways by which a popular and ambitious leader can escape the limitations of tenure and become a dictator.

(a) Julius Caesar did it by employing the plunder of Gaul to buy influence in Rome with which to crush Pompey after the First Triumvirate. In the 6 years he was dictator "Cicero tells us that authority of every kind had been committed to him," that is, through the legal forms. In time of war an American President could attain the same power, and the possibility of his Caesarlike use of it should not be permitted to arise.

"Aristotle laid it down," said Dr. Schurman, "that the primary principle of democracy is personal liberty and that among the essential attributes of popular government must be included the system of short tenure of office.

HITLER'S "LEGAL" RISE TO POWER

(b) Hitler, who was unknown and almost unheard of by Dr. Schurman up to the time he left Berlin as Ambassador, used a new but "constitutional" technique to become the master of the German people. "He planted a 'fifth column' behind the lawful government and * * * behind the mass of the German people." Thus he accomplished a revolution and the abolition of personal liberty without resort to civil war—"a phenomenon unique in history." Assisted by the discoveries and inventions of modern science, which permit a modern autocrat to reach control by easier means than those of the past, Hitler came to supreme authority.

"Let us imagine," said Dr. Schurman, "an American leader of Bryan's gifts but with Hitler's love of power." Let us assume that all-consuming ambition moved him, after two Presidential terms, to seek a third. Would not dictatorship be a possible consequence of success? Supreme as Executive, with growing dominion over Congress and the majority party, the nominator of every member of the Supreme Court and Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, he could easily become a "constitutional" dictator. The risk should not be run. "A Chief Executive can already * * * embroil the country in a situation which necessitates war."

4. The breaking of a revered custom or a constitutional prescription soon becomes general practice. The doctrine of indispensability is always the same when dictatorship or unlimited tenure is sought. Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin all proclaim it. But the British recently rejected it in the midst of war. No emergency can justify the doctrine, certainly not the present one.

Dr. Schurman has offered another challenge to what should have already become a great and worthy national debate.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURTON K. WHEELER
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 20 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18, 1940

NEWSPAPER ARTICLES BY KENNETH CRAWFORD AND RAYMOND CLAPPER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, last week I offered a resolution, proposing a Senate investigation into certain aspects of our national-defense effort. This whole general subject has in recent weeks received the attention of numerous writers, including several outstanding Washington observers. They point out that foreign interests in some of our essential industries may imperil our preparedness program, and suggest changes in existing procedure. Because I believe that these articles are of great interest to all our people who are concerned with making our Nation strong, I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a series of articles written by Kenneth Crawford, which have appeared in the newspaper PM, and an extremely interesting article by Raymond Clapper.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of September 18, 1940]

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION

(By Raymond Clapper)

The matter of throwing the spotlight of publicity upon German control or German interest in American industry is receiving growing attention here.

Enough is known to indicate that a considerable German interest exists, probably amounting to nearly $500,000,000. It is in the form of corporation stock holdings and other interests, such as patent royalty agreements. Much of it is covered up and there is even more mystery as to the use to which the proceeds of these investments are put. Undoubtedly some of it is used to finance propaganda and to subsidize trade in Latin America. Since all ownings, wherever located, of German citizens are considered the property of the Reich and subject to its orders, the question becomes one of public interest.

Chairman WHEELER, of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, is seeking administration support for a Senate investigation of the ramifications of German ownership. Study also is being given to the matter within the administration.

Interest arose partly from the episode in which the Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., which has close relations with the German Zeiss company and which holds a monopoly on certain patents for Navy equipment, notified the Navy Department that it would be compelled to delay for 6 months delivery of range finders for two new cruisers unless Assistant Attorney General Thurman Arnold withdrew his antitrust suit against the company. Trust-buster Arnold went to town on this and the company paid a $40,000 fine and proceeded promptly with the Navy range finders.

The incident is one of those that Senator WHEELER had in mind in asking for a Senate investigation of the whole question of German tie-ups in American industry. Information indicates to Senator WHEELER that German and other foreign corporations exert a measure of control over some of our most important defense industries. German chemical interests have heavy stock ownings in certain essential production here.

Senator WHEELER desires to ferret out such foreign ownership and foreign pooling arrangements. Some of these require American companies to supply all patents to their foreign cousins. Some arrangements have required reports from the American company of military articles manufactured, so that Germany knew at all times what our Army and Navy were getting.

In Germany everyone must register with the Government every foreign security, patent, license, or other property holding abroad. Proceeds are subject to Government disposition. Usually the German citizen is paid off cheap in marks and the German Government takes the full dollar value at this end and puts it to its own use. To allow this to continue without some scrutiny by the American Government would be to allow these particular private foreign holdings to be used for special purposes by the German Government.

No such monkey business is permitted among Americans holding property in Germany. Earnings from American corporations doing business in Germany are blocked and held there. They cannot be taken out of the country and can be used there only for approved purposes.

The obvious course is for the American Government likewise to block the earnings of German investments here, impound them, and allow them to be used to pay off Americans who cannot get their earnings out of Germany. It would be turn about, but fair play.

Such action would check the use of these German earnings for propaganda and for subsidizing trade competition against us in Latin America. The method might be to make compulsory the registration of such property and to deposit the proceeds in Government custody to be paid out in settlement of blocked American earnings in Germany. When post-war trade is resumed, such funds might be usable for purchase of American goods for export to Germany.

But before legislation is undertaken, it would seem desirable to dig out the facts through a Senate investigation. The full story undoubtedly would serve an educational purpose here.

[From PM (New York) of September 9, 1940]

HITLER HOLDS OUR STAKE IN EUROPEAN INDUSTRY AS HOSTAGE—GERMANY USES INVESTMENTS AS A LEVER TO PROMOTE APPEASEMENT SENTIMENT HERE

(By Kenneth Crawford)

Hitler is holding hostage in Germany and the nations he has conquered billions of dollars—good American dollars—and he is using them for all they are worth to make friends and influence people in the United States of America. He already has used them as a lever on American public opinion. They account, at least in part, for the nonvocal appeasement sentiment to be found in the high places of business and industry. If he conquers Great Britain, Hitler will have at least another $500,000,000 to hold for ransom.

These dollars represent direct investments of American companies in Germany, France, the Netherlands, Belgium, the Scandinavian countries, and other nations Hitler has taken over. They are in factories, stores, oil wells—all sorts of enterprises. The owners of these European properties are among this country's largest and most influential corporations—General Motors, Ford, Standard Oil of New Jersey, General Electric, International Telephone & Telegraph, Woolworth, International Harvester, Remington Rand, Yale & Towne. Indeed, almost every big American corporation has some stake in European industry.

HITLER'S LINE

The executives and owners of these corporations naturally hope to get something out of their investments in German Europe. Hitler's agents and propagandists are busy assuring them that this is quite possible. Hitler, they say, believes in capitalism and private enterprise. They used the same assurances to lull some French and British capitalists into an appeasement trance. The Cliveden set in Britain was quite willing to accept, at one time, the theory that the only alternatives left in the world were communism and fascism and that the latter, since it left something to the owning classes, was preferable.

Actually, what happens to business in Hitler's Germany differs only in method and degree from what has happened to business in Russia. The owner is not wholly dispossessed, unless he happens to be a Jew or a critic of the regime, but he is a vassal of the state as surely as is the Russian worker. Moreover, he is subjected to a kind of whimsical gangsterism that strips him of honesty, decency, and reason for self-respect. Experiences of the American companies still doing business in Germany should have shown them what to expect. Some of them have learned their lesson and pulled out. Some have played at Hitler's game of bribery and servitude. Others, in fairness, have had no choice. Their properties have been confiscated in all but name.

IS THERE AMERICAN BRIBERY?

None of the American concerns still operating in Germany or in German-controlled territory is now allowed to take any of its profits out of Europe—at least, not in the open. If some are still doing so undercover, it is because they have bribed the right people long and well. Experts on foreign trade, basing their opinion on admittedly inconclusive information, are inclined to believe that no American concern is now getting any of its profits out. They further believe that all American investments in Europe, if Hitler is not beaten, can be written off in red ink right now. That is why the persistence of appeasement sentiment in business circles is so curious a phenomenon. The part some businessmen are playing in the movement to give Great Britain all possible assistance, even if this assistance eventually involves this country in war, is more understandable. It is strange that so few of these men are to be found in the front rank of the fight against fascism.

The exact value of American business investments in Germany itself—the stake to be sacrificed if American business leaders accept the expert advice to write them off—is a matter of dispute. The Commerce Department estimated them at $227,817,000 in a study published in 1938. This guess was based on answers to a confidential questionnaire sent out to all companies with important European holdings.

A $2,000,000,000 STAKE

Douglas Miller, who for 14 years was commercial attaché to the United States Embassy in Berlin, now a professor at the University of Denver and the foremost authority on recent American trade relations with Germany, estimates that Americans own $2,000,000,000 worth of Germany, including manufacturing and business properties, bonds, real estate, bank balances, and miscellaneous assets. In 1928, at the height of the boom, Americans sold Germany almost $500,000,000 worth of goods, but exports have now been completely shut off by the British blockade.

Even before this war, Hitler's policy of barter had all but stopped German-American overseas commerce. What has continued to be important is production by American firms inside Germany. The largest automobile-manufacturing concern in the nation, for example, is a General Motors subsidiary. It has contributed enormously, as have other American companies, to the upbuilding of Hitler's war machine. It had no choice about this. Had it left Germany, abandoning its plant, the property still would have been operated by the Nazis, who long ago passed laws requiring that a majority of the directors and workers in foreign-owned companies be German.

"FIFTH COLUMN" WORK?

Mr. Miller, while not identifying any firm or individual, is authority for the generalization that American companies holding on in Germany have done so by accepting the Nazi system of wholesale corruption. He suspects also that the Hitler regime has used American employees of these companies in Germany to help him establish a "fifth column" in the United States.

He doubts, however, that the overwhelming majority of company officials back home have been taken in. He trusts in the loyalty of these officials, most of whom became enthusiastic about German trade possibilities in 1924, at the time the Dawes plan took effect. They could not then foresee Hitler's rise in power in 1931. The era of American business expansion of Germany was 1925 to 1930. Mr. Miller thinks that $1,000,000,000 of American assets were withdrawn in time—that at one time American holdings in Germany amounted to $3,000,000,000.

"Every American firm doing business in Germany has to stand for a pay-off," Mr. Miller said. "The alternative is to go out of business. The Nazi party is operating the world's most gigantic shake-down—an extortion plan that makes American racketeers blind men with cups by comparison. The American businessman who does not pay the racketeers in Germany faces smashed windows, diverted shipments, labor trouble, and perhaps the concentration camp.

SHAKE-DOWN

"Businessmen came to me to find out how much of a shakedown they would have to stand for to stay in business. I made the best arrangements possible. Sometimes these consisted of a gift to an important party member—an automobile, a house and lot, or a more handsome reward. Sometimes it meant placing a Nazi party member on the board of directors at a big salary, no work attached. Sometimes it meant only giving jobs to minor party officials. Often it meant contributing huge sums to some fund—the so-called Hitler gift, presumably for the poor, was a favorite.

"American firms in Germany stand to lose millions in investments and past profits."

GERMANY CAN TURN ITS G. M. C. WAR MACHINES ON U. S. A.—AMERICAN CONCERN LEFT HOLDING BAG BY NAZI SHAKEDOWN—COMPANY'S RESOURCES USED BY REICH TO HELP DEVELOP FIGHTING UNITS

(By Kenneth G. Crawford)

General Motors will be used here as an example of the American firms still doing business in Germany, not because its cooperation with the Nazis has been more extensive or more helpful than that of some other companies, but because it has been fairly typical. Regardless of intent, the fact is that General Motors money and brains have contributed enormously to the efficiency of the Nazi military machine. The company has applied American mass production methods to the German automobile industry; its German plant has manufactured trucks for the Army; it has reinvested profits in German property; it has played ball with the Nazi hierarchs, which means forced contribution to various "funds," some of which are known to be used for the Army.

It has been estimated by competent observers that no less than 50,000,000 marks in General Motors profits have been reinvested in Germany because of restriction against their removal. Moreover, export from Germany of General Motors cars has helped Hitler get the foreign exchange he needs to buy military supplies from other countries.

BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN

There is some irony in the appointment of its former president, William Knudsen, to an important place on the United States Defense Commission. General Motors is in the position of selling the United States Army machines which have no other purpose than to defend this country against machines it previously sold to the Reich.

After the first World War the idea became current, and in some places was accepted, that the wealthy beneficiaries of the capitalistic system were brothers under the skin, whether German, French, British, or American—that their first loyalty was to ownership, regardless of where they were situated in relation to national boundaries. It was even noted that munitions plants didn't seem to be bombed as they might have been. Krupp in Germany, Schneider in France, and Skoda in what became Czechoslovakia seemed to have some kind of understanding relationship. Aviators seemed to feel, for some reason, that it wouldn't be cricket to bomb their plants.

BOUGHT PLANT AT TEGEL

But all that is history and hasn't much to do with the present, the second World War. Munitions plants are being bombed this time, whenever they can be hit. Schneider was nationalized by the French Government, and that, apparently, didn't turn out very well either.

Playing the game in strict accordance with the rules of international trade, General Motors executives decided in the 1920's to set up a factory in Germany rather than export their cars to Germany. This was good business sense for several reasons: It hurdled tariff walls; it offered a new outlet for overabundant capital; it made possible production, at relatively low labor cost, of cars particularly adapted to the needs of European nations, whose tax laws favored light cars over heavy cars.

So General Motors bought a plant at Tegel shortly after the Dawes Plan took effect. The place was a World War munitions plant, and General Motors used it for production of Buicks and Chevrolets. Presently the company discovered that these American cars were too big and too expensive for the continental trade. As to what happened then I quote from American Industry in Europe, by Frank A. Southard, Jr., published in 1931:

"Early in 1929 rumors of negotiations between General Motors and Adam Opel Aktiengesellschaft began to appear. Organized in 1862 as a sewing machine factory, the Opel Co. added the production of motorcars in 1902. By 1929 its shops covered 57 acres and employed 13,000 workers. It is the leader among the German car producers, and sponsored a campaign for united opposition to the American import menace. Despite denials the rumor persisted, fed by conversion of Opel from a proprietorship to a corporation, and by the presence of a General Motors engineer at the Opel works. The persistence was justified by the announcement, at the end of March, that General Motors had acquired 80 percent of the stock of the German company, at a cost of $30,000,000.

"The transaction gave General Motors the most important motorcar company in Europe with the exception of Citroën. The report at the end of the first quarter of 1930 showed a daily production of 200 automobiles and 700 bicycles. The company was producing 60 percent of the cars in the four-horsepower class in Germany and 30 percent of the passenger vehicles in all classes. The production capacity of Opel is to be increased to 200,000 in 5 years' time."

General Motors, operating through Adam Opel, became a big European institution. Authorities other than Southard have placed the original investment of the American company at $40,000,000, most of it in General Motors stock rather than cash, and the subsequent investment at $20,000,000. At the end of 1930 or the beginning of 1931 General Motors sold its Tegel plant. The concern now has total German assets of $69,000,000 and has earned up to $36,000,000. In 1939 the company sold 122,000 cars, of which about 36,300 were exported. Since the current war started the General Motors plant at Russelsheim has had a virtually exclusive contract for production of light trucks, which are highly important to the Army. Its light four-cylinder civilian car is also important to the German export trade.

Just how much General Motors officials in the United States of America have to say about the operation of Adam Opel is a question. At one time the American company had five members on the board of directors—Alfred P. Sloan, James D. Mooney, Fisher, Bradley, and Smith. The last time it published a report in this country about its German works, General Motors said it had only one director left on the board and intimated that it had no control over the company.

Mooney is now liaison officer between General Motors and the Government, charged with responsibility for the company's defense work.

It is obvious that General Motors, fearful of losing all its German investment, has been victimized by the Nazi shakedown system. It is remarkable how little corporation officials know about what their subordinates do. Mr. Knudsen may never have heard anything about the Nazi shakedown. General Motors employees in Hitler's country are, of course, eager to keep their jobs. What they tell the home office may or may not reflect the true situation.

It must be said that General Motors is not wholly German in its foreign operations. It has interests in France, now German, and Great Britain. It also has properties in Sweden, Finland, Denmark, Norway, Latvia, Lithuania, Iceland, Estonia, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Austria, Hungary, Spain, and Portugal. Nor does it stand alone as a European motor-car maker. Henry Ford has a large plant in Germany and others spread over Europe. Ford organized a German company in 1925 and by 1928 its assets in Germany added up to more than $3,000,000.

Ford has bigger plants in England and in Ireland. He recently refused to take orders in the United States of America for airplane engines going to England.

CAPTIVE AMERICAN COMPANIES HELP OIL NAZI WAR MACHINES—$275,000,000 INVESTMENTS IN EUROPEAN REFINERIES AND DISTRIBUTION A BIG ASSET TO HITLER

(By Kenneth Crawford)

No American-financed and directed industry in Germany is more important in Herr Hitler's scheme of things than oil refining and distribution. The Nazis have used the German properties of several American concerns to get oil and keep it flowing into their war machines. The Panzer divisions that rolled over the Low Countries and France, the airplanes that now are demolishing parts of London—these burn a product of American genius and wealth.

Standard Oil of New Jersey is one of the largest foreign investors in the Reich, and its great refining plant at Hamburg, its 20,000 filling stations scattered over the country were indispensable to Hitler's war efforts. Socony Vacuum Co. likewise contributed the facilities of a refinery and distribution system.

In a sense, these firms have a direct stake in the fortunes of Germany. They also own properties in the countries Germany is fighting. But if Hitler should become the master of Europe, it would be only through him that American investors could get anything out of their European investments, German, French, or British. While most observers consider Hitler a frail and tricky reed for property rights to lean upon, owners of European property think him the only reed in sight. The Nazis have not discouraged this idea.

HEAVY INTERESTS

The last Government report on the subject placed the total of American investments in foreign oil at $1,035,000,000—$275,000,000 of it in Europe.

Standard's heavy interests in Germany were, of course, acquired long before Hitler emerged from a beer hall. The company has operated for years principally through Deutsche-Amerikanische Petroleum A. G., known as Dapag. The concern was established in 1890, with Standard in control of 95 percent of its stock. By 1928 it had assets of $24,000,000 and made a $1,600,000 profit. Standard also has had an interest in Deutsche Gasolin A. G., which is partly owned by I. G. Farben, and Hamburg-Americanische Oel A. G., and other companies doing a major part of Germany's oil business.

In addition, Standard is closely allied with I. G. Farben in exploitation of oil-refining patents, which the two companies developed jointly. Standard-I. G. Co. was organized in the United States of America in 1929, with Standard holding a majority of the stock and I. G. Farben a minority to use of the hydrogenation process on which the companies held patents. Close alliances between German and American interests are therefore an old story in the oil industry.

OTHER INVESTMENTS

In other industries these alliances are not so close and American investments in German enterprise not so large. But scores of American companies have important German investments, the biggest being General Motors and Ford, International Telephone & Telegraph, General Electric, Westinghouse, International Business Machines, Remington Rand, Pratt & Whitney, Sperry Gyroscope, International Harvester, Underwood-Elliott Fisher, Royal Typewriter, Worthington Pump, Otis Elevator, Mergenthaler Lintoype, Budd, Yale & Towne, Swift & Co., American Radiator, Anaconda Copper, Singer Sewing Machine, Colgate-Palmolive-Peet, and Woolworth.

What these companies are up against, including, of course, the oil companies, is a system under which they have no choice but to serve the Nazi cause or surrender their investments. Orders for the army have priority in the Reich, and there isn't any arguing about it. Hitler makes his own rules as he goes along. Just what these rules are today and what the condition of captive American companies is, no one, including officials of the companies most concerned, knows very definitely. The United States Government likewise is secretive about what current information it has. A majority of members of foreign corporation directorates must be German—and Aryan. American concerns, like others, were blacklisted after Hitler came to power if they continued to employ Jews.

TAX FAVORS FADE

Moreover, although foreign companies frequently got promises of tax favors in the palmy 20's—agreements that were supposed to cover collections for a long future period—most of these have since been discarded. Hitler's tax collectors are heavy handed and capricious in their dealings with foreign corporations. The Hitler method, except perhaps in the case of a few favorites, could scarcely be called appeasement. What his admirers say about his attitude toward private enterprise and what he does are two different things.

Douglas Miller, formerly commercial attaché in the Berlin Embassy, handled protests of American firms which the German Government proposed to tax, not only on their holdings within Germany, but on all their properties, wherever situated. And then there is the ongoing unofficial taxation. Mr. Miller recalls this incident:

"The American manager of an American firm came to my office one day and told me he wanted to pick up somebody to put on his pay roll. It developed that he had been having difficulties getting the products needed in his operations. When all his efforts to secure such products failed he was told quite simply that there was not enough Nazi representation on his pay roll.

"The man said, frankly, that he wanted to get somebody who would do him the most good for the least outlay. I got in touch with Nazi headquarters and asked that they send over a good man for this particular company. A short time later a young man less than 30 years old came in. He said he was propaganda leader under the Gau, or district leader, in Saxony. He said he would be very glad to give protection to an American firm. 'I am already giving protection to 17 other companies,' he told me, 'and I like very much the idea of protecting number 18—especially since it is an American firm.'

"His salary was set at 500 marks a month—$200—and he went on his way. As far as I know the only way the company ever heard of him again was through his endorsement of his monthly pay checks—but the businessman had no more trouble getting the products he needed."

GERMAN PATENT AGREEMENTS CURB UNITED STATES NATIONAL-DEFENSE PROGRAM

(By Kenneth Crawford)

During the World War we had a law against dealing with the enemy. The Alien Property Custodian took over German-owned assets in this country. After the war Germans were again extended the same legal protection, so far as property rights were concerned, that citizens enjoyed.

Now some of these rights are used to gum up the American defense program at vital points. And the gumming is done with the connivance of Americans. Or perhaps this is too harsh a way of putting it. The practices that now interfere with national defense might not seem sinister in normal times. And they result, in most cases, from agreements entered into long before this war started and Germany became identified again as this Nation's enemy. Since she still is technically a friendly nation, nothing has been done by Congress to prevent this form of nonviolent sabotage.

What has happened is this: Ever since the World War German scientists and engineers, urged on by their country's economic plight, have led in the rapid advance of industrial technology. They have found new methods and new formulae, particularly in the fields of chemistry and metallurgy. Seeking ersatz, they have sometimes found improved materials. Exploiting their discoveries, big German industrial firms have made the most of their equal treatment under the United States patent laws. They have laid claim wherever possible to exclusive right to these new materials.

TRICKS OF THE TRADE

Some of this country's most alert patent law firms have represented these German concerns. All the tricks of the trade have been used on behalf of German clients. In many cases so-called "umbrella" patents, covering large areas of new discovery, have been taken out not because they were likely to stand up in the courts in a show-down but because of their nuisance value. In most cases, however, German patent holders stood ready to guard against infringements to the last legal ditch.

As holders of American patents, these German firms were privileged to choose between three courses:

Manufacture their patented product exclusively.

License an American firm to manufacture it on a royalty basis.

Refrain from manufacturing the product or licensing anyone else to manufacture it in the United States of America.

All three options have been used but No. 2 is the most common.

What the Germant patent-holding company ordinarily does is enter into a licensing agreement with an American company. The patentee may collect royalties or it may permit free use of its formula in the United States of America in exchange for trade advantages—an agreement, for example, that the American company concerned will not export its products into German world-trade areas. Agreements of this kind have seriously interfered with American defense.

A recent example in point is the case of the Bausch & Lomb Optical Co. This company started to produce the optical glass used in torpedo directors, antiaircraft detectors, and other such complex fighting implements during the World War when it was discovered that Germans held all the patents and had not permitted a glass industry of this kind to develop in the United States of America. Patents of the Zeiss Optical Co., the German firm which controlled the American market, were confiscated by the Alien Property Custodian and turned over to Bausch & Lomb.

But after the war, when German patent rights were restored, Bausch & Lomb entered into an agreement with Zeiss to keep its military glass out of the United States of America, and Bausch & Lomb agreed not to invade Europe. The German company, however, still collected royalties on glass manufactured by the American company for the Army and Navy. Thus the Army and Navy paid tribute to a German firm and the American company achieved domestic monopoly on which our armed forces are wholly dependent. Moreover, all new patents on military equipment taken out in the name of the American company become the property of Zeiss.

FORTY THOUSAND DOLLARS FINE

When the Justice Department clamped down on Bausch & Lomb for violation of the antitrust laws, the company threatened to hold up work on battleships for the United States Navy. But it thought better of this and ultimately paid a $40,000 fine.

Then there is the case of the agreement between General Electric and Krupp, German munitions firm, for manufacture of tungsten carbide, a substance used for cutting edges in machine tools. General Electric manufactured tungsten carbide under patent license from Krupp and the Government charges that prices were fixed by the two companies in 1928. In 1936, Krupp sold out the business to General Electric, but retained the right under contract to limit the number of new licensees. Only three licenses have been issued. Tungsten carbide is important to the defense industries.

MAGNESIUM MYSTERY

More important still is the magnesium mystery. The undisputed facts are that magnesium is an alloy one-third lighter than aluminum and extensively used by the Germans to increase the lifting capacity of their airplanes, that only a limited supply of this metal has been produced in the United States of America for some still unexplained reason and that there are German interests in the patent wood pile.

The Dow Chemical Co. is the principal producer in this country and last year the entire American production was less than 10,000,000 pounds, not enough to go very far in American airplanes. Dow produces the metal partly under its own patents and partly under license from the Megnesium Development Corporation of America, which is owned 50 percent by the Aluminum Co. of America and half by I. G. Farbenindustrie, the German chemical trust.

The American Magnesium Corporation also used to produce magnesium, but no longer does. It is owned half by the Aluminum Co. of America and half by General Aniline and Film Corporation. The latter company, in turn, is part owned by a Swiss corporation in which Germans are interested and Aniline itself has had German directors.

It is impossible to draw a definite conclusion from all this that the Germans have forced American airplane manufacturers to use aluminum rather than magnesium in their products because of the obvious interest of the Aluminum Co. of America. It sells more of its product if magnesium is scarce.

At the same time, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that Americans are dealing with Nazi Germany through patent licensing arrangements and that too many of these dealings are under the table.

Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Founding of University of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the President of the United States at Convention Hall, Philadelphia, Pa., on September 20, 1940, in connection with the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the University of Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is a strange period of relapse in the history of the civilization of the world, for in some lands it has become the custom to burn the books of scholars and to fix by government decree the national forms of religion, morality, and culture. In such a time it is more than a mere formality to join with you in celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of this free and independent institution of scholarship. I am honored in becoming an alumnus of the University of Pennsylvania.

The very foundation of this university was concerned with freedom of religious teaching, and with free learning for the many who could not pay for higher education. It was originally proposed as a place where the good and Reverend Dr. George Whitefield might preach his religion without certain difficulties which the old conservatives of Philadelphia threw in his path. Indeed, it was desired to make it unnecessary for him to preach in the sun and rain of the open fields, when the doors of the established churches were closed against him. And it was the dream of the founders to make it a source of education to the children of the poor who otherwise would go untaught.

The survival and growth of the university through these two centuries are particularly symbolic of the eternal strength which is inherent in the American concept of the freedom of human thought and action. Here is living proof of the validity and force of single-minded service to the cause of truth.

Events in the world are making the vast majority of our citizens think more and more clearly about the manner of the growth of their liberty and freedom, and how hard their people have fought and worked to win and to hold the privilege of free government.

With the gaining of our political freedom came the conflict between the point of view of Alexander Hamilton, sincerely believing in the superiority of government by a small group of public-spirited and usually wealthy citizens, and the point of view of Thomas Jefferson, an advocate of government by representatives of all the people, an advocate of the universal right of free thought, free personal living, free religion, free expression of opinion, and, above all, the right of free universal suffrage.

Many of the Jeffersonian school were frank to admit the high motives and disinterestedness of Hamilton and his school. Many Americans of those days were willing to concede that if government could be guaranteed to be kept always on the high level of unselfish service suggested by the Hamiltonians there would be nothing to fear. For the very basis of the Hamiltonian philosophy was that through a system of elections every 4 years, limited to the votes of the most highly educated and the most successful citizens, the best of those qualified to govern could always be selected.

It was with rare perspicuity, however, that Jefferson pointed out that, on the doctrine of sheer human frailty, the Hamilton theory was bound to develop into government by selfishness or government for personal gain or government by class, which would ultimately lead to the abolishment of free elections. For he recognized that it was our system of free, unhampered elections which was the surest guaranty of popular government. So long as the voters of the Nation, regardless of higher education or property possessions, were free to exercise their choice in the polling place without hindrance, the country would have no cause to fear the hand of tyranny.

At all times in our history since Hamilton there have been many Americans who have sought to confine the ballot to limited groups of people. A quarter of a century ago President Eliot of Harvard summarized his views when he said to me: "Roosevelt, I am convinced that even though we have multiplied our universities in every State of the Union, even though higher learning seems to have come into its own, if the ballot were to be confined to the holders of college degrees, the Nation would go on the rocks in a very few years." It may seem ungracious for a very new degree holder to say this to this audience of older degree holders, but my authority for this view is a great educator, noted for his efforts to disseminate college education throughout the country.

I agree with him thoroughly in his estimate of the superior ability of the whole of the voters to pass upon political and social issues in free and unhampered elections as against the exclusive ability of a smaller group of individuals at the top of the social structure.

On candidates and on election issues I would rather trust the aggregate judgment of all the people in a factory—the president, all the vice presidents, the board of directors, the managers, the foremen, plus all the laborers—rather than the judgment of the few who may be financially interested. On such questions the aggregate total judgment of a farm owner, the farmer, and all the farm hands will be sounder than that of the farm owner alone. I would rather rely on the aggregate opinion, on matters affecting government, of a railroad president, its superintendents, its engineers, foremen, brakemen, conductors, trainmen, telegraphers, porters, and all the others, than on the sole opinion of the few in control of management, or the principal stockholders.

Only too often in our political history, the few at the top have tried to advise or dictate to the many lower down how they should vote.

Even today in certain quarters there are, I regret to say, demands for a return of government to the control of those few, who, because of business ability or economic omniscience, are supposed to be just a touch above the average of our citizens. As in the days of Hamilton, we of our own generation should give them all credit for pure intention and high ideals. Nevertheless, their type of political thinking could easily lead to government by selfish seekers for power and riches and glory. For the great danger is that once the Government falls into the hands of a few elite, curtailment or even abolition of free elections might be adopted as the means of keeping them in power.

I can never forget that some well-meaning people have even recently seriously suggested that the right to vote be denied to American men and women who through no fault of their own had lost their jobs and, in order to keep the family and the home going, were working on work-relief projects.

As long as periodic free elections survive, no set of people can permanently control government. In the maintenance of free elections rests the complete and enduring safety of our form of government.

No dictator in history has ever dared to run the gantlet of a really free election.

These fundamental truths have become commonplace among Americans, but it is well constantly to keep them in mind in order to understand what has happened in other lands. A decade ago, for example, the German people despaired of the processes of their democracy, which were based on the free use of the franchise. They were willing to lend ear to a new cult called nazi-ism—a minority group which professed extraordinary patriotism, and offered bread and shelter and better government through the rule of a handful of persons boasting of special aptitude for government. In those days loudly professed emphasis was placed by this special group on their own purity of purpose. Nothing was ever said about abolishing free elections. Many people of large business affairs, influenced by several factors, and dissatisfied with the democratic system, formed political and economic alliances with this small group.

You and I know the subsequent history of Germany. The right of free elections and the free choice of heads of government were suddenly wiped out by a new regime, still professing the same purity of purpose. It is a travesty on fact to claim that there is any free choice of public officials in that nation today, or that there ever has been one since 1933.

What Jefferson prophesied might happen in this country, if the philosophy of the restricted vote and of government by special class were adopted, did actually happen in Germany before our very eyes.

Many years ago, speaking in San Francisco, I pointed out that new conditions imposed new requirements upon government and upon those who conducted government. As Jefferson write a long time ago: "I know also that laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. * * * As new discoveries are made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions change with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also, and keep pace with the times."

We must follow that rule today as readily as then, always with the condition that any change in institutions or in economic methods must remain within the same old framework of a freely elected democratic form of government.

I have pointed out many times that Western migration and the free use of unoccupied lands have ended with the advent of the industrial age; that with the changes wrought by new inventions of steam and electricity, new relationships have arisen between units of finance and industry on one side and the great mass of workers and small businessmen on the other; and that certain Government controls have become necessary to prevent a few financial and industrial groups from harming or cutting the throats of other groups smaller in size but much greater in number.

We have at the same time developed new beliefs in governmental responsibilities to humanity as a whole. It is a relatively new thing in American life to consider what the relationships of government are to its starving or unemployed citizens, and to take steps to fulfill its duties to them.

A generation ago people had scarcely given thought to the terms "social security," "minimum wages," or "maximum hours." It is only within recent years that government has given its attention in a serious, effective way to the insurance of bank deposits, to soil conservation, relief to farmers and to farm tenants, development of cheap electric water power, reclamation of soil by proper use of water and forests; to the prevention of fraud and deceit in the sale of securities; to the assurance of the principle of collective bargaining by workers in industry; to Government assistance to the blind and the handicapped; or to the need of taking care of elderly people without throwing them into the poorhouse.

These are some of the new instruments of social justice which America has forged to meet the new conditions of industry, agriculture, finance, and labor—conditions which had been neglected too long, and which were beginning to endanger our internal security. These are the means which our own generation have adopted to overcome the threats to economic democracy in our land—threats which in other lands led quickly to political despotism.

Benjamin Franklin, to whom this university owes so much, realized, too, that while basic principles of natural science, of morality, and of the science of society were eternal and immutable, the application of these principles necessarily change with the patterns of living conditions from generation to generation. I am certain that he would insist that it is the whole duty of the philosopher and the educator to apply the eternal ideals of truth and goodness and justice in terms of the present and not of the past. Growth and change are the law of all life. Yesterday's answers are inadequate for today's problems—just as the solutions of today will not fill the needs of tomorrow.

Eternal truths will be neither true nor eternal unless they have fresh meaning for every new social situation.

It is the function of education to provide continuity for our national life—to transmit to youth the best of our culture which has been tested in the fire of history. It is equally the obligation of education to train the minds and the talents of our youth; to improve, through creative citizenship, our American institutions in accord with the requirements of the future.

We cannot always build the future for our youth; we can build our youth for the future.

It is in great universities like this that the ideas which can assure our national safety and make tomorrow's history are being forged and shaped. Civilization owes most to the men and women, known and unknown, whose free, inquiring minds and restless intellects could not be subdued by the power of tyranny.

This is no time for any man to withdraw into some ivory tower and proclaim the right to hold himself aloof from the problems and the agonies of his society. The times call for bold belief that the world can be changed by man's endeavor, and that this endeavor can lead to something new and better. No man can sever the bonds which unite him to his society simply by averting his eyes. He must ever be receptive and sensitive to the new; and have sufficient courage and skill to face novel facts and to deal with them.

If democracy is to survive, it is the task of men of thought, as well as men of action, to put aside pride and prejudice; and with courage and single-minded devotion—and above all with humility—to find the truth and teach the truth that shall keep men free.

We may find in that sense of purpose, the personal peace, not of repose, but of effort, the keen satisfaction of doing, the deep feeling of achievement for something far beyond ourselves, the knowledge that we build more gloriously than we know.

Propaganda To Enter the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ARTICLE BY CHARLES G. ROSS

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, under leave granted to me, I present for publication in the RECORD the article by Mr. Charles G. Ross, published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of September 22, 1940, under the heading "Inside Story of 'Propaganda Engine' To Send United States Army and Navy Equipment to Britain."

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of September 22, 1940]

INSIDE STORY OF "PROPAGANDA ENGINE" TO SEND UNITED STATES ARMY AND NAVY EQUIPMENT TO BRITAIN—BEHIND-THE-SCENES GROUP, INCLUDING WAR ADVOCATES, TAKES A HAND IN CAMPAIGN—HOW WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE AND OTHERS ARE AROUSING PUBLIC TO TRY TO INFLUENCE ROOSEVELT'S ACTIONS

(By Charles G. Ross, Contributing Editor of the Post-Dispatch)

WASHINGTON, September 21.

"This engine of publicity and propaganda"—thus William Allen White, Emporia (Kans.) newspaper publisher, in a radio speech August 22, described the Committee To Defend America by Aiding the Allies, of which he is the founder and chairman.

It is this organization which is now, hard on the completion of the destroyer-naval base deal between the United States and Great Britain, heading the movement for new and significant aid to Britain—25 flying fortresses (long-range bombers), 20 torpedo boats, and as many combat planes as possible, now the equipment of our Army and Navy.

White might have added that the committee has proved itself an engine of extraordinary power. That the creation and mobilization of public sentiment by the White committee played a tremendously important part—in a sense, the decisive part—in bringing about the transfer of the 50 destroyers to Great Britain, there can be no doubt.

In the same speech, White modestly described himself as "only the rooster on the cowcatcher, crowing lustily sometimes at the cross roads." That is a gross understatement. He is in fact as well as in name the head of the White committee, and his labors for its objectives have been prodigious. His name alone, because of the widespread public confidence he has long enjoyed, is a valuable asset to the committee.

Since the White committee is engaged in large-scale propaganda—frankly so—its personnel and activities become a proper subject of analysis. Indeed, they become, in the public interest, a required subject. That is true of any form of important propaganda, whatever its aim.

ADVOCATES OF WAR JOIN POLICY GROUP

It is the purpose of this article to examine objectively (1) the workings of the White committee and (2) of a small behind-the-scenes group which has operated with proved effectiveness along lines parallel with those of the White committee and to an extent in collaboration with it. Included in this group are a number of newspaper editors and columnists. Probably its greatest single achievemeent was its persuasion of General Pershing to make his radio speech of August 4—a speech which, members of the group and of the White committee believe, did more than any other single thing to mobilize public sentiment behind the destroyer deal.

This informal group of thirty to forty contains men of varying shades of opinion as to how far the United States should go in aiding Britain. Some are on the cautious side; some are in between; a few, unless they have changed their views since June 9, favor an immediate declaration of war by the United States against Germany.

On the June date 30 citizens in a public statement called for a war declaration. Among the signers were six who are now identified with the above-described group and who attended a group meeting on July 25, with 13 others, at which steps toward bringing about the release of destroyers to Great Britain were agreed upon.

The 30 persons who signed the memorial for a war declaration constitute no fixed propaganda group. They acted, as one of the instigators of the petition explained, "impulsively," with the view primarily to arousing the United States to the danger in which it would find itself from a Hitler victory in Europe. This result, he felt, had been since brought about by events abroad; consequently he believed that at least half of those who called for a formal war declaration on June 9 would not do so today.

There was no meeting of the signers. The petition was drafted in New York and sent around to a selected list of persons believed to be in sympathy with its objective. As soon as a fairly impressive number of signers had been obtained, the petition was released for publication. This ended the activity of this particular group, as such.

ALL AGREE ON WHITE'S OBJECTIVE

Among the signers of the war memorial, the White committee and the informal group working with and behind the committee, there is, of course, a large community of interest, extending up to the point where the extremists diverge in favor of immediate and formal war on Germany. All are agreed on the White committee's proposition that large and continuing aid should be sent to Great Britain, in this country's own defense, and that every effort should be made to induce public opinion to bring pressure on the Government to this end.

All the resources of the White committee are being enlisted, on behalf of its new program for "flying fortresses," torpedo boats, and combat planes.

As an instance, the committee this week arranged for a phone-ringing campaign in New York City, to begin next Tuesday. A corps of 1,410 women volunteers, each taking 2 pages of the telephone directory, will call up all the 735,488 residential numbers in the 5 boroughs of New York City. The job will take 2 weeks. The caller in each case will ask for the woman of the household and seek to line her up for the committee's work. Those who respond favorably will be asked to regard themselves as "American minute women," subject to call from the committee to write letters to the President or Members of Congress in support of the committee's objectives. Leaders of the movement are considering a Nation-wide telephone campaign.

Some idea of the success which the committee already has had in inspiring messages to heads of the Government may be gathered from its estimate that petitions presented under committee auspices to the President and Congress in favor of the destroyer deal carried 3,000,000 signatures.

CHAIRMAN PUTS "ENGINE" IN MOTION

When the decision was reached, in pursuance of the general aims of the committee, to go out for the three-point plane and torpedo-boat program, Chairman White set his engine in motion with a telegram to the heads of the 662 local chapters of the committee. This message, under date of September 12, briefly explained the new project and urged telegrams in its favor to the President.

"There is reason to believe," White wired, "that such material can be sent without hurt to our national defense, particularly as every month the struggle is kept going abroad means the more time we have to prepare the facilities to defend ourselves and the things we believe in."

On the same date, White supplemented this telegram with a letter addressed to the members of the national committee and the officers and chairman of its local chapters. Because this letter—released in full by the committee to the Post-Dispatch along with other material—not only sets out the arguments for the current program but helps to tell the general story of the committee's aims and methods, it is given here in full text:

"MY DEAR FRIEND: I wanted to write this rather long and confidential letter to say a few things about what we have accomplished and our plans for the next few weeks.

"The battle of Britain continues and is now reaching its full fury. We may expect within the next few days the destruction and loss of life to grow greater and greater and a strong possibility of an invasion from either the French and Belgian ports held by Germany or from Norway.

"We believe that the 50 destroyers will be of the greatest physical and moral assistance to Great Britain in repelling the invasion. Their importance cannot be overstated. As part of the arrangement, the United States secured air and naval bases which will be a tremendous factor in national defense. The public almost unanimously applauds the negotiations. I for one believe that the President acted absolutely correctly in negotiating the arrangement as an Executive matter. There was not time for the long debate which congressional consideration would have resulted in. I am proud of the part that this committee and its many chapters played in mobilizing public opinion in support of this great step.

"WHAT WE BELIEVE COULD GO QUICKLY

"But the battle of Great Britain goes on. Other materials will be needed. In fact we can for the sake of simplification think of materials for Britain in two divisions: One, material that will be needed this week or next to save Britain from destruction before the bad weather sets in. Two, material that Britain will need throughout the winter to be in a position in the spring not only strong enough to resist invasion but powerful enough to take the aggressive. Later on I shall write you about the latter material but today I want to say a word about what we believe could go quickly.

"First, airplanes. We have approximately 75 flying fortresses in our Army. These are incomparably more powerful with a longer range than anything that any other nation has. Also, we have many planes, not all first class, but out of which some could be spared for the defense of London. If an invasion is undertaken, little electric boats, called the "mosquito fleet," would be very helpful in turning back the transports. That would be second only in importance to the destroyers.

"Therefore, we strongly hope that our Government dispatch immediately 25 flying fortresses and as many pursuit planes as possible, and 20 mosquito boats. Every day is important and a few weeks may be too late to save Britain and our first line of defense. (This was covered in today's telegram.)

"This winter the British will need tanks for the desert campaign to protect Suez and Gibraltar; probably food on credit; and a large proportion of the products of American airplane factories. These latter materials we will discuss with you when the present emergency is over."

WHITE URGES FLOOD OF PROPAGANDA

"Many of you wired a few hours after the destroyer deal was completed asking what to do next. I wired Tuesday for letters, editorials, telegrams to the President urging that everything that can be spared from our American armed forces go now to help save London. We were very fortunate in the destroyer matter in being able to mention 50 destroyers and repeat the number constantly. It is not always easy to give as precise figures. Sometimes our instructions will have to be a bit more general. But please have faith in us, knowing that we are trying to do everything possible to secure correct information and that we will not urge anything that we do not believe is wise and possible.

"Although I know that you must be tired from the hard work over the destroyer campaign, I urge you to use every bit of energy and reserve you have in the next 2 weeks in support of our Government sending every bit of material that can be spared to help Britain resist invasion from air and sea.

"One word more, we are getting all sorts of letters and inquiries about our political position. Everything that is done as one moves toward an election naturally seems to have a political motive. A radio commentator referred to us the other night as a Willkie committee and as if to balance that a wire came from one of our branches asking if the rumor was true that the committee was about to come out for Roosevelt. May I say that the committee contains many of the outstanding men of both political parties and I hope a few members of the Socialist Party as well.

"The committee's position will be absolutely nonpartisan. As a nonpartisan committee we support the foreign policy of the President enthusiastically, not because the President is a Democrat but because he is our President, the Commander in Chief of our armed forces, and above everything else, because his foreign policy is one that we can enthusiastically support.

"Sincerely yours,

(Signed) "WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE."

CABLES TO ANOTHER GENERAL FOR SUPPORT

Having in mind the success in getting General Pershing to speak on the radio in behalf of sending 50 American destroyers to Britain, Chairman White then turned to Gen. Douglas MacArthur, former Chief of Staff of the United States Army, now in charge of the defense of the Philippine Islands. White cabled General MacArthur at Manila asking his military opinion as to whether "the time has come for America to give continued and further aid to England in the fight for civilization." In part, General MacArthur cabled in reply:

"The greatest strategical mistake in all history will be made if America fails to recognize the vital moment, if she permits again the writing of that fatal epitaph 'too late.' Such coordinated help as may be regarded as proper by our leaders should be synchronized with the British effort so that the English speaking peoples of the world will not be broken in detail. The vulnerability of singleness will disappear before unity of effort—not too late, not tomorrow, but today."

Immediately the White committee broadcast a leaflet under the heading: "Send those bombers! Stop Hitler now and keep war away from America." The leaflet contained the text of General MacArthur's cablegram to White and urged the recipient to "Wire the President—urge your Senators and Representatives in Washington to take a strong public stand on aid to England—our first line of defense."

JOINT IDEA OF WHITE AND EICHELBERGER

Now, to go back to the inception of the White committee. It was the joint idea of White and of Clark M. Eichelberger, now serving as its director. Eichelberger, a war veteran, grew up in Freeport, Ill. An enthusiast in the cause of world peace through collective security, he became a regional officer and later the national director of the League of Nations Association. (It was to devote himself to the work of this organization that John Hessin Clarke resigned from the United States Supreme Court in 1922.) Last May, White and Eichelberger talked over the necessity, as they saw it, of American aid to the Allies "short of war."

White had served as the chairman of a committee for the revision of the neutrality laws—palpably a change in the interest of the Allies—and he was eager to give further and continuing aid Eichelberger was of like mind. He concedes now, with a wry smile, the irony of the position into which he, as an ardent peace advocate, has been forced by events.

Out of the conversation of White and Eichelberger grew a message to 60 prominent persons of similar views, and the favorable response to this enabled White on May 19 to announce the formation of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies.

STIMSON AND KNOX BECOME MEMBERS

Among the first to join the movement were former Secretary of State Henry L. Stimson, now Secretary of War; Gov. Herbert H. Lehman, of New York; Col. Frank Knox, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, now Secretary of the Navy, and Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University.

The national committee now has 594 members, all of whom have come in at the invitation of White. The officers, in addition to White and Eichelberger, are Hugh Moore, chairman of the executive committee, and Frederick C. McKee, treasurer. Moore is the head of the Dixie Vortex Cup Corporation of Easton, Pa., and McKee is a Pittsburgh cement manufacturer.

With the officers named, Lewis W. Douglas, of New York, Mrs. Emmons Blaine, of Chicago, and Dr. Frank Boudreau, of New York, constitute the executive committee. Douglas is the antinew dealer who resigned as Budget Director under Roosevelt; he is now president of the Mutual Life Insurance Co., of New York. Mrs. Blaine is a sister of the late Cyrus McCormick. Dr. Boudreau is the director of the Millbank Fund, a medical foundation.

FORMING COMMITTEE TO ADVISE ON POLICY

Still in process of formation is the important advisory policy committee. The present members are the following:

Dr. Esther Brunauer, of the American Association of University Women, Washington, D. C.

James B. Conant, president of Harvard University.

Frederic R. Coudert, New York City, lawyer and writer on international relations.

Frank P. Graham, president of the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill.

Frank Kingdon, former president University of Newark, active in social-welfare work; 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

Freda Kirchway, editor of the Nation, New York City.

Fiorello H. LaGuardia, mayor of New York City, recently appointed by President Roosevelt as chairman of the United States-Canada Joint Defense Commission.

Thomas W. Lamont, New York City, partner in J. P. Morgan & Co.

Arthur Lovejoy, emeritus professor of philosophy, Johns Hopkins University; chairman of the Baltimore chapter of the White committee.

Robert A. Millikan, physicist, winner of Nobel prize in physics 1923; California Institute of Technology, Berkeley, Calif.

Bishop G. Ashton Oldham, Episcopal Diocese of Albany, N. Y.

Charles Seymour, president of Yale University.

Robert Emmet Sherwood, playwright, East Hampton, Long Island, N. Y.

James Shotwell, professor of history, Columbia University.

Huston Thompson, lawyer of Washington, D. C., former Federal Trade Commissioner.

Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen, professor, Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

W. W. Waymack, director of editorial section, Des Moines (Iowa) Register and Tribune.

Quincy Wright, professor of international law, University of Chicago.

Msgr. John A. Ryan, director of social action department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, Washington, D. C.

Mrs. Rushmore Patterson, New York and Washington, D. C.

UP TO WEEK AGO $145,000 EXPENDED

The headquarters of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies are in the building at 8 West Fortieth Street, New York City. There is office space for a staff of about 40, including telephone operators, stenographers, and file clerks. On the ground floor of the same building are the offices of the New York City chapter, which has about 2,200 members and is headed by Dr. Frank Kingdon. Like the other branches scattered throughout the country, this chapter is largely autonomous, though committed to following the policies laid down by the national committee. Herbert Bayard Swope, Jr., heads a special youth division of the New York chapter.

The total membership of the national committee and its 662 local chapters is estimated by White at upward of 100,000. New chapters are steadily being formed. Ninety came into being in August while the campaign for the dispatch of destroyers to Great Britain was at its height. Regional headquarters are being set up. For the Middle West there will be an office at Chicago and for the South one at Chapel Hill, under the direction of Dr. Frank P. Graham, president of the University of North Carolina.

Up to a week ago the national committee had received, as its officers informed the writer, a total of $120,191, from 7,825 persons, and had spent $145,000. The disbursements include $25,000 paid for the publication throughout the country of Robert E. Sherwood's full-page "Stop Hitler Now" advertisement. Except for the $5,000 which Sherwood personally gave toward this sum, the committee says it has received no subscription of more than $3,000. Neither the Carnegie endowment nor any other foundation, the committee says, has contributed.

When the charge lately was made in the Senate that J. P. Morgan was a heavy contributor, the committee asserted that the total received from Morgan was an unsolicited $500, and that a check for the same amount had come from David Dubinsky's garment workers' union. Less than half the contributions, it was stated, have come from New York City.

The money spent by the national committee is exclusive of whatever may have been spent locally by the various chapters. Some of these have offices and considerable staffs.

"STOP HITLER" AD SHERWOOD'S IDEA

The "Stop Hitler" advertisement was Sherwood's idea. An ardent protagonist of aid for the Allies, he wrote the ad and guaranteed the cost. The committee approved it and published it June 10 in 18 papers throughout the country over the committee's name, with a note appended that the names of all those who had contributed toward its publication were being filed with the State Department. There is no requirement of such filing in the law.

The advertisement attracted much attention and was favorably commented upon by President Roosevelt at a press conference. Mr. Roosevelt said he had not read the advertisement until he heard that it had been written by his friend "Bob" Sherwood, and that while he could not endorse every specific phrase in it, he thought it a fine, educational thing. The advertisement concluded with an appeal for the sending of planes, guns, munitions, and food to the Allies. The destroyers had not then come into the picture. Messages to the President and Members of Congress were urged, so that they would "know that the American people are not afraid to cast off the hypocritical mask of neutrality, which deceives no one, including ourselves."

TONE OF BIG AD PRINTED IN CHICAGO

A second large advertisement, July 15, was published only in Chicago. France by this time having fallen, the advertisement asked specifically for aid to Great Britain to "stop Hitler now."

"Hitler's dream of a world under Nazi rule cannot be realized as long as Britain holds out," ran the argument. "The acknowledged will of our people must not be stalled any longer. Our unlimited sympathy for those who still fight for freedom—and our profound convictions as to our own self-interest—must be expressed in something more formidable than weasel words."

Our Government, it was stated, was being asked by "a small but vociferous group" to "speak in the timorous tones of appeasement." To the appeasement argument the advertisement replied: "It makes no difference to Hitler—and the masters of all the slave states—whether we antagonize them, or bootlick them. They will attempt to continue with their program regardless of what we do or say at the moment."

Readers were urged to write or telegraph the President and Members of Congress and to tell all candidates for office that the Government should send Britain "all the planes, guns, ammunition, food, and essential materials that we can possibly spare—and send them now."

"BETWEEN US AND HITLER STANDS THE BRITISH FLEET"

Another advertisement, filling three-quarters of a page, was published in New York July 30, with the caption "Between us and Hitler stands the British fleet." Readers again were asked to telegraph or write the President and Congressmen in behalf of aid to Great Britain—"before it is too late." The statement was attributed to Adolf Hitler that "we will soon have storm troopers in America * * * we shall have men whom degenerate Yankeedom will not be able to challenge." Contributions to the work of the committee were solicited, and a coupon was printed for the convenience of subscribers. The advertisement stated that the funds for its insertion were "provided entirely by contributions of the American people who believe that helping Great Britain now is the best way to protect America."

Four small ads, paid for by individuals whose names they carried, appeared in the New York Herald Tribune September 3, 4, 5, and 6. These, again, appealed for the sending of messages by mail or wire to the Members of Congress urging "utmost speed in continuing to aid England now." Lines at the end invited contributions for additional advertising. Other such contributions have been received and more are expected by the committee.

AMERICANS FORM A LONDON OUTPOST

Individuals and newspapers in the United States have recently begun to receive a news letter issued by the "Americans-in-Britain Outpost of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies." This organization, according to officials of the White committee in New York, was formed wholly on the initiative of a group of Americans in London.

"We are America in miniature," says one of the news letters, and the stated purposes of the group are "to act as an observation post of the William Allen White committee; to tell Americans at home what we are seeing, thinking, and hoping for the future; to interpret America to Britain." Arthur Newell, of the Associates for Anglo-American Understanding, and Charles G. Tubbs are cochairmen of the enterprise, which has its headquarters at 29 Gordon Square, London.

AGENCY FOR GUIDING PUBLIC SENTIMENT

There will be occasion in this report to return to the White committee, but at this point there should be a more extended account of the informal group which I have described as working with and behind the White committee. The work of this group has been enormously effective. It has been a sort of idea mill, and, beyond that, an agency for guiding public sentiment (through the writers admitted to its discussion) and for laying the aid-to-Britain cause directly and forcibly before high Government officials, including the President.

The group has no name, no chairman, no treasurer, nor any form of organization. It has stayed strictly in the background, leaving the White committee to function undisturbed as the formal front of the aid-to-Britain movement.

It was the work very largely of this little band of like-minded men brought together by a burning conviction, that enabled Ernest Lindley, a columnist favorable to the New Deal and enjoying exceptional sources of information, a biographer of the President, to write in a recent article on the destroyer-air base deal:

"The duty of informing the public concerning a deal which the President regards as 'epochal' was shouldered by the columnists and editorial writers, with little cooperation from the President and his administration. More than that, a few columnists and editors and publishers were the moving spirits in the whole affair on this side of the Atlantic."

Lindley in the same article refers to the President "as a sort of executive officer for a deal largely arranged and publicly advocated almost exclusively by private citizens." He believes that except for the President's "concern about domestic politics," the destroyer deal could have been closed a month before it was.

"THE MILLER GROUP" BEGINS TO FUNCTION

What I shall call for convenience "the Miller group" had its inception late in June, when two or three of the present membership, discussing national defense, agreed that it would be an excellent idea if a group could be brought together to talk over the fate of the British fleet in relation to our defense, and see if something could not be done to spur our Government to more effective action in aid of Britain than was then being taken.

As a result of this discussion, Lewis W. Douglas, former Budget Director, was host on July 11 to a company of about a dozen, who agreed that it was imperative that this Government should take steps to prevent German control of the North Atlantic. It was agreed that the group should continue its discussions from time to time and that others of similar views should be brought in.

Later, it was decided that the group, while remaining unorganized and entirely fluid, should have a sort of "clearing house" to facilitate the arrangement of meetings and the execution of ideas that might be agreed upon. Francis P. Miller, of Fairfax, Va., well known over the country through his work as an organizer of study groups for the Council on Foreign Relations, was selected for this task. He accepted after obtaining leave of absence from the council, whose directors, like Miller, felt there should be no mingling of the activities of the council with those of a propagandist group.

Miller thereupon, on July 22, opened an office at 11 West Forty-second Street, New York. He was provided with a budget of $3,500 for office expenses for 2 months, the period of his leave of absence. It is expected now that this leave will be extended. Two thousand dollars of the $3,500 was contributed by Ward Cheney, silk manufacturer and a leading spirit in the group, and the rest came from group members or friends in small amounts.

NINETEEN MEN DECIDED ON DESTROYER PROGRAM

On July 25 the group held a dinner meeting at the Century Club in New York City and from the discussion emerged the illuminating memorandum on the destroyers-for-Britain deal. Attending this meeting were the following:

Robert S. Allen, Washington columnist.

Joseph Alsop, Washington columnist.

Ulric Bell, Washington correspondent of the Louisville Courier-Journal.

Barry Bingham, publisher of the Louisville Courier-Journal, son of the late Robert Worth Bingham, Ambassador to Great Britain.

Ward Cheney, silk manufacturer of New York.

Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, president of Union Theological Seminary of New York.

Clark M. Eichelberger, director of the William Allen White committee.

Harold K. Guinsburg, head of the Viking Press, of New York.

George Watts Hill, banker and farmer of Durham, N. C.

Henry W. Hobson, Episcopal Bishop of Cincinnati.

Ernest M. Hopkins, president of Dartmouth College.

Francis P. Miller, of Fairfax, Va.

Geoffrey Parsons, chief editorial writer of the New York Herald Tribune.

Frank L. Polk, New York lawyer, former Under Secretary of State.

Whitney H. Shepardson, a director of the Council on Foreign Relations, of New York.

Robert Emmet Sherwood, playwright, of New York.

Admiral William H. Standley, retired, of New York.

Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen, professor in Union Theological Seminary of New York.

SIX WAR ADVOCATES ATTENDED MEETING

Of this group of 19, six were signers of the June 9 public statement favoring an immediate war declaration against Germany by the United States. These were Agar, Hill, Bishop Hobson, Miller, Shepardson, and Admiral Standley.

Admiral Standley makes frequent speeches in behalf of the group's policies. In a speech at Chicago last Wednesday night before a meeting sponsored by the Chicago chapter of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, Admiral Standley advocated that America "provide an adequate number" of "mosquito boats" to Great Britain to "forestall any menace the U-boats of Germany may be in the Atlantic." Continuing, he said:

"As we advance with our rearmament we should throw more and more ships, airplanes, munitions, and all the material aid and comfort at our command into democracy's fight against Hitlerism * * *.

"We are alive to the belief that, if Britain does not stop Hitler now, sooner or later we must undertake the job ourselves."

ACHESON HELPS POINT OUT THE WAY

Among the other persons who have participated from time to time in the discussions of the group or who, because of their known sympathies, have been invited to do so are the following:

Dean G. Acheson, New York and Washington lawyer, who resigned as Under Secretary of the Treasury because of disagreement with the Roosevelt fiscal policies. Acheson was one of the four New York lawyers who signed the famous August 11 letter to the New York Times asserting the right of the President to make the destroyer-naval-base deal with Great Britain by Executive action alone. This statement, as events have shown, carried great weight with the President, and Attorney General Jackson leaned heavily upon it for his reasoning in support of the transaction. The other signers were Charles C. Burlingham; Thomas D. Thatcher, who was Solicitor General under President Hoover; and George Rublee.

Dr. James Rowland Angell, of Hamden, Conn., former president of Yale University and now educational counselor of the National Broadcasting Co.

Hamilton Fish Armstrong, of New York, editor of Foreign Affairs.

John L. Balderston, of Beverly Hills, Calif., playwright; official Washington observer of the William Allen White committee and former foreign newspaper correspondent.

Dr. James B. Conant, president of Harvard University.

Col. William J. Donovan, of New York, Assistant Attorney General under President Coolidge; recently in Great Britain as an observer for Secretary of the Navy Knox.

Lewis W. Douglas, of New York, antinew dealer who resigned as Budget Director under Roosevelt and now is head of the Mutual Life Insurance Co.

Allen W. Dulles, of New York, lawyer with firm of Sullivan & Cromwell; long in American Diplomatic Service.

Henry R. Luce, publisher of Time, Life, and Fortune.

Henry F. Pringle, author, of New York; biographer of Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft.

Walter Wanger, of Los Angeles, moving-picture producer.

Henry M. Wriston, president of Brown University.

HOW "MILLER GROUP" CARRIED OUT ITS PLAN

All the practical steps outlined in the illuminating July memorandum of "the Miller group" have been taken.

Carrying out the first item on the agenda, three of the group, Herbert Agar, Ward Cheney, and Francis P. Miller, went to Washington early in August, and in personal interviews bore down hard on the President and most of the members of the Cabinet for immediate and drastic aid to Great Britain. Transfer of the destroyers was the great objective.

Agar, accompanied by Eichelberger, of the White committee, saw the President on August 1. Miller talked to Henry Wallace, now Democratic nominee for Vice President. Joseph Alsop talked to Admiral Stark, Chief of Naval Operations. The burden of the message thus driven home to the President and the other officials was that the Government, in view of the danger to this Nation from Hitler's projected world-wide revolution, was pursuing a "cowardly" course; that public opinion demanded more than was being done and would assuredly support the administration in the destroyer deal.

"TALKED TURKEY" TO ROOSEVELT

As Alsop, who was in the middle of the picture, has written: "A great number of persons, both members of the administration and private White House friends, had become disturbed by the President's seeming lethargy." The destroyer deal had been in the wind since the 1st of June, when Prime Minister Churchill had appealed urgently to the President for as many destroyers as we could spare. It was to overcome the "lethargy" of the President that the delegation from the Miller group descended on Washington in August, and, as one of the group has said, "talked turkey" to the administration.

Lindley in the following paragraph attributes too large a part to the writers, though they played an important part, but his picture of the methods by which private individuals sought to influence, and did influence, the course of events in the destroyer deal is essentially accurate:

"For almost 2 months almost everything that was done toward effecting the destroyer deal was done by newspaper columnists and editors. They surveyed the problem with the high officers of the Army and Navy individually, with members of the Cabinet, with leading Senators and Congressmen, with Wendell Willkie, and with the President himself. They persuaded General Pershing to advocate the transfer of destroyers, in a Nation-wide broadcast."

THEN PERSHING, OTHERS ON RADIO

Second on the schedule of the Miller group, as developed at the July 25 meeting, was the launching of "a radio program of education." As related, General Pershing was induced to go on the air for the destroyer deal and he was aided in the preparation of his speech by one of the group—Agar. Broadcasting arrangements were made by Alsop. Later, radio speeches in similar vein were made by Admiral William H. Standley, retired, of New York, former Chief of Naval Operations, a member of the Miller group and also one of the signers of the June statement favoring a war declaration; and by Col. William J. Donovan of New York. Both these speeches were arranged for by Miller, as also was a radio speech by Maury Maverick, mayor of San Antonio, scheduled for today (Saturday).

Members of the Miller group emphasize its entire informality and its ad hoc character. No votes are taken. Friends of the members are freely invited into the discussions, which take place every 2 weeks or so. Ideas are tossed about in conversation and any that are deemed worthy and practicable—such as the launching of the radio program—are sought to be put into execution. Executive responsibility such as it is, rests on Miller.

WILLKIE IS SOUNDED OUT ON DESTROYER DEAL

A member or members of the group helped to sound out Wendell Willkie on the destroyer deal. Though he declined to commit himself publicly in advance, he indicated that he approved it. Consequently, when he came out with his statement, after the conclusion of the deal, approving the result but taking exception to the method, some of the members of the group felt that they had been let down. From within the group, as a result, came the inspiration of a statement, September 10, signed by some 60 citizens who joined, "irrespective of their party affiliations or their views on domestic issues," in an "unqualified endorsement" of the destroyer transaction.

Signatures to this statement, as set out in the preface, were solicited by "three Republicans and pro-Willkie members" of the White committee—Chairman White; President Conant, of Harvard; and Lewis W. Douglas.

WAR ADVOCATE TAKES A BIG PART

Another "practical step" decided upon at the Century Club meeting of "the Miller group" was the "approval of a news letter." Earlier John L. Balderston, successful playwright and former longtime correspondent of American newspapers in London, now a movie scrip writer living at Beverly Hills, Calif., had been in New York and expressed a warm desire to give some practical help to the aid-for-Britain movement. He was one of the 30 signers of the June statement urging the United States to declare war on Germany.

When the news letter idea came up, Miller telephoned Balderston and asked him to undertake the job. Balderston agreed to do so, at his own expense. Miller placed the idea of the letter with the William Allen White committee.

Balderston came on back East late in August and began the preparation of "wire letters" for distribution to a selected list of about 50 newspapers. These letters, which have been put out from Washington at the rate of about two a week, contain "background" information for editors on the needs of Great Britain and the progress of the White movement. The letters are telegraphed under the aegis of the White committee as the William Allen White News Service. A copy of each goes to Miller, who has it mimeographed and distributed by mail among the members of his group and perhaps 100 others throughout the country.

BALDERSON'S ACTIVITY BECOMES EMBARRASSING

Some of the letters, according to the White committee, have been "straight news releases," while others have been primarily for "background" and not intended for textual publication. All the copies distributed through the Miller office have been marked "not for publication." Nevertheless, much of the contents, textually and in paraphrase, of the "background" material as well as the other, has been published, and this publication on one or two occasions, because of Balderston's great zeal in pressing for aid to Great Britain, has been a source of embarrassment to the White committee.

The White committee asserts it draws a sharp distinction between the Balderston conclusions as to British needs and what the committee accepts as its objectives.

THE NOW FAMOUS SEVEN-POINT PROGRAM

On September 5 it was published, on the strength of a Balderston letter listing the "requirements" of Great Britain, that the White committee was about to sponsor a new seven-point program of aid to Great Britain. Balderston had written that the British needed, roughly, in order of priority:

1. A score of motor torpedo boats "wanted at once."
2. Flying boats of the PBY type now being made in San Diego.
3. Flying fortresses, our great long-range bombers.
4. Tanks: "Five or six tanks a day are now being turned out for the United States. The British ask for all of these, please, but not for long, only for the first few weeks of supply."
5. Air fields: "To train pilots in a country where out of any cloud may pop a German fighter presents certain difficulties. Such a country is England. This was foreseen, and the reservoir of pilots in training was decreed to be Canada. But it gets very cold in Canada. In fact, for many months the type of training necessary for fighting pilots cannot be carried on there at all. The British would like the use of air fields for training pilots in Texas and southern California. Training planes could be turned over to them there and would not have to be sent abroad."
6. Two hundred and fifty thousand more Lee-Enfield rifles.

ALSO HE WANTS OUR SECRET BOMB SIGHT

As to the seventh point, involving our jealously guarded bomb sight, reputedly the finest instrument of the kind in the world, Balderston wrote: "Finally there comes the bomb sight. At this point this dispatch hastens to censor itself, and the subject would not be mentioned except that it affords a perfect example of the two ways of thinking possible about any or all of the British requests.

"If we give a secret weapon to a friend, that weapon sooner or later may be captured by the enemy and used against us. That's one way to look at it. That's the way all of Hitler's victims have looked at similar problems. The other way to envisage the problem, of course, is to concede that if your friend is fighting alone, and protecting you while he does so, it is neighborly to give him whatever help you happen to have available, and if this involves risk to yourself, to take that risk in the interest not merely of sound strategy but of your own self-respect."

It was in this William Allen White News Service telegram that Balderston urged public pressure on the Army and Navy chiefs to override any opposition on their part to his seven-point program for aiding Britain.

WHITE DISAVOWS BALDERSTON PROGRAM

Upon publication of the Balderston statement of British needs, Chairman White immediately disavowed it as the program of the committee. As has been reported in the Post-Dispatch, he said that neither he nor the committee favored sending the British any war materials which Army and Navy authorities might consider necessary for American defense. He said that the Balderston program was an inventory of British needs rather than an immediate objective of the committee, and this view was reiterated to the writer by other officials of the committee in New York this week.

Emphasizing that he was against the United States entering the war, White said his objective was that of giving Britain all the aid that could be given "safely, wisely, and legally."

"Personally," he added, "I shall never advocate giving away anything needed for our safety, and by the word 'needed,' I mean what Army and Navy authorities say is needed."

THEN WHITE ADOPTS TWO BALDERSTON POINTS

As already told, the current objectives of the White committee, as outlined by the chairman on September 12, are three:

1. The dispatch to Great Britain of 25 "flying fortresses." This is No. 3 in the Balderston list of British requirements. Balderston hoped that "a small number" of these bombers could be transferred to the British at once. "The flying fortresses," he wrote, "can effectively bomb anything in Germany or Poland and fly home again. Nothing the British or anyone else now has can do this."

2. Twenty "mosquito" boats. This is the same as Balderston's No. 1 recommendation.

3. "As many pursuit planes as possible." This item is not specifically mentioned by Balderston.

Nothing is said in White's letter to his local chapters about flying boats, air fields, Lee-Enfield rifles, or our secret bomb sight. As to tanks (Balderston's No. 4), White's letter suggests that this item, with others, may later be added as an objective "when the present emergency is over."

BALDERSTON IN TOUCH WITH BRITISH EMBASSY

Balderston, as his letters show, is still the first-class reporter that he was in London. That he is in touch with officials of the British Embassy is no secret and has no special significance. Anybody not suspected of being a German agent can go to the Embassy and learn what the British regard as their needs of the moment. The official British position, as the Ambassador, Lord Lothian, has stated in public speeches, is that Britain is glad to receive any aid this country may give; whether or not aid is given is strictly an American concern.

One of the earlier letters in the Balderston series sent out as a wire letter of the William Allen White news service August 27 was as follows:

"One night in July a message came to Washington from Winston Churchill for President Roosevelt. It announced in effect, the writer hasn't seen it and doesn't pretend to quote it, the arrival at British ports of a huge mass of weapons—cannon, machine guns, rifles, and stuff to shoot out of them, too.

"After describing successful convoy precautions Churchill told the President trains were waiting with steam up in all ports, into which ships were being warped, and he said the weapons would be in the hands of British soldiers awaiting them within 24 hours.

"UNITED STATES PATCHED UP LOSS OF ARMS IN FLANDERS

"During this period of extreme crisis, when Churchill's already famous cry of defiance to Hitler, his fight-on-the-beaches speech, was ringing through the world, 15 ships containing roughly 100,000 tons of American weapons and explosives reached Great Britain. Invasion was thought a matter of days or hours by those who knew the tragic lack of means of defense caused by the loss of almost the whole modern equipment of the British Army in Flanders and France.

"Eighty thousand Hotchkiss and Lewis machine guns were sent from this country and now guard the shores of England.

"Some seven hundred 57.5-millimeter field guns with a mountain of shells were sent and now are in service.

"Half a million Lee-Enfield rifles were in those consignments, Churchill said last week that 2,000,000 soldiers armed with rifles now stand ready in Britain. One man in four of Britain's defenders now carries a rifle sent from the United States since the battle of France became the catastrophe of France.

"There has been no invasion, but there might have been and there may be and a high British authority has expressed himself to an American to the effect that these shipments 'repaired, at any rate patched up, a situation desperate in the extreme.'

"In addition to the weapons mentioned, huge quantities of shells, small-arm ammunition, and other materials were shipped across.

SAYS GERMANS WERE AWARE OF SHIPMENTS

"These shipments were far from gifts by the United States to Great Britain. They were rounded up by British purchasing agents and bought from holders in this country in strict compliance with the provisions of the neutrality law for good prices paid in American dollars, the purchaser taking the risk of loss in transit and then seeing to it there was no loss in transit. The method of transfer of Government property to individual firms is well known, and the transfer of airplanes at this time by these or similar methods received full publicity, but few outside inner circles were aware of the successful attempt in progress to help rearm British land armies before the Germans could strike.

"Among those who were aware were members of the ubiquitous German intelligence service, and this fact causes smiles among those who know what has been going on at the cries arising from Capitol Hill and elsewhere that turning over 50 old destroyers will somehow constitute an act of war against Hitler by a nation until now at profound peace with that potentate. Methods of transferring the destroyers will necessarily be legal, technically, and tactfully different from those employed in helping rearm the British Army, but the result will be precisely the same, the implementing of the pledge made by the President at Charlottesville. We have sold the British more than most people realize, as this dispatch shows—sold, not given, a distinction we should keep in mind."

WHITE'S ACTIVITIES DESCRIBED AS AMAZING

But Balderston, of course, is not the only person who has gathered information for the William Allen White committee. White himself has important contacts which have enabled him to get an accurate picture of British needs. Newspaper columnists and editors have helped. There is reason to believe that the survey lately made in Great Britain by Col. William J. Donovan, as an agent of the Secretary of the Navy, has been a fruitful source of information.

Chairman White has been indefatigable in furthering the aims of the committee. The number of persons all over the country whom he consults by telephone is described by his associates as amazing. When he is not working at the job at New York headquarters—he was there lately and had a 5-hour conference with his executive committee—he is likely to be similarly engaged at his Kansas office.

Every decision on policy is his, taken after consultation with his advisers. No proposed chapter of the White committee is permitted to come into the movement unless it subscribes fully to the objectives laid down by the national committee.

The White committee has been set up for the duration of the war and, if the present ideas of its leaders are carried out, for the period of peace making to follow. Appeasement, now and in the future, will be fought to the limit.

LEADERS DEFEND THEIR COURSE

To the criticism that the activities of the committee are heading the country toward war, the leaders of the committee reply that obviously there is no completely safe course for the United States; that anything we may do or not do involves risks; that in fact, the safest course we can take, relatively speaking, is to do what we can to bring about a British victory.

In their view, the steps that might involve us in the war are being taken on the other side, and it is only these, and not any aid we give Great Britain, that might bring us in. If Hitler wanted today to declare war on the United States, he would find a pretext. Any idea that the White committee is seeking or desires to get this country into war is declared to be the sheerest bunk.

There remains the criticism that the activities of the committee tend to strip this country of weapons it may need in its own defense. The recent reply of White to this charge has already been stated.

The director of the committee, Clark M. Eichelberger, in a conversation with the writer, said the committee was simply exploiting a last chance for the United States to stay out of war. He advanced the idea, too, that if the strong sentiment in the United States for aid to the Allies had not been channeled and made effective by the White committee, a sense of frustration would have arisen that might have led us directly toward, and perhaps into war.

Another official said the case for aid to Britain—and for the work of the White committee in arousing public sentiment to that end—was reducible to four points. First, we are in danger; second, we must arm adequately; third, it will take us 5 to 7 years to build the two-ocean navy we require; fourth, to put the matter in the lowest possible terms of self-interest, we can gain time for building up our defenses by enabling Britain to hold out.

The committee will decide from time to time, as the war situation changes, on the concrete objectives of its continuing campaign. Planes and mosquito boats for England are the immediate goal. Tomorrow it may be something different. The success of the committee in the destroyer deal suggests how formidable it will be in any cause it may champion.

OUTSTANDING MEMBERS OF COMMITTEE SEEKING AID FOR BRITAIN

Two St. Louisans are among the outstanding members of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies. They are George R. Throop, chancelor of Washington University, and Arthur E. Bostwick, former librarian of the St. Louis Public Library. Other members are:

Dean Acheson, New York lawyer; Louis Adamic, author; Julius Ochs Adler, general manager, New York Times; James Rowland Angell, former president of Yale; Frank Aydelotte, president of Swarthmore College; Tallulah Bankhead, actress; Barry Bingham, publisher, Louisville Courier-Journal; Robert Woods Bliss, of Washington, former Ambassador to Argentina; Col. Henry Breckinridge, of New York, former Assistant Secretary of War; Louis Bromfield, author, Van Wyck Brooks, author; John Stewart Bryan, publisher and president of William and Mary College; C. C. Burlingham, New York lawyer; Henry Seidel Canby, editor and author; Carrie Chapman Catt, organizer and former chairman, National Committee on the Cause and Cure of War; Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Harvard law professor; Evans Clark, executive director, Twentieth Century Fund; John H. Clarke, former Justice of the United States Supreme Court; George Creel, chairman, Committee on Public Information during World War No. 1; Walter Damrosch, orchestra conductor; John W. Davis, lawyer, Democratic candidate for President in 1924; Henry P. Davison, partner in J P. Morgan & Co.; Melvyn Douglas, actor; David Dubinsky, labor leader; William Yandell Elliott, Harvard professor of government; Clifton Fadiman, writer and radio entertainer; Dorothy Canfield Fisher, author; Lynn Fontanne, actress; Harry D. Gideonse, president, Brooklyn College of the City of New York; Ellen Glasgow, author; Grover C. Hall, editor, Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser; Moss Hart, playwright; Helen Hayes, actress; Arthur Garfield Hays, New York lawyer, national director, American Civil Liberties Union; Hamilton Holt, president, Rollins College, Florida; Ernest M. Hopkins, president of Dartmouth College; Rupert Hughes, author; Fannie Hurst, author; Alfred Lunt, actor; Archibald MacLeish, Librarian of Congress; the Right Reverend William T. Manning, Episcopal bishop of New York; J. P. Morgan, banker; Mrs. Dwight W. Morrow, wife of the late Senator Morrow; Conde Nast, magazine publisher; Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, professor in Union Theological Seminary; Robert Lincoln O'Brien, former chairman, United States Tariff Commission; Eugene O'Neill, playwright; John F. O'Ryan, commander, Twenty-seventh Division, United States Army, in World War No. 1; Ferdinand Pecora, New York Supreme Court justice; William Lyon Phelps, author and Yale professor emeritus; Gifford Pinchot, former Governor of Pennsylvania; Samuel Seabury, New York lawyer; Cornelia Otis Skinner, actress; Booth Tarkington, author; Gene Tunney, former heavyweight champion; Tom Wallace, editor, Louisville Times; Ray Lyman Wilbur, president, Stanford University; Wythe Williams, former European correspondent; Alexander Woollcott, writer; Mary E. Woolley, former president, Mount Holyoke College.

The committee has a chapter in St. Louis, of which the secretary is Miss H. Lorine Pickett, of 6650 Oakland Avenue.

URGES PUBLIC PRESSURE ON NAVY AND ARMY CHIEFS TO OVERRIDE ANY OPPOSITION TO WHITE'S GOAL

How public opinion should be brought to bear against possible opposition of military authorities to the further release of our war equipment to Great Britain was outlined in a recent William Allen White News Service telegram written by the committee's Washington observer, John L. Balderston, who last June publicly urged the United States to declare war on Germany. On this point, Balderston wrote:

"The weapons now wanted, or most of them, may cause a sharp controversy here. They are weapons some United States authorities are inclined to consider needed at home * * * the attitude to be taken by this Government must depend in great part upon whether Great Britain be regarded as our first line of defense.

"If we do what all the other victims of Hitler have done, we will grant aid grudgingly in small packets, because our military men will behave just as the military men in every other menaced country have behaved—hold the best of what they have to meet attack against ourselves and refuse to give it up to Britain or anyone else. Our staffs will perhaps incline to take this attitude. If so, they cannot and should not be criticised; they will be doing their professional duty. Staffs are like that in all countries, and were like that in countries that recently existed but exist no more.

"The only way, it is not inconceivable, in which some needed aid can be sent to Britain in time is for those staffs to be overruled by administrative or legislative action, and the likelihood of this depends in turn upon public opinion. And this is why the William Allen White News Service takes the responsibility of making known what the British most need at this moment, now.

"It does so because public opinion cannot bring pressure to bear in the higher interest of our own country and the cause of world democracy, against possible opposition which might base itself on the highest professional standards of duty, without an occasional dose of facts of a nature not usually made public when nations are at war."

HOW "MILLER GROUP" OUTLINED PLAN TO PUT OVER DESTROYER DEAL

Effectiveness of the policies decided upon by the behind-the-scenes "Miller group" is shown in the outcome of the recent deal by which Great Britain got 50 American destroyers from President Roosevelt in exchange for naval and air bases in the Atlantic. All of the practical steps outlined in an illuminating July memorandum of the "Miller group" have been taken.

A dinner meeting of the "Miller group" was held July 25 at the Century Club in New York City. From the discussion emerged the following memorandum, which was circulated to members of the group and a selected list of others believed to be in general sympathy with the aid-to-Britain movement:

A. PRINCIPLES

The most vulnerable sector in the American defense line is the North Atlantic. Consequently the primary immediate responsibility of the Government is to insure adequate defense in that area.

If Germany wins control of the North Atlantic the period prior to the completion of our own two-ocean Navy will be a period of acute danger for us. During that period the United States could be invaded from the Atlantic.

In order to remove the risk of invasion the Government should take all possible steps to prevent German control of the North Atlantic.

The most certain preventive (until our two-ocean Navy is built) is the continued existence of the British fleet. And the fate of the British fleet will be settled by the battle for the control of the North Atlantic which is about to begin on the shores of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

The British chances of success are at present doubtful; but responsible British officials believe that they could successfully withstand invasion if they had 100 more destroyers.

The United States—it is understood—has more than 100 overage destroyers recently recommissioned.

American naval experts believe that: (1) British crews could take these destroyers to England immediately and without special training; (2) British naval crews could learn to operate them in the discharge of all their naval functions in 2 weeks' to 1 month's time.

In the interest of its own national defense the United States should put a hundred of these destroyers into British hands at once.

B. QUID PRO QUO

So strong was the feeling that the United States should take this action in self-defense, that there was little discussion concerning the consideration to be asked in return for taking such a step.

That the United States should ask for some guaranty that the British fleets should neither be scuttled nor surrendered, but in case of a successful German invasion of England, should operate thereafter from Canadian and/or American bases; or

That these destroyers should be offered to Britain in exchange for immediate naval and air concessions in British possessions in the Western Hemisphere.

C. WAYS AND MEANS

Some thought that it would be more effective to put the destroyers into the hands of the Canadian Government, in connection with a program of joint defense of the Western Hemisphere.

It was generally agreed that (1) the time was too short for a congressional debate on the proposed program, and that (2) effective action could only be taken in time by the President, in cooperation with United States naval officials. Consequently, individuals whom the President believes should see him, and urge him to take action on the reasonable assumption that Mr. Willkie would go along with him.

D. PUBLIC OPINION

It was agreed that regardless of private representations which might be made to the President, the campaign of education concerning the vital importance of the British fleet to us (so well launched by the William Allen White Committee) should be immediately pursued through the press, radio, public platform, personal correspondence with influential individuals, and through all other effective channels.

E. PRACTICAL STEPS

Certain individuals to be designated to see the President.

A radio program of education to be launched immediately.

The group to cooperate fully with the William Allen White Committee, and the committee with the group.

Approval of a news letter to be prepared by three or four outstanding special writers.

Moral backing and practical support for the Committee for the Release of Ships for European Children.

Group to meet again in near future.

SIX MEMBERS OF "MILLER GROUP," NOW SEEKING AID FOR BRITAIN, URGED UNITED STATES TO DECLARE WAR ON GERMANY—RETIRED ADMIRAL STANDLEY AND HERBERT AGAR, EDITOR OF LOUISVILLE COURIER-JOURNAL, ARE AMONG THEM

In the article on William Allen White's "propaganda engine" the Post-Dispatch has disclosed an intermingling of interests seeking United States Army and Navy equipment for Great Britain. As stated in the article, six members of "the Miller group," seeking destroyers for Britain, were among 30 citizens who issued a public statement June 9 urging an immediate declaration of war against Germany and inviting others of like views "to express them publicly through the free democratic institution of the American press."

"In the German view," their statement said, "the American defense program means that the United States has already joined with Great Britain and France in opposing the Nazi drive for world dominion. In the American view, Nazi Germany is the mortal enemy of our ideals, our institutions, and our way of life. * * *

"What we have, what we are, and what we hope to be can now be most effectively defended on the line in France held by General Weygand. The frontier of our national interest is now on the Somme.

"Therefore all disposable air, naval, military, and material resources of the United States should be made available at once to help maintain our common front.

"But such resources cannot be made available fast enough to hold the German Army in check on the European continent or to prepare for the eventual attack on American interests so long as the United States remains legally neutral. Nation-wide endorsement of the defense program shows that the American people have ceased to be neutral in any other sense.

"For this reason alone, and irrespective of specific uses of our resources thereafter, the United States should immediately give official recognition to the fact and to the logic of the situation—by declaring that a state of war exists between this country and Germany.

"Only in this constitutional manner can the energies be massed which are indispensable to the successful prosecution of a program of defense."

ADVOCATES OF WAR DECLARATION

Captioned "A Summons To Speak Out," the statement was signed by the following:

Herbert Agar, editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal and author; winner of the Pulitzer prize for history in 1933. Agar is one of the most active members of the informal group for which Francis P. Miller acts as a sort of clearinghouse. He had a large hand in the preparation of General Pershing's speech of August 4, urging that 50 American destroyers be transferred to Britain.

Burke Baker of Houston, Tex.

John L. Balderston, of Beverly Hills, Calif., playwright and one-time London correspondent of the old New York World. Balderston is now putting out, from Washington, a confidential news letter to editors for the William Allen White Committee.

Stringfellow Barr of Annapolis, Md., president of St. John's College.

J. Douglas Brown, professor of economics at Princeton University.

Richard F. Cleveland, of Baltimore; lawyer; son of President Cleveland.

James F. Curtis, of New York; lawyer; Assistant Secretary of the Treasury from 1909 to 1913.

Edwin F. Gay, of Pasadena, Calif.; economist; formerly dean of the Graduate School of Business Administration of Harvard.

Edward T. Gushee, of St. Louis; executive vice president of the Union Electric Co. of Missouri.

Marion H. Hedges, of Washington; research director and author.

William H. Hessler, of Cincinnati; writer on political economy.

George Watts Hill, of Durham, N. C.; banker and leader in the organization of cooperative marketing and farm organizations; member of the Miller Group.

Bishop (Episcopal) Henry W. Hobson, of Cincinnati, who was a major in the last war; member of the Miller Group.

Leroy Hodges, of Richmond, Va.; economist and author.

Calvin Hoover, of Durham, N. C.; economist, author, and editor.

Edwin P. Hubble, of San Marino, Calif.; astronomer.

Frank Kent, of Baltimore; columnist of the Baltimore Sun.

Edward R. Lewis, of Chicago, historian and sociologist.

George W. Martin, of New York.

L. Randolph Mason, of New York, lawyer.

Stacy May, of New York, economist and social worker.

Francis P Miller, of Fairfax, Va., author and organization director for local committees organized by the Council on Foreign Relations. Leader of the Miller Group.

Helen Hill Miller, wife of Francis P. Miller.

Walter Millis, of New York, editorial writer of the Herald Tribune, author of The Road to War.

George Fort Milton, of Chattanooga, Tenn., newspaper editor and author.

Lewis Mumford, of Amenia, N. Y., writer.

Winfield W. Riefler, of Princeton, economist.

Whitney H. Shepardson, of New York, treasurer and director of the Council on Foreign Relations; assistant to Colonel House at Paris peace conference. Member of the Miller Group.

Admiral William H. Standley, retired, of New York, former Chief of Naval Operations. Member of the Miller Group.

William Waller, of Nashville, Tenn.

Lest We Forget

REMARKS

OF

HON. U. S. GUYER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, today while half the world staggers beneath the blows of war that shock the very courts of Heaven, and the rest of the earth trembles beneath the Sword of Damocles which threatens the peace of the whole world, it seems not inappropriate that we examine the steps by which we were catapulted into the bloodiest war in the history of mankind so that we may perhaps avoid the quicksands that dragged our feet into the vortex of armed conflict, a war that will cost us, when the last widow of the last World War soldier gets her last pension check, the astronomical sum of $100,000,000,000.

Before we plunge headlong into another such war, the cost of which would transcend the last one, had we not better pause and count the cost, and, if possible, avoid such a cataclysmic disaster? Let us contrast the position and attitude of our country then and now. There is no teacher like experience, no prophet like the history of the past. It seems to me that we may profit by a review of the facts concerning our entry into the war in April 1917 so that we may be aided in avoiding a like calamity; for who is so stupid as not to know that war with his bloody knuckles is knocking at our door? What was the path we followed to the blood bath a generation ago? Let us review the facts:

"LEST WE FORGET"

In 1912: "Too proud to fight."—Woodrow Wilson.

In 1914: "The people must even think neutral."—Woodrow Wilson.

In 1916: "When pictures of the war in Europe are shown on the screen the people should refrain from applause lest some belligerent conclude that the United States is not neutral."—Woodrow Wilson.

Election day, 1916: "You are working, not fighting—You are living, not cannon fodder—Wilson kept you out of war."—George Creel, Wilson advertisement.

In 1917, one hundred days lated: War declared April 6, 1917.

In 1940?

September 3, 1939: "The Nation will remain a neutral nation, but I cannot ask that every American remain neutral in thought."—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In contrast with Woodrow Wilson, the President opened the door for unneutral thinking, which is the mother of hysteria and the forerunner of the war fever.

If, in 1917, with Woodrow Wilson obsessed and saturated with a passion for peace, we were plunged into the greatest war in human history, where will we land when led by a bellicose and brutally frank assailant of nations with which we sustain relations of peace issuing threats of "quarantine" and "steps short of war"?

If, in 1915, with William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, one of the most eloquent and vociferous apostles of peace, we afterward rushed into a weltering sea of human blood to "make the world safe for democracy," whither are we racing today with a Secretary of State who irritates a jittery world with querulous warnings and a sensitive potential rival with peevish admonitions and caustic insinuations? If we do get into this war we cannot charge this administration with duplicity as we have about balancing the Budget and reducing expenses and taxes. The direction in which we are traveling is certainly obvious.

This precarious situation is the explanation of the insistence of the people that Congress stay on the job and prevent, if possible, our entry into any other nation's war and prevent the sending of American boys to die on alien soil. We have seen how easily we were once precipitated into a foreign war. Saw how evidently against the will of the President and his Cabinet we were dragged into a bloody conflict for which future generations will pay and pay.

It is the opinion of a great many people that commitments unauthorized by Congress might involve us in war. In other words, the great mass of the American people do not trust the Executive and the Executive Department in matters involving the question of war. Next to President Washington's example and admonition against a third term for a President was his warning against "excessive partiality for one nation and excessive dislike for another" and his caution against "entangling alliances." These sage warnings are just as important today as they were when he uttered them. They constitute, like the tradition on a third term, a sort of unwritten law and whenever we have discarded them we have suffered bitterly for it.

Every American feels sympathetic toward England but does that justify us in plunging into a destructive war in her behalf? Is not our first duty to our own country and its boys? Once we extended help to save democracy and then England permitted Hitler to get command of the air which is the cause of war. There would have been no war if France and England had the command of the air. They were warned by Lindbergh and he was invited to leave England. Now are we again to "make the world safe for democracy?"

Is it not a better policy for us to create an invulnerable national defense for this hemisphere and fill our sky with the best planes on earth? Take no part in other nations' wars. Make no commitments or alliances to drag us into war. Build an Army and Navy that will discourage attack by its superiority. In the meantime let Congress stay in session and sit on the lid.

Some Members complain that staying in Washington will prevent them from making a campaign for election. Conceding for the sake of argument that this is true, it is still our duty to stay on the job if we feel we can contribute toward keeping the country out of war. The people, I am sure, will understand our position and in our absence fight our battle for us. A political campaign is not the most important matter just now. The biggest job for America right now is to keep a level head and avoid the shambles of the European war.

Lord God of hosts, be with us yet; lest we forget.

Principle or Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAT HARRISON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES F. BYRNES, OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] on September 20, 1940, over the red network of the National Broadcasting Co., entitled "Is It Principle or Politics?"

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS IT PRINCIPLE OR POLITICS?

It is somewhat surprising that the Republican candidate, who, but a few short weeks ago, was shouting that he hoped that President Roosevelt would run again because he wanted to meet the "champ," is now crying that the "champ" should not run for a third term.

Daily Mr. Willkie attributes to President Roosevelt the statement that he is indispensable. In 1932 Mr. Roosevelt said there was no indispensable man. In 1940 he would make the same statement.

At this critical juncture in America's history the people are not concerned with any theoretical discussion of a third term or whether any man is indispensable. The issue that concerns them is whether it is better that Franklin D. Roosevelt or Wendell L. Willkie should be the next President of the United States.

The framers of the Constitution wisely refused to limit the number of terms a President might serve. In the century and a half that has elapsed the Congress has not even submitted to the people an amendment limiting the tenure of the President to one or two terms, because they knew the people would never surrender the right to elect whom they pleased for as many terms as they pleased.

The views of the people are in accord with those of George Washington, who said:

"Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who on some great emergency shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public."

That the emergency today is great is evident from the appropriation of millions of dollars for armament and the drafting of men. That the President is deemed universally most capable of serving the people is evident from every poll.

The view of Washington has been the view of the most conservative and thoughtful students of our constitutional history. As the late Senator Borah, who had as much regard for constitutional traditions as any man I have ever known, said:

"The people who could be trusted to determine whether or not they desire a President for the second term may also be trusted to determine whether or not they desire a President for a third term. I think they can be trusted to settle both questions in a way to best conserve the interest of the people and the Republic."

It is difficult to understand how Republicans who, in 1912, supported Theodore Roosevelt for a third term can seriously invoke the third-term argument against Franklin D. Roosevelt. And be it remembered that that great Democrat, Woodrow Wilson, who defeated Theodore Roosevelt, refused to use against his opponent the third-term argument, declaring that no restriction should ever be placed upon the right of the people to elect a President.

The Republican candidate asks, if a third term, why not a fourth term? I ask, if a second term, why not a third term?

The answer to both questions is that the people can be trusted to wisely select the man best qualified to serve them under existing conditions. No man need fear a third term unless he fears the people.

Just prior to the Democratic convention, the Gallup poll showed 92 percent of the Democrats of the Nation demanding the nomination of Roosevelt. More than 80 percent of the delegates were instructed by the people, either at elections or in State conventions, to vote for the nomination of the President. Mr. Willkie says the renomination of Mr. Roosevelt was a "cut and dried" affair. It was. The people made it so by instructing the delegates to vote for the man they wanted, the man whose 8 years' experience had demonstrated his fitness for the Presidency. The people left no opportunity, as at Philadelphia, for any group, by a "blitzkrieg" of publicity and deluge of telegrams, to nominate a man who had never been voted for by the people of any community for any office.

When you hear men talking about the sacred tradition against a third term, you will find upon investigation that, with very few exceptions, the defenders of tradition opposed President Roosevelt for a second term, and probably for a first term. Their attitude is based upon politics, not upon principle.

Reporting Mr. Willkie's speech in Albuquerque, the United Press said:

"The third-term argument that Mr. Roosevelt has been in office 8 years and therefore is more experienced than a man who has not been in office at all, Willkie described as 'ridiculous, fantastic, a child's-play argument, one that cannot stand up.'"

Well, let us see. Would you, needing the services of a lawyer to save your property, or a physician to save your life, believe it fantastic to employ a man with years of experience instead of a man with no experience?

When Mr. Willkie resigned as president of the Commonwealth & Southern Utility Corporation, he and his associates selected as their president a man who had been connected with that corporation and its predecessors for 28 years, and knew its problems.

Yet you stockholders and directors in the greatest of all enterprises, the Government of the United States, are urged to dispense with the services of a capable and experienced President, and replace him with a man who has had no experience in Government.

And you are asked to do this at a period when the nighttime prayers of men, women, and children go up to thank God for His guidance—and to ask that their President be given continuing strength and wisdom in his self-sacrificing task of keeping America safe and free.

During my service in Congress, I have seen five different Presidents assume office. Some of them had long experience in State or National Government, yet every one of them would have admitted that much of his first year in office was spent studying the powers of the office and the vast machinery of Government. Can this Nation, under conditions now existent, take a chance upon inexperience for an indefinite period?

The Republican candidate would like to make the American people believe that we cannot have a continuity of national leadership for 12 years without sacrificing democracy. He forgets that Mackenzie King has been Prime Minister of Canada for four terms; that Stanley Baldwin and Ramsay MacDonald have served as Prime Ministers of England for three terms, and that De Valera has been Prime Minister of the Irish Free State for four terms.

The Republican candidate warns of dictatorship. No modern dictator has waited for a third term to become dictator. The danger to democracy comes not from an experienced statesman who has handled the gravest domestic emergencies without calling out troops, and without the use of labor espionage, but from an inexperienced leadership which may become panic stricken in time of crisis. The American people know the faults and the virtues of President Roosevelt. They remember 1933. They know how he would act in the gravest emergency. They do not know how Mr. Willkie would act under grave stress and strain.

The Republican candidate says a third term will result in a dictatorship. There can be no dictatorship where we have a free press, free speech, and free elections.

No one questions the freedom of our elections. A recent poll showed two-thirds of the newspapers opposing Mr. Roosevelt. Surely no one can question the freedom of the press under the Roosevelt administration.

Mr. Willkie himself provides positive proof that this is a land of free speech. It is this free speech that is proving his undoing. Had the Republican National Committee, upon the adjournment of the Philadelphia convention, sent Mr. Willkie abroad, there might have been a possibility of his election. His speeches have removed that possibility. Through his speeches the people have come to know him. They have heard him question the veracity of Mr. Roosevelt and refer to the President as "this fellow." Perhaps I am old-fashioned. Perhaps I cling sentimentally to things I learned—in the long ago—to respect. I have respect for the President, whether he is a Republican or a Democrat. And if I know the heart of the American people, they do not approve of any man speaking contemptuously of the President of the United States.

It was as unpleasant to me as it must have been to millions of Americans to learn that Mr. Willkie as he left Chicago resorted to profanity and consigned that American city to the lower regions.

It was not pleasant to read that on the same day in speaking to workers at industrial plants, Mr. Willkie liberally sprinkled his remarks with profane words. He was not recorded as using profane language in speaking to others. If he did this deliberately, believing it would enhance his popularity among those workers, it was an insult to every wage earner in this democracy. If as I prefer to believe, he did not do it deliberately, it evidences a lack of control deplorable in one seeking the Presidency of the United States.

The Republican candidate's charge that President Roosevelt telephoned Hitler and Mussolini urging them to "sell Czechoslovakia down the river" shocked the American people. A few hours later, a member of the "brain trust" accompanying him announced that Mr. Willkie did not mean what he had said. Secretary Hull states that the President did not telephone to either Hitler or Mussolini; that his only communication was through diplomatic channels and was immediately made known to the American people. You and I recall the President's statement: "The conscience and the impelling desire of the people of my country demand that the voice of their Government be raised again and yet again to avert and to avoid war." His voice was truly the voice of America.

Whenever war threatened, President Roosevelt appealed for peace. Mr. Willkie says the appeal failed. It did. But I do not believe it would have been any more effective had it been sprinkled with profane words.

In Illinois, Mr. Willkie declared: "Of all the people with whom I have any acquaintance and have any knowledge of international affairs at all, Franklin Roosevelt is the least qualified to handle the Nation's foreign policy." I know this came as a shock to thoughtful Republicans who differ with Mr. Roosevelt as to domestic problems, but admire his wonderful grasp of foreign problems. It is for them, and it is for you to say whether these irresponsible statements demonstrate that the candidate possesses the poise and control essential to leadership of the American people.

The United Press quoted Mr. Willkie as saying in Texas on Tuesday last:

"Just to think that only in a few isolated spots in all this world people may gather as we are gathered tonight, and men may speak as I speak to you, to determine what shall be the future of our Government."

Splendid. But he omitted to say that the freedom for which he claimed to be grateful was enjoyed under the administration of the President he calls a dictator. In order that such freedom may be preserved for him and for all other Americans, the people are determined to reelect President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America Meeting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address which I delivered last Saturday morning, September 21, 1940, before a meeting of the Pennsylvania membership of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America held for the purpose of reelecting President Roosevelt.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, honored guests, and friends of Franklin D. Roosevelt, in these trying hours for America, the hosts of labor bear a particular responsibility for the destiny of our country. As leaders in the labor movement, you share in that responsibility. Labor has justly done honor to President Roosevelt for his fearless championship of its rights. Yet President Roosevelt could have done nothing without the support of the people, who entrusted him with power in 1932, and again in 1936.

Because he has used that power wisely and well, because his country needs him more now than it did even in the dark days of 1932, the people of America are drafting him for new and greater labors. The power he exercises stems from the people. It must be renewed now if he is to be of further service to the cause of democracy—constitutional democracy, political democracy, and industrial democracy.

The President properly has said that the people must base their decision at the polls upon the record he has made and is making, rather than upon campaign speeches. He has properly decided that his place at the hour of crisis is at the helm of government, and not on the political rostrum. Yet the political rostrum must be manned. The challenge of his opponents must be met; the attack of his enemies must be turned back. That is the task of all who have benefited by Roosevelt policies, and not least among them is organized labor.

I am not one of those who says that labor owes Roosevelt a debt of gratitude for befriending it, for what labor has received labor has been entitled to as a matter of right—but I do say that Roosevelt was first to recognize that right and to fight for it. Labor, not from a sense of obligation, but to defend the rightful gains it has made, must fight for Roosevelt as he has fought for labor.

There can be no question that the leadership now controlling the Republican organization is bitterly opposed to labor. Nowhere is that more true than in Pennsylvania. Labor received nothing but promises under Republican rule in this State, and labor knows it. Almost every State in the Union was further advanced in social and labor legislation than Pennsylvania before the forces of liberalism swept over it in 1934.

When the "old guard" gained control again in 1938 one of its first moves was to scuttle the labor laws, either by repeal or nonenforcement. We need only to look at the present Republican leadership in the State and Nation to see that the same disaster which delivered Pennsylvania labor back into the hands of its enemies is inevitable if they capture the White House.

On the national front a utility lobbyist and fixer runs for President on the Republican ticket, with a notorious labor baiter raising the funds and the house of Morgan directing the strategy from Wall Street.

In our own State the anti-Roosevelt legions are led by a Governor who has consistently opposed labor, an arch lobbyist whose Pennsylvania Manufacturers' Association has always been a thorn in the side of the worker, an antiunion oil operator, and a well-known banker who fathered the Philadelphia wage tax.

I don't have to tell you their names; you know every one of them from past bitter experience. The past records of these men are evidence, if any evidence is needed, that the social and labor reforms of the New Deal will be scrapped if they are ever returned to power. They represent no idle threat, but a real, definite, live menace.

When we are enjoying the benefits of the New Deal it is difficult to believe that those benefits may be withdrawn. It seems inconceivable that we should ever dream of going back to the old days. Yet those gains are not everlasting; they can be swept away almost overnight by a hostile President and a hostile Congress. Even today they are constantly under fire in the Congress. More than one big businessman during the past few weeks has attempted to use national defense as an excuse for attack upon the rights of labor. I need not tell you that it is the same people who are also fighting to evade taxation on excess profits.

The Roosevelt administration is not deceived by these would-be profiteers. National defense and internal prosperity must go hand in hand—the United States Government will not take the lead in chiseling the worker out of a fair wage, because it knows that a fair wage is essential to prosperity. It will not be a party to any attempt to break down the labor safeguards it has taken such pains to establish.

I want to pay my tribute to labor, here and now, for the unselfish patriotism it has shown in cooperating on national defense. Labor has shown that it will not profiteer at Uncle Sam's expense. At the same time, in the interest of our country's prosperity, it must not permit profiteers to exploit that patriotism.

We would be doing only half the job of defending our democracy if, while we were straining every effort to ward off outside aggression, we were to permit our economy to be gutted from within by abandoning the progress we have made under the New Deal. When I speak of progress, I mean not only the progress made by labor but also the gains made by legitimate, honest business—as distinguished from the chiseler.

In the disputes over the defense program we find big business constantly bringing up proposals which would favor big business at the expense of little business—schemes which would enrich the sweatshop operator and ruin the competitor who tried to treat labor fairly. Don't let anyone tell you that the conflict is between business and the New Deal; it is the last stand of big business against everyone else, particularly labor.

During the next few weeks great events will shape the future history of the world. While our eyes are fixed upon the battle of Britain, we must not overlook the battle of America. It is the battle of America. It is the battle to preserve everything we have been fighting for since the black days of our national despair in 1932. President Roosevelt has raised the light to show us the way out of that darkness. Let us keep that light burning.

Walter-Logan Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SHERMAN MINTON
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ARTICLE BY CHARLES G. ROSS

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, under leave granted me, I present for publication in the RECORD an article by Mr. Charles G. Ross, published in the Washington Evening Star of May 8, 1940, under the heading "The reverse of court packing—Logan-Walter bill seen as applying judicial censorship."

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of May 8, 1940]

THE REVERSE OF COURT PACKING—LOGAN-WALTER BILL SEEN AS APPLYING JUDICIAL CENSORSHIP

(By Charles G. Ross)

The Logan-Walter bill to heighten the control of the courts over the work of the administrative agencies of the Government—which is a very mild way of describing it—might be called a court-packing scheme in reverse.

The scheme advanced by the President in February 1937 would have tended to bring the courts under the thumb of the Executive. Wisely and patriotically, the Senate sent it to the scrap heap. Though within the letter of the Constitution, the President's proposal would have violated the fundamental constitutional principle of keeping in balance the three independent branches of the Government—legislative, executive, judicial.

The Logan-Walter bill, except in the case of those agencies which have been exempted, would subject the administrative branch to a court censorship as disruptive of the proper distribution of governmental powers as would have been the court-packing proposal.

DOUBLY HARMFUL

Where the court bill sought to aggrandize the executive arm at the expense of the courts, the Logan-Walter bill seeks to reverse the process and give the courts an unprecedented and wholly unwarranted power over the day-to-day functioning of the affected agencies. The result would harm not only the executive branch but the courts themselves.

Hear the independent testimony of the Brookings Institution:

"The ultimate consequence would be not only to swamp the (appellate) courts with a flood of minor administrative matters that have never been regarded as justifiable cases or controversies, but to retard and hamper the work of the executive branch of the Government to an intolerable degree. The control of the executive branch would be transferred to the courts, and the performance of all executive duties would be subjected to the supervision and control of the judiciary.

"Theoretically, this is contrary to the basic ideas of our form of government, which makes a clear demarcation between executive and judicial duties. Practically, it will destroy the efficient and expeditious operation of the executive departments and throw them into confusion. The cost of government would be multiplied tremendously.

LACK OF CONFIDENCE SENSED

"It is a significant fact that certain administrative agencies are expressly excepted from the operations of the law. While there is no objection to freeing any agency from the shackles of the proposed legislation, the very fact that some agencies (such as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission) are to be exempted would seem to be an indication of a lack of confidence in the basic theories on which the legislation is predicated."

Properly jealous of its own place in the constitutional system, the the Supreme Court has yet shown its full awareness of the rights of the administrative agencies. This from Mr. Justice Stone, in one of his opinions, is pertinent to the discussion of the Logan-Walter bill:

"When the courts are faced with interpretation of the particular, administration breaks down and the manifest purpose of the legislature is defeated unless it is recognized that, surrounding granted powers, there must be a penumbra which will give scope for practical operation. * * * In carrying such schemes (for regulation by administrative bodies) into operation, the function of courts is constructive, not destructive, to make them, wherever reasonably possible, effective agencies for law enforcement and not to destroy them."

A. A. A. DISSENT PERTINENT

And again Mr. Justice Stone said, in his famous dissent in the A. A. A. case: "Courts are not the only agency of Government that must be assumed to have capacity to govern."

When the present Chief Justice, Mr. Hughes, was Governor of New York, he made a memorable speech at Elmira in 1907 in defense of pending State legislation for the regulation of public-service corporations. This was the speech in which he said: "We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is, and the judiciary is the safeguard of our liberty and of our property under the Constitution." But Mr. Hughes, pleading for the creation of a regulatory commission with broad powers, gave the other side of the picture as well. He might have been speaking against the hamstringing provisions of the Logan-Walter bill when he said:

"No more insidious assault could be made upon the independence and esteem of the judiciary than to burden it with these questions of administration. * * * Let us keep the courts for the questions they were intended to consider. * * * To say that all these matters of detail which will be brought before the commission * * * should, at the option of the corporations, be taken into court, is to make a mockery of your regulation. * * * You must have administration, and you must have it by administrative officers. You cannot have it otherwise. Under the proper maintenance of your system of Government, and in view of the wide extension of regulating schemes which the future is destined to see, you cannot afford to have that administration by your courts."

COX STATES ITS PURPOSES

In an illuminating colloquy in the House, Representative Cox, of Georgia, a leading proponent of the Logan-Walter bill, said it was framed primarily to "get" the National Labor Relations Board and the Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department.

The obvious answer is that if Congress wants to "get," or curb the powers of any specific agency, it ought to pass a law addressed to the specific requirements of the case, and not, in the language of Dean Landis, of the Harvard Law School, apply the formula of the procrustean bed. The Logan-Walter bill would do precisely that.

Limitation of the Presidential Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD R. BURKE
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

STATEMENT OF GEORGE W. ROBNETT

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the statement made today before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary by George W. Robnett, executive secretary, Church League of America, of Chicago, Ill., on the question of the limitation of the Presidential term of office.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

While I address this committee as an individual citizen, I am prepared at the same time to reflect the views of a great many within and outside our organization—the Church League of America—whose impressions I have sought especially for this purpose.

I have anticipated that your committee is interested in learning the sentiment of the citizenry on two main questions, namely:

(1) Shall there be legislation to limit Presidential tenure for any single individual?

(2) If so, what form of restriction would be best suited for the purpose?

In order to obtain a cross section of sentiment upon these two questions, I have consulted a number of people from our committee of clergy, and also from our committee of laymen. In the instance of the clergy, I submitted these questions by letter and received more than 100 replies before I left to come here. These came from all denominations, and without exception they all favored a restricted Presidential tenure. In the matter of the laymen, I called a luncheon meeting in Chicago and invited a number of prominent citizens from all sections of business and professional life. These men were asked to express themselves freely upon these questions, which they did. Among those present, for instance, was Mr. John F. Voigt, recently president of the Illinois Bar Association, whose address on the Constitution of the United States has become a classic. Mr. Voigt affirmed the importance of restricting the Presidential tenure and cited historical instances where leaders through great popularity (obtained usually by alms and subsidies from the public treasury) sought and obtained more and more power until the complete freedom of the people was lost. Mr. Voigt has been willing to make a statement on this subject, which I attach to this report.

Mr. Dwight Bobb, another constitutional lawyer, was present at this luncheon, and believed that a President should be limited to a single term of not more than 7 years and should not be eligible to succeed himself. Mr. Gordon Hostetter, executive director of the Employers Association of Chicago (a highly important organization) believed that a single term of 6 years would be a proper constructive and desirable limitation. Mr. Samuel T. Chase, whose father was one of the outstanding rebuilders of Chicago after the great fire, and himself widely known in business and civic circles, believed that the groundwork now exists for dictatorship in this country and urged that every possible precaution be taken to head off such a peril. He believed that the President should be limited to his tenure by some effective safeguard. Mr. C. J. Holland, prominent in the railroad-supply business, expressed fear as to what the breaking of the third-term precedent might lead to and in support of his fear of the present trend toward personal government, he quoted the sage advice of Lord Macaulay, written 100 years ago.

Mr. Whipple Jacobs, a young man who came up through the ranks to be president of the largest company manufacturing insulated wire, stated his interest in legislation that would help to preserve our Republic by keeping it a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. Mr. Edison Dick, vice president of the well-known A. B. Dick Co., stated that he was in complete accord with the statement of Mr. Frank J. Loesch which we shall quote hereinafter. Mr. Walter Crawford, formerly president of a bank in the Illinois coal-mining region and also formerly president of the Illinois Bankers Association, believed that we should have legislation restricting Presidential tenure and placing a curb upon any future President who might wish to extend his personal power indefinitely. Mr. O. A. Ross, a prominent Chicago lawyer, favored legal limitation upon the time any one man could serve as President. Mr. Wilbur Helm, formerly a professor at Princeton and Exeter Academy, and now in business, vigorously argued for legislation that would keep any President from becoming entrenched indefinitely. Mr. Helm believed that the breaking of the third-term precedent would be a major disaster in the life of this country. Mr. Robert J. Martin, who is in the public-accounting business, believed that we must go back to basic and moral principles of our forefathers and this, he said meant respect for the limited-term tradition of President. He favored legislation that would preserve this tradition. Dr. George Magill, Presbyterian minister and former college president, feared the psychology of an attempt at legislation unless it were successful—but he believed strongly that every effort must be made to preserve this great American tradition.

I wish, therefore, to report that among the many whom I consulted, and these included prominent Democrats as well as Republicans, I found almost unanimous sentiment for some way of guarding the office of the Chief Magistrate of the Nation from that individual, or that group who might become so impressed with self-importance as to be impelled to use the vast new instruments of power for self-intrenchment and perpetuation of tenure to the point of destroying the democratic character of our Republic.

Nothing, of course, has done so much to arouse this sense of alarm and consciousness of the need of protection as recent political developments. The dreaded third term is no longer a thing to be speculated upon academically. Like Hitler and Stalin, it has become a flesh-and-blood reality—and is regarded by many as an equally great menace to the democratic processes of our civilization. I can say to you that this new spirit of adventure masquerading in the form and spirit of the indispensable man has added wrinkles to the brows of our people in the Middle West. We out that way are rather suspicious of the idea that God has created or ever will create any one ordinary mortal whom he endowed or equipped especially to rule all other human kind. The great Master of life has apparently never considered any man as indispensable.

What I may say to you gentlemen, cloistered here in the halls of Congress, where you are accustomed to hearing learned dissertations and deep philosophic profundities, may indeed seem unorthodox. I imagine that experience would cause you to expect me to bring the repolished words of Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Grant, Theodore Roosevelt, Harrison, Wilson, and others who expressed themselves forcibly upon this matter of Presidential tenure.

I shall do nothing of the kind. Instead, I shall bring you the words of men who have never been President nor who ever expect to be President, but who have as much stake in the bylanes of American democracy as any of these men ever had. I bring you the words of men whose voices have never been cultured in the classrooms of Harvard, but whose judgments have been whetted by hard knocks on the Great Plains of the Middle West. I bring you not the voices of politicians who seek office or pay rollers who wish to hold onto their patronage jobs, but the earnest views of honest men who want a chance to work and to live as free men under a government that will guard but not goad them. These people may not have read all the Marxian and neo-sociological literature of the latter-day scientists, but they do know that they want to keep their Government humble in its service and subservient to the people and not see it eventuate into a cruel, arrogant, and oppressive dictatorship or oligarchy. They believe that the claim to indispensability (which, of course, is the pretext for breaking down the walls of our third-term tradition) is spurious because such a reason is voided completely by the high uncertainties of life itself. The very fact that a man is here today and gone tomorrow makes it unwise to conclude that any one individual is indispensable to the destinies of a great nation.

I say this in order to dispose of the false equation of indispensability before we approach the main reasons upon which I shall base my recommendation for legislation to limit the tenure of any one individual as President of the United States.

We cannot ignore the outstanding fact that there has grown up in this country, as the result of the action and the expressions of men like Washington, Jefferson, and others, a tradition that one man shall serve no more than two terms as President. This has come to be regarded as an unwritten law or an unwritten part of the Federal Constitution. It has been so claimed by both major parties at times when the matter of a third term has seemed to be a possible threat from either side. This issue was raised by the Democrats in the case of Grant and by the Republicans in the case of Cleveland.

Men distinguished for their scholarly and cultural background, whose understanding runs deep in the philosophies of government and in the legal comprehension of our own constitutional structure, have appeared before this committee and I shall not attempt to review the historical and legal aspects which I know they have presented well. I come to you as an ordinary man who lives and mingles with the common people and has their views of life.

My plea for legislation that will restrict the time which any one individual may serve as President of the United States is simple and factual, and one that every citizen can easily understand, whether or not he may be versed in the lore of tradition and legal history. I bring you, not an academic argument, but a plea of emergency based upon new conditions and circumstances that have arisen during particularly the last 8 years.

I bring you a consensus of sentiment, as I have found it, which resolves itself into widespread apprehension that Federal bureaucracy and Government largess have, during the last few years, and during the last 8 years particularly, been extended to such huge proportions as to place within the grasp of any President leverage that he could easily use successfully to perpetuate himself in office indefinitely, if he were so minded.

Mr. Roosevelt himself has stressed the peril inherent in these "new instruments of power" which he said would be dangerous in the hands of the wrong person.

The third-term tradition has been regarded by many as a strong link in the chain of checks and balances which guards our system of government from the dynastic and despotic perils which sooner or later have infested other systems of government throughout the world and destroyed the individual freedom of the people.

This particular safeguard of limiting Presidential tenure by law has never been incorporated into statute or constitutional amendment for various reasons. Although attempts have been made in that direction such efforts have never been approved by both Houses. But we must remind ourselves that the emergent conditions which I have just cited have never prevailed before when such a legislative attempt has been made. It is likewise true that we have never before conscripted for a peacetime army either, so the fact that it has not been done does not argue against it now. I urge upon this committee the importance of vigorous and immediate action that will protect the people from the perils that are inherent in a continuous process of Government expansion where there is no legal limitation for the tenure of a Chief Magistrate once he is in office.

No better way, I urge upon you, presents itself at the moment than to make it impossible for any one individual to intrench himself behind the Federal Treasury and clothe himself with the raiment of perpetual power through quadrennial reelection.

No one can doubt that, under these new conditions, unless some legislative safeguard be placed upon the possible abuse of this leverage which in this new age has been placed in the hands of the Chief Executive, it will not only lead to the development of dangerous machine political power but will also lead inevitably to harmful regimentation of industry, agriculture, and our whole social structure. It would sooner or later hinder human initiative and destroy our traditional American way of life.

Mr. Frank J. Loesch, general chairman of the Church League of America, whom the Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Daily News have both eulogized editorially as "Chicago's First Citizen" has added the following statement in his own words to what I have said in this general résumé.

Referring to the subject which this committee has under consideration, Mr. Loesch says:

"I believe his [Senator BURKE'S] amendment to the Constitution to limit the President's term to one of 6 years is sound.

"I think the amendment offered by some other Senator and advocated in the Republican Party platform to limit the President to two terms of 4 years does not meet the evil. It is history that no sooner is the President in office than he plans for a second term and all other interests of the public are subordinated to that end. Every policy is advocated with this in view and to keep himself and his friends in office. And that holds true of a Vice President who succeeds a President. In only two cases, that of Theodore Roosevelt or Coolidge, was it successful. It failed with Fillmore and Johnson.

"I believe the 6-year term is long enough to shape a consistent policy and leaves the President to devote his time and talents to the duties of his office and leaves him free of the pressure to work for a second term always put upon him by those in office or party who wish to profit selfishly by place and power.

"It has the added advantage of not causing a business upheaval every 4 years—6 gives more breathing spell and saves business millions of dollars of loss in the too frequently recurring Presidential elections."

Dr. Almer M. Pennewell, pastor of St. John's Methodist Church, Chicago, and chairman of the Committee of Clergy of the Church League of America, has authorized me to say for him that he believes firmly in restricting the time a President shall serve. He favors an amendment to the Constitution rather than a statutory law because the latter is too easily repealed. He would favor limitation to two terms of 4 years each as he feels that it is well to have the country take stock of itself each 4 years. Dr. Pennewell feels keenly that our precedent of limited tenure for the Chief Executive must be preserved.

From Bishop Frank E. Wilson, S. T. D., Episcopal Bishop of Eau Claire, Wis., and co-chairman of the Committee of Clergy, I quote the following letter:

"I believe it would be very advisable for some decision to be made about the term of the Presidency of the United States in order to avoid just such sharp questions as are now arising in regard to a third term. I would prefer to see us settle down to a single term of 6 years for the following reasons:

"1. It would give us a longer term of stable procedure between elections, with less frequent national upheavals which now occur every 4 years.

"2. It would give an administration a longer period to develop and work out a national policy.

"3. A single term of 6 years would prevent the possibility of a dynastic administration with a perpetual claim on ruling power.

"4. It would avoid the necessity of political activity aimed toward reelection and allow any President to concentrate on the immediate duties of administration.

"Further than that, I believe that 6 years is about as much as any man should be called upon to give if he is to display his maximum efficiency under the heavy pressure of Presidential duties.

"I shall be very much interested in the outcome of the present proposals."

From a Presbyterian minister in Kentucky I quote:

"I favor legislation restricting tenure of the President to get rid of bad Presidents."

A Baptist minister in Omaha, Nebr., says:

"Certainly we should have legislation restricting the tenure of any man occupying such high and important office as President. I see no reason in the world why a third term is needed."

From a theological seminary professor in Pittsburgh, I quote:

"My bitter opposition to a third term is not motivated by political bias, it is rooted in a deep conviction that it looks in the direction of life tenure, which means only one thing—dictatorship. * * * I would gladly vote for a statutory law or a constitutional amendment limiting tenure of office to one term of 6 years."

From a Lutheran minister in Wisconsin, I quote:

"You are going to Washington. May the Lord bless you. My feeling is that there should be legislation especially in times of political restlessness and confusion like ours. Perhaps it would be well to limit it to two terms."

A Methodist minister in South Dakota says:

"May God deliver us from a third term."

A Lutheran minister from Iowa writes:

"There should be legislation restricting the tenure of the President. He should be limited to one term of 6 years. This should not exclude reelection after an interval of 6 years."

I could continue these quotations indefinitely from both clergy and laymen, but the expressions I have given will serve as typical of wide sentiment as it exists today.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, September 23 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM KNOB NOSTER GEM

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, one of the best country newspapers in Missouri is the Knob Noster Gem, owned and published by a very brilliant young man by the name of Dan Saults. During his recent illness the newspaper was temporarily edited by a very able young man, 21 years old, one of the most brilliant students in Missouri, by the name of Walter James Carr, Jr. At that time he wrote an editorial on the subject of the draft which seems to me to be so timely and so pertinent, coming from a young college man of his age, that I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONCERNING THE DRAFT

This question of the draft is a much too radical departure from American precedent to be passed over lightly without sufficient debate. A calm consideration of the measure without any war hysteria is owed to the youth of the Nation. If the draft is unnecessary we don't want it. A few brass hats in the Army who have long wanted conscription have told us the voluntary system is inadequate. Contrast this with a statement recently made in the Army Recruiting News. This statement, incidentally, was stricken from the report somewhere along the line before anyone could see it. And no one would have ever seen it if Isolationist Senator BURTON K. WHEELER had not dug up the evidence. Reported in the deleted article was the following: "The Army recruiting program as a whole * * * is progressing at an excellent rate. Combined results to date * * * are ahead of schedule originally projected. Total enlistments during June were highest number made in 1 month in Army's peacetime history. An appreciable increase in production will help the Army to another new high record in July."

Today even before the Army's big advertising campaign has swung into high gear recruits are coming in at the rate of more than 1,000 a day. If the term of enlistment were reduced to 1 year, and the basic pay brought up equal to or slightly better than that given to those on relief, there is no reason to believe that this rate could not be tripled. If this were the case, the Army would have their 400,000 new men needed and as quickly as the draft could provide them, probably quicker than equipment could be provided.

Of course we can follow the other alternative and do away with the volunteer system. We can substitute the method of force and compulsion. We can draft the youth of the country and destroy the volunteer spirit. We can force them into camps, leaving many of them disgruntled and thinking they are being prepared for Europe's slaughter rather than American defense. We can draft a large number this fall and teach them how to march and how to fire .30-caliber rifles. But we can't teach them how to run tanks, how to shoot big guns, or even how to fire the Garand rifle; in short, we can't teach them how to fight because as yet we have no equipment for them. We won't have this equipment for months to come. This is true in spite of statements to the contrary. Facts and figures bear it out.

And while we're discussing the draft let's remember that France had universal service for years. France had the best trained army on the face of the earth. But when the test came the spirit wasn't there, especially among the officer group; and more important, the equipment wasn't there. Why can't we see the moral of the fall of France and the rise of Germany? Let's begin with a small well-equipped force and strive for efficiency. Then let's expand it as equipment is made ready. While that is being done let's eliminate the large amount of dead wood in the officer class which always accumulates during peacetime. At the same time let's democratize our army as was done in both Britain and Germany, where officers no longer look on enlisted men as social inferiors, and where officers and enlisted men use the same washroom, which is not the case on some of our American bombers. It's a strange paradox indeed to see the No. 1 dictator nation with a more democratic army than the No. 1 democracy.

But let's get back to the draft. Remember back in 1917 when we had the first draft without being any more prepared for it than we are today? Influenza got more of our soldiers than did bullets in France. It was necessary then, but it isn't today. Admittedly our time is limited, but there is every indication that England will hold out at least another year. This would give the volunteer system time to function and also give us time to get equipment. But even if England doesn't hold out for another year, there's nothing much we can do about it. Our men drafted into camps without guns aren't going to frighten Herr Hitler very much.

Money Instability and Its Economic Consequences

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. ROBERT L. OWEN

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, every Member of the House should study with care the following timely and fundamental statement of ex-Senator Robert L. Owen. I am pleased to include it here with my remarks:

MONETARY INSTABILITY AND ITS ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES

(By Robert L. Owen)

The monetary unit of account by the act of 1792 was made the dollar and the decimal parts thereof. The Constitution authorized Congress to create and regulate the value of money.

The value of money in terms of other property depends on the volume of money in circulation and not on money which is not in circulation. Dollars not only comprise the unit of account but also the medium of exchange by which property values are transferred from one person to another.

The dollar serves also as a storage of value and comprise dollars which are hoarded as currency and as demand deposits, dollars which are invested as an investment in time deposits and savings accounts, and dollars invested in bonds, stocks, real estate, and other forms of property.

When the dollars are stable by virtue of the volume of dollars in circulation as currency and demand deposits, then there is stability in the value of investments of all of the above types.

When the volume of such currency and demand deposits is inflated or expanded so as to interfere with the stability of the volume in circulation, it has the effect of increasing the relative purchasing power, or exchange value in dollars, of real estate and all other forms of investment.

When the dollars represented by currency and demand deposits are contracted by whatever process, such as the contraction of bank loans and bank investments, or by the hoarding of currency and demand deposits, the reverse takes place, affecting the value of real estate; stocks, listed and unlisted; bonds; and the earning power of money through interest on unemployed money falling from a normal rate to an abnormal rate, such as at present.

When the volume of money in circulation rises above the normal amount adequate to the transaction of maximum business and the employment of labor it has the effect of impairing and diminishing the purchasing power of dollars in terms of commodities in the wholesale markets, as well as in all other forms of property, without any advantage to the economic life of a nation; and to the disadvantage of those whose investments are in forms of dollars invested in bonds and debts; and benefits unjustly and unfairly the debtors who would be able to liquidate their debt by the transfer of property whose value had been abnormally and unjustly increased. Contraction of the money supply reverses this process and is unfair to the debtors, destroying the value of their real estate, their investments in stocks and often in bonds, particularly bonds of domestic corporations which may be put into bankruptcy by such an unjust contraction of the volume of money in circulation. The consequences of this was seen in the destruction of values by the contraction of 1921 and 1932 up to date. The reverse took place when money was unduly expanded in the stock markets for speculative purposes, which culminated in 1929, when stocks reached prices far beyond their economic value through an inflation of credits employed in the stock markets. From 1922 to 1932, $50,000,000,000 of new securities were sold to the people of the United States in our domestic corporations.

It seems desirable to present a bird's-eye picture of what has taken place within the last 20 years, because we now have dependable statistics collected together by the Division of Research and Statistics of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System at great expense and time and labor. These statistics are of supreme importance in demonstrating the enormous losses due to monetary instability, which has resulted in losses of actual production and a failure to achieve equally great advantages through maximum production under a stabilized system. There is presented below a table for the last 20 years:

1. The volume of check money debited on the books of all the banks in billions. Since this check money transacts over 95 percent of the monetary business of the country, the currency in circulation is not inserted in the table because of its comparative unimportance in understanding what has taken place.

2. Value of stocks. Violent fluctuations of the value of stocks is emphasized when the extent to which the volume of stocks, listed, has increased is observed, going from about 200,000,000 shares listed on the New York Stock Exchange at the beginning of this period and reaching about 1,450,000,000,000 in 1939.

3. National income, in terms of billions with one decimal point, shows the manner in which national income rises and falls with the volume of dollars in actual circulation.

4. All-commodity index or price level, while rising and falling with the volume of dollars in circulation was not affected in the same degree in the years 1927–29 because the expansion of credit was almost exclusively, to the extent of about $14,000,000,000, in the operations in securities, in stock speculation, in brokers' loans, and in foreign money brought to America for speculative purposes.

5. Purchasing power of the dollar in terms of wholesale commodities. It is always in inverse ratio to the all-commodity index, or so-called price level. The standard price level of 1926 was established at 100 on a basis of $54,700,000,000 required to pay for the entire volume of commodities moving through the wholesale markets for that period. It represents a volume of money, and this should be kept clearly in mind as the basis of the index of the so-called price level. It represents the total annual price of 784 commodities moving in the wholesale primary markets and is not concerned with individual prices but only with the gross value in dollars of all commodities moving in the wholesale primary markets.

6. Ordinary revenues of the United States, profoundly affected by these conditions as will appear from the record.

7. Exports, affected in like manner.

8. Imports, affected in like manner.

National income up to 1929 is estimated by the National Bureau of Economic Research, and by the Department of Commerce for succeeding years.

Sources: Bureau of Research and Statistics of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, Department of Commerce, National Bureau of Economic Research, Yearbook for 1940 of the New York Stock Exchange.

We have no annual record for the value of real estate but the Census report for 1922 shows the value of real estate with improvements at $176,000,000,000, falling to $126,000,000,000 in 1932, and to $110,000,000,000 in 1937. It is probably at about the same figure now.

It will be observed that the losses above set forth in national income for the years following 1929 have exceeded $200,000,000,000, if 1929 is to be taken as a standard year. Dependable authorities estimate that the normal growth of productive power of the people of the United States for the last 20 years had averaged 4 percent, until the catastrophe of 1929. Potential improvement, due to increased electric energy, increased production of steam, improved machinery, and the growth of invention justifies the estimate that 4 percent would be a normal increase under conditions of monetary, economic, and financial stability.

The last 20 years have demonstrated the incapacity of private individuals and corporations, however patriotic and well-intentioned, to stabilize our economic and financial system. Our 500,000 domestic corporations have no adequate power to cooperate in control of the money supply, and they have no duty imposed upon them to attempt regulating the value of money. The only power adequate to meet this responsibility is the Congress of the United States under the Constitution using the Federal Reserve System which has the power to expand and contract the volume of money, and to regulate the value thereof by regulating the volume which may be required at any given time for maximum production. It may be fairly said that everybody in the United States who has any information with regard to the subject matter favors monetary, financial, commercial, and social stability, all of which are interdependent, and all of which can be stabilized by the Congress establishing a stable monetary policy, in which a ceiling would be established beyond which the all-commodity index should not rise, and a floor below which the purchasing power of the dollar in the commodity market should not fall. This can only be accomplished by legislative mandate properly implemented and under the instruction and direction of the Congress through a statute which from time to time may be modified as events justify.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a story of the life of the late Speaker BANKHEAD, as told by him to Mr. William H. Hendrix, published in the September number of a magazine a few days before his death.

The story is as follows:

[From True Story Magazine for September 1940]

I'M PROUD TO BE A POLITICIAN

(By the Honorable WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, for 24 years Congressman from Alabama, and since 1936 Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, as told to William H. Hendrix)

A little while ago a man from my home district came to my office weighted down with woe. He is still a comparatively young man whom I have known since his youth. He related to me how his small business, a little store he had operated in his spare time from farm work, had gone to pot. Two years of poor crops had put him far in arrears with his mortgage. Lately, he had had much sickness in his family, climaxed by the death of his wife. Bills due the doctor and undertaker were unpaid. Crushed by his staggering burdens, he despaired over the frustration of his early ambition to get a college education and prepare himself for a career.

It appeared that about all the ill fortune that could come to a man had been visited upon him. As we sat and talked, it soon became clear that he had not come to me for advice on where to get financial assistance. It was simply that he was in a desperate state of mind, and wanted to unburden his heart to someone who would understand.

It didn't take me very long to discover that this man's most unfortunate loss was not financial; that debt was not his greatest danger. He had lost faith in himself—and that is the worst bankruptcy that can come to any person. His faith in the eternal goodness of things was shattered.

As I listened to him unfold his unhappy story, I found myself comparing it with some experiences of my own which closely paralleled some of his. His economic reverses brought to mind that gloomy night when I realized that my first 8 months as a lawyer had brought me exactly $64 in income. His bitterness over his failure to obtain an education reminded me of the burning desire of my own youth and early manhood for a theatrical career, and all but irresistible yearning that I abandoned only because for me to have gone on the stage would have broken my mother's heart.

And when he described his grief and sense of utter hopelessness when his wife died, there came to me vivid memories of that dark and awful day soon after the turn of the century when my own first wife died, shortly after our second wedding anniversary. Not only was I bowed with the sorrow that came with the loss of my beloved companion, but I faced the challenge of a mighty problem—caring for two infant daughters, Eugenia, 1 year old; and Tallulah, 3 weeks old.

And so I tried to prescribe for this man's need the thing that sustained me in my own Gethsemane—faith. Faith came to me as a birthright, and has been increased with the understanding the years have brought me. Faith in God, in one's nation, and in one's self. That is a rugged anchorage that will withstand any storm. It is a thing that can be defended with logic and proved by every test that time has provided. In that cruel hour, to me my faith in God, my reliance in His providence, brought comfort and strength to bear my grief; my faith in myself steeled me, steadied me to face the task of carrying on.

As I thus counseled with my troubled friend, I could almost feel the change taking place within him, as he struggled to regain his grip on himself. Since then, I have learned with great satisfaction that he is making a splendid, courageous come-back.

Circumstances of our family in my earliest childhood planted firmly in my heart the fundamental value of simple faith in a way that few children today, I am afraid, have opportunity to experience. Faith was, indeed, the only capital we possessed.

I was born in 1874. The chaos and poverty that followed the Civil War still gripped the region. Luxuries were all but unknown. Those of us who possessed the bare necessities felt thankful. When I hear people today complaining of some little obstacle, the lack of some little thing that they want but cannot afford, I am moved to smile at their plight, as compared to that which every family faced, back in the dawn of my recollection.

My father was a Confederate Army captain. He returned from the war to our little plantation to begin all over again, and nothing to start with. Conditions were primitive. How well I remember, as a little tot, hearing my father and mother talk of the privation that was our lot and the lot of everyone. After dinner they would sit under the dim glow of a kerosene lamp and discuss their problems. And yet, they never gave up—they kept alive the spark of faith to light the path of hope.

My mother combined the piety of Methodism, which she had embraced, with the more rigid disciplinary philosophy of Presbyterianism in which she was bred. So it was that, as soon as I was large enough to toddle around, I was taught both by example and by more painful and direct methods that I had best toddle straight.

Our home was at Moscow, in Lamar County, Ala. It was surrounded by cotton fields and swamplands. There, people just toiled and prayed and hoped. Though everybody had but little, their wants were few and on the whole I believe we managed to get about as much wholesome enjoyment out of life as most people get today.

It was there in the hills that I got my first taste of school life. As soon as I was sturdy enough, I began walking 3 miles down a muddy pathway to a log schoolhouse. School terms were 3 months long—if good luck prevailed and the patrons could scrape up the funds to pay a teacher.

It was there at my birthplace, too, that the first public honor was conferred on me. It fell to my lot to ride a mule to town to get our mail and that of our neighbors. I recall hearing my father say that I wasn't as large as the tiny saddle that I sat upon; but to be entrusted with such an important task was glory enough for me.

When I was 7, the first definite upturn came in the family fortunes. My father was made head of the Alabama prison system. We left our farm home in an ancient, creaky covered wagon, which was the only transportation system I had ever known, and set out for Wetumpka, where father would be stationed. We left the wagon at Tuscaloosa to take the train. Here I got my first look at a locomotive, and it was days before that thrill wore off.

This was in 1881. My father directed the prison system 4 years. In those years I played among and talked with the convicts—that is, the trusties who were permitted limited freedom in the open where I played. I used to tell my friends that I spent 4 years in the penitentiary very early in life.

My father was seriously concerned with prison conditions, and I can say with considerable pride that he launched the move toward prison reform in the State and helped direct attention to the need for reform in other States. I am positive that it was his ceaseless discussion in our home with mother about this or that improper condition that first interested me in public reform generally.

I recall especially one episode of those childish years which emphasizes the concern of my parents to implant in my mind a sense of fundamental values. It was the matter of my friendship with Old Silas.

Old Silas was a trusty. I never knew what his full name was. He was doing a stretch for stealing a horse. I guess I heard him tell his story a hundred times. According to his version, he swapped horses with a sharper who victimized him, exchanging a nearly blind, spavined worthless animal for Silas' own excellent nag.

Realizing he had been swindled, Silas resolved to right the wrong. He inquired around and discovered the sharp trader lived two counties away and habitually made his swapping forays, victimizing easy-going farmers. So, under cover of darkness, Silas went and reswapped, getting back his own good horse and leaving the worthless animal in the swindler's stable.

Silas contended that all he had done was right the wrong that had been done him. But his act didn't square with the statutes, so Silas was doing a term for larceny. One day I had some peppermint stick candy and proffered Silas a stick. He accepted it gratefully, and told me it was the first candy he had tasted in years.

I felt that perhaps I had transgressed by this chummy act, for I was not supposed to be too friendly with the prisoners. And so at dinner (we called it supper then) I told my parents what I had done. But my fear was groundless. I was not scolded.

My mother said to me, "Now, Will, that was all right. Maybe Silas is telling the truth about how he got into trouble. But even if he is telling the truth, he still did wrong, and he is now paying the debt because he sinned. But remember, like all sin, his may be forgiven, if he has faith in God and mends his ways."

My father nodded in agreement and added the remark, typical of his comment in those days. "It's high time we began thinking as much about what these men will be like when they leave here as we do about how to keep them busy while they are here."

There you have a picture of the atmosphere in which my earliest viewpoints were formed—the twinned reliance on God's eternal goodness and the acceptance of man's responsibility. A thorough consciousness of this relationship, I am sure, will help us solve our problems today just as it gave our forbears the strength and will to conquer forests.

When I was 11—in 1885—father quit his prison post and moved to Fayette, which was to be my home until I was admitted to the bar. We established our home there because father had determined to try for Congress, and Fayette was the hub of the district. It was from there that father first went to the House of Representatives, where he served 20 years, then rounded out his public service in the Senate.

I shall never forget that nominating convention back in 1885, the first political conclave in which I had a part. Politics was a wild, untamed thing in that era. The courthouse where the convention was held was thronged with Confederate veterans. Most of the delegates were veterans. The crowd had spirit, enthusiasm, and plenty of noise. When the argument would grow heated one of the participants usually let out a wild rebel yell and hurled his hat through the open window into the courtyard. This gesture was the signal for general pandemonium.

Because I was the son of one of the figures in the convention, I naturally was known to all the delegates, and by noon of the opening day they were calling me Will, and I strutted with importance. And it was right there that I was guilty of the only corrupt practice of my political life. Believe it or not, but I shall confess it right now: I was mixed up in bribery, and let him who will make the most of it!

The convention was deadlocked. I was playing under a tree, just outside the chamber where the delegates were arguing, sweating, and not getting anywhere with their nominating. Late one afternoon a delegate approached me as I was eating a pear. We had several trees in our yard, laden with fruit.

"Listen, Will," the delegate whispered to me, "if you'll bring me half a bushel of them pears tomorrow morning, we'll nominate your daddy—sure!"

Next morning I was on the job bright and early with the bag of pears. Finally my co-conspirator arrived. He gave me a knowing wink, accepted the pears and disappeared in the chamber. Mind you, I hadn't spoken a word to father or mother about my deal.

An hour after the convention assembled that morning, the deadlock was broken. Pickens County switched its votes to father, thus nominating him. I was playing outside the window when the delegate whom I had bribed leaned out and yelled to me:

"All right, Will. Your daddy's got it!"

Our home was quite a distance, but I don't believe that Nurmi today could excel the speed with which I dashed home to mother. I burst in on her as she was busy in the kitchen, screaming at the top of my lungs: "Daddy's got it!" That was all that mattered in the world, it seemed to me then.

But I began to feel worried about the pear episode, and so at dinner I confessed my sin. Instead of a spanking, my father laughed uproariously.

"All you're guilty of is cheating yourself!" he chortled. "The fellow you gave the pears to asked me yesterday if he might have some. I was too busy to bother with it, and told him to see you and make a deal. Now, if you hadn't been such a poor trader you could have got a quarter or 30 cents from him. This way, you didn't get anything."

So father went to Congress in 1886, and I began a crowded school program. Fayette had a one-room, two-teacher school with a high-sounding name—the Fayette Male and Female Academy—which had pupils of all ages from 6 to 25.

It was in my last year in this school, when I was 14, that I had an experience which I want to set down here. Now, I do not believe it is good practice for anyone to go about "wearing his religion on his sleeve," so to speak. But I do believe so sincerely that religion is an essential to character that I wish to say for the record that I embraced it early and have, throughout my life, been happy that I did so.

It was at an old-fashioned revival. We called it "the big meeting" back then. Evangelism with a direct appeal was the order of the day, and it was in this setting that I went forward and united with the church. For nearly half a century it has been my privilege to serve my church. Much of the time I have been a steward, or assisted in some other official capacity. Often I am called upon to speak from the pulpit or to lead in a prayer service. These things I regard as so close to the heart of America, so vitally important as a basis of our national greatness, that I am thankful to have performed my own humble role in the ranks of those who believe in God and regard Him as the true source of all that is good and worthy for humankind.

I finished at the Fayette school and entered the University of Alabama when I was 15.

It was at the university that my desire for a theatrical career first flamed. Though I was quite young in years when I matriculated, my entire life had been spent in an atmosphere of grim, practical reality, and I was pretty seasoned for my age.

And as my thoughts began to center on the future, I could see nothing for me except a stage career.

This desire grew and became more intense as I progressed with my college work. Hungrily I read the classics of the drama. In my room I would enact the great roles as I anticipated doing before audiences in a few years. And the thrill came when I almost felt that I could hear the applause.

My father disapproved the idea, which was discouraging. But it was mother's adamant "No" that forced me, unwillingly and unhappily, to put the urge aside, for the time being. I could not help feeling that I was abandoning the one thing that beckoned me to success. How ardently the young heart is set when it yearns for something.

But mother couldn't bear the thought of my going on the stage. She didn't say it in those words, but I know she felt that the theater was an abiding place for sin. Her heart was set upon my becoming a lawyer. Already, in her own mind, she was forming her own hopes for my future. Later in life I was to know that she had set her heart on my taking my place in public service. And still more years later, I was to realize—or at least, believe—that whatever dramatic talents I possessed found a more beneficial outlet on the great stage of life, in the labors I have followed, than could have been provided in the theater.

I was in the class of '93, a class that turned out a number of graduates who were destined to make history in Alabama, and elsewhere. It was a place of strict discipline, back in those days. It was a military school, and early curfew was the rule for the lads. There was no hanging around the streets—not for us. We were in our classrooms punctually, and our work was properly done—or the prexy found out why in stern, short order. Sundays we marched to church, then marched back to our dormitories.

I played fullback on the university's first football team, an aggregation that started early building a reputation for its "thin red line." I was center fielder on the old baseball nine, and took a hand in track events, too.

But I suppose it was more prophetic of what I was destined to become that I was active in debating, and once won the college medal for oratory. I was active in fraternity affairs, belonged to the literary society, and helped get out the first college annual.

When I finished in Tuscaloosa, I yielded to my family's advice and went to Georgetown to study law. I finished in the class of 1895, returned to Fayette, and was admitted to the bar. I started my law practice in Huntsville, in the office of the good Judge William Richardson, who for many years was a Member of Congress.

Eight months after starting out as a lawyer, I added up my accounts. It was then I faced the somber fact that my earnings had been just exactly $64. And if that slow start wasn't discouraging enough to a budding barrister, there still was the haunting memory of my first case in court.

Picture this: My first case was tried before a Negro justice of the peace. I don't remember all the details, but it was some litigation involving a blind mule. And I lost it.

It was a pretty sorry spectacle when I added it all up. So I decided that greener pastures lay elsewhere. I had a few dollars left from earnings as clerk to some of father's congressional committees while I was a student at Georgetown. I went to New York.

Soon after reaching New York—this was the autumn of 1896—I had my final wrestling match with my stage ambitions and put theatrical hopes behind me forever.

I had discovered that the path to legal recognition in New York was more difficult than I had imagined. Many other young law graduates were on hand, as I was, ready to pounce on any likely opening. I found that a long, poorly paid apprenticeship was a requirement. These disappointments brought a new decision: After all, what I wanted to be was an actor, not a lawyer.

While I contemplated the struggle that a law career would require, I canvassed the opportunities to get started on the stage. It was here that the yearning burned with new intensity—I must go ahead and act, I resolved. I so wrote to my mother. I reasoned that I was now mature, my academic education complete; I must find myself work of a kind that I craved. Just then I saw a newspaper advertisement which seemed to have been written directly in quest of me—a Boston dramatic company wanted a young man with a Southern accent.

I rushed to Boston and saw the manager of the company on a Saturday. We read the script of the play, which I liked tremendously. He talked to me a long time, then engaged me, and told me to report Monday for rehearsal. I was hired at last.

Sunday morning came and, with it, a special-delivery letter from mother. It was her final plea to me to abandon my stage plans. Between the lines, which were plenty emphatic, I could read a deeper meaning. I realized that it would break her heart if I went against her wishes. I never shall forget that Sunday. I sat there in Boston Common most of the day, rereading that letter and thinking long, long thoughts. But when evening came I had made my decision. I did not report for rehearsal.

But that Sunday I made a resolution that appears to have been prophetic. I promised myself that if ever I had a child of my own, and that child showed a desire to go on the stage, I should never oppose its wish. I often recalled that pledge in later years as I watched Tallulah, encouraging in her the flowering of the spark that had been denied expression in me.

It was not long after this that I abandoned, too, my plan to establish myself in law in New York. Both my father and my brother were insisting on my return to my native State, pointing out to me the opportunities that I had at first overlooked. And so it was that I returned to Alabama, with my law books, rather than my banjo, on my knee. In Huntsville, I became a partner in a law firm.

It was in Huntsville that I laid the foundation for what became a lifetime in the public service. It was there that I first devoted serious thought to public service—politics, if you prefer that term. I served as city attorney there. I went to the State legislature from there, and I served as solicitor of the fourteenth judicial circuit. But more important than those early posts was that there my first great happiness was to be attained.

It was while in Huntsville that I met my first wife, Ada Eugenia Sledge. Her home was in Memphis, but she was staying in the Huntsville area at the time.

The way of a man with a maid was much the same, I take it, then as now, except then we didn't have streamlined automobiles and ritzy night clubs as settings for our wooing. We strolled in the soft moonlight in the rural lovers' lanes. I remember one park particularly, just off the downtown area, on a bluff overlooking a small stream. Often we talked for hours there, leaning over the rail beside an old Civil War cannon that still was kept in its original position, its mouth pointing toward the river. And I remember how we used to gaze down on the water, and see reflected there the realization of our dreams of the future. I was full of ambition and the longing to achieve, restless with the plans that stir the young men of every era; she was equally ambitious and eager to help in the attainment of those ambitions.

Our friendship developed swiftly into love. We shared each other's hopes and inclinations in an ideal way. I remember with what delight we talked of the future, and of the many things we hoped to do that would make our lives worth while to ourselves, and of value to the world.

We were married January 31, 1900, in Memphis. How proudly I carried my bride back to Huntsville, and how I rejoiced when all my friends were entranced with her beauty and delighted with her charm and capability.

We were fortunate in our brief happiness in that we could not know how short-lived it was to be. A year later, Eugenia was born. Then one more year, and on January 31, 1902, Tallulah was born, and our happiness was complete.

But our joy was destined to be brief. For my wife was to make the supreme sacrifice of motherhood by giving her life for that of her child. She was stricken with a terrible illness shortly after Tallulah was born. In 3 weeks she was dead.

To go through such a valley of anguish as confronted me then is not only a supreme test of one's faith. It is a test that proves the necessity of having such faith. Crushed by a blow that was all but unbearable, I emerged with this conviction: I not only must rise above my grief and despair, but I must carry on with more courage than ever the task that the will of God had made doubly hard by taking away my partner.

My mother and sister came to the rescue, taking care of my motherless babies. Sad and lonely years followed for me, but I found joy in watching the children grow up, and in the thought that I would always seek to guide them just as she would, had she been spared. My loneliness continued through 13 unmarried years. The girls were growing up by that time, starting their school careers.

In 1905, 3 years after Tallulah was born, I moved to Jasper, my present home, and entered a law partnership with my brother, John. This law partnership continued until 1916, when I was first elected to Congress.

It was in 1915 that the contentment and happiness that comes only from a happy home life was mine again. Florence McGuire, who was born in my old home town of Fayette, but who then lived in Jasper, my adopted home, came into my life. Her presence brought the first ray of sunshine into my unhappy, drab existence that had been there since that desolate hour 13 years before. Out of our companionship there soon ripened the love that meant a newness of life for me, a rebirth of hope, a new charging of my batteries of faith. To make the prospect more pleasing still, my children, who were "big little girls" now loved her with the same intense devotion that she lavished so spontaneously on them.

We were married January 16, 1915. Now, if I took time to make a speech right here, longer than any I ever made in the House, I could not express in it an adequate tribute to my wife. She adopted my children as her own, helping them through the difficult years as they completed their education, married, and established homes of their own. She was ever their counselor, friend, and confidante. And she has capably and lovingly filled that need that is denied to many men in public life. She has made a real home, whether it is here in Washington, or down at our real home in Alabama. The home is the most important cog in our labyrinth of civilization, and that ours is so perfect is a tribute to my wife. To her goes all the credit. And around her cluster the happiest memories of my children. She shared with me, always, the joy of encouraging Tallulah as she started out, and as she won her laurels on the stage. And she has shared with me in toiling over every problem that has come since we have been together. Truly, in the deepest, truest sense, we have been partners in the journey through life; and as partners we joyously face together whatever the future may hold.

The year after our marriage I entered Congress. If there had been any lingering disappointment over my frustrated stage ambitions—which there was not—my appearance on the national stage would quickly have overcome it. For here there was drama, more than any stage at any time could have offered. It was just as I was cutting my teeth as a Congressman that President Wilson came to us with his resolution that put us into the war. Never, on any stage, was there a more gripping drama than the President's appearance there on the floor that day. There have been many more such thrill-packed, dramatic moments in succeeding years.

It has been my privilege to have a role in this greatest of all shows for many years. As a Member on the floor of the House I had the satisfaction of serving my district and taking part in legislation for the well-being of the Nation. Later, as chairman of the Rules Committee, it was my privilege to occupy a position of greater power. Again, as leader of the majority on the floor, it was my duty to look beyond the fiery debate and discern, if I could, what was best for the Nation in the matter under discussion. As Speaker, it fell to my lot to sit in judgment on matters involving even more responsibility.

And so it is that, remembering my early stage ambitions, I do not feel that I missed any of the drama of life by abandoning the world of make-believe for the realm of reality in response to my mother's pleading. Instead of repeating through life the lines written by great dramatists, it has been my lot to write the lines, create the parts and enact the roles myself on the great stage of life. I can only hope that in the final review the critics will be able to find more to praise than to censure.

You asked me what is the most important thing the years have taught me; what lesson I have gained from my own experience that I would pass on to others. First, I would say that the years have taught me the importance of keeping unshaken one's faith in God, in his nation, and in himself.

As to politics, public service, the change has been swifter, faster, than in any other field of human activity. When, as a youth, I got my first glimpse of Congress, as a clerk, politics was a remote, impersonal thing to most citizens. People discussed politics only at election time, during campaigns. The Government was a thing far removed from the average man's daily life. The average Member of Congress received very few letters, and most of these were requests for garden seeds. Government, to the layman, meant a distant power that jailed post-office robbers and collected a few taxes when money was needed.

Contrast that with today. Now, there is hardly a human relationship that isn't affected in a dozen ways, directly, by some governmental edict or regulation. The Government today has to do with our health, our education, our security, our jobs. It builds highways and hospitals, has to do with pensions and bank deposits. Everything we do, in some way or other, involves some governmental agency; local, State, or national.

It is an excellent thing that this is so, because this growing intimacy between the individual and his Government has given the individual citizen a growing sense of responsibility in the proper operation of his Government. This, in turn, has purged the evil, sinister practices that in some places brought the word "politics" into bad odor a generation or so ago.

There probably were places, some time back, when political bosses in smoke-filled back rooms had much corrupt power over the political set-up. But today the field of politics has moved from those smoky back rooms into every living room in the land. The people, themselves, are the political bosses today, and that is a healthy, happy national condition.

The field of public service today offers more than it ever did in the past to the young men afire with the zeal to serve. There are so many more things being done by our governmental units today than in the past that there is a new challenge every day to the man who wills to do them.

But right here I want to state what to me is a most melancholy fact; yet one for which I do not see any remedy in sight. The field of politics, public service, demands more from a man and gives less in return than any other field of human effort.

If a man is honorable and spurns the chance to profit through the machinations of political position, and serves through his active years with ardor and devotion to the public welfare, in the evening of life he faces a period of living without resources—for he certainly hasn't been able to accumulate a fortune from a career of public service. He is thus what we might term an "economic lame duck." I've seen hundreds of them in my time, and they are tragic reminders of the fate that awaits many more, I'm afraid.

But to the young man who burns with the desire to serve his nation and his fellows, and who is willing to accept as his reward the satisfaction in work well done, the field of politics is more alluring today, I believe, than at any time in the past. This is true because there is more worth-while work to be done today than ever before, awaiting the hand of the man with the will to serve. But it is no place for the man who covets wealth. If he starts out with the hope of accumulating a fortune, then politics is not the field he should choose.

I can say with a feeling of deep thankfulness that I have been happy over my own opportunity to serve the Nation. True, I am not, nor shall I ever be, wealthy; but I have been enriched through the years with that compensation that comes from the knowledge that one is doing his part on the great stage of life, that he is playing his role faithfully and humbly. I have much to be thankful for. And if I was privileged to live my life over again I believe that I would retrace the steps very much as I have taken them.

To sum up in a word my own philosophy, gathered through the years, I would put it in one phrase: Keep bright and shining the lamp of faith and hope.

Recently I was talking of these homely fundamentals to a young New England chap who was contemplating a career in politics. Some friend of his father had advised him to talk to a veteran in public service before definitely making up his mind, and that is how he happened to be presented to me for the interview.

I went over the field with this young fellow, pointing out the really marvelous opportunity that politics offers today to the young man of ambition and the spirit of sacrifice. I pointed out to him that, at his age, most young fellows are thinking more of their personal fortunes, rather than entering what is often a thankless field.

But this young man had zeal. He was of a religious family, and had no special longing for wealth and position. He wanted really to serve.

And when he shook off my warnings and persisted in his contention that he really wanted a political start, I decided perhaps he was too cocky and might be successful, and go "high hat." That is another fatal malady that sometimes afflicts men in public life when they reach high places.

So I cautioned this young man about the danger of getting to believe you're good. Or, as we used to say down in Alabama, the danger of "getting too big for your breeches."

To illustrate my point that, no matter how high one goes, there's always somebody ready to show you how unimportant you really are, I told him the story of my own homecoming after my election to the Speakership.

Now, when I was elected Speaker back in 1936, I was the first Alabaman ever to occupy the chair, so the old home State naturally felt a touch of pride. And the fact that I was elected unanimously, the first man ever to be so elected, heightened the State's feeling. When adjournment time came, the folks back home decided to put on a welcome celebration that would be a corker.

Everybody in my home district, it seemed to me, was there in Jasper, my home town, a county seat of six of seven thousand population. The whole State had joined my district folks in staging the party. The town, and the highways leading into it, were festooned with flags. Barbecue was ready to serve the hungry thousands. The National Guard was out in its best bib and tucker. Name bands were on hand from New Orleans and Chicago. The boys had sent a special streamlined train over to Birmingham to pick me up, and bring me the last lap of the journey in style.

About noontime, an old resident of the hills, away above the town, appeared on the principal corner. It seems he had come to Jasper to see about his taxes. Suddenly he noted the crowds and the troops. Then he glanced at the gay, flag-bedecked streets. He was confused by it all.

Just then a constable, whom the old fellow knew, came by. The constable wore a wide sash across his chest with "Welcome Committee" in 6-inch letters. The old gentleman hailed him.

"Hey, Henry," he said, "what's all this fuss about? There ain't no circus in town today, is there?"

The constable beamed. "No," he said, "no circus, but WILL BANKHEAD'S coming home today."

"Well, I declare!" the old fellow mused. "So Will's comin' home, is he? Good boy—WILL BANKHEAD. I ain't seen him for 3 or 4 years. Last time I seen him I sold him a nice yearlin' I remember. So Will's coming home, y' say?"

The train whistled. "Yes," the constable repeated, "WILL BANKHEAD will be here in 5 minutes. That's his train now."

"Well, well," the old gentleman rambled on, "Good feller, Will is. Say, where in hell's he been, anyhow?"

Who Pays for the New Deal's Propaganda?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 23, 1940

ARTICLE BY HON. ROBERT F. JONES, OF OHIO

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. JONES]:

[From Liberty of September 14, 1940]

WHO PAYS FOR THE NEW DEAL'S PROPAGANDA?—A CONGRESSMAN FLINGS A CHALLENGE: ARE THESE THINGS WITHIN THE LAW?

(By United States Representative ROBERT F. JONES, of Ohio)

Contrary to law, and proved guilty of violating the law by its own evidence, the New Deal is operating a political propaganda machine which could teach Dr. Goebbels a thing or two.

The New Deal's propaganda is not prepared by the Democratic National Committee, although it ought to be; nor is it paid for out of the campaign war chest. This advertising, this argument and blandishment, spread by pamphlets, press releases, radio and motion pictures, and traveling exhibits, and out of the mouths of agents in the field, is spread at public expense.

I want to be wholly reasonable. I do not blame the new dealers for striving to remain in power. I know that political propaganda, good or bad, has a place in our political system. Every political faction and pressure group employs press agents.

But, until the New Deal took over the Federal Government, the political press agent and his products were always paid for by the party or group whose interests he served. It took this administration to make the people themselves pay to be propagandized.

Whether you are Republican, Prohibitionist, Democrat, or what not, you are paying to be told that the New Deal way of running the country is best. The cost comes out of the Treasury, out of tax money and borrowed money, and that, I maintain, is wrong.

It is more than wrong. It is illegal. Congress enacted a law on October 22, 1913, expressly forbidding Federal departments to hire publicity agents except when specific authorization and appropriation are provided by it. The chink through which the New Deal advertisers crawled into our cash drawer is the law's permission for the maintenance of information services. What Congress contemplated in making that allowance was a public convenience whereby citizens' questions would get helpful answers. Congress did not intend to permit the establishment of multiple staffs of special pleaders—press agents in fact—or it would not have made that very exact distinction.

But there they are, and at a cost to you of millions of dollars a year; exactly how much, nobody knows. The Bureau of the Budget says, "It would be a practicable impossibility to prepare a compilation of the actual costs under these heads over any period of years." However, I have a few figures. For example, under "Press services, radio broadcasting, exhibits, and motion pictures" this year we find: Federal Works Agency, $708,824; Henry Wallace's Agriculture Department, $698,168; Federal Loan Agency, $202,189; Paul V. McNutt's Federal Security Agency, $172,291; Harold Ickes' Interior Department, $128,633; and so on down a list of 26.

Let me hasten to record the fact that a goodly share of this money does pay for the writing of legitimate information. As to what the rest of it pays for, I won't make any accusation; I will let those come from Government sources.

The law of 1913 forbids the employment of Government press agents. In 1938 the report to Congress of Public Printer Augustus E. Giegengack complained that "there is a disregard of this law by some of the departments and agencies." By law, all Government publications are printed in the Government Printing Office, which would afford a check on publicity; but Mr. Giegengack reports to Congress that, in direct violation of the law, the Federal press agencies are using mimeograph and other duplicating devices.

"I realize," he says, "the advantages which can be taken of present conditions by the departments and agencies to get out propaganda of a type they would not submit to the Government Printing Office, and the waste of public funds involved in this superfluous matter."

In 1932 the blank paper purchased by all the Government departments combined cost $724,188. In 1935 the cost was $1,466,921. In 1936, an election year, it rose to $1,733,056. In 1937, with the New Deal safety entrenched for another 4 years, the administration had to have only $1,333,826 worth of blank paper. In 1938 came the crucial congressional elections, and the paper bill jumped to $1,403,729. The New Deal lost heavily, so it bought $1,658,733 worth of paper in 1939, and this year the bill is $1,775,470.

Last year the Government departments sent out 970,000,000 pieces of mail matter without paying postage. It cost the taxpayers $38,000,000 to have that mail sent to them.

O. K.! I know it; it was not all publicity. But neither was all the press agentry sent out by mail. Tons of it was delivered by hand to the press associations and the newspaper correspondents in Washington.

Let us take the Department of Agriculture as a laboratory specimen of Government press agentry. I don't single it out as the most horrible example, but simply because I have my filing cabinet open at A.

In 1940, Secretary Wallace himself informs me, at my request, his Department is spending $897,460 for publications, which does not include "the cost of preparing material for publication."

Engaged in preparing the Department's publications are 114 full-time employees, 61 half timers, 152 working part time. Fifty are engaged in making movies and visual exhibits. The pay roll totals more than half a million dollars, not including $175,000 in expense accounts.

These publications include the farm bulletins, which are a legitimate and valuable service. They also include—diving at random into the pile of exhibits in my drawer—mimeographed copies of a speech by Mr. Wallace to the American Political Science Association, in which he praises rural electrification and paved roads as an escape from "the monopolistic rackets" of the cities. He winds up with the opinion that "one of the great functions of the higher Government officials in a mature civilization is to understand the battle that goes on steadily between the better educated, overprivileged groups and those who are poorly educated and underprivileged to turn this battle into constructive service for the general welfare."

Figure that out for yourself as a contribution to the art of farming.

Let's dip in the drawer again. Here's a fat one, a 17-page press release marked "For April 27 p. m. papers": Mr. Wallace's speech before a mass meeting in St. Paul, Minn., called by the National Farmers Union and the National Federation of Grain Cooperatives; a speech which was broadcast by N. B. C. It is a defense of the transfer of the Farm Credit system to the Department of Agriculture. "We want no dictator from either Wall Street or Washington telling us what to do," Mr. Wallace says in it. "But we welcome a government which gives us the machinery for expressing our wishes through local leadership * * *. Fight for a better credit system. Fight to guard your farm program against every kind of attack." Fight for the New Deal, in short.

Next my hand closes on a chunky little volume called the A. A. A. Notebook, which reads like a salesman's guide, and proves to be one. It condenses all the Wallace arguments for A. A. A., so all the field agent has to do when confronted by a disgruntled farmer is to look up the answers in the index. Who and what are these field agents? Well, in my Ohio congressional district there are three in every township busily "selling" A. A. A. and the New Deal farm program with the help of these little sales manuals. They work in relays. Agent No. 3, the high-pressure member of the team, even has pictures of any stubborn agriculturist's farm photographed from an airplane, to illustrate where and how submitting to A. A. A. will bring in more money for less work. Besides, the picture is a nice souvenir, suitable for framing. The farmer would be a tough customer indeed if he did not feel flattered. However, there are some who are tough enough to baffle even the third-degree propagandist.

Each of most of the other departments has its Information Service, a staff of trained writers whose duties include the writing of speeches for the Department heads. Exceptions are the War and Navy Departments, whose Press Relation Bureaus are staffed with commissioned officers of the Intelligence Units.

Correspondence with Miss Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, left me baffled in an attempt to segregate the cost of publicity in her office, although it is one of the most prolific. Her writing staff is, from her description of the set-up, well concealed under assorted titles and categories. It does an effective job, however, in preparing attractive pamphlets.

Here is one entitled "Workers—How the Wage and Hour Law Affects You," which advises wage earners, if they think their pay is "less than it should be under the law," to get in touch with the nearest wage-hour office, after working hours, promising that "your name will be kept confidential," and assuring them that "your employer will be violating the law if he fires you." It goes on to say that sometimes "a firm does not keep a record of hours worked and wages paid. Sometimes these are not true records." So employees are advised to keep their own records "in case you have to sue your employer." A successful suit means the employer will have to "pay you twice the amount due plus court costs and reasonable attorney's fees." Now, I am for every right and privilege that is labor's due, and I think a cheating employer should be treated like a common thief, but to my eyes the pamphlet quoted reads like a Communist manifesto.

Another Perkins opus is entitled "Women at Work," and advises employees to "fight for better conditions." It says women have always been active in labor movements and organized strikes since as early as 1824 and 1825. Then it tells how in 1936 and 1937 there were "many strikes in which women played their part. In the huge struggles in rubber, automobiles, and steel * * * women picketed, helped in the 'sit downs * * *'."

Why the emphasis on strikes throughout? I don't think it is commendable for the Labor Department to hire writers and artists, at public expense, to extol the sit-down strikes which disrupted this country 3 years ago. I haven't seen any employers' association circulate literature advising its members to "fight against better conditions." I speak in Congress for thousands of industrial wage earners, and I know the Perkins philosophy is not theirs.

Like most department heads, Secretary Perkins insists she employs no publicity writers, only "information" workers. So does Secretary of the Interior Ickes—outside his office. I have, however, photostat copies of his Department's budget sheets, a sheaf of which is labeled "estimated expenses for information and publicity." His 1940–41 budget calls for employing, for these purposes, 16 persons at a wage cost of $42,190 plus $1,900 for "contingencies." Assigned to his personal office are 6 publicity men at a total annual wage of $16,590 and 8 at $21,660 for radio broadcasting, 2 at $3,940 for motion-picture work.

In answer to my inquiry to the Department of Justice, I received a letter explaining that the Attorney General's "public relations" staff numbered eight persons who received a total of $29,600 a year. Most of the output consists of press releases describing in lay terms the law-enforcement accomplishments of the Department. That is all right—but the letter from the Attorney General's office contained this significant line:

"It should be pointed out that the Department of Justice, unlike some of the other departments, has no publicity unit."

Now, if the Department of Justice knows that other departments maintain publicity bureaus, then it is countenancing a violation of the law.

There is my preliminary case. I have thick envelopes of evidence for nearly every Federal Department, agency, authority, and bureau. Even if the Treasury's coffers were bulging with money, it would be legally and ethically wrong for the New Deal to use public funds to promote its own political theories and fortunes. But the Government is almost broke, and it has to go deeper into debt, at your expense, to pay for this press agentry.

It does worse than that. It takes money authorized by Congress for relief to spend on promotion stunts. Consider the United States Film Service, established merely by President Roosevelt's say-so. It has produced beautiful movies showing the New Deal's own idea of the New Deal's benefits to the Nation. W. P. A. allotted it $75,900 and P. W. A. $75,900—money voted by Congress to support 217 families on relief for a year—to make movies about unemployment!

Worse still, $850,000 of relief funds obtained on the floor of the Senate and House is being used by the New Deal's "How-am-I-doing" department. This agency, officially known as the Government Reports Bureau, is directly under the President. It compiles and summarizes news articles on the New Deal's activities every week, and once a month summarizes magazine articles, and circulates the digest in a mimeographed volume to the top jobholders. As this magazine goes to press, there is not a relief client assigned to the Bureau, although it is using relief funds that could keep the families of 1,200 unemployed sheltered and fed for a whole year.

Maybe it isn't unlawful, but it looks dishonest to me.

The American Column

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, recently there was organized in Bloomington, Ill., in my congressional district, one of the finest organizations I have yet heard of. This organization was fostered and given life through the efforts of Mr. Art Kane and Mr. Oscar Hoose, two prominent patriotic businessmen of the above-named city. The formation of the American Column was started early in June of this year. Already there are over 7,000 members in Bloomington in the first unit, and there are several thousand other members in the various units which have been formed in Illinois and elsewhere throughout the United States.

The American Column has a real purpose and objective, namely, that of promoting true Americanism, love of country, and the formation of patriotic groups to defeat un-American thought and activity.

Sponsor of this movement is the Louis E. Davis Post, American Legion, Bloomington, Ill. Already the American Legion, Department of Illinois, has adopted the plan, with the hope that other posts throughout the State and Nation will do likewise.

Mr. Speaker, this is a most worth while and deserving organization, built and fostered by unselfish Americans, who, like all of us here, have but one common interest, which is the preservation of our great Nation. Membership is limited to male Americans over the age of 21. There are no dues or assessments, and it is nonmilitary, nonpolitical, and nonreligious.

It is a privilege for me to call the attention of the House to this newly formed patriotic body of American citizens. Knowing of the interest in this fast-growing movement, I am, by consent given me by this House, including in my remarks the "principles and purposes" of the American Column:

PRINCIPLES AND PURPOSES

The declaration of purposes and principles of the American Column follows:

"With a definite and earnest pledge of sincere allegiance to America, a firm conviction in its democratic principles, an unswerving loyalty to its traditions, an unconquerable devotion to its time-tested blessings and, above all, an imperishable faith that our Nation will continue to be guided in the paths of liberty and justice for its people we join ourselves in a patriotic alliance for our country.

"We believe in these things:

"1. That America is and must continue to be the best place in the world in which to live and labor.

"2. That within its borders there is no room for those who have even a single counterfeit patriotic thought.

"3. That anything less than complete, thorough, and genuine allegiance to this country of any individual or group of individuals who enjoy its blessings is treacherous and should subject them to public condemnation.

"4. That there cannot be tolerated here any fractional Americanism; it must be whole and flawless or it is not such.

"5. That in all dealings between man and man, and between man and government there must be tolerance and consideration, but that such tolerance and consideration must be mutual.

"6. That the constitutional rights of freedom of speech, of the press, and of assembly shall not be denied to anyone provided those rights are not exercised to defeat the very purposes which brought them into being. The right of one person in these things ends when it becomes a wrong to some other person or to the community, State, or Nation.

"7. That in times of national stress, hysteria occasionally asserts itself. As a result, innocent people suffer and are unjustly accused. It should be the province of real Americans to protect their honest and true fellow citizens from unjust criticism and condemnation, as well as to accuse and prosecute those who are un-American in thought or deed.

"To the end, therefore, that true Americanism may continue, that our institutions may survive, and to better serve our Government, we solemnly pledge ourselves as follows:

"1. To completely and definitely promote the cause of true Americanism and to that end, only as the regularly and legally constituted authorities shall determine and direct, assist in the overcoming of subversive and un-American thought and activity in a sane and orderly manner.

"2. To favor and promote the enactment of legislation which has as its basis the curtailment and punishment of all subversive and un-American activities.

"3. To prosper the cause of patriotic education not only in public institutions but in private conversation as well, to the end that those not fully cognizant of the blessings of American citizenship may not be led astray by the teachings and urgings of those who seek to undermine or overthrow our Government.

"4. To enlist in the youth of our Nation admiration and respect for our Nation's flag and the purposes for which it stands."

1940 American Legion Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

ADDRESS BY ARCHBISHOP FRANCIS J. SPELLMAN CALLING THE AMERICAN LEGION TO DEFENSE OF NATION, SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1940

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, we have always taken a deep interest in the annual convention of the American Legion. This year, because of the troubled world conditions and in view of our recently enacted program for national defense, the proceedings of the convention now in session in Boston are being closely followed by every serious-minded person. The address delivered to the delegates by His Excellency, Archbishop Spellman, of New York, is, in my opinion, a most valuable contribution to the pressing and timely subject of national defense. The archbishop, spiritual head of a great archdiocese, speaking as a citizen gave forceful expression to the patriotic sentiments that must be in the heart of every loyal American.

It might be well for every citizen, regardless of his race, creed, or color, to read the inspiring address of the archbishop because it is based on our most sacred national tradition—love of country and fellow man.

I wish to thank the Members of the House of Representatives for giving me unanimous consent to insert the address in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to congratulate the editor of the New York Times for printing the complete text in this morning's paper.

It was most fitting that this address should be delivered on Sunday in the historic city of Boston in the shadow of the Bunker Hill Monument and within a stone's throw of Faneuil Hall, the "cradle of liberty."

The address follows:

Mr. Chairman, Legionnaires, ladies and gentlemen: There is a fitness in your choice of this place for your assemblage on the first day of your national convention. You are gathered beside the Charles River, the river to which the poet Longfellow repaid with a song the help he had drawn for his spirit from its stillness:

"Thou hast taught me, Silent River,
Many a lesson deep and strong."

We who crowd the margin of this stream on this autumnal night may also learn a lesson—that calmly and without hysteria we may prepare to preserve and defend the peace of our land. This, for us whose minds yield to its spell, is the admonition of the deep and quiet waters of this river "stealing onward like the stream of life."

We have met in the open with the sky as our roof. Looking upward on this dark night of humanity's sufferings, we seek hope in the heavens, and thence not merely a tiny ray but a whole flood of light descends upon us. On the same stars that now shine down on us locked St. Augustine centuries ago, and to his silent questioning they answered: "We are not the God whom thou seekest. He made us."

Yes, the stars proclaim in luminous, inerasable language the existence of God. These stars navigate the firmament in a certain definite way, and the plan, the progress, and the order involved in their movements presupposes an intelligence which could not come from matter or from chance. And this intelligence vast enough to regulate the orbits of heavenly bodies we know by the name of God.

God is that same first cause who designed our bodies, masterpieces resulting from the union of a hundred other masterpieces coordinated in such a manner that despite their separately complicated natures they function with an amazing harmony of action. Every fiber of our bodies, every power of our souls, proclaims the existence of God, and though other pillars upon which our lives are based may have tottered, we still have God, the supreme master of order, and firm is our confidence that through Him, out of the present turmoil, will come order and peace.

RECALLS WORLD WAR TASK

Lights lesser and nearer than the stars beam upon us. These are the lights of old Boston town, lights of hospitality and friendship and lights of freedom, for in convening in Boston we have come to a historic place where American independence was first asserted, when, sped by lantern's flash, the midnight messenger of liberty raised the alarm the sound of which at critical periods still rings and is heard in our land.

This river at the point where we are gathered is close to its outlet in the sea, and the sea for you of the American Legion is of epic memory. Gathered at the rim of ocean, it is natural that your minds should go back in thoughtful retrospect to that heroic embarkation of your youth upon the broad waters of the Atlantic so fateful for yourselves and so providential for our country.

Beyond the seas was France, where battle awaited you, into which you threw the strength and courage of your young manhood with such an impetus as to turn the whole tide of the war; nor did you rest until peace was returned to the world, which at its announcement went delirious with joy.

When the combatants put down their arms historians took up the pen to expose the origins of the sanguinary struggle, and many causes of the war were listed in books that have been published in the last two decades. By these authors the World War was explained in its beginnings by the rivalry of nations for power and wealth, their quest for territorial expansion and imperial domination, their seeking of new markets and outlets for capital investment, their competition in exploiting backward people, motives, all of them, materialistic, sordid, and ignoble.

If these were the underlying causes of the World War, you knew nothing of them. These were not the motives which stirred your minds and inspired you with the will for victory. Yours was an unselfish crusade. You fought for pure and high ideals.

The spark that flamed you into patriotic fervor was flashed by the President of the United States, and you judged it your task, whatever the sacrifice, to bring to accomplishment the ardent hopes that our Chief Executive had formulated in matchless sentences vindicating the inviolability of small nations, the security of democracy and a world rid of the threat and actuality of war. Even though secretly mocked and later openly thwarted by foreign statesmen, these principles were sincerely proposed by President Wilson and by you as sincerely accepted.

Let historians, economists, sociologists, and philosophers who explore human conduct decide among themselves the reasons for the outbreak of the World War; but for a confirmation of my recollection and my understanding of the reasons for our own involvement I shall not resort to books. I shall turn to living witnesses, to you, men of the American Legion; and to my query, why America threw its power into the contest, you will tell me, as you have told your sons, that for them and for all the children of men you braved every peril that they might inherit and possess a world that would not know the evil of war, since the causes leading to war had by your determined valor been removed.

For the disruption of peace, for the calamitous miseries that now oppress mankind, for the sorrows that we fear are yet to come, the responsibility must be placed on others. There can be no revindication against you; for you took no land that had to be reclaimed, you committed no economic wrong that had to be rectified, you suppressed no political liberties that only an uprising could restore. Your honor is forever secure. In military annals you belong to the company of the most knightly who fought without fear, without reproach, and without thought of personal gain or national expansion.

Despite the failure in the realization of our aims in the World War we still remain idealists. To be otherwise is impossible for Americans. But experience has taught us a measure of realism. We know now that we cannot draw the boundaries of States on the map of Europe so that race will never transgress upon race. We know now that we cannot bestow our democratic institutions on peoples opposed by natural feelings and traditions to our political system.

We know now that we cannot continue to remain unarmed when other countries have not imitated our peaceful example. We know now that it is our pressing duty to defend ourselves, our lives, our liberties, and our institutions. Interventionists, isolationists, and those whose political thought lies between these two extremes all agree and must agree on the policy of national defense.

What is worthless needs no guards set about it. The more valuable an object the more it calls for protection. Treasure is kept in secret vaults. A city is patrolled by police. A home is locked and barred against intruders. If in this world there were no greed and envy, no violent actions to enforce illicit desires, these precautions would not be necessary.

Nations do not differ from individuals, and although we have envied none, have wronged none, and have coveted nothing, although we have shared our abundance with a distressful world and have felt ourselves charged to do so before God and men, we have the fear that in many cases our charity has not been requited, our good will has not been reciprocated; we have the additional fear that our national wealth and our national way of life may have aroused envy in others, and this envy might incite actual attempts to conquer us by force of arms, to take from us that which belongs to our people.

For who can gainsay as he envisages on the one hand the vast natural resources of our land and on the other hand the present rapacious temper that is abroad, quickened and emboldened by modern mechanical invention, that it would be worse than folly if we did not immediately proceed to build about ourselves a strong defense that will discourage any possible effort that might be made against us.

It is better to have protection and not need it than to need protection and not have it. We Americans want peace, and it is now evident that we must be prepared to demand it. For other peoples have wanted peace, and the peace they received was the peace of death. Our good will and the sincerity of our desire for peace have been demonstrated to the extent of sinking our own battleships. We can no longer afford to be moles who cannot see, or ostriches who will not see, for some solemn agreements are no longer sacred, and vices have become virtues and truth a synonym of falsehood. We Americans want peace, and we shall prepare for peace, but not for a peace whose dilemmatic definition is slavery or death.

Valuable as are our material possessions, more precious still are our liberties. For these blessings of a higher kind no less than for our national wealth are we indebted to God. This truth was forcefully enunciated by the Catholic bishops of the United States assembled in the Third Council of Baltimore in the year 1837: "We consider the establishment of our country's independence," the bishops said, "the shaping of its liberties and laws, as a work of special Providence, its framers building better than they knew, the Almighty's hand guiding them. We believe that our country's heroes were the instruments of the God of nations in establishing this house of freedom."

These are impressive thoughts prompting gratitude to God and a deeper appreciation of our inherited liberties. For religion, which traces the sources of all our blessings to a divine Author, has always added its force to patriotism when our Government has summoned our citizens to the country's defense so that those who have sprung up at the call have felt themselves doubly inspired and doubly armed.

Of this twofold influence of religion and patriotism have I been conscious in all the thoughts I have expressed to you on this occasion. The invitation to address you was directed to me as the bishop of the Catholics in the Army and Navy of the United States, and in this capacity and as an American citizen have I spoken to you.

I am proud to address the men of the American Legion, and I believe in you. I believe you mean a great deal to America and that America means a great deal to you. You men cannot conceive of an organization calling itself American that challenges the constitutionality of a bill providing that no Government position in a State may be held by anyone who believes in the overthrow of the Government by force. And yet there is such an organization. You cannot imagine an organization which openly teaches disrespect to the American flag and under the pretense of freedom of religion engages paid workers to go from house to house to attack the religion of others. And yet there is such an organization.

By vocation I am a man of peace. I am consecrated to Christ, the Prince of Peace. Unceasingly, day and night, I pray and I ask my flock to pray for peace. "There is nothing to be gained by war that cannot be gained by peace," was the warning of Pope Pius XII on the eve of the outbreak of the present European conflict. I am a man of peace and I pray and hope and work for peace. Not knowingly would I injure anyone.

I am a man of peace, but gone is my hope of building a world safe for democracy on such foundations as the Treaty of Versailles. Vanished, too, is the mirage of many philanthropic optimists who cherished the vision of a world united in peace and fraternal charity beneath the aegis of science divorced from religion and around the altar of Godless education. Blasted is the dream of a communistic universal brotherhood—blasted by the tell-tale rattle of machine guns and the roar of cannon over Finland.

Science, knowledge, communism, these three great hopes of men, these three great deified abstractions have wavered and failed beneath the pressure of human prejudice and selfishness and the spirit of cruelty and wickedness in high places. A great scientist, himself a refugee from the deification of race and blood, has stepped beyond his depth and suggested that mankind abandon belief in a personal God. That is just what men have done and are doing and the net result is written in the bomb-mangled bodies and the decree-shackled minds of Europe's suffering millions.

What is the answer? There is only one road to peace that I know of, the highroad of democracy, the road marked by the signposts of the Ten Commandments, the road back to Christ and His teachings, in personal life, in national life, and in international life.

This is the road to peace. This is the road for America to take. This is the road our forefathers took when they lived and died for our national independence. This is the road you and your comrades took when they lived and died for the national independence of other countries. This is the road that we shall travel if we are to live in peace, a government of the people, by the people, for the people.

If through indifference or negligence, if through penetration or permeation from without or corruption or disintegration from within, it shall come to pass that some day some conqueror of democracy shall stand at the tomb of George Washington in Mount Vernon and with mock reverence and double-meaning cynicism salute our country's founder with these words: "Washington, we are here to finish your work." God grant that I, for one, shall not be alive to know it.

May God bless the United States of America.

A Modern Caesar

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, another "country editor," Mark P. Haines, of Sturgis, Mich., is one of that great class of owners and publishers of newspapers in the smaller cities of the land who keep their feet on the ground, their heads out of the clouds; who use common sense and good judgment; who are not deceived or bedazzled by what they hear over the radio, read in the city papers. He gives us an accurate picture of America's would-be Caesar, who, in Chicago, nominated himself as the candidate of the Democratic Party. Our modern Caesar, who has all of the ambition, though lacking the ability, of the Caesar of old, tried to purge loyal members of the Democratic Party who refused to accept the role of rubber stamps. He is now seeking to fool the people into electing him in November for a third term. He will, if he lives and succeeds, undoubtedly be seeking a fourth and a fifth term in subsequent Novembers, for, so long as he is President, America will never cease to be confronted by an emergency.

Here is a characterization of him from the Sturgis (Mich.) Daily Journal of September 19, 1940:

A MODERN CAESAR

"Brutus: Ay, Casca; tell us what hath chanced to-day, that Caesar looks so sad.

"Casca: Why, there was a crown offer'd him; and being offer'd him, he put it by with the back of his hand, thus; and then the people fell a-shouting.

"Brutus: What was the second noise for?

"Casca: Why, for that too.

"Cassius: They shouted thrice; what was the last cry for?

"Casca: Why, for that too.

"Brutus: Was the crown offer'd him thrice?

"Casca: Ay, marry, was't, and he put it by thrice, every time gentler than other; and at every putting-by mine honest neighbors shouted.

"Cassius: Who offer'd him the crown?

"Casca: Why, Antony.

"Brutus: Tell us the manner of it, gentle Casca.

"Casca: I can as well be hang'd as tell the manner of it: it was mere foolery; I did not mark it. I saw Mark Antony offer him a crown—yet 'twas not a crown neither, 'twas one of these coronets—and, as I told you, he put it by once; but, for all that, to my thinking, he would fain have had it. Then he offer'd it to him again; then he put it by again; but to my thinking, he was very loth to lay his fingers off it. And then he offer'd it the third time; he put it the third time by; and still as he refused it, the rabblement shouted, and clapped their chopt hands, and threw up their sweaty nightcaps, and utter'd such a deal of stinking breath because Caesar refused the crown, that it had almost choked Caesar; for he swounded, and fell down at it."

The timelessness of Shakespeare's insight into the hearts and motives of men is indicated in the excerpt above taken from his play of Julius Caesar.

Julius Caesar was a popular idol. He had led the Roman legions in a victorious war with the hordes of barbarians that threatened to swarm over and destroy the Roman Empire. He had returned to Rome in triumph with many prisoners and much loot, to be acclaimed by the populace. There was a movement afoot to draft him for a king.

It is not too difficult for a discerning mind to see the close analogy between the predicament of the Roman Caesar and that of a modern Caesar who has been offered the crown (nomination) for a third time, and awaits only the verdict of the people to accept it.

Even in those long-ago days there was public resentment, and the people became suspicious of such inordinate ambition. They sensed the reluctance with which Caesar pushed the crown and temptation away.

Fortunately, the American people still have a peaceful weapon with which to curb the craze for power that seems to afflict certain men of destiny. The ballot box is still available and on November 5 every United States citizen has the privilege of expressing his opinion as to the wisdom of continuing a President in power for a third term.

Already this American Caesar is drafting his legions. In numbers and amount that far exceed any reasonable need for home defense he is creating a military establishment that is geared for an aggressive foreign war.

Can it be that Franklin D. Roosevelt does not wish to relinquish his high office without the added distinction of being a war President? Was that the motivating reason that induced him to undertake to violate the tradition that no American President has ever been elected to a third term? Gen. Hugh Johnson thinks that it was.

With so much power concentrated in his hands over the lives and property of 130,000,000 American citizens, is there anything in President Roosevelt's record or character to reassure the public that he will not use it in a great military adventure on foreign soil?

The President's background, his Messianic complex, his recklessness with other people's money and property all contribute to a conviction that it would be courting national disaster to submit him to such a temptation. With millions of trained soldiers available it would be too much to expect that a man of Roosevelt's impulsive and irresponsible disposition could resist the urge to use them.

If we are headed for war, either defensive or aggressive, what kind of leadership might we expect from a President of Roosevelt's type? What can be said for the judgment of a man who would overlook the obvious qualifications of a Louis Johnson as Secretary of War for a 72-year-old Stimson, whose only recommendation was political expediency? What about the wisdom of naming as Secretary of the Navy a newspaper publisher who was the Republican candidate for Vice President in 1936, but with no experience in naval operations. When, indeed, has the President ever demonstrated any aptitude for selecting competent men and women for the tasks of Government? What kind of war administration would we be likely to get from men of the type of Harold Ickes, Harry Hopkins, Tommy Corcoran, and the lady member of the Cabinet, Mme. Perkins?

These are the questions that every American citizen must ask himself when he goes into the voting booth to cast his ballot on November 5. The choice is still ours. With Roosevelt entrenched for a third term, which, when completed, will make 12 years in the White House, who can be so sanguine as to predict that war is not inevitable?

Willkie Disappoints

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

ARTICLE BY RAYMOND CLAPPER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following article by Raymond Clapper, from the Washington Daily News of September 20:

[From the Washington Daily News of September 20, 1940]

WILLKIE DISAPPOINTS

(By Raymond Clapper)

By two tests, the Willkie campaign falls so far short that grave doubts are raised, at least with me, about the kind of job he would do as President.

One test is Willkie's success as an organizer. The other test is to be found in the policies upon which he offers himself for the job. By neither test does Willkie seem to live up to earlier expectations of at least this one of his friends.

At the time he was nominated, Willkie was a highly successful lawyer and business executive. His published utterances, such as those in Fortune magazine, gave evidence of an understanding grasp of national problems. He was equally impressive in private conversations. In all, he seemed, as did Herbert Hoover in 1932, exceptionally well qualified to be President.

Public life is different from private life, and Willkie is entitled to have time in which to hit his stride. But that time must be about up.

The Willkie campaign has been notorious for disorganization. Seldom has there been more chaos in a Presidential campaign. Congressional cloakrooms echo with stories of confusion, hurt feelings, unanswered telegrams and letters, crossed wires, and general demoralization. Willkie is carrying his campaign in his hat. This condition is well known, and is a subject of incessant discusson among politicians here and among newspaper correspondents on the Willkie train, which seems to operate with all the confusion of an amateur road show.

There are always some confusion and friction in a Presidential campaign. But this one is so loose-jointed that it indicates poor direction at the top. If the Willkie administration in the White House functioned with no more unity, coordination, and effectiveness than the Willkie administration in the campaign, then the Government would be almost paralyzed.

The Presidency is more than a business office. It is a political office also, and I don't mean that in a tricky sense. The art of herding an army of politicians and public officials and second-string prima donnas into effective handling of the enormously complicated public business centered at Washington requires more than Willkie has shown in the management of his campaign.

By the test of his policies, Willkie is falling short of the standard which he set for himself earlier.

His start was a brave one in which he disregarded expediency and stood for essentials in foreign policy, which encouraged his friends. But he has dropped his standard and has now reached the point of making narrow-minded appeals to sectional interests. He is using Argentina as a whipping post at a time when we are striving to keep that country from falling completely into the totalitarian orbit. His thrust at the Argentine sanitary convention was unnecessary, and if he carried his attitude into the White House our situation in Latin America would be done serious harm.

Willkie also said, out in the cattle country, that one way to rehabilitate our domestic economy would be "to have the American Navy eat American beef instead of Argentine beef." That was an attempt to reawaken the storm of indignation in the cattle country over the Navy's purchase of about $7,500 worth of tinned Argentine beef a year or so ago. It was fishing for votes at the expense of our interest in Latin America, and it was needless; Willkie evidently didn't know that Congress later passed a law forbidding the Navy to buy foreign beef. If that is the way to rehabilitate our domestic economy, as Willkie suggests, then it has already been done long ago.

The irresponsibility of some of Willkie's other recent talks already has been revealed by his own corrections. He seems to be suffering from a combination of misinformation and bad judgment. If that, coupled with the confusion which he seems unable to eliminate from his campaign organization, gives a fair sample of what Willkie would be as President, then it leaves much to be desired.

Twentieth Convention of the International Association of Machinists

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. SCHULTE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

ADDRESS BY PAUL V. McNUTT

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following full text of an address by Paul V. McNutt, Federal Security Administrator, before the twentieth convention of the International Association of Machinists, at Cleveland, Ohio, September 17, 1940:

I want to tell you first of all that I am glad to be here today. Glad to be on this platform with Emmett Davison and other close personal friends. Glad to talk to an organization that represents the finest and best traditions of the trade-union movement.

You have a right to be proud—proud of the strength and integrity of your union—proud of its long record of service to the cause of labor and of service to your country both in peace and in war.

I can tell you this: There is no one in Washington, from the President of the United States on down, who has one single doubt about the machinists. Everybody knows the willingness of this organization and its members to give the full measure of devotion and sacrifice to insure the safety and security of this Nation.

I want to talk a little while about some of the things that seem to me important, as we face the unknown jeopardy of the next few months and years.

In times of great national peril, people get mixed up. They sometimes confound what they want to do with ways of doing it. In everyone's zeal to build up the defenses of the Nation, some of them seem to forget what it is we are getting ready to defend.

If, as we believe, the significance of democracy is its way of life, its processes of government, and the manner in which things are done, it is important that we do not deliberately give up these things before the shooting starts. In such a case, we would discover—ironically—that we had lost the battle with dictators before it had begun. It is vital, therefore, that we hang on to the social reforms of the past few years.

It has taken a mighty effort and a sad experience for us to establish a society in which there is a genuine effort to attain a minimum economic security for everyone.

It has taken us a long time to get the beginnings of old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, aid for the blind and for crippled and dependent children.

It has taken a long time to obtain a program to insure labor against the worst abuses of the capitalistic system, against long hours and starvation wages, against the sweat shop, against usurped judicial power, perverting the injunction to break strikes.

It has taken a long time to outlaw the infamous "yellow dog" contract, to obtain legal protection for the principle of collective bargaining.

It has taken many generations to get recognition of the proposition that every man is entitled to a job at living wages, and if it is not available, that it is the responsibility of the Government to create the conditions which will secure one to him.

It was no easy matter to get acceptance of the principle that highly involved financial operations should be closely scrutinized by the Government, that promotion schemes and stock issues must meet a certain standard of safety for investors.

It was no easy matter to establish the principle that farmers are entitled to the same protection as industry and that the equalization of the prices for the farm products and industrial products was a proper obligation of the Government.

All these things have been obtained gradually and slowly and by hard plugging. They represent the mature flowering of democratic principles. They are a real and effective effort to create circumstances under which every citizen is assured a decent livelihood and a fair opportunity for a happy life.

These things are democracy. And it is these things that we are now preparing to defend against the threat of destruction. If we voluntarily give up any of these priceless possessions, to that extent we have already conceded defeat at the hands of those who represent and advocate a different manner of life.

The question is often asked whether democracy can equal the pace set by other forms of government. We are told by many an orator of the terrible efficiency of dictatorships. We are told how they mobilize the resources of their nations; how they conscript labor from their citizens; how they confiscate the wealth of the country and ruthlessly regiment, organize, and systematize the lives of every man, woman, and child. The orator will then wave his arms, pop out his eyes, and point out how Germany is supporting an army of 4,000,000 men and is building more airplanes, more tanks, more munitions than all the democracies put together.

We are then asked whether America can meet this challenge. I think the answer is perfectly clear. We can do it with one hand tied behind us.

We, too, have demonstrated that we can meet an emergency. In fact, we have been meeting a major emergency for the past 10 years. We have had, at the bottom of the depression, as many as 3,000,000 men on work relief. We have had another 2,000,000 men on other forms of relief. When you add the dependents of these 5,000,000, there were some fifteen to twenty million people who were being supported by the country. And while it is true that they were not supported very well, it is quite probable that they had a better living than Hitler's labor slaves and military conscripts.

And all this was done without much of an effort. There was, to be sure, a great deal of squawking from certain quarters. There have been some people throughout these past 10 years who were confident that this country was headed straight for bankruptcy. There were those who insisted that the national debt would soon be so high that the Nation could no longer stagger along under the load. There were those who insisted that a billion or two deficit in the Budget was not only fatal to economic recovery, but, if continued for a few years, would bring about the complete collapse of our economic structure.

This was merely throwing dust in our eyes. The truth is that today the actual cost of carrying the national debt is considerably less than it was under the man heralded as the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton. In 1923 the total interest on the national debt was slightly more than a billion dollars a year, or 1.6 percent of the total national income of that year. In 1939 the interest on the debt was slightly less than a billion dollars, or 1.3 percent of the total national income. Although the interest payment estimated for the present year will reach almost the 1923 figure, it will still be only 1.4 percent of the estimated income—far below the carrying charge under Secretary Mellon.

If further proof is needed that expenditures for relief of the unemployed during the last 10 years in no way threatened the financial soundness of the Government, it is to be found in the way in which the financial experts are accepting the present expenditures for national defense.

Bankers, industrialists, and conservative Congressmen, who a year ago were shedding crocodile tears about a billion dollars for work relief, now find that a $15,000,000,000 Budget for national defense carries no risk whatever to the soundness of the country's financial structure.

The reason for this change of judgment is perfectly clear. The squawkers of yesterday are now scared. When they once discover that their own interests are involved they find that America can raise whatever amounts are needed for safety. When the threat is to the welfare of the workers, the farmers, and the plain citizens, the economic conservatives at once find that the national debt is a great menace to our Government and its solvency.

The truth is that this country has been passing through a crisis as great as the one with which we are now faced. In spite of the alarm of the reactionary elements, we were able to meet that crisis. And in spite of the alarmists today we can meet the present situation, dangerous as it may be.

People who doubt the ability of this Nation to maintain itself and its institutions in a world as crazy as this one, will do well to remember what we have got in this country.

Here is a land which by natural wealth and endowment is the most favorable place in the world for men to live. It is not overcrowded. With only 6 percent of the world's population we have 45 percent of the world's wealth. We have more than 60 percent of the world's supply of monetary gold. We furnish 62 percent of the world's oil products. We mine a third of the world's copper and a third of its coal. We possess 30,000,000 of the world's 43,000,000 automobiles; 20,000,000 of the world's 40,000,000 telephones. We raise half of the world's cotton; half of its fruit. We have an adequate supply of labor, skilled and unskilled. Our industrial plants and our scientific knowledge surpass that of any people on earth. In spite of public expenditures of $35,000,000,000 during the depression to afford relief to its victims, our tax rate is far less than in any other civilized nation.

In the face of this situation, we are asked whether we can meet the threat of dictators. I still say, we have the capacity to do it with one hand.

And it is heartening to see what is possible when the full powers of democracy are brought into play, even under terrific obstacles.

Look at England today. Torn and blasted with bombs. London, a roaring inferno. Death raining incessantly from the skies.

What do men think about, in the presence of flaming death? What political and economic views pop into their minds while a fleet of bombers roars overhead? Apparently, they think about the Bill of Rights—not only the Bill of Rights guaranteeing free speech and religious liberty, but the economic Bill of Rights that assures a job and food and clothing.

It may seem odd for people to think of such things when the very ground on which they stand is about to be blown into the North Sea. But I don't think it's odd at all. They are thinking about feeding British children—war orphans, undernourished children, children wounded by the merciless destruction of total war. They have decided to pay, from government resources, a flat sum for every child so that they may all live better than the wartime diet would permit. This is a democratic idea. It is the way democracy responds to pressure.

I want to see our democracy make a similar response. I want us to extend the coverage of old-age insurance until it includes every worker in America. Until it does, I want to see every aged person assured of a decent livelihood, free from humiliating conditions.

I want to see every young person in this land assured of the opportunity for the kind of education he wants and needs to make him a happy and useful citizen. I want to see every man who is willing to work assured of a job at decent wages.

The defense program does not in any sense make the need for these things less. It makes them the more important. And those who argue that a liberal Government policy in times of national peril will be fatal to our security will do well to consider the fate of France.

Why was it that a nation with a great army and thoroughly patriotic working class could be completely crushed and beaten to her knees in 3 weeks' time? French soldiers were brave, French labor skilled. And the loss of life and suffering from 1914 to 1918 was far greater than in the tragic battle of France in 1940.

We are told that France's fall was due to "politics." Politics, my eye. You always have politics in a democracy. There are no politics in Germany or in Italy or in Russia or in Japan. But in England, France, and America there have always been political parties, political processes, and political action.

It is said, in high places, that the liberal government of Blum and the French labor leaders so reduced the industrial productivity of France that she could not turn out the machines necessary to meet German mechanized warfare. But the truth is, as every American newspaperman in France knows, that exactly the opposite is true. Under the liberal government of Leon Blum, the output of French industry was the highest it has ever been in French history. And this production was accomplished not by the stretch-out and wage curtailment, but by decreased hours, increased wages, collective bargaining, and other labor and social reforms which characterize a genuine democratic government.

No; it was not the French liberals and labor leaders who sold out their country to Hitler. On the contrary, it was the same small group of pro-Fascist reactionaries who almost betrayed the British Empire. Men who, for their own selfish ends, were shipping consignments of critical war materials to German markets even after the Nazi legions were on French soil. You can imagine how French soldiers felt when they discovered French silk in German parachutes after shooting down enemy planes.

There are different kinds of appeasers. There are those who want to compromise with dictators, to trade with them, to make such concessions as may be necessary to keep them in a good humor so that a small group of men can carry on a profitable and lucrative business with them. France had such a group and could not get rid of it in time to save her hide. England had such a group and got rid of it barely in time—we hope.

I suppose there are a few appeasers of this kind in America. There have been, for some time, suspicious statistics floating around concerning our trade with Italy and Japan. In the past 6 years we have shipped to Japan 8,500,000 tons of scrap iron. Japan has a hard time getting metal, but she added to her Navy 500,000 tonnage in warships during those 6 years.

What does this add up to? I'll tell you what it adds up to. It means that we are helping to build up the Navy of a strong and antidemocratic nation which is our only threat in the Pacific, just to make business good for a few junk dealers.

But this kind of appeasement is obvious. The greater danger lies in that indirect appeasement which makes concessions to dictators by advocating the abandonment of our democratic life. Men who are willing to junk the reforms of the century on the pretext that we can't afford the luxury of a decent society. Men who insist that because we have to build warships and dive bombers, we have to cut out W. P. A. and curtail unemployment compensation and old-age pensions. People who think we have to give up our vision of a decently housed Nation, a free labor movement, a reasonable standard of living for workers, and a chance for their children to go to college with N. Y. A. help.

Let me quote a statement just issued from the policy pronouncement of one of the most influential organizations in the country—the United States Chamber of Commerce:

"The compelling need for expenditures for the national defense," it says, "makes it more important than ever that the ordinary nondefense expenditures of the Government be brought down to the irreducible minimum, and that every possible means be taken to insure that result."

You can see which way the wind is blowing. The "nondefense expenditures" it is talking about are work relief, social security, soil conservation, housing and slum clearance, aid to tenant farmers, and all the other services designed as the margin for a decent minimum security against want and privation.

In the same statement, the chamber announces solemnly that "hard work, self-denial, and sacrifice, by and for all, are indispensable to both national defense and prosperity."

At the very time this solemn call was made, statistics were released on the business and industrial earnings for the first half of 1940 which shed a lot of light on the "self-denial and sacrifice" of some of our citizens in connection with the defense program. Profits of 400 leading industrial corporations exceeded those of the first half of 1939 by 59 percent. What is more important still, corporate dividends for the first half of the year were up 14 percent. The increase in wages, however, was less than 5 percent in spite of the big upturn in the cost of living.

As our industrial machine is now operating, the profits to proprietors have increased almost three times the slight increase in wages. And the United States Chamber of Commerce wants still more, national defense or no national defense.

It seems pretty clear that the sacrifices which the chamber demands of "all" are not coming from all alike. It is this kind of "appeasement" that threatens to undermine the foundations of our democracy.

Today, I call upon the machinists and all groups of organized labor in America to unite solidly behind a campaign to hold fast to the things that differentiate America from those nations and governments which threaten our very existence, to give battle to every kind of appeasement, and to permit no departure from the decent, liberal, humanitarian way of life that is the very essence of democracy. America must rely upon labor on the home front as well as on any other field of battle.

EDITORIAL ON WILLKIE SPEECHES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

BRIGHT LIGHTS OF WILLKIE'S HIGH LIGHTS

In Chicago he took up the banner of Governor Stark, of Missouri, long enough to assure his audience that if he were elected he would send Ed Kelly and Pat Nash, of Chicago's powerful machine, to the penitentiary.

Goodbye to J. Edgar Hoover, of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Willkie will take care of that as a side issue, if elected.

In Cicero, a suburb of Chicago, he said: "We are in Cicero. To hell with Chicago."

At Joliet, Ill., he said that "Roosevelt had telephoned Hitler and Mussolini and urged them to sell Czechoslovakia down the river at Munich."

Later his press secretary, Lem Jones, said Mr. Willkie had "misspoken," and that he intended to say that the President had urged a settlement at Munich and that the pact there "agreed to sell Czechoslovakia down the river."

Also at Peoria, Ill.: "Of all the men I know who have any acquaintanceship with international affairs, Franklin Roosevelt is the least qualified to lead this Nation."

And then, divine providence or some other agency of the Republican Party stilled his voice with hoarseness.

Facts About Cash Farm Income and Farm Prices Under New Deal as Compared With Republican Administrations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, New Deal Vice Presidential candidate, Henry A. Wallace, formerly Secretary of Agriculture, has repeatedly stated, to committees in Congress and on the platform, that American farmers are better off today than they were under the preceding Republican administrations. As an argument for the perpetuation of the New Deal for a third term, Mr. Wallace and other new dealers seek to win farmer support by referring only to farm-price levels and income in 1932. They forget to inform the farmers about their income prior to 1932. They also forget to tell that the Democratic Party took control of Congress on March 4, 1931, and that the Democratic majority used every political means to obstruct the enactment of legislation which would pull our country out of the depression.

Facts and figures from the Departments of Agriculture and Commerce, shown in the tables below, give the true picture of cash-farm income and farm-product prices under the 12 years of Republican administration as compared with the 7 years of the New Deal.

Wallace a Presidential Candidate

OF
HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, if those who decide to vote the Democratic ticket this fall do so in the belief that President Roosevelt should remain in the White House for another 4 years, they are laboring under a false assumption.

For, if the Democratic national ticket should happen to be successful this fall, there is little doubt that Mr. Roosevelt plans to turn the Presidency over to his running mate, Henry A. Wallace, within the next year or two.

There has been ample indication of this ever since the White House controlled Democratic Convention in Chicago in July named Mr. Wallace as the Vice Presidential candidate.

Now, there is conclusive evidence that Mr. Roosevelt has such a plan in mind. This evidence comes from no less a source than M. W. Thatcher, chairman of the National Farmers' Union legislative committee, a confidant of President Roosevelt and one of his most ardent supporters.

Here is what Mr. Thatcher wrote in a letter to all members of his organization after a lengthy conference with Mr. Roosevelt late in July:

> He [the President] discussed at great length how Mr. Henry Wallace was chosen for Vice President through a process of elimination, and in all that analysis it was evident to me that he is deeply conscious that he may not live or it may be necessary for him to resign if he is reelected. Without any quotation at all from his communication with regard to the President, I am positive that if he is reelected and the war situation gives him opportunity to get out, he will resign. I make this statement because he emphasized the qualities of Mr. Henry Wallace as one who is a thorough new dealer, who has unquestioned integrity, fidelity to the common people of this country and the cause of democracy, and who also has one of the best minds and the clearest concept of world problems of any in his group.

This does not come from anyone who can be accused of carrying on any mud-slinging campaign against the New Deal ticket. It comes, I repeat, from a stanch supporter of the President and the New Deal, and a man who boasts of his intimacy with Mr. Roosevelt. It is evidence that Henry Wallace is trying to get into the White House through the back door.

The history of the strategy employed by Mr. Roosevelt to have himself nominated for a third term on the grounds that he is "the indispensable man," what he said at the time he was nominated, and what has transpired since, all seem to fit into the picture presented by Mr. Thatcher.

It will be recalled that Mr. Roosevelt told the convention that if he followed his personal desires he would under no circumstances accept nomination for a third term. He said he was tired and is anxious to retire to Hyde Park and be relieved of the burdens which he has carried for 7½ years.

There is scarcely anyone who will deny that Mr. Roosevelt insisted that Mr. Wallace be named as his running mate, and it is no secret that Mr. Roosevelt feels that the former Agriculture Secretary would carry on his New Deal policies better than any other man.

And in his acceptance address to the Democratic Convention Mr. Roosevelt said:

> To you, the delegates to this convention, I express my gratitude for the selection of Henry Wallace for the high office of President of the United States.

Of course, in his prepared speech of acceptance, this paragraph of Mr. Roosevelt's statement said "the high office of Vice President of the United States."

Whether or not this was a slip of the tongue has never been made clear by Mr. Roosevelt, but psychologists will tell you that very often we blurt out in public when momentarily off guard the very thing we most desire to keep secret.

Since the convention, Mr. Wallace has been parading up and down the country making speeches in a manner befitting a Presidential candidate, except that what he has had to say only reveals that he is eminently unsuited and unqualified to hold the office of President.

Forgotten Morality

EDITORIAL FROM THE UNITED STATES NEWS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to revise and extend my remarks, I include herein an editorial by David Lawrence published in the September 20, 1940, issue of the United States News:

[From the United States News of September 20, 1940]

FORGOTTEN MORALITY—INDIFFERENCE OF THE PRESIDENT TO VIOLATIONS OF LAW IN HIGH PLACES IS CONTRARY TO SPIRIT AND LETTER OF THE CONSTITUTION AND HIS OATH OF OFFICE—PLAIN CONTRAVENTION OF STATUTES IS IGNORED

(By David Lawrence)

The Constitution of the United States says that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

The President, as the responsible head of the Government, must see to it that the heads of all departments of the Government shall obey and particularly that the Attorney General shall enforce the laws on the statute books.

The American people are being asked to elect Mr. Roosevelt for a third term on the ground that he has "experience" in government. What is the nature of that "experience"? The test is written in the oath of office which says "I will faithfully execute the office of President and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. Roosevelt shocked many people when he deliberately attacked the Supreme Court and sought to bring the judgments of its members in harmony with his particular views of the Constitution, but the shock was not half as violent as when Mr. Roosevelt, having been given by a turn of fate the opportunity of appointment, packed the Court with five members of his intimate official group of political advisers.

Fortified by the knowledge that he now has complete control of the highest court in the land, the President may feel he need give no further concern to the Federal statutes and that he and his departmental associates may ignore them at will.

Three flagrant instances of defiance of the statutes can be cited for they reflect a spirit that runs through the New Deal—a spirit of revolution which views the end as justifying the means, no matter how illegal the means.

VIOLATION OF FEDERAL STATUTES IS IGNORED

Thus the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board recently testified under oath before a House investigating committee that he had violated the Federal statutes governing lobbying and use of Federal funds for that purpose. The incident was drawn to the attention of the Attorney General by the chairman of the House investigating committee.

Nothing was done about it.

Congress put on the statute books in 1909 a law forbidding any contributions by corporations to national political campaigns. The language of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act is clear. Any contribution by a corporation is barred. And "contribution" is defined specifically as "anything of value." Notwithstanding this, the Democratic National Committee has just collected from 170 corporations more than $150,000 which is brazenly put into the New Deal campaign chest with the purpose of reelecting President Roosevelt.

Nothing is being done about it.

MORAL VALUES DISREGARDED BY THE NEW DEAL

The Federal statutes prohibit anybody from sending out of the jurisdiction of the United States our armed vessels with the intent of delivering them to a belligerent government. The Attorney General rendered an opinion saying it could be done anyhow. The words of the statute plainly contradict his view. No amendment to the act was sought.

The importance of such indifference to law enforcement on the part of the Department of Justice is that all through the Government the lesser officials take their cue from the top. A President of the United States who condones law violation and allows politics or expediency to bar from prosecution those who are giving money to the administration in power or who are carrying on, as did the Labor Board chairman, the partisan objectives of the party in power cannot hope to build up, among the many thousands of Government officials who every day interpret laws and make regulations, a spirit of disinterestedness and even-handed justice.

The way in past history has often been opened to revolution and anarchy where law and order breaks down. Lynch law and jungle law are the inevitable forms of counterattack which have followed failure to apply the law fairly and impartially.

The New Deal has raised a considerable hullabaloo about the difference between property rights and human rights. But there has been a noticeable disregard of the basic moral values that are associated with human rights. Political chicanery is the very basis of disintegration in a democracy. The French politicians failed their Government, because they allowed the cancers of graft and partiality, prejudice and favoritism, to eat away the whole fabric and structure of virile government.

Mr. Roosevelt is credited with beneficent intentions by his many admirers, by the people who regard his personality as a mixture of friendliness and good nature and humanitarianism. But he is asking the people to vote for him now impersonally as an administrator of government after nearly 8 years.

The people are being invited to say whether they want disregard of law to go on, whether they want politicians entrenched so that laws can be applied only to the opponents of the administration and not those who bestow on it their favors.

These are fundamental considerations which go to the heart of honest government.

Our forefathers provided for impeachment of a President who failed to do his duty. It was thought this check against abuse of power would be enough. Such proceedings are unnecessary today because a national election is to be held in a few weeks at which the American people can pass judgment on the President's method of conducting the Government of the United States.

Recently Westbrook Pegler said that the American people didn't care any more about morality in government; that they had adopted a sort of "what the hell" philosophy. Confirmation of this, in part, is to be seen by the way many people are saying it was right to violate the law in order to send England 50 destroyers. It is being said that the President could not have gotten consent of Congress except after prolonged discussion and that the end justified the means.

But isn't that the very argument made in favor of lynching Negroes? Isn't it contended that the courts are too slow or that justice might miscarry after a prolonged trial in our modern courts?

CONGRESS WOULD HAVE EXPEDITED AIR-BASE DEAL

Certainly the President could have obtained the approval of Congress if he had placed the responsibility on both Houses in a message which frankly said that the action had to be taken within 3 days. Congress would not have dared to lose for America those important air bases in the Atlantic. After all, the destroyer question was before the country for nearly 2 months. Likewise the President could have conceded the need for special permission without asking that the statute itself be abrogated, thus safeguarding against future transfers without authority of Congress.

The language of the law is plain. The Attorney General rendered an opinion which will remain on the pages of history as the most flagrant piece of intellectual acrobatics and Machiavellianism the country has ever read.

What profits it that a man gain the whole world and lose his soul? What profits it that America aid Britain and at the same time put in the hands of the Executive a sort of sanction to violate the letter and spirit of our Constitution? Are we about to draft boys to defend that kind of "democracy"?

BREAK-DOWN OF LAW BRINGS TOTALITARIANISM

Once the stern rules of morality and justice in enforcing the laws of the land are broken the whole structure of good government collapses. The citizen then loses faith in the integrity of institutions and too many citizens become receptive to the idea of one-man governments and benevolent dictatorship.

Mr. Roosevelt has had a dramatic opportunity to deal frankly with the cases of law violation under his very nose. When it was found that a Republican Cabinet member erred, President Coolidge appointed two special prosecutors to see that the laws were enforced. He did not hesitate to put in jail a member of his own party—a Cabinet officer under his predecessor, another Republican.

Will the Department of Justice prosecute the Democratic committee members and all others who had a part in violating the Federal Corrupt Practices Act?

Will the Department of Justice arraign the Chairman of the Labor Board for law violation? Or will Mr. Roosevelt, as rumored, send in a recess appointment of the Chairman of the Labor Board as soon as Congress goes home?

These are questions which should make the American people pause as they are invited to continue in office an Executive because of his "experience" in handling the affairs of a democratic government. Has not the time come even at this late date for the laws to be enforced, and will not such a step regain for the President the confidence he has lost? Certainly it will remove the odium of political persecution which the same Department of Justice has manifested by its series of indictments and arrests of prominent businessmen for alleged violations of the complex laws regulating marketing of commercial products. To prosecute some and give immunity to others is not Americanism. It is the beginning of anarchy and ultimately of totalitarianism.

Labor Conditions Surveyed in Talk to Sawmill Employees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. WALTER M. PIERCE, OF OREGON

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered through proxy recently at Dee, Hood River County, Oregon:

The first job at hard labor that I secured after I left home in Illinois, was in a sawmill in Colorado, more than a half-century ago. I was a big strong boy from the Middle West and willing to do hard work to get a start. My experiences and associations with the lumbermen in that early day have always been vividly recalled to my memory when I have come into contact with men interested in the harvesting of trees.

CONDITIONS HAVE IMPROVED

Conditions under which you labor today in lumber mills have vastly improved over those days of the oxen and the crude machinery that was used in sawmills at that time, but still there remain some of the same unsolved problems which we talked over in the lumber camps of days gone by—wages, living conditions, and prospects for the future. Wages have materially advanced in that period of time and conditions are vastly more favorable for the laboring men. (I got $2 a day and board, many worked for $1.50 for 10 to 12 hours a day.) Nevertheless, we have a long way yet to travel before ideal conditions can be enjoyed everywhere by wage earners in sawmills. In some Oregon mills we have the best labor conditions I have ever seen, and our Pacific Northwest wage scales are the highest in the Union.

NO LABOR UNIONS UNDER HITLER

I believe in labor organizations, have always believed in them, and in my various official capacities as legislator and as executive of the State of Oregon I have never forgotten my own struggles, nor been indifferent to the interests of the men who guide the machinery to make the great logs into manufactured products. I know our democratic ideas are being disputed today by the world's conquering armies. I know that in most of Europe labor is enforced and will not again be free so long as totalitarian governments rule. It is said that the big tanks with which Germany conquered France were made by Czechs, friends of the French, over whom armed soldiers stood, commanding their labor. We must defend our country against this kind of an aggressor. When I say "defend our country," I mean not just our shores, but our way of life. Never forget that all the advances made for the benefit of the laboring men in wages and conditions have come under democratic forms of government.

Under the rule of a Hitler, there are no labor unions. Wages are fixed by decree, and labor representatives have nothing to say in regard to the fixing. The wages are little better than enough to live on, and if, for any reason, a man in a totalitarian state is dropped from the pay roll, then he has to accept work in an organization similar to our W. P. A., but where wages are less than subsistence and much lower than those paid in private industry—in short, enforced labor.

DEMOCRACIES MUST BE PRESERVED

As a second proposal, therefore, I would say to keep firmly in mind that your hope to better what you now have rests entirely on the maintenance of our form of government. While I have a firm belief that our system of government can never die, I am not forgetful of the fact that Norway had probably one of the most democratic governments that ever existed, and lost it. Yes, it is today under the heel of a Hitler dictator, and democratic processes have entirely disappeared. Belgium and Holland, with all their advantages and advanced ideas, are today owned, commanded, and handled exclusively by the same conquerors. Liberty, freedom, and fraternity are dead in continental Europe.

My speech in Congress July 25, 1940, deals with the threat to us from Hitler's victories and our necessary defenses. This is available, upon request, and I do ask that my point of view be given thoughtful consideration by those whom I represent in Congress.

LABOR LEGISLATION

We must not forget, either, that under the economic order in which we labor, the men who own the enterprises and meet the pay rolls must necessarily make a fair margin above cost of production. If they did not do so, there would be no incentive to continue to produce. There would be no work.

In all negotiations remember that it is only by slow degrees that progress is made. "Rome was not built in a day." We have advanced more rapidly in recent years than ever before, and some people think progress has been made so rapidly that reaction will set in. I sincerely hope not. I hope labor can hold the material legislative gains it has made under this administration.

I voted for the wage and hour law, to put a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours. It is my belief that work must be found for all willing workers. The impression I get from careful study is that, in the main, increased use of machinery is largely to blame for the unending line of unemployed. I am well aware of the argument advanced by some employers that the introduction of machinery has increased the demand for labor. It may have done so temporarily and in some places, but in the main it is retiring people from the pay rolls by the millions, and is one of the major causes of the widespread unemployment of today. Industry is producing today at more than 100 percent, perhaps even at 110 percent, and is capable of still greater increase, but it has not absorbed the idle labor. It is easier and more profitable to use a machine than to hire human labor. I have reached the conclusion that machine industry must, through revised methods of taxation, divide the profits so that all may get a share. It may be necessary to go even further in fixing hours of labor.

I voted for the Wagner Labor Relations Act. I did so because I believed it offered a fair means of settling disputes between employers and employees, without making it necessary to resort to the drastic method of the strike. While the law has been severely criticized, and the members of the Board have been subjected to an investigation, nevertheless it is my judgment, and that of many who have been observant, that in the main the law has been most beneficial.

FORESTRY

Since I have represented you in the Congress and, in fact, when I was Governor, I have made extensive studies of forestry problems. I have been honored by the Speaker of the House with an appointment to the Joint Senate and House Forestry Committee of the Congress. The committee has held eight hearings at strategic points all over the country, including Portland, Oreg., and is now preparing legislation. I have become convinced that the time is not far distant when it must be made a punishable crime to cut an unripe tree, even on your own land. The forest belongs not only to the man or firm that owns the land on which the trees grow, but it belongs to all the members of society. The community has an interest in the trees. Cutting of trees should be looked upon as harvest time, and not as that of time for slaughter. The ripe trees should be taken out and provision made for the young and growing trees, so that they may be protected from fires and destructive pests, so far as possible. We want our forests made permanent.

It is known that centuries ago the bare hills of China once were green with forest growth, but they were ruthlessly destroyed; the rains came, the soil was washed away, and now only the bare rocks and the deserted hillsides remain. It behooves us, working men as well as the men who own the forest lands, and all interested in public welfare, to realize that we have a problem in using the forests and at the same time preserving them for generations to come. In our own country magnificent forests have been ruthlessly destroyed. Ghost towns are often the only reminders of the wealth and grandeur of the forests.

VOTERS' PAMPHLET—PRIMARIES

Do not forget that in this State, we have the Voters' Pamphlet at election time, a privilege not enjoyed by other States. It will come to every voter. Every candidate for office has the privilege of stating his case therein, or having it stated by his committee. Measures are also discussed by those who favor and those who oppose them. It comes to you free of charge. Read your Voters' Pamphlet. Since it has come into existence in Oregon, I have always taken from one to two pages in it, in the firm belief that some farmer or laborer would find time, between his hours of labor, to take a few minutes to scan what might be said about me, or by me, on what I have done or what I am trying to do.

You will find on your ballot this fall an initiated measure to move the date of our primaries from May to September. I advise you to vote against this proposal as it would eliminate candidates of limited means. I believe we are far better off in having our primaries in May than to have them in September. It gives more time for citizens to consider and study measures on which they are to vote in November. It gives the candidates more time, also, to present their cases. Primaries held in September mean hurried, intensive campaigns, with much newspaper advertising. September primaries would eliminate our voters' pamphlet, thus limiting publicity for candidates and measures to those who could pay for or command the support of press or radio. In a sparsely settled State like Oregon, it would be a serious mistake to hold primaries in September and then hold the main election in November. Speakers could meet but few voters and educational campaigns on measures would be impossible. I ask you, in the interests of good citizenship and good government, to vote against the change which would make us victims of propaganda and high pressure which cost money.

A BILL OF ATTAINDER

A few weeks ago, a bill was up for final passage in the House, known as the Allen bill. It was a bill which simply directed the authority of the United States, notwithstanding existing law, to deport one certain named individual—Harry Bridges. I was one of the 42 who voted against passage of the bill. The bill went to the Senate, where it was referred to the Judiciary Committee, where it was determined to be a matter for the courts and not for the Congress. In other words, the House, in the Allen bill, was passing a clear-cut bill of attainder which is strictly forbidden by the Constitution. It also denied Harry Bridges the right of a writ of habeas corpus. That is a privilege for which English-speaking people have fought for centuries. It means that the accused has a right to go before a court and state his case. Under the Allen bill, that right was denied to Harry Bridges. An officer would appear at his home, put a hand on his shoulder, and send him to Australia. Does that sound like the United States or like Hitler? You know they say that here in our country a man knows that if there is a noise at his door just before daylight it can only be the milkman. It was even admitted by those urging its passage in the House that the bill was unconstitutional. Since I have been a Member of the House, I have never knowingly voted for an unconstitutional bill. I feel sure my intelligent and thoughtful constituents approve of my vote against the Allen bill. I never voted a more conscientious vote in my life. I have been gratified to learn that the American Bar Association has, by resolution, condemned such legislation.

OUR PRIVILEGES

You workers in the mills in Oregon enjoy with all others the benefits of our advanced ideas of government. You are numbered among citizens of the United States who vote for or against the men who would represent you in the National Capital, the State capital, or at the county seat. That is a high privilege not enjoyed in the totalitarian countries controlled by dictators. Here we can hold an election free and untrammeled. We enjoy the privilege of belonging to political parties of our own choice and voting in the primaries for those whom we think could best represent our parties in the general election. We have the option to change our representation; the men who make our laws. This is a precious privilege gained only after tremendous sacrifices. May we never betray the sacred trust handed down to Americans, especially in Oregon, where so many features of popular or people's government originated or were first fully developed and applied—popular election of United States Senators, the voters' pamphlet, the recall, the initiative, and referendum.

Appreciate America fully. Make use of the opportunity to take part in your Government. Vote; yes, every time; vote intelligently, after careful consideration, study, and thought. Vote for the men who represent your interests and for those you think will do most for the preservation of American ideals and institutions.

Congress Should Stay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of today:

[From the New York Times of September 23, 1940]

CONGRESS SHOULD STAY

Congressional leaders have been planning to have Congress adjourn at the end of this week, and the President has indicated his approval of this program. But we should not forget that on June 4, when the German drive against France was in full swing, the President said that he saw no reason, vital to national defense, for holding Congress in session during the emergency—except, as he unflatteringly added, for the no doubt "laudable" purpose of making speeches.

The pressure of public opinion prevailed against this view. The leaders of Congress were forced to abandoned their plans for an adjournment in mid-June, and except for recesses of about a week each for the political conventions, Congress has remained in session. By remaining in session it has made vital contributions to national defense. It has adopted a universal selective service law which the President himself strongly endorsed. It granted the President authority, which has already been exercised, to mobilize the National Guard. It has passed a huge supplemental defense appropriation bill of $5,250,000,000, under which the President has already been able to let contracts totaling about $4,000,000,000 for 200 new naval vessels. It is passing an excess-profits-tax bill which the President himself demanded, embodying amortization provisions that are necessary to make it possible for industry to erect huge new plants for defense purposes.

Every one of these measures was wanted by the President himself. He could not have had them without Congress. In one or two very important decisions, as in the military understanding with Canada and the trade of 50 destroyers for naval bases, the President has "short-circuited" Congress. But even if no question of legality had been raised, his wisdom in following this course was highly doubtful—particularly when there was ample time for him to seek congressional cooperation. Actions without congressional sanction or consultation on matters of this importance, no matter how much the country may approve the particular steps that have so far been taken, are not precedents to be encouraged.

Mr. Roosevelt's declarations of June 4 and June 11, that he saw no reason why Congress should remain in session, and his belief that it will do no harm for Congress to adjourn now, contrast sharply with that part of his acceptance speech in which he declared: "Events move so fast in other parts of the world that it has become my duty to remain either in the White House or at some nearby point where I can reach Washington, and even Europe and Asia, by direct telephone; where, if need be, I can be back at my desk in the space of a very few hours."

One is obliged to conclude that, while Mr. Roosevelt now regards his own hourly presence and judgment in Washington as indispensable, he does not at all hold the same opinion of the need for the presence and judgment of Congress. But Congress, if it respects itself and recognizes its own function in the democratic scheme of things, will take a different view. No President should be permitted to regard American foreign policy as his private affair. The world situation today is just as critical as it was in June. Emergencies and unforeseen needs requiring congressional action may just as suddenly make their appearance as they have since mid-June.

Even if Congressmen feel that they must go home to campaign for reelection, then they should do so, not by adjourning, but by taking a recess to a date, definitely fixed in advance, promptly following election day. Congress must not abdicate its authority, above all when the decisions to be taken are as momentous as they are today.

Civilians Should Carry Out Provisions of Draft Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is the obligation of all Members of this House, both those who favored and those who opposed the peacetime conscription of our youth, to see to it that those who are called into the armed forces shall have every possible guaranty that their service will be given under the best possible conditions.

We all, friend and foe alike of this law, must, in the interest of the parents and other loved ones of those called, do our utmost toward assuring them that the registration of our manpower and its subsequent call to the colors and service shall place upon no one an unnecessary hardship. We all, in the interest of our people and our country, must be on the alert to see to it that every individual touched by this law shall be touched in even measure.

This law must not rest with onerous burden upon one while another scarce feels the touch of the law's compulsion.

While this bill was pending in the Military Affairs Committee and before the Congress I made an extensive study of the operation of the Selective Service Act under which we raised our National Army in the World War. In that act and in its operation there were blunders. I have no doubt that time will uncover the blunders in this present act—some of which have been foreseen and some of which have not been.

But there was one outstanding success in the operation of the 1917 act. It cannot be denied that under that act the registration of our manpower was carried through with smoothness and efficiency. It cannot be denied that the provisions of that act were carried out in neighborhoods and by neighbors with a minimum of ill feeling, both for the Nation and among the neighbors, when the actual conscription started.

Much of that success, the authorities assure us, was due to the fact that, to a large extent, almost totally, the operation was a civilian one while, at the same time, a neighborly one. It is true that the Federal Government was the guiding factor. It is true that military officers were probably the spark plug behind the machinery of the registration and the draft.

But the actual, and to our people, palpable working of that draft was divorced—certainly in the public mind—from the military and from the Federal Government.

That was the prime reason for its success where it succeeded.

Now, our peacetime-service law is only a few days old. The ink is scarcely dry upon President Roosevelt's signature. But already there is a lamentable tendency toward overemphasis of the military aspects of this law.

The military will have enough to do with the men called into service later on. They should not anticipate their functions. The obligation for the successful operation of the first phases of this law rests upon the civil authorities and upon the State governments.

That cannot be emphasized too strongly. When this, or any other Nation, has left it up to the military authorities to conduct a draft of manpower those drafts have provoked resentment, riots, and even worse. We want no repetition of that here and now.

I hope that the administration in carrying out this law which it demanded of us will bear that thought strongly in mind.

The tendency which provokes my comments on the situation is already illustrated by some of the preliminary appointments of executives of the draft. Here in the National Capital a brigadier general commanding the National Guard has been named to take charge. Across the line in Virginia, another military officer with the rank of colonel has been appointed.

No doubt, these are both able and intelligent men, thoroughly capable of carrying out their share of the work, and I make no criticism of these gentlemen personally.

But I am convinced that this law, which for its success or failure depends upon public cooperation and support, will receive a better public reception if it is made operative by men who are known as mister rather than as general or colonel.

We provided in the law, wisely, I believe, that members of the draft boards shall have no connection with the military. It was not the intention of the House, I feel sure, that everywhere else in the machinery of this law we should pack in military titles and military uniforms.

The Governors of the several States will do well if they avoid the precedent set in Virginia and in the District of Columbia and make these appointments from civil life, preferably far removed from titles and uniforms. Those will come in their own proper time and place to dominate the lives of those called to service.

Let the call come from the civil side and let the preparations leading to that call be made on the civil side as Congress intended.

Our military officers will have enough and more than enough to do when these men are finally in the service. Because some of us who through the years have pleaded for a progressive system of preparation were ignored, we are going to find that we will need more officer material than is available when we come to training those who are to be called up.

We should not use such officer material in carrying out the civilian angles of the service law.

I am somewhat puzzled, too, as to how these high National Guard officers can be spared from their duties with the guard in view of the urgent necessity presented to us a few months ago of mobilizing the guard. Now that the guard is about to be mobilized, some units having already been called, it is not clear how these high officers can be kept at home to superintend the registration and draft.

There is another proposition which preys on my mind as I contemplate the hundreds of thousands of young men soon to be marching under the colors. And that is the matter of the health of these youths.

We are told that the registration day will be October 16, and that within a month after that, on November 15, the first contingents of the draft army will be called to duty and training.

Mr. Speaker, that rush to get these men into camps causes apprehension in my mind. I recall only too vividly the intense personal hardship that was visited upon the men called in the World War. I recall those immense, unheated, clapboard cantonments into which they were rushed—cantonments that were unfit in many instances for human habitation, but that nevertheless housed hundreds of men.

In those places these men, waiting to carry out a patriotic and dangerous job, were subjected to untold punishment. Their health and in many instances their morale was undermined. Is it to be that way with these new draft contingents?

Are we going to take these young men from their comfortable homes and, in the middle of winter, send them out to poorly conditioned camps?

We all know and some of us recall all too vividly the devastating epidemic of influenza that swept these barracks and on through the entire country during the World War. Such an epidemic thrives on conditions to which these youths may be subjected.

Unless every precaution is taken, unless every care is exercised, we will see disease and death ride over these camps just as it did during the World War.

It may be possible to justify in wartime the conditions which prevailed in some of the camps used during the World War. America will not accept such conditions in peacetime. It should not be asked to.

To my mind it would be far better to delay for a month or two the calling of these men if by so doing we could be assured that the camps will be prepared adequately to prevent a repetition of the horrors of epidemic.

Further, I have seen nothing regarding the preparation of the material to be used by these men which would warrant our calling them to service immediately. We do not have the guns, we do not have the uniforms, we do not have the blankets, we do not have the beds essential to training properly an army of this size. When we will have them no one seems to know.

Now that we have the law on the books, let us call these men the minute we need them, but let us not call them a minute before we are prepared to give them the essentials of their training.

Turners Launch Campaign To Train American Youth

ARTICLE FROM THE DETROIT NEWS

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in compliment to the attitude of the American Turners, an organization encouraging physical education in schools, the following article from the Detroit News.

The national president of the organization is well known to many Members of this House, being my predecessor in this body—the Honorable Carl M. Weideman.

[From the Detroit News of September 17, 1940]

TURNERS LAUNCH CAMPAIGN TO TRAIN AMERICAN YOUTH

In the belief that American youth has grown "soft" as a result of inadequate physical training in the Nation's school system, Carl M. Weideman, circuit court commissioner and national president of the American Turners, announced today that his organization has started a movement for more widespread and intensive physical education in the schools.

The American Turners was founded as a gymnastic and cultural society in 1848 by a group of German refugees who fled to this country to escape political persecution in their homeland. It has since spread to 130 American cities, and, while its membership is largely Americans of German descent, it has frequently taken a public stand against nazi-ism.

Weideman said he is writing to presidents of the Turners societies throughout the country to organize groups in their communities for the sponsorship of "rational physical education with a view toward developing the manpower of America."

"Our program is particularly important in view of the approaching conscription of an American peacetime army," Weideman said. "Our organization always has held the best interests of the United States paramount, and for that reason we believe that we can perform a great service by stimulating interest in physical training so that young Americans can stand the rigors of army life.

Weideman pointed out that in the first World War draft 33 percent of the Nation's youth were rejected for physical unfitness, while only 6 percent of the membership of the Turners were rejected for the same reason.

"I point to this fact as evidence that the gymnastics and physical training our members undergo constantly made them fit for service when the emergency arose," said Weideman.

Weideman said in each community where the Turners have a society the local officers will cooperate with the school system and other organizations, like the Y. M. C. A., to broaden the scope of physical training in the locality.

What Is a Demagogue?—Washington Times-Herald Predicts Roosevelt's Election

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, September 22, there appeared in one of the leading newspapers of Washington, the Washington Times-Herald, a clever, copyrighted editorial entitled "What Is a Demagogue?" which I take pleasure in inserting in the RECORD in full, with permission of the Herald:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of September 22, 1940]

WHAT IS A DEMAGOGUE?

A demagogue can be roughly defined as a politician who makes most of his appeals to class prejudices and gets most of his votes out of people's dislikes and resentments. Both Franklin D. Roosevelt and Wendell L. Willkie have been called demagogues.

Maybe there's some truth in both charges. But assuming for argument's sake that both Presidential candidates have their demagogic streaks, what kind of demagogue is Roosevelt and what kind of demagogue is Willkie?

When Roosevelt says that old people should be comfortable rather than live in institutions which may be well run but also may not be, he unquestionably appeals to at least two classes. These two classes are poor old people and poor people who fear a poor old age.

Roosevelt appeals to the class prejudices of the farmers when he says their incomes should be somewhere near parity with city incomes. He appeals to workers' prejudices when he says they should have unemployment insurance; to bank depositors when he says bank deposits should be insured under Government supervision. And so on.

Conversely, he offends most wealthy and quite a few well-to-do people's prejudices when he makes such statements, because these people know it will cost them tax money to pay for these proposed reforms.

Not too many of the wealthy and well-to-do are able to take the larger view that Roosevelt's reforms have in 7 years kept the ship of state from capsizing as it threatened to do before Roosevelt, and may in a few more years give us a fairly well-stabilized social and economic system.

To most of these people, Mr. Roosevelt is a traitor to his class, a rich radical who cannot sincerely feel for the masses of people, a Catiline rather than a Caius Gracchus or a Marquis de Lafayette.

WILLKIE'S APPEAL

Insofar as Mr. Willkie is a demagogue, he strikes us as another kind than Mr. Roosevelt. Mr. Willkie looks to us like an appealer to the class prejudices of the wealthy and well-to-do and of the large middle-class delegation of Americans who believe in the poor-boy-makes-good pattern of Horatio Alger's stories.

Not that Mr. Willkie in his campaign talks is appealing to upper-crust emotions. On the radio and the back platforms and in the auditoriums he is trying to talk shirt-sleeve English and utter husky, forthright, democratic American sentiments.

But Mr. Willkie's whole life prior to the Philadelphia convention is a standing appeal to upper crust prejudices. He didn't start at the bottom, though the hint dropped in some of his remarks is that he did. Both his parents went to college (rare in Indiana a generation ago); his father was a rich real estater till the panic of 1893–96.

Willkie likewise went to college (Indiana University), fighting the fraternities there until the best one on the lot, Beta Theta Pi, asked him in. He sent his own son to Princeton. He began his professional life as a corporation lawyer in Akron, and moved to New York to become a bigger and better corporation lawyer 11 years ago.

He endeared himself to Roosevelt's haters when he made the T. V. A. raise its bid for Commonwealth & Southern's Tennessee properties to $78,600,000. And though he started his presidential campaign at Rushville, Ind., he lived at 1010 Fifth Avenue, New York City, and officed at 20 Pine Street, in the Wall Street district, for years before the campaign.

The groundswell which nominated Willkie was churned up, we believe, by wealthy gentlemen who hoped to lure voters with a tousle-headed, blue-eyed Hoosier type.

LOOKS LIKE ROOSEVELT

We do not see how the Willkie appeal can win out over the Roosevelt appeal. The people can be fooled, and frequently are, contrary to what politicians tell the people just before trying to fool them. But we can't see Willkie, with his fundamental appeal to the wealthy and well-to-do, appealing to the masses.

Therefore, Mr. Roosevelt seems likely to get the bulk of the common people's votes, and thus to be reelected; because there are many more of them than of the well-to-do.

W. P. A. Physical Accomplishments in Sedgwick County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. HOUSTON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

REPORT BY CLARENCE G. NEVINS, KANSAS STATE W. P. A. ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert a summary of physical accomplishments of the W. P. A. in Sedgwick County, Kans. The report follows:

With the worth of the Work Projects Administration most frequently measured in terms of jobs provided and human distress alleviated, there has been a tendency to obscure its physical accomplishments. The inventory of W. P. A. accomplishments from the beginning of operations in 1935 through June 30, 1940, in Sedgwick County, made public by Clarence Nevins, administrator, today, shows that sizable contributions have been made to Sedgwick County's progress in the 5 years of W. P. A. operations through important construction projects.

One of the most important fields of W. P. A. assistance in Sedgwick County has been the W. P. A. improvements to the Witchita, Kans., municipal airport. Located strategically for national defense, this airport is a source of pride to Witchita residents since it now ranks as one of the finest in the Nation. W. P. A. workers have constructed 3,750 feet of new paved runways and made necessary improvements to the entire airport field.

During the 5-year period, Sedgwick County has acquired through W. P. A. 528 miles of roads and new or greatly improved streets. The modernization and extension of the road system of the county consists of 523 miles of farm-to-market roads. These roads were newly built or straightened, graded, drained, and gravel surfaced to make them safe for passage in wet weather. Many dangerous curves were eliminated. These improvements have included the laying of 884 new culverts, 42 new bridges constructed, and improvements to 2 existing bridges.

The construction of public buildings is another important phase of the W. P. A. program. In Sedgwick County 14 new public buildings have been erected and 12 reconstructed or improved. The buildings include schools, auditoriums, office buildings, etc.

Facilities for sports and other recreational activities in connection with educational institutions were increased by the erection of 1 stadium, 2 gymnasiums. Greater opportunities for public participation in many recreational activities were provided through the construction of 4 swimming pools, 2 wading pools, 26 tennis courts, 8 athletic fields and playgrounds; 11 parks were developed or improved through the clearing of underbrush, general landscaping, building of picnic equipment, and miscellaneous other work.

Since the problems of maintaining an adequate water supply and of providing for proper sewage disposal are of great importance, many projects have been directed toward these ends. Through June 30, 1940, not only had the distribution of water to consumers been facilitated and increased through the installation of 8 miles of water mains, but water systems had also been helped through the construction of 1 water-treatment plant, 3 pumping stations, 21 water wells, 2 storage tanks and reservoirs.

Toward better sewage-disposal facilities W. P. A. project work contributed 3 miles of storm and sanitary sewers, 61 manholes and catch basins, 1 sewage-treatment plant, and 921 new sanitary privies were constructed.

Much work has been done in Kansas in an effort to prevent floods and erosion and to conserve land and water. W. P. A. work in Sedgwick County in this field includes planting of 321,771 trees on 1,044 acres of ground, 2 farm ponds, over 80 miles of fencing, 150,000 acres of drainage, 97 acres of landscaping. Levees and embankments have been constructed for a total of 30,000 linear feet. Other river improvements included the riprapping and general improvement of 5 miles of river banks and the erection of 176 linear feet of retaining walls and revetments. Stream beds have been improved for a total length of 12 miles.

Additional construction included a variety of miscellaneous work such as curbing and guttering, drainage, excavation, weed, and plant eradication, building small recreational facilities such as croquet sets, tree trimming, geodetic surveys, car and railroad track removal, painting traffic lines, etc.

All of these permanent accomplishments for Sedgwick County were effected by W. P. A. labor and practically all of these undertakings combined with the social, educational, health, research, and recreational services have directly or indirectly benefited every citizen in Sedgwick County.

Walter-Logan Bill Should Be Passed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT J. ENGEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

ARTICLE BY GEORGE ROTHWELL BROWN

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George Rothwell Brown:

[From the Los Angeles Examiner of September 14, 1940]

THE POLITICAL PARADE

(By George Rothwell Brown)

WASHINGTON, September 13.—Mr. Roosevelt's heroic attitude of a Commander in Chief who is too patriotic to be concerned with and too busy to be bothered with politics, has failed to be impressive in in the light of the many things which indicate that he is playing politics as he never played them before.

It would seem that the Republicans are overlooking an important issue when they fail to call the attention of the American people to the fact that the President is blocking consideration in Congress of two measures, the significance of which to the people could scarcely be exaggerated.

The President, as is clearly proved by the actions of New Deal leaders in the Senate, is determined to bring about the adjournment of Congress before the close of this month without permitting final action on the Logan-Walter bill, and the bill for the improvement of the National Labor Relations Board. They are sticky with politics.

Both of these measures are bottled up in the Senate, after having been approved at the south end of the Capitol by huge majorities.

The Logan-Walter bill passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 3½ to 1, yet Senator BARKLEY, of Kentucky, Democratic leader of the Senate, and the man who from the floor of that body carries out the instructions which are given to him at the White House, refuses to let this bill come to a vote, notwithstanding he is on public record as pledging that it would be permitted to come to a vote at this session of Congress.

Senator BARKLEY has reached the point in his public career that would make "Charlie McCarthy" look like Daniel Webster.

The Logan-Walter bill is a simple democratic measure designed to put a curb bit on the reckless New Deal bureaucracy which is running wild in nearly every board and commission in Washington, and to give back to the American people, who are harassed and tormented in their business and industry by these arrogant bureaucrats their ancient right to appeal from unjust and illegal decisions to the courts of the land.

That is the purpose of this bill, which Mr. BARKLEY, the White House spokesman in the Senate, refuses to permit to come to a vote. He knows that if he did so the Senate would pass the bill and Mr. Roosevelt would either have to sign it or in vetoing it focus the attention of the people in a critical campaign upon his unwillingness that the New Deal bureaucracy should be hampered in any way.

The transaction leaves Senator BARKLEY in a most unenviable position, although he must be used by now to being thus left. The Logan bill, sponsored by the late Senator from Kentucky, passed the Senate by unanimous consent shortly before his death. With his consent, the Senate reconsidered this vote.

It is said that Mr. BARKLEY made a deathbed promise to his colleague that, in good time, he would bring the bill before the Senate again to be voted on.

Whether this be true or not, during the debate in the Senate on May 30 of this year, Senator AUSTIN read from a statement which had been made to the Senate on August 1, 1939, by Senator BARKLEY, the concluding sentence of which is as follows:

"It is entirely satisfactory to my colleague that the vote by which that bill passed should be reconsidered and that the bill be restored to the calendar, with the understanding that the measure be taken up at some early date in the next session."

It is now a very late date—"in the next session."

The leaders are planning to get Congress out of Washington.

Senator BARKLEY, when are you going to make good on your promise to the Senate?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JESSE P. WOLCOTT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES W. MOTT, OF OREGON

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the gentleman from Oregon, Hon. JAMES W. MOTT, at the twenty-sixth annual meeting of the American Association of State Highway Officials, at Seattle, Wash., on September 17, 1940:

Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure to me to meet members of the American Association of State Highway Officials and to talk to them. I have met you before in convention and have watched you formulate your policies. I have met many of you when you have appeared as witnesses before our Committee on Roads of the House of Representatives, where you have so often given us the benefit of your experience and your opinions on road matters. I know of no organization whose membership through the years has been more uniformly high in character, more devoted to the national interest, or more abundantly equipped, through knowledge and experience in its own field of endeavor, to make its efforts effective. And so, I feel very highly honored indeed by your invitation to attend this convention over which, by the way, a most distinguished citizen of my State, the Honorable Henry F. Cabell, presides as chairman and retiring president, and I am happy to have the privilege of addressing you briefly upon a subject which, I am sure, is of mutual interest to your association and to the Congress, as well as to the country.

Highways in their relation to the national defense is a subject to which your association and the Congress, particularly the Roads Committees, have already given considerable preliminary study, and we are all awaiting with a great deal of interest the comprehensive report which our good friend, Tom McDonald, Commissioner of Public Roads, will soon make to us on the survey he has been conducting in collaboration with the War Department and the State highway departments.

It is not my purpose to discuss this problem from all of its angles. I wish to confine my remarks on the subject to the legislative angle of it, first, because that is the only angle from which I can approach it with any degree of experience or authority and, second, because it is the only angle with which, officially, I can have anything to do. No legislation on this subject has, of course, as yet been formulated, but that it will be within the very near future, I think there can be no doubt.

At the outset let me express the hope that in our desire to bring the road system of the United States as rapidly as possible to a point where it will meet the needs of the national defense, we may approach the problem in a sane, sensible, and deliberate manner, and that we may be able to avoid the confusion and uncertainty which has accompanied our efforts in some of the other phases of the defense program.

We must try to avoid such confusion, for example, as that which followed the recent announcement that the size of the Army was to be doubled, its mechanized equipment trebled, and its air force quadrupled. That situation was and still is very serious and very unfortunate. I believe we can avoid that in the highway phase of the defense program, and the reason I believe it is because in the building of roads, unlike the building of guns, tanks, and airplanes on a vastly expanded scale, we already have a highly efficient, a long-established, and a thoroughly experienced road-building organization in the United States.

I use the word "organization" in a very broad sense. The road-building organization of this country consists of the several State highway departments, the Public Roads Administration, the Congress of the United States, and the thousands of manufacturers, materialmen, contractors, and their employees, who for 20 years have been functioning every day in a field of activity in which they are experts, and which is capable of immediate and orderly expansion. Moreover, this organization has been functioning during all of that period under a definite legislative plan and policy which has remained basically unchanged and with which the whole organization is thoroughly familiar.

Organization is the important factor in every phase of the defense program. Where we have had it the program has proceeded without serious difficulty. Where it has been lacking, confusion, delay, criticism, and controversy have been the rule. I might illustrate this by citing the remarkable record which the Navy is making in its part of the defense program. The Navy is being expanded, implemented, and modernized upon a scale never before undertaken by any nation, and when the program is completed the United States will have a Navy larger than that of any other two nations combined. The program was commenced immediately upon the passage of the expansion bill, and today the 200 new ships authorized by that bill are now actually on the ways or under contract.

The organization of the Navy is comprised of the Chiefs of Bureaus, who are the planning heads, the Congress, which, through it Naval Affairs Committees, determines the policy, and vast shipbuilding and manufacturing establishments of all kinds, which do the work. It is an organization of experts, which, like the road-building organization, has been long established and continuously operating, with the fullest harmony and cooperation among all of its diversified activities and with the complete confidence of the Congress.

There is a certain parallel between the Roads Committee and the Naval Affairs Committee in the House and also between the two organizations with which these committees work. I happen to be a member of both committees. They both get results in much the same way, and I believe that is largely due to the fact that both have experienced organizations with which to cooperate. I have thought it may be of interest to you to note this, since the road builders, like the builders of ships, are soon to become, we hope, a very important part of the defense establishment.

Now what is the highway problem in its relation to national defense? Let us see first what the picture is at present. Let us then examine what needs to be done to make the highway system an integral part of the defense system. And finally, and that is the phase of it with which, as a member of the Roads Committee, I am most directly concerned, let us inquire by what method and under what jurisdiction and supervision this is to be accomplished.

You are all aware, of course, that while our present highway system is inadequate to meet the needs of modern national defense, it is as a whole by no means in the impossible situation that some have supposed it to be. A part of it is, to be sure, but most of it is not. It is true that, as yet, we have only one Pennsylvania Turnpike. It is true, also, that we have not, as some of the dictator nations have done, built a series of purely Federal highways for purely military purposes; but, nevertheless, we do have an existing highway system which, for average excellence of engineering and construction, for natural strategic value of its location and for its total length in miles, far surpasses any national highway system in the world. And it is upon the basis of that existing system that we should build and improve and extend and expand until every main highway, including every bridge upon those highways, has been brought up to the standard which the War Department has already set for them.

This, rather than the fantastic schemes which some have proposed, such as building a parallel series of Federal superhighways from the Atlantic to the Pacific and another series from Canada to Mexico, is the sane, sensible, and practicable way to proceed. Let us proceed as rapidly as we possibly can. But in proceeding let us not depart any further than may be absolutely necessary from the fundamental procedure, the basic policy, and the presently vested jurisdiction and authority in road matters which in the past have enabled us to reach our present status in the orderly development of a national highway system.

Some 20 years ago the War Department undertook a study of the strategic highway needs of the Nation and in 1922, after a detailed survey of all the principal roads, the Department made a report. It was accompanied by a map, which is sometimes referred to as the "Pershing map," and upon which all main highways were shown and classified with respect to their relative military importance. That report and map have remained the basis of all subsequent study of this question.

The problem of the War Department was, first, to determine and recommend what kind of roads we should have in order to get the Army from one strategic place to another with the greatest safety, the least inconvenience to the public, and in the shortest possible time, and, second, to determine where these highways should be located. The Department did not confine its study simply to the improvement of the then existing highway system. On the contrary it could have recommended, and it would have done so had it deemed it to be in the interest of the national defense, that in the building of new roads new locations should be found.

It is a remarkable fact, however, and a lasting tribute both to the pioneers who laid out the first roads and to the great road building organization which has since developed the system, that the War Department found, in respect to location, that the highway system as it then existed was ideally suited to the needs of the national defense; and although every year since that time the Pershing map has been revised and brought up to date, the general location of the highways on it remain the same. Not only this, but the relative importance of the various highways from the military angle is practically the same on the Pershing map of 1940 as on the map of 1920. So far, then, as any drastic changes in location are concerned, the highway defense program presents no very serious problem.

It is not my intention here to go into detail as to the various recommendations of the War Department. You are as familiar with them as I am and, I dare say, more so, because every road-building program that your State highway departments have planned during the past several years has had to be submitted to the War Department for its approval. And so, although military needs in road building have become steadily greater and the requirements higher, all of the main highways that you have built in recent years have met the requirements which the War Department had set for them at the time the construction of those highways was undertaken. I mention this for the purpose of reminding you that in the construction of highways for national defense you already have a very good start, even though it may be only a start.

Let us now review very briefly what, according to the War Department, is required to bring the existing system up to military standards. There are 75,000 miles of main highways joining strategically important points and vital areas throughout the United States, and there are approximately 3,000 miles of road in and adjacent to military reservations which the War Department considers important as military concentration points, as well as roads adjacent to naval bases, airports, naval training stations, and supply depots. With the exception of roads in military and naval reservations, these are all State roads. And I think it is important in considering any program for improving and expanding our highway system so as to meet the needs of national defense to keep constantly in mind the fact that these highways are State highways, under the exclusive control and jurisdiction of the States. We should be careful to see to it that they remain so. We should permit nothing to happen in connection with this program which might impair or abridge that State control and jurisdiction.

In this 75,000 miles of strategically important highways there are some 20,000 miles which do not meet the present requirements of the War Department. This amount of substandard mileage is deficient in various respects and in varying degrees. Some of it is too narrow, some of it is too crooked, some of it is too steep, some of it is encumbered by railroad grade crossings and highway crossings. Some of it is obsolete in design and engineering. Some of it is too light in construction to sustain the weight of tanks and artillery. Some of it passes through congested towns and villages so that the progress of the Army would be impeded and civilian activities unduly interrupted. Some of it runs through populous areas and includes in its route the streets of great cities—a situation which is incompatible with efficient military use. On these 75,000 miles of highway there are also more than 2,000 bridges which must either be replaced or rebuilt. There are a great many other deficiencies in this substandard portion of our highway system which will readily occur to you as you visualize the picture.

Obviously, our first and most important problem in highway building for national defense is to correct these deficiencies as fast as we can; and in correcting them, of course, those portions of highway which are of greatest strategic value and most in need of reconstruction should have priority, because, unfortunately, we cannot do all of this work at once.

It is not my intention to single cut examples of main highways which are in crying need of reconstruction or improvement, but since at this moment we are meeting on the Pacific coast in a city located at a strategic point on one of the most strategic highways in the United States—the Pacific Highway, U S. 99—I think it would not be out of place to remind you that if war should occur tomorrow, a war involving large concentration of troops on the west coast, it would be a military impossibility to move an army with its tanks, artillery, supply trucks, and other equipment, over this highway from San Francisco to Seattle, because the road contains a series of bottlenecks which, if not eliminated through replacement or very drastic reconstruction, may be fatal to our chance of military success.

I hope while you are all here you may have an opportunity to drive over the Pacific highway from Seattle to San Francisco, and particularly that part of it between Eugene and a point somewhat south of Grants Pass in Oregon. There you will see one of the most glaring examples in the United States of a highway designated by the War Department as one of primary military importance and which is wholly inadequate to the needs of national defense. You will see a road which no modern army could negotiate. There are examples like this in strategic locations in nearly every other section of the country, which the States, through their regular Federal-aid highway programs alone cannot remedy for many years without seriously impeding development of other important highways in other parts of these States. These are the particular stretches of highway which, on account of their primary military importance and their present deplorable condition, should have the immediate consideration of the Congress, the War Department, the Public Roads Administration, and the highway departments of the several States in any program for the development of our highway system into a system of national defense.

The question, then, of what ought to be done seems rather clear. The problem is how are we going to do it? It is obvious we cannot do it entirely on the basis of our present Federal-aid road-building policy; but, as I have said before, in bringing the road system rapidly up to the standards required for national defense we should depart no further from that policy than may be absolutely necessary. At the risk of repetition let me say that all of these roads are still State roads and that they have been built and paid for out of revenue from State and Federal gasoline and other automotive taxes which have been levied exclusively on the road users. And in this respect let me remind you that there is no particular difference, so far as the burden upon the road user is concerned, between the State and Federal tax. They both come out of the same pocket; that is, the pocket of the man who uses the road, and no one else.

Now, since the States must by all means retain control and jurisdiction of these roads they should, I believe, contribute something toward this new highway defense program; for, no matter how valuable the improved highway system may be to the Federal Government for defense purposes, the States will have the full benefit of that increased value for general road purposes. Therefore, the States should help in some degree to pay for it.

It is difficult in advance of thorough consideration by the Congress of legislation on this subject to say what a proper distribution of the cost should be, but my present view is that under the new defense program, which should be distinct from and in addition to the regular Federal-aid program, the Government should contribute by far the major portion of it—I should say not less than 75 percent of the cost and, perhaps, as much as 80 or 85 percent instead of the 50–50 contribution which obtains under existing law. There are a number of sound reasons for this. One of them is that if the States were required to contribute more than 15, 20, or 25 percent for this huge amount of additional roadwork their financial ability to carry on their regular Federal-aid highway programs might be seriously impaired, if not halted altogether.

This division of costs, I think, should apply only on Federal-aid highways which are to be brought up to military standard. As to roads within military and naval reservations, obviously, the Government should bear the entire expense. That should be the case also with connecting roads adjacent to the reservations, the construction or improvement of which is necessitated solely by military considerations.

The question still remains where is this money to come from, and that question becomes one of exceeding importance when it is considered that the estimated cost of bringing our present road system up to the requirements of national defense will be in excess of a billion dollars.

I do not know how others may view the matter but it is my considered judgment that if the entire revenue collected by both the States and the Federal Government from the road users, through gasoline and other automotive sales taxes, were used solely for the purpose of road building the problem would not be difficult of solution.

The States for the most part do use their gasoline-tax revenues exclusively for road-building purposes, but the Federal Government has never done this. The Federal Government, ever since it began collecting Federal gasoline taxes, has insisted upon diverting a large part of this revenue for purposes other than highway construction. It has done this in the face of public opinion and in spite of the fact that it has no moral right to levy a special tax upon one class of its citizens and then spend the revenue from that tax for general governmental purposes. It has a legal right to do this, of course, but I contend the practice cannot be justified in equity and good conscience, and I contend further that we will never be able to solve our highway problem, either from the angle of ordinary peacetime needs or from the angle of national defense until we put a stop to this pernicious practice.

This is not a new position, so far as I am concerned, and it is not new so far as you are concerned. When I was appointed to membership on the House Committee on Roads 7 years ago I stated my position on this question as soon as the first road bill in which I had the privilege of participating came up for consideration. I have repeated that position and have made it a matter of record in the consideration of every other road bill since that time. I stated then, and I repeat now, that if I am ever placed in position to make my policy in this regard the policy of the Roads Committee of the House I intend to take full advantage of that opportunity. And, I say, further, that in event that time should come the Roads Committee of the House will not permit views of the executive branch of the Government to interfere with the legitimate jurisdiction of the committee to decide upon highway policy and legislation, including the annual amounts of Federal funds to be authorized for road building.

The Federal Government collects each year in sales and excise taxes levied exclusively upon the road users of the several States more than $350,000,000. It expends annually in aid to the States for road building only a little more than half that amount. Its diversion of road-tax revenue to other purposes of Government now amounts to more than $150,000,000 a year. This has been going on for 17 years, and the total diversion has amounted to nearly $2,000,000,000. If, during those 17 years, the Federal Government had spent upon road building as much money as it has collected in special taxes from the road users, the national-highway system today would meet every requirement which the War Department has set for it. And when this diversion has been stopped, and when the whole of Federal road-tax revenue is expended on roads, the major part of the financial problem involved in the highway-defense program will be solved.

Here, then, it seems to me are the principal things we should consider in formulating legislation to bring the national-highway system to national-defense standards, and to make it an integral part of the national-defense system:

First of all, we should have a special bill for this special purpose of highway building for defense. This should be in addition to the regular biannual Federal highway bills, the last of which was signed by the President a few days ago, and which carried an authorization of $163,500,000 per year for the next 2 years. It should be introduced, thoroughly considered, and passed as soon as possible.

Please note that I have said this should be additional legislation. There must be no attempt on the part of the Federal Works Agency to divert any of the money authorized under existing road law for the purpose of commencing this new highway-defense program. I mention this particularly at this time because during the last few days fear has been expressed by some that under section 19 of the 1940 road bill it may be possible for the Commissioner of Public Roads to compel the use of unobligated funds already apportioned to the States, and which by law belong to the States, for the purpose of financing the new defense-highway program. Section 19, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the entire Roads Committee of the House, does not permit of any such interpretation. I am convinced the Commissioner of Public Roads agrees that it does not, and I trust he will take occasion here to assure your association that he does not intend to try to place any such interpretation upon it.

The bill should authorize an amount of money sufficient to make a definite start on the solution of our problem, and it should be followed each year with a similar bill, so that the whole program may be completed as early as possible.

The basic principle of the existing Federal Highway Act should be retained, and should be deviated from only in respect to the division of costs between the States and the Federal Government, so that the major portion of the cost may be borne by the Government.

The formula of allotments of Federal aid money to the States under this new and separate program should be changed only to the extent necessary to give due and proper consideration to the new factors involved, the principal ones of which are, first, the total mileage in each State of highways of primary military importance which are now classified as substandard, and, second, the urgency of the need in each State, from the military angle, of bringing those roads up to standard.

Legislation of this kind will necessarily involve the granting of some discretion to a central authority in the matter of deciding upon priorities, but here again, that discretion should be as limited as the circumstances of the situation will permit.

With a law based broadly upon these main considerations, and with a willingness upon the part of the Federal Government to expend at least as much money for road building as it collects in special road taxes, together with whatever additional amounts may be necessary solely in the interests of national defense, I think we can solve the problem.

And so, Mr. Chairman, for myself and in behalf of my colleagues of the Roads Committee of the House, may I take this occasion to pledge to you and to your successors, and to the members of your association in all the States, our most earnest endeavor to find the best legislative solution we can to the problem of building highways for national defense—to find it as quickly as we can and to get the program for it under way. And in our efforts to do this I want to assure you that we will all be encouraged and strengthened by the knowledge that we have the full cooperation and the wholehearted support of your energetic, efficient, and patriotic organization, whose record from the beginning has exemplified the highest ideals and the great accomplishment in road building—the American Association of State High Officials.

Status of Employees of State Soldiers' Homes Under the Hatch Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS H. CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 23, 1940

LETTER FROM CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from the Civil Service Commission:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., September 20, 1940.

Hon. FRANCIS CASE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CASE: Some time ago you wrote to the Attorney General requesting an opinion as to whether or not the Hatch law is to be interpreted to apply to employe s of the South Dakota Soldiers' Home. Your communication was referred to the Civil Service Commission for attention.

We have looked into the status of this agency and find that pursuant to the statute of August 27, 1888 (24 U. S. C. 134), as amended, the Veterans' Administration shares the maintenance of soldiers' homes operated by States and Territories. Funds are included in the regular Veterans' Administration Appropriations Act. These funds are paid by Government checks to the fiscal agent designated by the State to receive such funds. On the basis of the information disclosed it appears that the maintenance and operation of these homes is clearly an activity financed in part from Federal funds. Accordingly it is the opinion of the Commission that employees of the South Dakota Soldiers' Home are subject to the provisions of the Hatch law.

By direction of the Commission.

Very respectfully,

WM. C. HULL,
Executive Assistant.

The United States Is a Republic, Not a Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 23, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from the New York Times of September 23, 1940:

[From the New York Times of September 23, 1940]

REPUBLIC OR DEMOCRACY?—WE DID BETTER, IT IS HELD, WHEN WE THOUGHT OF OURSELVES AS THE FORMER

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

I am a little surprised at your editorial in this morning's issue entitled "We, the People," in which you quote me as saying, "It is time to brush aside this word 'democracy' with its connotations."

The editorial fails to quote my next sentence, "It is time to return to the conception of the republic—a conception so clear that all can understand."

It seems to me that your editorial writer must have read somewhat hastily the account of my talk in your issue of September 20.

The editorial says: "If he was trying to draw a logical distinction between republican and democratic forms of government, he may have had some logic on his side."

A fair reading of my speech makes it clear, I think, that I was commenting on the fact that till very recent years we always thought of ourselves as a republic, but that since then, under what I think is studied propaganda, the word "democracy" has slipped into its place.

THE ADDRESS QUOTED

In view of your editorial, may I ask you to print exactly what I did say on the subject in my September 19 address?

"I wonder sometimes if one of the causes of our troubles today does not arise from the fact that we have been overdrilled into believing we are a democracy. This, too, may be one of the latest 'insidious wiles of foreign influence.'

"In the Constitutional Convention of 1787 pure democracy was rejected and the republican form of government was adopted in its place. Neither the Declaration of Independence nor the Federal Constitution contains any mention of democracy—the Constitution does guarantee to each State a republican form of government. Few State papers of the first 125 years of our national existence even contained the word democracy. Julia Ward Howe did not write the Battle Hymn of Democracy. The Nation was almost always spoken of as a republic. Woodrow Wilson, it is true, said we entered the Great War to make the world safe for democracy. But after his administration the word was largely dropped.

"It is only during the past 5 or 6 years that we have heard much about it. Governor Lehman found it unnecessary to use the word a single time in his inaugural address in either 1933 or 1935. But in his address of 1939 he used it 25 times. And in his annual message to the legislature last January he used it no less than 33 times.

"So far as I can see, the great impetus to the use of this word appeared after the meeting of the Communist International in 1935. From then on the Communist line has been to speak of the great 'democracies'—England, France, the United States, and Soviet Russia. I suspect that it was through the powerful influence of the Communist International, having groups in nearly every civilized country and with ramifications extending into unnumbered 'liberal' groups, that this word became substituted almost entirely for the word republic.

"It is time to brush aside this word with its connotations. It is time to return to the conception of the republic—a conception so clear that all can understand."

PUBLIC SPENDING RESTRAINED

It is interesting to note that when we styled ourselves a republic we kept our public spending and debt within reason. We gave private enterprise a real chance to serve the people; we had a higher and more widespread sense of individual responsibility. The people realized that they had duties as well as rights. It was as a republic that we built up the highest standard of living in the world.

But since the word democracy came into use, and the word republic has been almost discarded, we have run wild in public spending and in regimenting our private enterprise. Class distinctions have come into existence. Envy and hatred have been stirred up. Per capita American income—even before taxes—has never returned to the level attained when our conception was of a republic. In the general muddle of permitting ourselves to be classed with certain other countries as democracies, rather than standing out by ourselves as the great Republic of the West, we have permitted Communist, Nazi, and other alien infiltration. The American way of life has been diluted with internationalism.

Perhaps all this is just a coincidence. But I doubt it.

In my Union League speech I said in closing: "Our only hope is to stage a great revival of Americanism, to build for defense, to put our domestic house in order, and to keep out of this war."

Good Will Rather Than Class Hatred

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. McLEOD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE DETROIT JEWISH CHRONICLE

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks I include the following article, entitled "Nazi Revival of Yellow Badge," by Mr. Philip Slomovitz, distinguished writer and editor, which appeared in the Detroit Jewish Chronicle of September 13.

This article portrays the necessity of spreading good will among our fellow men rather than encouraging the class hatred which has been springing up, particularly in the last few years.

[From the Detroit Jewish Chronicle of September 13, 1940]

PURELY COMMENTARY—NAZI REVIVAL OF YELLOW BADGE

(By Philip Slomovitz)

Revival by the Nazis of the yellow badge to be worn by Jews and the effort to introduce it as a symbol of shame in conquered lands is cause for reviewing the history of this mark of degradation. The information that came from Antwerp that the non-Jews of the community protested against the introduction of this badge by wearing it as a mark of sympathy with the Jews is of great interest. This action helped to thwart the Nazi scheme in the Dutch community.

In a recent issue of the Catholic World, edited by the Reverend James M. Gillis, Miss Dorothy Penn wrote an article on the "rota" worn by the Jew in the Middle Ages, in which she reviewed in interesting fashion the history of the yellow badge. In the course of her article, in which she made several references to Dr. Solomon Grayzel's The Church and the Jews in the Thirteenth Century, Miss Penn wrote:

"It is said that the origin of the idea of separating believers from nonbelievers by special dress for the latter originated with the Mohammedan Calif Omar in the year 634, when he ordered that in his kingdom unbelievers should wear different headgear and girdle, and a patch on their outer garment on the shoulder—Jews a yellow one, Christians blue, and Magi black. This custom spread through all Islamic lands. In the ninth century in Sicily the Mohammedans made the Jew wear a white symbol with the image of a monkey, and the Christian one with the image of a pig. The same images were affixed to the houses of Jew and Christian. (This fact is quoted from Dr. Grayzel's book.)

"In Christian Europe as early as 1204 we find Pope Innocent suggesting some distinguishing mark for Jew and Saracen. At the famous Lateran Council (1215) it was first officially established that 'Jews and Saracens must be distinguished from Christians by a difference in their clothes.' The reasons given were several: To prevent Christians by mistake having relations with Jewish and Saracen women; that Moses had commanded the Jews to wear dress different from gentile; that otherwise the Jew had a too aristocratic appearance.

"It seems the enforcement of the decree and the details of the insignia were left to local kingdoms and communes. In the diocese of Paris and in France in general the ruling was probably first carried out. A passage from 'Or Saura' of R. Isaac ben Moses, a Jew of Vienna, tells us: 'And when I, the author, was in France, we used to wear round signs (wheels) upon the clothes, for thus it was decreed against the Jews at that time. * * * Some used to sew them into the garment. * * * Others used to make a circle from parchment and attach it to the garment * * *.' This was in Paris about 1217, a little over a year after the Lateran Council decree.

"In general this sign was known as the 'rota,' or wheel, or disk. The insignia were made by the civil authorities and sold to the Jews much as bicycle or auto tags are sold today. This wheel had to be worn by Jews of both sexes, boys of 13 or over, girls of 11 or over.

"The accepted form of this badge came to be a circle of yellow felt, about a palm's width in diameter, sewed on the outer dress, over the left breast or near the left shoulder. Sometimes this disk was half red, half white. Ulysee Robert, French scholar of the last century, sees in this round badge the symbol of the piece of money paid to Judas, or simply a symbol of gold (money) always associated with the Jew. Yellow paint, too, was put on the houses of insolvent debtors in the Middle Ages. To explain the use of a badge half red, half white, Robert points to a medieval legend, very popular and often heard when antisemitic feeling ran high. A Jew is supposed to have stolen one of the consecrated wafers, and as he ran carrying the white host, drops of red blood were seen to come out of it. Hence the red and white badge.

"Naturally the Jews sought to prevent the enactment of such decrees, even going so far as to send representatives to the Pope. When such measures failed, they depended on economic pressure. This latter recourse worked well in Spain where Jews could migrate to Moorish lands, taking their money and trade, and so indirectly aid the Moslem enemies of Spain. In France and Germany the use of economic threat does not seem to have been so effective in mitigating the enforcement of the decree. Charles V is recorded to have permitted the Jews to omit the badge when traveling. The insignia seems to have dropped out of use in the fifteenth century."

Now, in the twentieth century, this nasty symbol of the Middle Ages is being revived again. It is difficult to imagine that enlightened Christian peoples, knowing that the early Christians, too, were subjected to such humiliation, just as Christians were the first to suffer from the ritual-murder libel, later using the libel themselves against the Jews—should tolerate it.

It is interesting to make note of the fact that the sale and distribution of the yellow badges was a matter of business with the states in the Middle Ages. Nevertheless, it was the Jew who was branded as being always associated with gold and money.

Another important fact, in relation to the "badge of shame," will be of interest at this time. Writing in the year 1645, John Evelyn stated: "The Jews in Rome wore red hats, till a Cardinal of Lyons, being shortsighted, lately saluted one of them, thinking him to be a Cardinal as he passed by his coach; on which an order was made that they should use only the yellow color." This anecdote, which is a historical fact, ought to open the eyes of clear-thinking men and women on the question of imposing badges of shame upon a group of people living in their midst. It ought to prove the ridiculousness of spreading hatred among men, instead of encouraging a feeling of good will. There were times—and we have recorded incidents to prove them—when Popes stopped their coaches to chat with the Jews. We have instances in our own times of honest men and women in Antwerp pinning a yellow patch on their clothes in order to register protest against indignities heaped upon a persecuted Jewish minority. Let this be a lesson for Christians who are abusing their faith. True religion does not know and never should know hatred. Nazi-ism which tries to impose bigotry upon friendly peoples is the very antithesis of true religious faith.

Transportation of American Commodities to Foreign Markets

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter addressed by me on September 19, 1940, to the chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Hon. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND. In connection therewith I offer the following brief explanation.

On August 28, 1940, Admiral E. S. Land, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, expressed at length his views and recommendations with respect to H. R. 10092, a bill now before the said committee for consideration, the object and purposes of which are stated in my letter hereafter appearing. As the letter written by Admiral Land to the chairman of the committee was, in my judgment, a brief in opposition to H. R. 10092, and as it has a place in the record of the hearing held by the committee on the proposed legislation, I felt that its statements should not go unanswered and unchallenged. I, therefore, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries a letter, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 19, 1940.

Hon. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND,

Chairman, Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: On August 1, 1940, a hearing, over which, as chairman, you presided, was held by the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries on H. R. 10092, a bill introduced in the House of Representatives by the writer on June 14, 1940. H. R. 10092 has as its object the authorization and direction of the United States Maritime Commission to recondition as speedily as possible and to charter, sell, or operate vessels of the so-called laid-up fleet for the transportation of coal, lumber, wheat, and other basic American-produced commodities to foreign countries. The bill would authorize the appropriation of $10,000,000 to carry out the purpose of the act.

At the committee hearing the author of the bill, together with a number of witnesses favoring its enactment, as well as parties opposing the measure, appeared and presented their views. Such appearances, together with the evidence presented, statements made, and exhibits filed, were recorded at the time and are shown in the record of the hearings, to which reference is had.

There was no appearance at this hearing, nor at any other time so far as the writer is advised, of any representative of the Maritime Commission, nor was there at any time filed as part of the record of the hearing any statement or presentation of any character of the views of the Maritime Commission as to the merits or demerits of the proposed legislation.

Recently, however, through your courtesy, I have been furnished with a copy of a letter addressed to you as chairman of the committee by Admiral E. S. Land, Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, under date of August 28, 1940. This letter is not, either in form or substance, a report from a Government agency created and established for unbiased and unprejudiced public service, but, surprisingly, the letter so addressed to you by Admiral Land presents at length his personal views upon the proposed legislation, his criticism of the wording of the proposal, a review of prior legislation enacted by Congress of a similar character and alleged results therefrom, a discussion of certain policies of the Maritime Commission, a statement with reference to the present condition of the laid-up fleet, unsubstantiated estimates of the cost of reconditioning the vessels under the terms of the proposed act, the Chairman's understanding of certain policies of the Government, and his expressed judgment to the effect that the proposed measure was generally unfit as a remedy for any ills complained of by the producers and shippers of American basic commodities. The letter is in fact a brief in opposition to the proposed legislation. I shall, however, in this reply, for the purpose of identification, designate the admiral's letter as the admiral's report. The report concludes with the following language:

"In view of all the foregoing the Commission does not recommend the enactment of H. R. 10092.

"This report has been submitted to the Director of the Budget, in accordance with the usual procedure, and he has advised that there would be no objection to the submission of this report to the committee, and that the proposed legislation is not in accord with the program of the President."

With your permission, and as we have no statement in the record from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, I will defer until later any comment upon the statement in the report that "the Director of the Bureau of the Budget * * * has advised * * * that the proposed legislation is not in accord with the program of the President." At the instant, however, and in view of the statement by Admiral Land that "the Commission does not recommend the enactment of the legislation," I wish—again with your permission—to address myself to the not-so-difficult task of answering that part of the Admiral's statement which is argument and correcting that part wherein there are manifest errors of fact.

The Chairman of the Maritime Commission would seem to misconstrue the intent and purpose of the legislation proposed by the terms of H. R. 10092. Here and now I definitely assert that it is not the purpose of the bill, nor the desire of the author, to deprive the Maritime Commission of any power or authority already delegated to it. Neither is it the intent to place upon the Commission any additional burdens. I cannot, however, but recognize the attitude of disinclination upon the part of the Chairman of the Commission to undertake the task that the passage of the proposed measure would naturally assign to the Commission—a task that is neither new nor beyond the scope of the Commission's duty, and an attitude making congressional action imperative.

I shall not here attempt any restatement of the argument and evidence heretofore presented to the committee in support of the legislation proposed by the measure now under discussion. Evidence of the need for additional transportation facilities for the carriage to foreign markets in bulk of such basic American-produced commodities as coal, lumber, wheat, and other necessities was submitted at the hearing, appears in the record, and is not disputed. There is, therefore, not before us the question of the desirability or necessity of establishing facilities for the transportation of such commodities, but the question to be determined is whether or not the legislation proposed by H. R. 10092 is the best, or even a feasible method of accomplishing the desired end. The Maritime Commission, through its Chairman as spokesman, objects to our proposal, not, as I understand it, because the need for additional transportation facilities for bulk cargoes has not been established, but because the Maritime Commission feels that it is not feasible to build up these additional transportation facilities through the instrumentality of the Commission. Therefore the Commission, through its Chairman, objects to being burdened with the task of reconditioning the vessels that are now lying idle and with the duty of either chartering or operating these ships for carriage to foreign ports of the basic commodities mentioned in the bill. May I be pardoned for saying that, in my judgment, Admiral Land, in his letter (or report) to the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, fails to sustain his position, either by his statement of alleged facts or his argument.

It would seem that one of the admiral's objections to the enactment of the proposed legislation is that the Maritime Commission already has authority to recondition and operate vessels under its control, including the vessels of the laid-up fleet, at which this legislation is directed. The admiral cites section 702 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 and other acts of Congress (see p. 2 of report of Admiral Land as authority for this statement). This is undoubtedly true, yet it can hardly serve as argument against H. R. 10092, for this latter measure is designed not only to authorize the Commission to recondition and operate these ships, but it also directs such reconditioning and operation. That such mandatory provision is necessary is fully disclosed elsewhere in the admiral's report (as well as by oral statements of the Chairman made in the presence of witnesses) that both the Chairman as well as the Commission are definitely opposed to operating the vessels and will not operate them unless required to do so by congressional action.

Throughout this entire discussion it has been made apparent that the Maritime Commission entertains the idea that the laid-up vessels can be chartered just as they are, imposing upon the charterers the burden of reconditioning. It is the contention of the proponents of the measure under discussion that such a plan is hopeless. I also point out that recent events have proven the utter unwisdom of the idea that charters can be obtained for vessels that must be reconditioned at the charterers' expense, especially when the cost of reconditioning is figured in accordance with the estimates of Admiral Land. On page 3 of the admiral's report, where he discusses the laid-up fleet, he mentions six vessels as being "allocated for charter 'as is'" for intercoastal service. My latest advice is to the effect that in response to invitation by the Commission for bids on the six vessels mentioned by Admiral Land, no bids were received.

Also on page 3 of his report, the admiral refers to the fact that commercial shipyards are filled with national-defense work and that reconditioning of the vessels under discussion would strain the facilities of these yards. This is a complete reversal of the statement made by Admiral Land and several representatives of the Maritime Commission to this writer in the presence of a number of witnesses on the occasion of a more or less recent interview at which this matter was discussed. On that occasion the admiral stated that shippers would have no difficulty in obtaining drydocks for reconditioning these boats, if they would take them "as is." The Chairman then emphatically indicated that shipyard facilities were quite sufficient to recondition the vessels. It is obvious that if the statement now made in Admiral Land's report is true and reflects the actual present situation, and if drydock facilities are not available to the Commission, they certainly would not be available to private interests. How then can Admiral Land hope to now induce private interests to charter "as is" the unreconditioned ships?

Admiral Land in his report (see p. 3) complains that "the immediate effect of H. R. 10092 would be to substitute for the Commission's discretionary authority to recondition its vessels, a mandatory direction that it do so as rapidly as possible." He also complains that the measure would impose mandatory Government operation. He, therefore, concludes that these mandatory sections would interfere with certain defense measures undertaken by the Commission. I have already briefly pointed out the necessity for a mandatory requirement. Discretionary authority is of no possible use unless exercised. It is true that H. R. 10092 does contain a mandate that the Commission operate such vessels in the laid-up fleet "which have not been sold or chartered or contracted to be sold or chartered." I do not see how any possible interpretation could be put on this language, to the effect that vessels which the Commission has undertaken to recondition and allocate for national-defense purposes or earmarked for other governmental use would be diverted from such assignment. If, however, in the opinion of the committee, the present language of the bill is not sufficiently clear, the paragraph can certainly be amended to clarify its meaning. There has been no statement put into the record nor made by any proponents of the bill as to the actual number of vessels that might be required nor has there been any statement offered by the Maritime Commission as to the number of the ships that will be needed for national-defense purposes. The adjustment of these questions would present no difficulty whatever.

In other paragraphs of the report the admiral points out that coal, one of the commodities to be served by the proposed legislation, is principally a tramp movement and that shipments of coal on liners is an exception rather than the rule, because, among other things, it shuts out regular and more lucrative cargo. Granting, for the sake of argument, that this is true, it leaves the shipment of coal and the building up of foreign markets therefor entirely at the mercy of tramp steamers, but few of which operate under the American flag. It is this difficulty in the matter of having liners or American vessels take coal, as stated in the admiral's report, that makes it necessary to request Congress to recondition the laid-up fleet, thus providing facilities for such shipments.

The following statement made by Admiral Land is certainly enlightening. He says "the transportation overseas of American bulk commodities in shipload lots is practically confined to vessels under foreign registry." It seems to me that no better argument for the passage of the proposed legislation could be advanced. I submit that the quoted statement is a frank admission that our Government is not looking out for its foreign trade through construction and maintenance of adequate shipping facilities.

I also desire to call particular attention to the paragraphs in the admiral's report immediately following the one in which the above-quoted statement occurs. If the admiral is correct in his statements with reference to the movement of bulk commodities, he proves the necessity for having an American tramp service available to American bulk commodity shippers, as they are at present dependent entirely on foreign-flag vessels. It is my judgment that unemployment of idle seamen could have been cut to a minimum had Congress long since set aside funds to recondition and operate a number of these laid-up vessels. Instead of placing unemployed men on direct relief or allowing them to remain idle, it would have been much better to have placed these ships in commission for the movement of bulk cargoes, furnishing employment to seamen and facilities for shippers, even at a sacrifice of profit.

The admiral refers to construction and operating subsidies granted in order to equalize the ships under United States registry and those under foreign flags. He states that this policy does not favor the export of certain commodities over others. One of the commodities in which I am particularly interested is bituminous coal. None of the boats benefited by the subsidies are available for loading coal for overseas or South American movements. Thus coal is still at the mercy of tramp steamers, predominantly flying foreign flags, and there is no equalizing factor in connection with the coal movement, because there are few, if any, American tramp steamers. This, therefore, is certainly discrimination against coal, a basic commodity and a foundation of one of America's greatest industries.

The admiral stresses the desire of the Commission, its policy and accomplishment in the matter of taking the Government out of the business of ship operation. This attitude and policy on the part of the Commission would, in my judgment, be more praiseworthy and commendable if applied to a business in which the demand for service was adequately, or even to a reasonable extent, met by a private enterprise. But when it is shown and admitted that American shipping will not and cannot supply the required facilities, that shippers of bulk cargoes are at the mercy of tramp steamers of foreign registry and that want of transportation denies to American commodities entrance to foreign markets, why should our Maritime Commission so earnestly desire to remove the Government from a field of effort in which no competitive American interests are operating? Why so zealously guard the rights of a private industry that is, to all intents and purposes, nonexistent? It is, in my judgment, incumbent upon Congress, and equally so upon the Maritime Commission, to determine if these boats are needed for carriage of the named basic commodities to foreign ports; and if they are found to be needed they should be made available, regardless of any policy of the Maritime Commission to keep the Government out of ship operation. The operation of vessels by the Maritime Commission is by no means without precedent, a precedent established by the highest authority and which should be followed when demanded by the interests of the American people.

In his report the admiral refers to section 211 (h) of the 1936 act of Congress, by which the Maritime Commission was directed to investigate the advisability of legislation to authorize aids to the producers of certain specified commodities in an emergency. He also refers to section 213 (b) of the same act. For ready reference I quote the acts mentioned:

"SEC. 211 (h). The Commission is authorized and directed to investigate, determine, and keep current records of the advisability of enactment of suitable legislation authorizing the Commission, in an economic or commercial emergency, to aid the farmers and cotton, coal, lumber, and cement producers in any section of the United States in the transportation and landing of their products in any foreign port, which products can be carried in dry-cargo vessels by reducing rates, by supplying additional tonnage to any American operator, or by operation of vessels directly by the Commission, until such time as the Commission shall deem such special rate reduction and operation unnecessary for the benefit of the American farmers and such producers."

"SEC. 213 (b). The Commission shall make studies of and make a report to Congress as soon as practicable on tramp shipping service and the advisability of citizens of the United States participating in such service with vessels under United States registry."

It will be noted that the acts above quoted are mandatory. They "authorize and direct" the Maritime Commission to make certain investigations to determine the advisability of legislation to aid the producers of the very commodities mentioned in H. R. 10092 in the "landing of their products in any foreign port"; and section 213 (b) provides that the Commission "shall" make studies and report to Congress "as soon as practicable" upon the matters in such section mentioned.

The above legislation has been upon the statute books for 4 years, and as evidence that nothing has been accomplished under it I refer to and here quote the concluding sentence of the paragraph of Admiral Land's report, in which he deals with the subject. The admiral says: "Both subjects now (italics mine) are receiving continuous study by the Commission, but on the basis of facts developed to the present time the Commission does not feel justified in recommending to the Congress any material departure from the present policy." This statement is certainly an admission that to date the Commission has not carried out its instructions from Congress. In view of this fact, it is rather surprising that the legislation even merited an allusion.

To sustain his attitude of opposition to this proposed action of the Government for the relief of American producers of basic commodities, the admiral makes reference in his report to a loss allegedly suffered by the Government in the operation some years ago of coal-carrying ships to the Mediterranean and South American ports. He states that 45 voyages were made in this trade, with a resultant loss to the Government of $1,561,000, or an average of $5.11 per ton. This matter was fully covered at the hearing before your committee on H. R. 10092, but the admiral makes no reference to the testimony given at the hearing concerning the off-setting advantages in the way of employment in mines and on railroads, and in other relative and allied industries by the movement of this coal overseas, which appreciably reduced the loss referred to in the report. To include that this experience should preclude any further experiments is to likewise inferentially make the same conclusion with respect to the entire operations of the Maritime Commission, in that, as I am advised, this Bureau is now operating at a deficit.

With further reference to the former experience of the Government in operating ships, it is my understanding that under the conditions set up at that time by the Shipping Board the charterer of a vessel was not permitted to book return cargoes, and in most cases where returned cargoes were negotiated, it was through the Shipping Board or the company who represented the Board. Records are not available to show what loss was encountered on three boats having return cargoes, but the loss on the vessels returned light was from 50 to 60 percent of the figure mentioned in the admiral's report. According to available figures there is only one recorded case where the average cost was $3.12 or above, and that was on seven voyages to Civita Vecchia, which averaged $3.33, and included in this figure is 62 cents maintenance and 40 cents administrative, which is excessive.

It is submitted that the cost of the operation of these vessels for movement of coal about 9 years ago, exclusive of reconditioning cost, should be weighed with respect to the benefits to the individual workers and not to the outlay of funds. If direct relief is a necessary factor in our daily life, then relief through the medium of work is of far greater benefit to our people.

The report of Admiral Land fails to take into consideration conditions prevailing in the world today, whereby Germany controls 70 percent of European coal lands, and if England should be defeated, and we are not prepared to meet this situation, we will have a competitor in South America who will receive all the benefits of the money which our Government contemplates advancing to our southern neighbors. We are now planning to send $500,000,000 into the South American republics. Unless the producers of American commodities are given the opportunity to place these commodities in the South American markets, our half billion of American dollars will cross the Atlantic.

The only other medium through which the exporters of American coal and other commodities can operate and meet the views of the Maritime Commission would be to form a corporation, borrow money from some other Government agency and use it for the reconditioning of the idle vessels owned by the Government. This method is impossible and impracticable, especially so far as the coal industry is concerned. The latter industry has been through a long period of financial loss and consequent embarrassment, and is not in position to put up the necessary funds to go into the shipping business and to meet all requirements and obligations of such new enterprise.

The report of Admiral Land is in many respects misleading. The statement is made that the exports of coal from this country to South American countries have increased enormously since 1938. As a matter of fact, because of lack of shipping facilities, there have never been, and are not today, any "enormous" exports of coal to South America. It is not a true picture of the trade situation to single out any one period of a few months or even an entire year and set forth the happenings of that period. It may be true that at the instant moment or at any one particular time there is and may be a supply of vessels available to carry coal to South America, and it may also be true that some appreciable quantity of coal moved from this country to South America on the high boat rates that obtained during the early part of the present year, but there is a big distinction between the purchase of coal under what we might call compulsion and the purchase of the same commodity through good trade relations and stabilized boat rates. The very fact that South America had to obtain her coal from this country and pay these high boat rates of itself militates against the building up of good and permanent trade relations between this country and the South American republics. We may not hope that our distribution of $500,000,000 in loans to our neighbors of the south will induce them to buy our commodities at a premium. Gratitude may open hearts, but it will not open avenues of trade.

The report of the admiral complains that H. R. 10092 as drafted, applied to vessels other than the laid-up fleet. Further complaint is made that the bill would apply to certain other vessels, such as passenger, refrigerator, and tankers now laid up. There is no objection whatever to the amendment of the bill to meet this criticism. Such amendment can very properly be made in committee before the bill is reported out. I am certainly not concerned with reconditioning refrigerator, passenger, or tank ships and it is certainly beyond the scope of reasoning to construe the bill to require the reconditioning of vessels of this character for the purpose intended or to recondition ships which are not in need of reconditioning.

The report points out that Government money would be risked unnecessarily in the repairing of the vessels, and yet, as pointed out in the hearing before your committee, the Maritime Commission would ask private industry to assume this risk. It is respectfully suggested that private industry should not be asked to assume the burden of building up a Government merchant marine.

The interpretation placed by the admiral's report upon the wording "as rapidly as possible" contained in the bill is not only erroneous; it is surprising. The phrase "as rapidly as possible" is nothing new either in the realm of business or in law. It is certainly not to be assumed that the phrase means that bids must be immediately secured and accepted for the reconditioning of the entire remaining laid-up fleet. The phrase has often been construed as meaning no more immediacy than the words "as soon as practicable," which are found in the initial sentence of section 213 (b) of the present Merchant Marine Act, to which I have heretofore referred. In that section Congress instructed the Maritime Commission to make certain studies and report to Congress as soon as practicable. The act was passed 4 years ago, and so far as I am advised no report has yet been forthcoming. The Commission evidently determined that it was not practicable to sooner report, and had the words in the act been "as rapidly as possible," the Commission could just as easily have determined that it was not possible to sooner report. Notwithstanding this, however, the Commission now assumes to interpret the wording "as rapidly as possible" to mean immediately. I do not think this is a serious question, and believe that I am right in asserting that the legal interpretation of the phrase gives the Commission all necessary latitude in the matter of time.

It is noted that the admiral's report estimates the cost of reconditioning the vessels affected by the proposed legislation at from $200,000 to as high as $500,000 per vessel. Persons familiar with and cognizant of the condition of these vessels have made no such fantastic estimates. It is no doubt true that if the vessels were to be reconditioned in such way as to bring them up to naval requirements, and if their propulsion equipment was renewed, the Commission estimate might possibly be approximately correct, but there is no necessity for such elaborate reconditioning of the vessels for the purpose of transporting coal, lumber, and other basic commodities overseas. It is not only my judgment, but also the opinion of others who are better informed and more qualified to speak, that these ships can be brought within the requirements and specifications of the American Bureau of Shipping at a cost per vessel well within the appropriation of $10,000,000 authorized by the bill. At an interview sometime since Admiral Land stated that the average cost of reconditioning was $15 per dead-weight ton; therefore, after deducting the passenger, refrigerator, and absolute junk vessels, $10,000,000 would recondition at least 50 vessels.

With reference to the cost of operating the vessels, it must be borne in mind that we have no accurate figures to show us what the operating cost will be. It can be safely asserted, however, that if the ships are operated on the basis of fair charges for administration, maintenance, etc., and the elimination of commissions, and the vessels are permitted to load under usual tramp-steamer customs, they should be operated to South America and return in ballast for a figure close to $5 per ton.

The discussion by the admiral in his report of the meaning of the words "commodity" and "produce" as employed in the bill, would seem to be purely academic and of little if any practical value. The wording of the bill is not yet, at least, a law of the Medes and Persians. If deemed necessary, the "commodities" intended to be embraced by the measure can be specifically itemized and "produce" can be tagged to the satisfaction of the admiral's taste. I cheerfully grant the assurance that no pride of authorship will bar clarifying amendments. The issue to be determined is the purpose and intent of the proposal, which I do not for an instant think either the Maritime Commission or its chairman misunderstands. The committee now considering the measure can be, I am sure, safely trusted to clear up such obscurities of expression as may, unhappily, have been used by reason of the author's cultural limitations. In other words, it is not necessary for me to say to the chairman of this committee that if the language of the bill does not clearly express its purpose it can be made to do so before it is reported out.

As heretofore stated it is not my intention to here either repeat or add to the argument for the passage of the proposed measure that was so splendidly and ably presented by others to the committee at the time of the hearing. I cannot refrain, however, from here calling attention to the effect that the passage of this measure will have upon one American produced commodity in which the State I have the honor to represent, as well as many other States of the Union, are vitally interested. I refer to bituminous coal, the production of which is one of the greatest American industries and which furnishes employment to many thousands of American workers.

It has been determined that probably 5,000,000 tons of coal per year can be exported to South American countries provided that shipping facilities can be provided with such certainty that long-term contracts can be made for delivery to South American purchasers. In order to make these long-time contracts for the delivery of coal to our southern neighbors it is necessary that the freight rate be a stabilized and continuing one, and that the coal shipper be assured that shipping facilities will be available throughout the life of the contract. This is necessary in order to definitely fix a delivered price for the coal to the South American purchaser, and to assure that the American coal producer will not be faced with the hazard of changing freight rates. The reconditioning and operation of ships under authorization of the pending measure will accomplish the desired end. The opening of such a South American market for this one commodity alone will give employment to thousands of idle laborers and add millions of dollars to the national annual income.

It can be readily understood that the pending measure is designed to benefit the producers and shippers of commodities which are transported in bulk. It has been called to my attention that practically all vessels now operating under the American flag on routes established or approved by the Maritime Commission and which vessels have been provided by the Commission, are not of a character or so equipped that they can be cheaply operated as bulk cargo carriers exclusively in competition with foreign-flag ships engaged in the same character of shipping. While some of these established lines frequently use their vessels for the movement of bulk cargoes, when other more profitable cargoes are not offered, it is a well-known fact that when these more lucrative cargoes for which the vessels were originally designed can be obtained, the vessels abandon their bulk-cargo business and leave the American producer and exporter of American coal, lumber, grain, and other like commodities without that regular and continuous service which is necessary for the maintenance of their export trade. It is respectfully submitted that we have today as never before an opportunity to supply a continuing service of bulk-cargo carriers and thus lend a helping hand to a class of brave and gallant American producers who have long been ignored by their Government and have had neither governmental aid nor cooperation. The time has come when Congress must assist this class of American producer.

Referring again to the admiral's report, which is concluded by the statement that he had been advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget "that the proposed legislation is not in accord with the program of the President," I wish to call attention to the fact that quite some time ago the writer, together with certain representatives of producers of commodities affected by this measure, appeared personally before a representative of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, designated by him to hear our presentation, and we had a full and complete discussion of this subject. It was the understanding that our evidence and statements, which were then and there recorded, would be presented to the Director of the Bureau for his consideration. We were advised that the Director's resolution upon the subject, when had, would be promptly communicated to us. Since that time we have had no word from the Bureau of the Budget.

I am loath to believe that the Director of the Bureau of the Budget would reach and announce a resolution on this subject without advising us of his action, thus violating an understanding had with his representative, completely ignoring the hearing held on the matter and wholly forgetful of our known interest in the subject.

Of course, it is not stated in the admiral's report that the President himself either approved or disapproved the pending proposal nor is it stated that the proposal was ever submitted to the President. It is also not stated just who adjudged the proposal as "not being in accord with the President's program." It can therefore readily be assumed that some other person or persons, who are perhaps better informed as to Presidential programs, might, and very likely would, quickly determine that the proposed measure is not only definitely in accord with and complementary to the President's program for national improvement, international relations and his good-neighbor policy, but also that it conforms to the program of Secretary Hull and would implement the undertakings agreed upon at Habana.

In any event, the statement that the legislation "is not in conformity with the President's program" is, in the language of a profession with which I have some familiarity, hearsay evidence and, therefore, of no probative value.

With every assurance, Mr. Chairman, of my grateful appreciation of the many courtesies you and your committee members have shown to those who are deeply interested in the measure under discussion, I beg to remain

Sincerely yours,

JOHN KEE, M. C.,
Fifth District of West Virginia.

He Loved His Fellow Man

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, bright in the annals of statesmanship gleams the illustrious name of WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, late Speaker of the House of Representatives. No less radiant glows his fame in the memory of many as a man whose kindly interest in their endeavors was a flame lighting the way to greater achievement. If he had considered his epitaph, it would have been characteristic of him to have disregarded his successful career, and he could have suggested with serenity and with sincerity, as did Abou Ben Adhem, "Write me as one who loved his fellow man."

There is none who will remember him with more affection and admiration than Horace C. Carlisle, a septuagenarian with many years of service at the Capitol and still active on the staff of the Capitol Architect. Speaker BANKHEAD wrote the foreword for one volume of Mr. Carlisle's poems, which reads:

FOREWORD

I have examined with great interest and appreciation the poems of Mr. Horace C. Carlisle entitled "Parodies of Praise," and I commend their excellent literary composition as well as their fine spiritual fervor to all persons who are interested in this type of literature. I have known Mr. Carlisle for many years and deeply appreciate his most excellent mental, spiritual, and patriotic qualities, and I am sure that all who may read and consider his literary productions will be deeply impressed with their searching and significant qualities.

WM. B. BANKHEAD,
Speaker, House of Representatives.

When Poet Carlisle sent to the Speaker an acrostic he composed about a year ago, he received the following acknowledgment:

I wish to thank you sincerely for your cordial note of September 1, enclosing poem entitled "Speaker BANKHEAD." I have read it with great interest and appreciate the poem and thank you sincerely for the tribute of praise contained in the acrostic.

In tribute, I submit for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the acrostic referred to, and a poem written by the same author since the Speaker's death:

He that hath knowledge spareth his words: and a man of understanding is of an excellent spirit.—Proverbs XVII:17.

SPEAKER BANKHEAD

A-lmighty God, in His infinite wisdom,
M-ade in His own image man for a cause,
E-ven to rule, in the world He'd created,
R-ightly controlled by His natural laws.
I-n every age, and in every known country,
C-hosen for leadership, great men arise,
A-nd formulate plans to safeguard the nations,
'S-tablishing courses in ways that are wise.

W-ILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, of north Alabama,
I-s a born leader of measures and men,
L-eader whose labors for right and for reason,
L-ive in the fruits of his popular pen—
I-n his great heart is enshrined equal justice,
A-nd every great purpose, slumbering there,
M-asterful in its conception, is surely
B-orn of a faith in Him who answers prayer.

B-rought up by parents of note and distinction,
A-mply endowed with a keen intellect,
N-ational in his mature meditations,
K-ind, and yet candid, in every respect,
H-appy, yet serious, in all his dealings,
E-ver alert, WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD would,
A-s President of our dauntless Republic,
D-o the great job as a great leader should.

—Horace C. Carlisle.

The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord; and he delighteth in his way.—Psalms 37: 23.

A NATIONAL LOSS

Speaker WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, America's friend,
Recognized as a leader in national thought,
On whose counsels his country could safely depend,
For they always with unalloyed wisdom were fraught—
Never shifted to others the tasks that were laid
Upon him, but courageously carried the load
Uncomplainingly on—undeterred, unafraid—
Till he came to the end of life's wearisome road.

As a Member of Congress, beloved by his peers,
He had served long before he, deservedly, came
To be Speaker—and now mem'ry's sorrowing tears
Testify to the greatness of his worthy name.
With a heart big enough to look over the faults
And see virtues in those who'd opposed him in vain,
He oft "buried the hatchet," forgot their assaults,
And became their beloved benefactor again.

When we needed him most, our revered Speaker passed
Into service more suited to his heart's desire,
For he practiced in full what he preached to the last—
And the life that he lived among men will inspire
Them, along down the years, to look up past the hills
To the eternal God, from whom all goodness comes,
For the peace passing all understanding which fills
Those with hope who put Him first of all in their homes.

At Stake Are Free Enterprise and Free America—While Jobless Still Look for Jobs, Public Debt Zooms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 23, 1940

EDITORIALS FROM OREGON JOURNAL AND LETTER FROM CONSTITUENT IN REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I include two editorials appearing in the Oregon Journal and a letter from a constituent with reference to one of the editorials. The editorials and letter are as follows:

[From the Oregon Journal (Portland, Oreg.) of September 18, 1940]

AT STAKE ARE FREE ENTERPRISE AND FREE AMERICA—WHILE JOBLESS STILL LOOK FOR JOBS, PUBLIC DEBT ZOOMS

We deal with a peculiar dilemma in the United States. It has horns, and they are sharp. In a few weeks the voters of the Nation must express themselves upon a national economy that now adds the financing of national defense to the immense peacetime debt.

There is involved a question of plain, unvarnished honesty toward our young people whom we are drafting for military defense and at the same time holding responsible to repay at some future time the billions in debt we have created.

During the present administration $22,000,000,000 have been added to the national debt, which now totals about $45,000,000,000. We created that debt largely to solve unemployment, but we still have the unemployed, millions of them. We proposed "priming the pump," but the pump isn't primed. Free enterprise hasn't taken over the employment of our idle millions. Instead, by creating debt and by increasing taxes we produce money to be used as salve for the surface without remedy for the ill.

The total public debt is imperiling the real value of the property on which it rests. The use of public in place of private money has forced the savings rate down to 1½ percent or less. The incentive to save is being destroyed. We want to get back to an $80,000,000,000 national income but not to be compelled to pay it all in taxes.

There have been wise expenditures for public works, such as power projects, reclamation, roads, and the like which are justified by their permanent value.

But we haven't produced a permanent plan to balance private enterprise and public works. Instead we have submitted to concentration of political power which means concentration of economic power in government. The debt we have created is owned by those who have loaned the money. Who owns the debt becomes master of the debtor.

The third term for which Mr. Roosevelt asks is a violation of tradition. It is also an application for authority to go on concentrating the power of government, imposing a political-economic control upon the people, reducing the American living standard by exhausting taxes and creating a new, permanent, dependent class.

The jobless are still looking for jobs. Private enterprise still waits for release. Free enterprise and a free America are at stake.

Nothing can be more certain than that in November the voters of this great Nation will say the defense of the United States includes return to the American way of free enterprise and self-dependence as much as troops and munitions to warn off foreign aggressors.

[From the Oregon Journal (Portland, Oreg.) of September 12, 1940]

EMERGENCY MAY FURNISH PLAUSIBLE PRETEXT FOR THIRD TERM, BUT NO SOUND REASON TO OFFSET WHERE IT MIGHT LEAD

Seven weeks from next Tuesday the people will elect a President. Eleven weeks have elapsed since Wendell Willkie's nomination at Philadelphia gave a distinct lift to New Deal opponents, and 8 weeks have gone by since President Roosevelt declared in accepting a third-term nomination tendered at Chicago that "my conscience will not let me turn my back upon a call to service."

During the same period the Nazi attack upon Britain has become progressively more furious, and America's activities toward adequate national defense have grown apace.

The spectacle of the European crisis abroad and the defense program at home necessarily have taken the spotlight of public interest away from the political campaign, because fundamentally Americanism takes precedence over partisanship.

The September primaries in eight States have come and gone with inconclusive significance as regards the outcome of the national election.

From this point on, however, the political war at home will be on in real earnest. After a number of visits to defense plants in the East, here and there, and a Labor Day week end in the Tennessee regions, ostensibly as President, Mr. Roosevelt emerged last night as a Presidential candidate in a major labor speech, with the familiar appeal to class prejudice—the same old soap in the same old wrapper.

Tonight, after weeks of intermittent conferences and interviews, Mr. Willkie takes to the road to meet the people in 18 Western States. His entire political fortune rests in his own hands. His is an uphill fight.

Domestic issues cannot further be avoided by the President. It is all very well for administration spokesmen—such as Henry Wallace, for example—in speaking out of character, to bunch all the issues in a single package labeled "Roosevelt or Hitler," and to brand the Republican Party as the party of appeasement. But he fools no one. As the President said in his acceptance speech, "They (the people) will decide on the record." And so they will.

Their minds will run back to March of 1937, when after an enviable record of achievement during his first administration, the President, flushed by an overwhelming victory, instead of consolidating his gains, pushed on to new adventures.

They will remember how complacently the administration condoned the sit-down strikes of that year, which instrument ultimately was outlawed by the Supreme Court.

They will recall the President's willful, if vain, attempt to pack the Supreme Court.

They may appraise the reckless delegation of powers by the Congress to a myriad of bureaucracy. They see the spectacle of one person out of every 13 men, women, and children in the United States as a Federal employee. They witness the concentration of more and more power in the hands of the Executive, and well may ponder "Is that the democratic way?"

Then, too, their collective common sense fears a national debt which under Roosevelt has increased $22,000,000,000 without achieving its purpose, even if the President's running mate does not. And they do not swallow the specious reasoning advanced last week by Henry Wallace in a speech at Champaign, Ill., that such fear is ill founded because, due to lower interest rates, such debt is easier to carry than in 1933.

And finally as election day draws near, they well may ask themselves whether departure from the precedent established by Washington, Jefferson, and other great Presidents, in retiring after their second successive terms, is not fraught with peril to our free institutions.

A third term is urged for President Roosevelt because of the emergency in international affairs. That smacks too much of indispensability which in its very essence is dangerous to liberty. As Jefferson wrote to Henry Guest in 1809, "there never will be a time when real difficulties will not exist and furnish plausible pretext for dispensation, or annulling the principle of rotation."

The third term sought by Mr. Roosevelt for Mr. Roosevelt is a real issue in this campaign which will gather strength as time runs.

To the Journal, a third term is dangerous to our free institutions, even a third term for President Roosevelt. A third term leads down the path to autocracy and there can be no benign autocracy.

FEARS THIRD TERM—WALTER L. TOOZE SAYS COMING ELECTION IS NONPARTISAN FIGHT TO PRESERVE TRADITIONAL LIBERTIES, THAT NO ONE IS INDISPENSABLE

To the EDITOR OF THE JOURNAL:

PORTLAND, September 14.—You are to be congratulated upon your splendid editorial of September 12, entitled "Emergency May Furnish Plausible Pretext for Third Term, But No Sound Reason To Offset Where It Might Lead." It states the issues clearly. This is no partisan fight. Its nonpartisan character is evidenced by the actions of such Democrats as John W. Kaste, who has been a supporter and financial contributor of the campaigns waged in 1932 and 1936 for Roosevelt; by the stands taken by newspapers which have uniformly supported the Democratic ticket, such as the Capital-Journal, of Salem, the Medford Mail Tribune, the Astorian Budget, the Oregon Journal, and many others.

We face a battle in which loyal Americans without regard to party, race, color, or creed are united in defense of the free institutions transmitted to us by our forefathers. They support that brand of Americanism which respects traditions and has faith in our representative form of government; an Americanism that has confidence in the ability of the American people to achieve their own destiny; one that is unwilling to admit the Nation to be so bankrupt in intelligence and statesmanship that its future welfare depends solely upon one man, no matter how great or indispensable that one man may believe himself to be.

Those who subscribe to the doctrine of indispensability have but little faith in America, and wholly fail to appreciate American history. Suppose Roosevelt should die, would our country go to pieces?

There is another danger involved in the present third-term attempt. When we elect a President, we also elect another potential President, the Vice President. Life is always uncertain. Suppose Roosevelt is reelected and should die. Then what? We would have the rabble-rousing Mr. Wallace with his socialistic theories. Would the American people want to turn this Government over to the Wallaces and to their economic and political philosophies?

WALTER L. TOOZE.

National Air Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COSTELLO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

STATEMENT BY COL. J. E. MYERS

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by Colonel Myers, of the Aviation Defense Association:

NATIONAL AIR DEFENSE

The Aviation Defense Association, Inc., of Washington, D. C., is a patriotic, nonprofit organization, established for the purpose of urging proper air defense for the Americas. It holds that "superiority in the air is vital to our peace and safety."

The following outline of its past and proposed operations is presented for your consideration and we ask your immediate assurance of cooperation. Should you require further information, please communicate with the secretary of the committee concerned.

COMMITTEE ON SAFE AIR TRAVEL

(Mr. Chester G. Myers, chairman, Hellam, Pa.)

Purpose: To endorse all measures which will insure safe air travel and particularly to introduce and sponsor legislation for the immediate construction of uniform directional air markers.

Legislation now in Congress:

Senate Joint Resolution 300, placed by Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida, on September 20, 1940, at our request.

House Joint Resolution 601, placed by Representative J. HARDIN PETERSON, of Florida, on September 3, 1940, at our request.

Providing for the construction of uniform directional air markers in the tops of buildings, roads, etc., in cooperation with the Civil Aeronautics Administration.

COMMITTEE ON AIRPORTS AND AIRWAYS

(Mr. A. R. Towner, chairman, 1421 Upshur St. NW., Washington, D. C.)

Purpose: To endorse all measures for the vast expansion of all commercial aeronautical and meteorological activities, research laboratories, main and feeder air passenger and freight lines, airports and bases, and to advocate the unification and standardization of airplane parts and their accessories.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC RELATIONS

(Hon. M. H. Thatcher, chairman, 741 Investment Building Washington, D. C.)

Purpose: To encourage all possible means of rapid transportation, shipping, and communication for the purpose of increasing trade and friendly relations for the establishment of a strong coalition of all American nations and to bring about a general sense of security by awakening the confidence of the American people in the protection afforded by an adequate military and naval defense and, to this end, to cooperate with all patriotic organizations.

COMMITTEE ON SAFETY SUPERHIGHWAYS

(Col. C. B. Treadway, chairman, Taveras, Fla.)

Purpose: To support legislation for the construction of great lighted superdefense, nonstop highways or rivers of traffic, between all strategic points and air bases, within the boundaries of the Western Hemisphere, as a necessary measure for our national defense and to provide for immediate constructive work for the unemployed. Senate Joint Resolution 814, placed by the late Senator Ernest Lundeen, of Minnesota, on January 19, 1940, House Joint Resolution 1939, placed by Representative J. BUELL SNYDER, of Pennsylvania, on January 5, 1940, providing for the construction of six superhighways north and south, and three east and west from coast to coast, throughout the United States, with air bases at their intersections.

COMMITTEE ON "YOUTH EDUCATION IN AVIATION"

(Mr. R. E. Grabel, chairman, 345 First Street, South, St. Petersburg, Fla.)

Purpose: The editing of a magazine for "youth education in aviation" and the distribution of this magazine and other literature at a reasonable price within the reach of the average American boy or girl for the promotion of air-mindedness in the youth of the Nation; as well as to publish an authentic history of aeronautics as an inspiration to them.

COMMITTEE ON MEMORIALS AND NATIONAL AVIATION DAY

(Col. J. E. Myers, U. S. Army, retired, chairman)

Purpose: To honor, revere, and perpetuate the names and memories of the pioneers of the air, particularly those of Wilbur and Orville Wright, "the fathers of flight," by the annual celebration of National Aviation Day on August 19, Dr. Orville Wright's birth date; and to observe other occasions of national and international import, as well as to encourage the erection of memorials for air achievements, the issue of special air-mail stamps, etc.

Legislation for national aviation day already enacted, as proclaimed by the President of the United States on July 25, 1939.

Senate Joint Resolution 111, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, placed by Senator CLAUDE PEPPER on April 3, 1939, at our request. (Statement, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 20, 1940.)

Other resolutions similar to Senate Joint Resolution 111 were placed at our request for National Aviation Day by the following Members of Congress: Representatives C. A. Anderson, William J. Ashbrook (deceased), Frank Carlson, N. M. Mason, M. J. Maas, J. A. Martin (deceased), M. J. Merritt, Jennings Randolph, J. A. Shanley, H. R. Sheppard, R. M. Simpson, J. J. Sparkman, Jerry Voorhis, M. C. Wallgren. (See extension of remarks by Representative CHARLES I. FADDIS, Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 4411.)

Special credit for the establishment of National Aviation Day on August 19 and for the sponsoring of its observance is accorded to Senators ROBERT REYNOLDS, HATTIE W. CARAWAY, MORRIS SHEPPARD, PATRICK MCCARRAN; Representatives HARRY N. ROUTZOHN, THOMAS A. JENKINS, and many other Members of Congress, as well as Col. John H. Jouett, president of the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce of America.

Proposed legislation: To honor Orville Wright and the memory of his brother, Wilbur.

House Joint Resolution 591, placed by Representative JOHN M. COSTELLO, of California, on August 7, 1940, at our request, as follows: "That the annual celebration of National Aviation Day on August 19 will be observed in the spirit in which it was initiated and fostered according to such procedure as the President of the United States may in his discretion direct."

House Joint Resolution 123, placed by Representative THOMAS A. JENKINS, of Ohio, on January 19, 1940, providing for the construction of a decorative work of art in the unoccupied space in the dome of the Capitol in commemoration of aeronautical achievement.

We also sponsor the return of the original Wright airplane from England to the United States and the annual issue of commemorative stamps for our pioneers of the air.

The extent and number of congressional resolutions introduced on the above subjects in this session of Congress emphasize the national importance of both commercial and military aviation, and we hope that this interest as shown by Members of Congress will be reflected in public sentiment for our national air defense.

Broader Horizons

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ARTICLE BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, on August 18 there was printed in the Portland Oregonian an article by Richard L. Neuberger, one of the most brilliant young writers, entitled "Broader Horizons." I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Portland Oregonian of August 18, 1940]

BROADER HORIZONS, THE WEST GOES COUNTRYWARD—THE CENSUS OF 1940 REVEALS WESTWARD POPULATION TREND

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

Portland's population was almost stationary from 1930 to 1940, but the rest of Multnomah County soared 31 percent. Seattle stayed where it was, yet King County, outside Seattle, shot up 39 percent. No new numbers augmented Tacoma's total, but Pierce County, beyond the city limits of Tacoma, registered a 19-percent increase. San Francisco dropped 5,000 people, yet the area around San Francisco filled up like a bonanza land.

In the decade since the last census 131,000 men, women, and children have been added to the population of Oregon. But on the other side of the Continental Divide Nebraska lost 64,000 people, Oklahoma lost 72,000, South Dakota lost 52,000, and North Dakota lost 43,000. Some villages and towns in these States crumbled back into the prairie wilderness out of which they once had been built.

All these statistics have vast and significant meaning. The census tells the story of our times. It reveals great social and economic trends. It explains the map of America. It is an index to history. Now that the preliminary figures for the 1940 census are available, important conclusions about the development of the United States in the last 10 years can be ratified. Many of these conclusions concern Portland and the State of Oregon.

People have been moving out in the country. Get in your automobile and see if this is not so. Drive out Base Line Road, Sandy Boulevard, Canyon Road, or any of the other thoroughfares that lead to the city. Hillsides which were matted with timber in 1930 are now dotted with homes. Hundreds of new bungalows stud the adjacent countryside. Scarcely a road or highway near Portland fails to confirm this impression.

Palatine Hill, the slopes above Sylvan, Dunthorpe, the Powell Valley flats between the city limits and Gresham, the green highlands that fringe Macleay Park in the west, the banks of the Willamette out toward Oregon City, the river in the direction of Linnton, the meadows on the far side of Eighty-second Street—these and a score of other sectors emphasize the fact that there has been a population trek outside the borders of the city.

TREND TOWARD COUNTRY IS NATION-WIDE

This is not alone true of Portland. It applies as well to Seattle, Tacoma, and San Francisco. In fact, it is a trend Nation-wide. Dr. Leon E. Truesdell, population expert of the United States Bureau of the Census, recently declared: "We know that the growth trend which once was greatest in the cities now is obviously some place else—the suburbs or the wide open spaces." And Delbert Clark wrote in the New York Times last week that there is "flight from the cities rather than influx."

Consider the findings of the census in our own Pacific Northwest. The population of Portland increased 17 percent between 1920 and 1930. This leveled off between 1930 and 1940, however, when the increase was only 1.9 percent. But Multnomah County outside the city limits of Portland went up 31 percent. For example, Byron G. Carney, State census director, reports gains of approximately 18 percent for both Gresham and Fairview, small rural communities east of Portland.

Now look northward at Seattle. The largest city in the Northwest stepped up 16 percent in population between 1920 and 1930, but in the next decade stopped growing. It was the first time in 60 years that Seattle had not produced a big increase at the taking of the census. Yet King County beyond Seattle's boundaries made a staggering jump of 39 percent—from 97,934 people in 1930 to 135,949 in 1940. "Many of our former residents," explained Joseph P. Adams, Seattle census supervisor, "are now living just outside the corporate limits on larger tracts of land."

Some information from the Seattle Chamber of Commerce shows what has happened. On the Puget Sound lowlands north of the city 11,000 new homes have been built since 1930. The new districts include Blue Ridge, Aviation Heights, Windermere, and Hawthorne Hills. South of Seattle there are 6,000 homes which were not there 10 years ago. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer states that "Seattle folk are demanding and getting 'lebensraum.' The last decade has seen thousands of families moving from crowded neighborhoods to more agreeable surroundings in modern suburbia."

What factors lie behind all this? What forces have motivated this trend? One influence not to be overlooked is the increase in what is called "part-time farming." On one of your Sunday afternoon drives around Portland's environs observe how many homes and bungalows have small truck gardens behind them. The owner of a home may be a shipping clerk or a longshoreman, yet outside his kitchen window stalks of corn and potato plants sway in the breeze. Delbert Clark avers that a cause of this is the "attempt by workers to achieve a degree of self-sufficiency in times of economic uncertainty."

Along the Atlantic seaboard there is a movement led by a consulting economist named Ralph Borsodi, which seeks to get people out of crowded cities and settled on small plots of crop-producing land in the country. Magazine editors, newspapermen, artists, actors, lawyers, physicians, and other professional men and women in New York have tried this in small colonies. John Chamberlain, editor of Fortune, describes one of these colonies, Bayard Lane, as "a picture of at least relative independence and contentment." Bayard Lane has vegetable gardens, fruit trees, berry patches, and a cooperative carpenter shop.

As yet the Pacific Northwest has no Bayard Lanes, but many families in this area have moved out to the country individually. Part of this is the desire for security. Stuart Chase, when he visited Portland 7 years ago, urged that industrial workers get "kitchen gardens" back of their houses as "anchors to windward if the jobs give out." Rexford Guy Tugwell, now chairman of the New York City Planning Commission, often speaks of the cities as having "decaying centers and growing peripheries." This is another way of saying that the push is toward the surrounding countryside rather than in the direction of the downtown metropolitan areas.

Truck gardens are not the only reason people have been moving out beyond the last line of paved streets. Improved transportation facilities have made it easy to commute. A 15-mile drive to work is little or nothing now; it can be made easily in half an hour. Shorter workdays, wage and hour laws also contribute to the trend. People have more time for leisure. They can putter around in their gardens whether the gardens grow beets and peas or roses and nasturtiums. Books on vegetables and flowers have sold in ever-increasing quantities in the last few years.

Maj. Roy F. Bessey, of the National Resources Committee, points out that the decentralization of industry has been a force in the outward expansion of urban population. No longer are mills and factories congregated in a few restricted areas. The tendency in the Pacific Northwest, with its immense supply of hydroelectricity in the Columbia River, is for factories to be scattered all over the region rather than concentrated in any one particular place. Note that the new plants now under construction are not by any means confined to the two largest cities, Seattle and Portland.

Although it is nearly forgotten in the wild maelstrom of world events which have occurred in the last 3 years, it is interesting to look back upon the speech President Roosevelt delivered at the dedication of Bonneville Dam in 1937. It has a direct connection with the recent census figures which show Portland, Seattle, and Tacoma static, but with the nearby hinterlands filling up. The President said he wanted no "Pittsburghs" in the Northwest, and then he went on to maintain:

"It is because I am thinking of the Nation and the region 50 years from now that I venture the further prophecy that as time passes we will do everything in our power to encourage the building up of the smaller communities of the United States. Today many people are beginning to realize that there is inherent weakness in cities which become too large and inherent strength in a wider geographical distribution of population.

GROWTH OF BIG CITIES DEPENDS ON TOWNS

"No one would suggest that the great cities of Portland and Tacoma and Seattle and Spokane should stop their growth, but it is a fact that they could grow unhealthily at the expense of all the smaller communities of which they form logical centers. Their healthiest growth actually depends on a simultaneous healthy growth of every smaller community within a radius of hundreds of miles."

Even as the President spoke the hegira out of the cities was on. Mayor Arthur B. Langlie, of Seattle, told the Pacific Northwest Regional Planning Conference in 1939 that for 4 or 5 years people had been moving out of his community into the neighboring suburban areas. To all the apparent reasons for this trend he added the suggestion that perhaps families were anxious to avoid the governmental costs of cities. Taxes might motivate migration, he hinted. City assessments are ordinarily considerably higher than those in the country

Do not make the mistake of thinking that Portland and Seattle are the only cities which have not gained population since 1930. Census compilations indicate that whereas the United States as a whole has increased 9 percent in inhabitants in the last 10 years, communities over 25,000 have experienced only half that increase. As a matter of fact, many of the greatest cities in the Nation actually have lost population. This category includes Philadelphia, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Cambridge, Akron, and Duluth.

The State of Oregon has fared remarkably well. Its population was elevated 13.8 percent, almost a 6-percent increase over the gain throughout the entire Nation. This is one of the figures which proves that the mighty westward pilgrimage of Dust Bowlers has been no myth. People from submarginal agricultural regions in the Middle West have rolled toward the sundown in a long column ever since 1934. "Drive out on any of the main highways of our State," said the late Senator Borah, of Idaho, in 1936, "and you will see cars, sometimes almost caravans, fleeing from the devastations of the drought."

What he saw is now reduced to statistics. Oregon has gained in population. So has California, another of the States to which the men and women from the Dust Bowl fled. But Nebraska has lost 64,000 people, and other States in the Middle West have dropped proportionately. South Dakota's decline was 7.4 percent; North Dakota's, 6 percent. On the other hand, California gained 21 percent. This was one of the biggest increases in the country. Most of the migrants went there.

County-by-county examination of the census returns from the Prairie States indicates that the loss was heaviest where drought has been the most severe and crop failure most inevitable. Some places in Nebraska and Oklahoma, where wind whipped away the topsoil and the sun caked the ground, are utterly desolate today. Farms fall apart and towns stare out of vacant windows at the ruined scene. Many of the people who lived in such areas have gone to Oregon, California, Idaho, and Washington. The western half of Montana, which is in the Columbia River Basin, has reported an 8.5-percent increase; the eastern part of the State, caught in the swath of the drought, failed to meet this gain.

The regional planning commission for the Pacific Northwest estimates that in the last decade 400,000 have migrated into the Columbia Basin; the Columbia Basin, in the commission's opinion, includes Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and that part of Montana which lies on this side of the Divide. Much of this migration has been composed of people from the Dust Bowl. However, they are not all necessarily farmers. Many of them are men and women who lived in small towns which were dependent on prairie ranches for their economic existence.

Last month Major Bessey told the National Conference on Planning, which met in San Francisco, that "additional land development—largely in the form of public reclamation projects—is needed to meet demands of new settlers and of excess population of the Pacific Northwest's own farm areas." Logically enough, in view of this statement, the greatest population increase in the region has taken place where the Federal Government has constructed huge irrigation undertakings.

Far and away the biggest proportionate gain in Oregon has taken place in Malheur County. In 1930 it had 11,269 people; now it has 19,756. This is a 75-percent boost. The reason is the Vale-Owyhee reclamation project, which has turned thousands of acres of sagebrush into fields of sugar beets. Canals full of water have given life to the soil. At Nyssa a great sugar-beet factory employs hundreds of people and buys the products of many families tilling the land. The Owyhee project, begun during the administration of President Coolidge, has lately been augmented with an enormous new syphon line authorized by Secretary Ickes.

California, too, owes its heaviest proportionate increase to a Government reclamation enterprise. Shasta County was mainly wilderness in 1930. Then last year the Bureau of Reclamation began construction of the stupendous Shasta Dam across the Sacramento River. Great quantities of machinery and many men entered the fastnesses. Actual work started this year. Now the population of Shasta County is up a mere 106.5 percent.

And, to complete the picture, Washington also attributes its major increase to a big dam—in this instance the biggest dam on earth—Grand Coulee. In 1933 only two men lived in the vicinity of the big bend of the Columbia River, where it twists through a granite canyon below the mouth of the Grand Coulee. The two men were Sam Seaton, who ran a dilapidated ferry boat that carried sheep to their upland pastures, and Charley Osborne, who coaxed a straggling peach orchard up through the rocky soil.

Now more than 20,000 people live in that immediate area. The Seattle Argus even believes that Grand Coulee may have enticed some people from Washington's No. 1 community. This may not be as far-fetched as it sounds. Years ago men and women who failed on the dry land at Grand Coulee trekked to the city. Today the land is about to be irrigated, and they are returning to it. Lee Jacobi, of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce, calculates that 3,000 families have moved from the Puget Sound metropolis to the huge irrigation project on the other side of the State.

Probably the most absolute percentage gain in the Northwest is North Bonneville, Wash., just across the Columbia from the Oregon headquarters of the $75,000,000 Government power enterprise. In 1930 there was no North Bonneville, not even an important railroad siding. So the increase has been precisely 100 percent, starting from scratch. Government activities also account for a whopping gain at the Bremerton Navy Yards. The United States naval-expansion program has boosted Bremerton's population 50 percent—from 10,170 in 1930 to 15,076 today.

A few people have moved out of the cities of the Northwest and started to pioneer land, just as did the frontiersmen years ago.

By and large, Portland has come out of the 1940 census with figures which augur well for the future. The city held its own in population, while the neighboring countryside gained greatly. As a trading, commercial, and industrial center Portland now has a far larger population on which to draw. New industries were planned for Vancouver and Cascade Locks, sufficiently close to Portland to be classified among its "satellite communities." And the State of Oregon, of which Portland is the metropolis, made one of the largest proportionate gains of any of the States in the Nation.

There also is the likelihood that the diffusion of Portland's people over a wider area will have salutary results. Big lawns, spacious yards, vegetable gardens, expansive playgrounds, green fields—these are more in the western tradition than crowded buildings and cramped surroundings. Probably the 1940 census for Portland and vicinity would be pleasing to Thomas Jefferson, who sent Lewis and Clark here in 1803. He was the great advocate of an agrarian economy and never ceased his contention that people should live in the countryside.

A CENSUS TAKER SPEAKS

(By Betty Ann Paddock, census enumerator in Portland)

I will never be sorry that I was selected as one of the thousands of cogs in the 1940 census machine, for I met more interesting and unusual people in 6 weeks than I ever shall again. In spite of the adverse publicity which preceded the census, I found people were flattered by being enumerated. Many insisted on telling much more than they were asked.

Some related the family history for generations back; they told of their personal trials and troubles; the faults and virtues of their husbands; even the personal secrets of their friends and neighbors. One dear old lady, being fifteenth on my current schedule, was asked the birthplace of her parents. Beginning with her several great-grandparents she worked down through ancient to modern history, finally delivering the needed information.

Multnomah County abounds in queer residences. The shanties and huts of the Hoovervilles were not so unusual, nor were the north end flophouses, where 200 men stretch out on the floor of a large room every night, a total of 600 in the 3 floors of 1 barnlike structure.

Along the river front one enumerator found three men living like wild animals inside a big hollow block of cement in the center of a garbage dump. They subsisted on canned heat (Sterno) and what they could salvage from the garbage. Another man was found living inside an unused railroad tank car.

My district included the Ross Island shantytown. News of my coming preceded me. The huts were tidied up, and as I approached each shanty the occupant was all ready for the quiz. They were tickled to death to be enumerated and were especially pleased to know that they were considered residents and not transients, to be descended upon the hectic night of April 8, when most of us plodded through our schedules to midnight or later.

The populace was largely Finnish and Swedish and many of the shanties were immaculate. The men were all eager to be counted, so eager that one of them, who was missed, walked all the way to census headquarters the next day in order to be enumerated.

When it began to rain I stayed in one of the larger shanties and the owner routed all his neighbors through, one after the other. I received the full housing schedule rate for each shanty, most of them valued at $5 or $10, as much as other enumerators got for palatial homes in exclusive parts of the city.

During the first day out a death occurred in the house next to the one I was enumerating. The wail of sirens and news of the death soon disrupted the whole neighborhood, and I was unable to get any work done that day. Nevertheless, the lady was counted even in death, as were all those who died or were killed during the time of the census enumeration. Babies who made their appearance during the census were "kings-X." They have to wait until 1950.

Romance might even have blossomed as a result of the census if it had not been that I was already married and a mother. The day after I completed enumeration of shanty town one of the younger members of the community, whose fancy, no doubt, was turned by the advent of spring, came to the census headquarters to inquire if a proposal of marriage to his enumerator might be in order. I wasn't there at the time, so I'll never know how much of the report I got was fiction. But under other circumstances the proposal might have been worth a second thought—I did meet some very nice men in the Ross Island shanties.

The New Deal's Ever-Normal Poverty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES L. McNARY, OF OREGON, AT EXPOSITION PARK, AURORA, ILL.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the notable address delivered by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], Republican nominee for Vice President of the United States, at Exposition Park, Aurora, Ill., on September 21, 1940. The subject of the address is The New Deal's Ever-Normal Poverty.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEW DEAL'S EVER-NORMAL POVERTY

I am genuinely happy to be here today. Rejoicing in another harvest with farmers; men who, like myself, practice the ancient and difficult arts of husbandry. You and I need no introduction. Farmers of the vast, fruitful Middle West and farmers of the Pacific Northwest—both suffer from the adverse elements; in common with other agrarian sections of the country both suffer because of an income that too often falls below the cost of production. I speak to you as a farmer. I have worked on a farm since childhood; always the same farm, the farm my grandfather homesteaded almost a century ago. I shall speak with the direct candor of the farmer so that nothing I say may be misunderstood.

The times demand clear definition. The second World War has lasted into its second harvest season. We meet under its threatening shadow; a threat that disturbs our economy, impels us all to extraordinary effort and huge expenditures for defense. At the minimum we shall have to sacrifice our treasure; at the worst we face war in defense of our independence, our way of life, and our rightful prestige in this our hemisphere. If we must face war, let us face it with steady gaze and a single heart. If we must grasp the nettle, let us grasp it firmly. It is too late in our historic day for Americans to flinch from a duty once made plain.

But meanwhile, despite wars abroad and the fevers of a Presidential contest at home, let us hold on to our emotional balance—and our common, or horse sense. We hear that, inasmuch as the war seems to dwarf domestic considerations, we should adjourn domestic politics; that the campaign should be fought out solely in terms of our relationships with Europe and Asia. I take emphatic issue with that doctrine. We must guard the home front, especially in times of international stress, to make sure that enduring values—our liberties and the democratic processes that assure them—are not impaired under cover of an emergency distracting our attention elsewhere. For myself, I shall stress domestic issues.

I am here today to discuss the New Deal's failure substantially to better the lot of agriculture after 7 years of authority, and to suggest hope for the future under a realistic and expansive administration of our common problem. Permit me, however, to digress momentarily. I had supposed, until reading Mr. Wallace's acceptance speech, that there was little disagreement among Americans regarding Hitler. Nor did Mr. Wallace convince me to the contrary. What he did convince me of was that he had elected to transfer his campaign for the Vice-Presidency from the Farm Belt to Europe.

I fear that Mr. Wallace seeks a change of venue. The device is familiar. When I was a young lawyer out in Oregon, we observed that shrewd counsel, in defending a weak case, preferred being as far from the scene of the crime as possible when he went to trial. Mr. Wallace has been physically present in the Farm Belt during the last few weeks, but his uttered thoughts have been far, far away. In my acceptance speech I characterized Secretary Wallace as a "high-minded and sympathetic Secretary of Agriculture." That characterization stands. I had not then observed him as a candidate for office. In his new role he is energetic, articulate—but mischievous in argument. The attempt to make party the test of patriotism is sheer mischief making. If taken seriously, it might injure the national unity so needful in a crisis. He should take greater care, therefore, to avoid weakening the country's common resolution.

To say that the Republican Party is the "party of appeasement"; to suggest that Republicans, as Republicans, are eager to appease Hitler, with the blood of the European democracies fresh on his hands, is, of course, an irresponsible generalization unworthy of a leader in times of tension.

Mr. Wallace charges that congressional debate hinders—his word is "obstructs"—national defense. I dispute that. Does Mr. Wallace propose that Congress abdicate; go home for the duration of the crisis and leave all power and all discretion in the hands of the New Deal? I remind Mr. Wallace that we are yet at peace and the time has not arrived for martial law. I hope the time does not arrive when it shall be unpatriotic for the Congress to fulfill its constitutional functions. I hope that fervently.

Elsewhere in Mr. Wallace's remarkable speeches he credits the New Deal with unique qualifications to arm America. I do not share his faith. I maintain that the New Deal's failure with America at peace disqualifies it for administering the affairs of an America that may be at war. The New Deal's frivolous waste of our substance has enfeebled us in advance of the vast effort that may lie ahead. The shrinkage of business activity in strategic lines finds us with an industrial plant unequal to its enlarged tasks, to say nothing of a depleted reservoir of skilled labor.

The New Deal desires to arm America. No one questions that. But good intentions are not enough. The roads of Poland, Norway, the Netherlands, Belgium, and France were paved with good intentions. Will is needed; a will capable of integrating a gigantic national effort; will plus the willingness to collaborate with all elements in the population and the added—and vital—capacity to get things done. I have every confidence that an administration possessing the attributes I describe would galvanize the Nation into an intensified effort that would shortly spell security against any foes. I look for that type of administration under Wendell L. Willkie.

The New Deal stands charged with incompetence in preparing to safeguard this country against the ordeal that crushed France and now challenges England. It failed to prepare the agricultural plant for wartime demands. The consequence is that a closing of markets in other parts of the world might find us crippled by shortages of essential raw materials. The irony of this situation is that many of these materials could profitably be grown here, benefiting our own depressed farmers at the same time that their domestic growth assured us against stoppage of supplies. In peacetime we import far too much agricultural produce. Most of the fats and oils, medicinal drugs, starches, fibers, and pulps that we bring in from abroad either can be grown here or home-grown substitutes equally as useful can be made to take their place. The aggregate sum annually expended on these foreign purchases is great.

The part of prudence, as well as the interest of our farmers at a time when world markets were vanishing, should have dictated to the Secretary of Agriculture steps toward closing this possible gap in the national supplies. A wise administration should have surveyed this situation months ago. Secretary Wallace, to my knowledge, exercised himself in two directions toward defense. Employing a direct appropriation for the purpose, he has initiated experiments in rubber cultivation in Brazil and Central America. And he has renamed the agricultural surpluses. You will, of course, recall that the great gluts of wheat, corn, and cotton that still plague the New Deal began as plain surpluses. Then in 1938 Mr. Wallace changed the name, but not the substance, to the ever-normal granary—a condition which, if not checked, seems on the way to providing ever-normal poverty for the farmer. Now the ever-normal granary has been translated into "war reserves." The sound of war reserves is reassuring. It should reassure you to know that the immense hoards of corn, wheat, and cotton held by the Government, either outright or as pledges against nonrecourse loans, no longer overhang the market as plain surpluses.

The only thing wrong with this picture is that, in the absence of foreign demand, our present rate of production seems fully ample to take care of any conceivable requirements a war would levy. Mr. Evans, Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, estimates that only 15,000,000 of our acres will be needed to supply foreign requirements this year—against 28,000,000 in 1939.

Happily, the future is not altogether as foreboding as it has just been painted. Given an industrial boom because of war orders—and many analysts predict such a boom—the domestic demand for farm products should steadily expand. But even here we should not count on too swift, or widespread, a recovery in domestic demand. However, a Government green light to business resulting in new jobs for city workers would be reflected at once in improved demand for farm produce. We need a sustained rounded program for restoring American prosperity. We need, in short, what we have been vainly promised for the last 7 years—business recovery.

Surrounded by mountainous surpluses, or reserves, the farmer has been frozen into a dependence on the Government. The New Deal, as everyone knows, did not invent the farm problem. Its offense lies in the fact that, finding agriculture ill of a functional disorder, it made the disorder chronic.

For generations agriculture played a lordly role in American life. The first European migrants to these shores came to farm. Our earliest industries—shipbuilding, milling, tanning, and weaving—grew out of farming. Washington and Jefferson primarily were farmers; they got their livelihoods from tillage. At the time of Washington's first inaugural 9 out of 10 Americans lived on the soil. Thereafter, land-hungry pioneers poured out across mountains, prairie, and plain; preempting fertile valleys; dispersing civilization westward. One does not often nowadays associate adventure with husbandry—but the farmer during all these years was the authentic empire builder.

The years from 1900 to 1914 loom in retrospect as the farmers' golden age. Population expanded by 29 percent. Unrestricted immigration added 22,000,000 mouths to be fed. The world's markets eagerly purchased our surpluses. Acreage values steadily rose. And the farmer had what, in the main, he has lacked since that day—his fair, proportionate share of the national income. He could trade an hour of labor for the product of an hour of labor expended by a city dweller. That of, of course, what we mean in the last analysis by parity.

The year 1920 was the last in which the farmer had an abundant share in the national income based on his proportion in the population. In 1920 his share was more than 20 percent. Last year his share was only 12 percent. That is, of every $8 earned by Americans, only $1 went to the farmer.

Clearly something is woefully amiss. It isn't so much that the farmer isn't as well off as formerly; many Americans in the cities, large and small, are in that fix also. The trouble is that the farmer is worst off disproportionately. He has taken a deeper pay cut than the rest of us. Mr. Wallace concedes that for the last several years farm prices have constituted—apart from Government payments—a clear gift from farmer to consumer of $2,000,000,000 a year. Oddly enough, that is the precise sum—two billions—by which the average farm income for the 7 lean or New Deal years falls below that for the 7 years just preceding the New Deal. Those, I might throw in, were Republican years.

The New Deal, it is true, has kept the farm population off the bread lines. That is not my idea of success. In the 7 New Deal years, average farm income per farm has been only $1,124, including benefit payments; in the 7 preceding years it was $1,432. In its futile attempt to increase prices by withholding crops from the market, the New Deal now has on hand in Government ownership and control 10,000,000 bales of cotton, 500,000,000 bushels of corn, and 100,000,000 bushels of wheat. I do not regard that as successful, especially as farm commodity prices on August 1, 1940, were in approximately the same range as on August 1, 1933.

Actually, the basic farm problem is no nearer solution today than it was on March 4, 1933. The New Deal has reached none of its fundamental objectives. Its farm program is a thing of shreds and patches; settling nothing; merely putting off the day of reckoning. If I did not believe that the New Deal's "success" could be enormously bettered, I should not—as a farmer and a friend of the farmer—be standing before you today. If I thought that the best the Government of the United States had to offer the farmer was regimented subsistence and a permanent state of disparity, then I should despair for my country.

A billion dollars this year goes from the Treasury to the relief of agriculture. A billion dollars richly earned in service to society. A billion dollars which still falls short by an equal sum of the farmers' just due. No thoughtful citizen, in any party, whether a rural or a city dweller, begrudges those payments. They bear the seal of ancient and eminent sanctions. Alexander Hamilton, farsightedly expecting that tariffs protecting manufacturers would work to the disadvantage of the unprotected farmer, advocated subsidies in compensation. Before him, Benjamin Franklin, observing British corn laws created artificial surpluses that depressed farm prices, urged that the government indemnify the farmers. Otherwise, he said, the farmers were being taxed for the benefit of the city consumers.

In passing may it be said that the inclusion of the marketing agreement provision in the Agricultural Adjustment Act was wise and well-considered legislation, and its invocation has proved beneficial to many groups of farmers. This provision may be termed appropriately one of the cornerstones of this act. Under section 32 of this statute a substantial appropriation is provided to encourage the exportations of agricultural commodities and their increased use domestically by diversion. This program has been a particular child of my heart. From that fund has been evolved the food-stamp program which serves the dual purpose of assisting the needy and helping the farmer by reducing surplus crops.

I know of no one who advocates withholding from the farmer the grants he now has—soil conservation, parity payments, crop loans, and other benefits—until the prolonged emergency is past and the farmer no longer at a disadvantage. I have many farmer friends who are gravely concerned over the deficits which these benefits—together with all the New Deal's excess expenditures—are piling up for deferred payment. The farm population will pay its full share in meeting these bills. Furthermore, the administration of these vast paternalistic enterprises leave much to be desired. The inevitable faults of bureaucracy—red tape, favoritism, confusion, and delay—plague these enterprises. They should be decentralized. Costs should be reduced.

The New Deal, satisfied with its farm program, sees the aggregate improvement it has been able to make in the farmers' lot as a maximum aim. I see it as a minimum. I accept that program only as a stop-gap substitute for something better until something better can be provided. And I assert, in full confidence, that the next administration will be able to provide something better. You may quite properly ask the grounds for my confidence. My answer is prompt.

The next administration will not begin, as did the New Deal, with the notion that the American economy is winding up; that it is in its dotage. It was in 1932, before the election, that Mr. Roosevelt set the party line in a speech at San Francisco, wherein he said—and I quote: "Our industrial plant is built. The problem just now is whether under existing conditions it is not overbuilt. Our last frontier has long since been reached and there is practically no more free land. * * * Our task now is not discovery or exploitation of natural resources, or necessarily producing more goods. It is the soberer, less dramatic business of administering resources and plant already in hand. * * *"

The Republican Party and the next administration take direct issue with the concept of a shrinking economy. We propose to create greater abundance; not to strive for scarcity and devote our chief energy to planning how to distribute that scarcity. I have said that the farm problem is primarily one of markets. The New Deal, doubting that markets are expansible and that new markets may be found, has made little effort to find them.

In addition, the next administration will not be bound by the free-trade dogmas of Secretary of State Hull. A patient and lovable gentleman, Secretary Hull yearns for the return of the last century, before the world had been parceled out into trade preserves; before the days of quotas, embargoes, and the other arbitrary devices of totalitarian trade. Hence, the reciprocal-trade treaties, which are not reciprocal, do not promote trade and are not properly treaties, not being subject to ratification by the Senate. They are not reciprocal because, under the unconditional most-favored-nation practice, a treaty negotiated between the United States and Mexico, for example, at once applies to all other countries with which we maintain unimparied trade relations.

It may be appropriate for me briefly to quote from a speech I made in the Senate in April of this year on reciprocal-trade agreements. "What impelling motive should prompt us to lower our standards to those of Europe and Asia or any other country? Our sacrifice will not solve their problems of economics, conquest, or peace. The best contribution we can make to the world, as well as ourselves, is to defend, preserve, and improve our American standards of living by protecting American markets for American producers at American prices, consistent always with an intelligent policy of reciprocity that does not collide with the resources of any nation with which we contemplate a treaty agreement."

The next administration undoubtedly will deal with foreign countries realistically. At the least, it will reserve to the American farm producer first access to his own market. It will further, by every means, seek to enlarge the American market for farm products—both by improving the consuming power of city consumers and also by encouraging the industrial uses of farm raw materials. Thirdly, it will search for a formula for freeing the American farm price from the vagaries of foreign markets; putting the farmer on the same footing with other American producers, who sell at the American—not the world—price. That simply means folding the American farmer at last into the American economy.

An administration worth its salt will strive for parity prices, not parity payments. It will seek to make our surpluses a blessing and not a curse. It will seek to blot out rural poverty and avoid future enforced shameful large-scale migrations. A first order of business will be restoration of the family-size farmer to his rightful place as an independent producer, realizing, with Jefferson, that the prospering freeholder is the cornerstone of the democratic state.

To me a permanent solution of the agricultural problem does not appear to be insuperable. A substantial solution merely involves a national program which will allot to each farmer his fair share in the American market upon which he will receive parity price. Such a plan would assure the farmer his equitable share in the national income. This desideratum can be accomplished through some form of an allotment plan whereby a segregation will be made of that part of the crop which is required for domestic consumption and that part which is denominated the exportable surplus. Definitely we must not permit the ruinous world price levels to fix the price level of American farm products. Too long, far too long, a world of lower standards of living, lower wages and lower incomes have fixed the price of American agricultural products. Let us end that situation without delay.

A program can and will be evolved by a Republican administration for attaining these objectives. I believe them to be vital to our continuity as a nation of freemen. I believe that through them we can build the greater, happier America wherein the "more abundant life" may become a reality instead of a political phrase.

The Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE L. HERRING

OF IOWA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 24, (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

QUOTATIONS FROM BOOKLET BY SECRETARY ICKES

Mr. HERRING. Mr. President, the founding fathers, distinguished for their great foresight and for soundness in their principles, after its absence had been called to their attention, did not incorporate in the Constitution any provision governing the number of terms a President may serve.

Washington said he did not see any propriety in precluding "ourselves from the services of any man, who on some great emergency shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public."

Jefferson said that circumstances such as a monarchist being elected as his successor would make him run for a third term.

Hamilton may be styled "Alexander the Great" in the eyes of many men of Republican persuasion in this body. In the Federalist he expressed his belief that circumstances and exigencies would make it essential for an experienced man to continue in office.

President Taft advocated the continuance of Mr. Coolidge for what was considered a third term for the Presidency, as did President Hoover. Theodore Roosevelt offered himself for a third term and Senator Borah said that the people could be trusted to determine whether they desired a President for the third term.

These and other statements of illustrious men and historical sources have been quoted by the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, the Secretary of the Interior, in a very illuminating booklet touching upon the third term. I ask that there be incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD quotations from the writings of the Secretary of the Interior upon this current question. There is no doubt in my mind that the American people will approve the reelection of Presiednt Roosevelt. I submit the statements of Secretary Ickes.

There being no objection, the quotations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Everyone knows that the third term is not the real issue in this campaign. The real issue is whether a democratic people should have the right to choose an experienced and trusted leader in a time of grave crisis.

The opponents of President Roosevelt are using the third-term bogey against him. They are trying to create the impression that the third term is unconstitutional, unpatriotic, and a violation of the express will of the founding fathers.

I am presenting the arguments of the founding fathers and other patriotic Americans. Here is a selection of historic and fully documented source materials showing that the third term is not contrary to the Constitution, is not contrary to the wishes of the founding fathers, and is not a violation of American principles.

"Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence and deem them like the Ark of the Covenant, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment. * * * I am certainly not an advocate for frequent and untried changes in the laws and the Constitution * * * but I know also that laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. * * * As new discoveries are made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions change with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also and keep pace with the times."

This was written by Thomas Jefferson on whom the anti-third-term traditionalists are leaning so heavily.

The third-term issue is being used cynically by the opponents of President Roosevelt. Some of these opponents, such as the Chicago Tribune and Mark Sullivan, saw nothing wrong with a third term for Theodore Roosevelt or Calvin Coolidge; but they pretend to be frightened at the horrendous possibilities of another 4 years for Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The historic truth is that there is no reason, either in law or in common sense, why any President should not serve for more than 8 years.

In challenging the phoney anti-third-term propaganda I wish to make four essential observations.

My first point is that it is not against the Constitution for a President to seek and to obtain a third term. This is now quite generally understood, despite persistent and hypocritical efforts to make the contrary idea prevail. As the materials presented in this booklet amply show, not only does the Constitution not prohibit a third term, the framers of the Constitution were emphatically against any such limitation.

This question was fully debated at the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia. It is an historic fact that, almost without exception, the founding fathers objected to setting a limit to Presidential terms. So they left the question open, thereby agreeing that a President should have as many terms as the people might want him to have.

President Washington did decline to accept a third term, to be sure, but he did this not because he was opposed to the third term on principle but because he was physically ill and tired of office. He was eager, in fact, to withdraw after his first term. Only his great sense of duty and the persuasions of his countrymen kept him in an office which he found increasingly burdensome. The reader can find Washington's reasons stated fully in his letter to Lafayette and in his Farewell Address, both of which are reproduced in this booklet.

Washington emphatically rejected the idea of Presidential ineligibility. He considered setting a limit to the Presidential office dangerous to the public welfare.

It is illumindting to trace briefly the Presidential elections after Washington. President Adams was defeated after his first term. Jefferson served two terms, and he had good reason to believe that, owing to the unpopularity of his foreign policy, he could not be reelected. In any case, as some of the material in this booklet shows, Jefferson was just as weary of office as was Washington, and he looked forward eagerly to retirement after 8 years. Moreover, he himself selected his successors, Madison and Monroe, each of whom served 8 years. From the point of view of influence, therefore, it might be said that Jefferson exercised power for 24 years.

John Quincy Adams was defeated after his first term. Andrew Jackson served 8 years and then indicated his successor. From Jackson to Lincoln every President was defeated after his first term. Lincoln was assassinated in the second month of his second term. Grant served two consecutive terms, retired for 4 years, and then vainly tried to get the nomination again. From Grant to McKinley no President was elected consecutively for more than 4 years. McKinley was assassinated during his second term. Theodore Roosevelt served seven and a half years and then, in 1912, sought a third term after an interval of 4 years. He would undoubtedly have been elected if there had been no split in the Republican Party. This is shown by the fact that Roosevelt and Taft together pulled more votes than did the Democratic Party under Wilson.

President Wilson, as the material in this booklet shows, had no objections to a third term. He served 8 years and there is reason to believe that he would have tried to obtain a third term if he had not been gravely ill. After him only Coolidge served for more than 4 years. The majority of the Republican National Committee, including many Republican bigwigs, favored a third term for Coolidge. It seems, however, that Coolidge, who apparently had hoped to be drafted, was outmaneuvered. Thus, no President until Franklin D. Roosevelt actually has been in a position, or has had the chance or the willingness, to serve more than 8 years.

My second point is that, in a democracy, there is no more, or no less, danger in successive and unrestricted Presidential terms than there is in unlimited congressional, senatorial or judicial terms. The founding fathers, in fact, realized this and refused to set any constitutional limits to electing public officials. If a third term for the President is supposed to be a threat to our institutions, then what about a third, fourth, or even a seventh term for a group of Senators or a lifelong tenure for a judge? I am referring the reader to the appendix in this publication, showing the number of Senators in the present Senate who have already served more than two terms of 6 years each.

Many Senators and Congressmen are reelected until they die in office. And frequently their wives succeed them. At the time of Senators Borah's death, for instance, he had been a Member of the Senate for 33 consecutive years. There is no limit on the terms of office for Congressmen and Senators. Federal judges are appointed for life, and yet no one has ever said that these multiple-term Members of Congress, singly or in combination, have been a threat to our democracy. In fact it might be argued that the longer they serve the more experienced they are in public affairs and hence the more useful they become to the American people.

The truth is that so long as we keep our democratic sources pure and persist in our will to be free no force, be it Presidential, judicial, or congressional, can imperil our democracy. Presidents are not dictators, whether they serve one term or three. They are checked by Congress, watched over by public opinion, criticized by a free press, and kept within the limits imposed by the laws of the country. The number of Presidential terms has nothing whatever to do with the powers that a President exercises constitutionally.

My third point is that the whole subject of the third term, especially in this year 1940, is obfuscated by a cloud of hypocrisy. Those who shout loudest against a third term "on principle" are actually opposed to Franklin D. Roosevelt personally. They pretend lofty principles to cover selfish aims. They lurk behind a Maginot line of high-sounding words. And their line can and will be turned by the truth.

The materials selected in this booklet show, for example, how men like Mark Sullivan supported Theodore Roosevelt for a third term in 1912 and Calvin Coolidge for a third term in 1925, but now consider it a violation of a sacred tradition for Franklin D. Roosevelt to have a third term.

My final point is that we constitute a democracy, and that in a democracy the will of the people is the highest law. The vitality of a democracy is endangered if it is inexorably chained to an immutable tradition. If the people want President Roosevelt for another 4 years, they are within their constitutional, legal, moral, and democratic rights in taking him.

In conclusion, I want to quote what Senator William E. Borah said in 1912. The late Senator from Idaho, it should be remembered, was a profound student of American constitutional history.

"The people," Senator Borah said, "who could be trusted to determine whether or not they desire a President for the second term may also be trusted to determine whether or not they desire a President for a third term. I think they can be trusted to settle both questions in a way to best conserve the interest of the people and the Republic."

[Letter to the Marquis de Lafayette, April 28, 1788]

GEORGE WASHINGTON (APRIL 28, 1788)

There are other points in which opinions would be more likely to vary. As, for instance, on the ineligibility of the same person for President after he should have served a certain course of years. Guarded so effectually as the proposed Constitution is in respect to the prevention of bribery and undue influence in the choice of President, I confess I differ widely myself from Mr. Jefferson and you as to the necessity of expedience of rotation in that appointment. The matter was fairly discussed in the Convention, and to my full conviction, though I cannot have time or room to sum up the argument in this letter. There cannot, in my judgment, be the least danger that the President will by any practicable intrigue ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less perpetuate himself in it, but in the last stage of corrupted morals and political depravity; and even then there is as much danger that any other species of domination would prevail. Though when a people shall have become incapable of governing themselves, and fit for a master, it is of little consequence from what quarter he comes. Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who on some great emergency shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public.

[Letter to Gen. Harry White, president, Pennsylvania Republican State Convention, May 29, 1875]

ULYSSES S. GRANT

* * * Now for the third term. I do not want it any more than I did the first time. I would not write or utter a word to change the will of the people in expressing and having their choice. The question of the number of terms allowed to any one Executive can only come up fairly in the shape of a proposition to amend the Constitution, a shape in which all political parties can participate, fixing the length of time or the number of terms for which any one person shall be eligible for the office of President. Until such an amendment is adopted the people cannot be restricted in their choice by resolution further than they are now restricted as to age, nativity, etc. It may happen in the future history of the country that to change an Executive because he has been 8 years in office will prove unfortunate if not disastrous. The idea that any man could elect himself President, or even renominate himself, is preposterous. It is a reflection upon the intelligence and patriotism of the people to suppose such a thing possible. Any man can destroy his chance for the office, but no one can force an election or even a nomination (New York Tribune, May 31, 1875, col. 4, p. 1).

[Editorial, Chicago Tribune, November 3, 1912]

CHICAGO TRIBUNE WANTS ROOSEVELT—(THEODORE)—WHY ROOSEVELT?

* * * The Tribune supports Theodore Roosevelt because, though he is a sincere friend of world peace and a potent worker for international arbitration and conciliation, he does not believe in stripping the Nation of its powers of self-defense while the era of armed combat endures.

The Tribune supports Theodore Roosevelt because he is the most formidable national leader who has the vision to see and the courage to deal with the profound problems of social betterment which modern industrialism has thrust upon us for settlement, the urgent problems of the men and women and little children, in field and factory, upon whose shoulders the whole national fabric rests.

The Tribune supports Theodore Roosevelt because it believes with him that these problems should be and must be met now and not later, when they have bred through generations of causeless human suffering the terrible offspring of injustice, hatred, violence, and revolution. In these fundamental problems the enlightened Democrat is as gravely concerned as any other citizen, for himself, for his children, and for his children's children. * * *

Lastly, the Tribune supports Theodore Roosevelt because he is a public man whose career has given from its beginning every pledge of his patriotic devotion to the common welfare, and because he is a statesman whose extraordinary achievements and whose deepening and broadening vision give assurance of his ability to deal practically and adequately with the vital questions confronting the American Republic today.

MARK SULLIVAN (MARCH 1925)

Finally, there is not now the feeling against a third term that there was 20 years ago. Twenty years ago there was still current in the very deeps of American political instinct that apprehension about kings and dynasties that had existed at the birth of the Republic and had caused Washington to make the first of the declarations against a third term, and thus start the tradition.

Just why our apprehension has become dissipated it would be difficult to say positively. Probably the fact that things have gone so badly with kings and dynasties during recent years, the clear fact that they are a passing institution, may be the cause of our having so little apprehension about one arising in our own country.

In any event, the suspicion against a third term—whether a third full term of 4 years or a third term in the sense that Coolidge's could be after 1929, if he should have one—that has largely gone out of American politics. The nomination of Roosevelt in 1912, although that nomination did not happen to lead to his election, was sufficient evidence of the passing of the third-term bogy. And in 1920, if Wilson had happened to be in good health, there need be little doubt that he would have been nominated for a third term (World's Work, vol. 49, March 1925, Third Term for Coolidge, by Mark Sullivan, pp. 471–472).

[The Federalist, No. LXXII]

ALEXANDER HAMILTON (MARCH 21, 1788)

To the People of the State of New York:

Among the reasons offered by Hamilton may be quoted those styled as the third and fourth:

"A third ill effect of the exclusion would be the depriving the community of the advantage of the experience gained by the Chief Magistrate in the exercise of his office. That experience is the parent of wisdom is an adage the truth of which is recognized by the wisest as well as the simplest of mankind. What more desirable or more essential than this quality in the first Magistrate of a nation? Can it be wise to put this desirable and essential quality under the ban of the Constitution, and to declare that the moment it is acquired its possessor shall be compelled to abandon the station in which it was acquired, and to which it is adapted? This, nevertheless, is the precise import of all those regulations which exclude men from serving their country, by the choice of their fellow citizens, after they have by a course of service fitted themselves for doing it with a greater degree of utility.

"A fourth ill effect of the exclusion would be the banishing of men from stations in which, in certain emergencies of the state, their presence might be of the greatest moment to the public interest or safety. There is no nation which has not, at one period or another, experienced an absolute necessity of the services of particular men in particular situations; perhaps it would not be too strong to say, to the preservation of its political existence. How unwise, therefore, must be every such self-denying ordinance as serves to prohibit a nation from making use of its own citizens in the manner best suited to its exigencies and circumstances! Without supposing the personal essentiality of the man, it is evident that a change of the Chief Magistrate, at the breaking out of a war, or at any similar crisis, for another, even of equal merit, would at all times be detrimental to the community; inasmuch as it would substitute inexperience, and would tend to unhinge and set afloat the already settled train of the administration."

Communism in the Entertainment Unions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, my effort to enlighten the members of the acting profession as to the reason for the reluctance of Congress to remove the ban against a Federal theater project as part of the W. P. A. program has been sabotaged through a series of evasions by the Actors Equity Association.

The issue here is very clear. In 1939 the Federal theater project was banned by Congress because it had been shown, in voluminous testimony, that the Federal theater project was wastefully operated, was being used to disseminate communistic propaganda, and was strongly influenced by Communist forces. In 1940 the Actors Equity Association sent several delegations to us to request the lifting of that ban. The members of these delegations showed that they understood the feeling of Congress since they frequently assured many Members of Congress that no "red" influence would be permitted to obtain a foothold again if the project was renewed. The Actors Equity Association had enjoyed a fine reputation as a fair-minded organization, completely loyal to American ways and ideals up to a short time ago. However, in the past year or two several disturbing incidents had tarnished that reputation in the public mind. Congress did not lift the ban on the Federal theater.

Since I sympathized greatly with the unfortunate plight of many fine members of the acting profession, I determined to investigate more fully the present position of their union as regards this question of Communist influence. The results of that investigation I presented here and presented to the Actors Equity Association. I did not charge Communist control. I charged Communist penetration into key positions. I stated that, in my opinion, the deserving actors and actresses who could be helped by a Federal theater project would not receive that aid unless and until Actors Equity Association had completely eliminated the possibility of control by elements holding beliefs subversive to our form of government.

That issue has been steadily obscured by the Actors Equity Association. On September 11 I presented the curious record of undelivered, unanswered letters in my correspondence with the officials of the association. On September 13 I received the following from Mr. Dulzell, with enclosure, purporting to be a letter sent me August 19. I do not reproduce the opinion of counsel, also enclosed, since it merely restates what Mr. Dulzell quoted in his letter of August 7.

NEW YORK CITY, September 11, 1940.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: President Bert Lytell, at the council meeting yesterday, stated that he had been informed that you had received no reply to your letter addressed to us dated August 13, 1940. This we are at a loss to understand as on August 19 we replied to your letter giving what we understood was the information you desire, along with an amplified opinion from our legal department. Why this correspondence went astray is beyond us, as it has not been returned here.

However, this is to inform you that your letter of August 13 was read to the council yesterday, along with our reply dated August 19, also the opinion of our chief counsel, and we are taking care that this letter will be sure to reach you by having it registered. The council ordered that copies of our letter dated August 19, 1940, as well as the opinion of our chief counsel be sent to you with the request that they be inserted in, and made a part of, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which we understand you will have no objection in doing.

Very truly,

ACTORS EQUITY ASSOCIATION,
PAUL DULLZELL,
Executive Secretary.

ACTORS EQUITY ASSOCIATION,
New York, N. Y., August 19, 1940.

W. P. LAMBERTSON, ESQ.,
House of Representatives Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: Pending consideration by the council of your recent request, I am enclosing a copy of the opinion of our legal department. Regarding this, in view of your statement in your letter of July 26, to the effect that in your own mind there was some question regarding our immunity and that the matter demanded legal consideration, we fail to understand your criticism of us set forth in the first three paragraphs of your letter of August 13. As I see it, we simply acted as advised by our counsel.

You will be interested to know that we have received word that immediately Congressman DIES returns to Washington, attention will be given to our urgent request for a thorough investigation. In this connection, permit us to remind you that we asked that we have your cooperation in having this investigation proceed promptly, but so far have not noticed any particular interest on your part. Are we wrong about this?

Yours very truly,

EVASION AND MORE EVASION BY DULZELL

Mr. Dulzell states that his letter of August 19, which never reached me, is in reply to mine of August 13.

I asked, in that letter, for the legal opinion which led them to reverse the decision to publish this matter in their official magazine Equity. That he sends me.

I asked which of the councilors charged had refused to release their association from the threat of a libel suit. This information is not sent me, or even mentioned by Mr. Dulzell.

I asked for the mailing list of the membership, so that I might take the responsibility of informing them on this question. It is not sent me or even mentioned.

I asked again, for the third time, for an explanation of a resolution of the association misquoting me as stating the council was dominated and controlled by Communists. This was not sent me or mentioned.

I asked for further explanation of another phrase in a letter from Mr. Dulzell, of July 25. This is not mentioned.

I asked that the letter be brought to the attention of the council, and to be advised of the date this would be done. No date is given me.

The Actors Equity Council held meetings on August 20, September 3, and September 10. Although I had sent copies of my letter of the 13th to the President and to the association, nothing is presented to the council until September 10, and no action is taken even then to comply with five of my six requests.

I had also suggested, in a previous letter, that the association could obviate any possible risk from libel suits by its members, by asking the Government Printing Office to reprint this part of the RECORD at very small cost, and distributing it to the membership. This suggestion has never been answered.

Mr. Speaker, there is only one conclusion to be drawn. Actors Equity Association, or certain powers in Actors Equity Association, are determined that the full and complete record of this matter shall not be made available to the membership. To my mind, trickery and evasion have been used to conceal and obscure the entire question. Communist control must indeed exist, and must be greater than I had supposed, since such devious methods are used to keep the members in ignorance on so vital an issue.

CONGRESSMAN MARTIN DIES WILL INVESTIGATE

My colleague from Texas, Congressman MARTIN DIES, has announced that the congressional Committee on Un-American Activities will investigate the theatrical unions in the near future. I gratefully and gladly turn all material and records over to him, as I offered in my letter to him of August 2, requesting such investigation.

Although I regret that my original statement, issued merely to help members of the acting profession in their request for a theater project, has resulted in a controversy of such length, I feel that in fairness I must offer for this RECORD the denials of the people involved. These are from Miss Marsh, Mr. Loeb, Mr. Heller, Mr. Jaffe, and Mr. Sherman. Mr. Leroy MacLean has offered me no denial.

JULY 13, 1940.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: I hoped to entirely ignore your public statement of a few days ago in which you referred to the activities of seven members of the Equity Council, my name being included in this group.

Due to very unfavorable comments which your assertion has created, I am compelled to answer these charges with a specific and an emphatic denial.

I want my comembers of the unions in which I am enrolled and all my social, professional, and business associates to know that this statement is definitely untrue. I sincerely believe that those who know me have always found me an honest, fair-minded, sincere, and true American, and, above all, democratic in all activities in which I took part in the unions mentioned.

The actors and the American people will not believe that Congress permitted many thousands to go hungry and our Nation to be deprived of one of the most notable and worth-while W. P. A. projects merely because of this unproven and false opinion.

I am disillusioned to find that an important member of the Government of our land of liberty could speak words so foreign to democracy and Americanism.

I think your remarks have been made without consideration and hope you will not make unproven statements in the future.

Very truly yours,

EMILY MARSH.

HOTEL LINCOLN,
New York, July 11, 1940.

The Honorable WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: You have accused me of being a Communist. I wish you to know that is untrue. I am not a Communist, nor have I ever been. I believe in our democratic form of government and that its preservation is the hope of the world. I do not believe that you would want to bear the burden of having made an unfounded accusation, and I therefore ask you to publish a retraction of the charges of communism that you brought against me in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

If you do not consent to do this, you are in fair play bound to publish the grounds for your charges together with the sources of information that led you to make them.

Yours truly,

PHILIP LOEB.

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 9, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON,
House of Representatives:

You were reported in this morning's press as having stated that I am a Communist. This is untrue. The plain facts are that I am not now and never have been a Communist. This charge was evidently instigated either by a crank or someone with a selfish personal motive intent on creating trouble. It is a scandalous condition that permits anyone to issue irresponsible statements which damage the reputation of innocent citizens without at least giving such persons a fair chance to disprove scurrilous allegations. In times such as these one would think that men who hold high positions in our democracy would consider themselves doubly bound to act with scrupulous responsibility and regard for the truth. In this spirit I ask you to issue a public retraction of your completely unfounded charges.

GEORGE HELLER,
Associate Executive Secretary, American Federation of Radio Artists.

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 11, 1940.

DEAR SIR: I have denied both in the press and at a meeting of the Actors Equity Council the allegations that I am or ever was a Communist and was content to let it go at that. After all, even the President of the United States and the mayor of New York City have also been absurdly referred to at one time or another as Communists.

But these are hysterical times, and accusations seem to carry the branding stamp of indictment, and so I wish to amplify the statements that I have made.

Let me repeat them, that I have never been a Communist. I am a devout believer in the principles of democracy as laid down by the founding fathers in the Bill of Rights and the Constitution of the United States and am ready to defend those principles with my life.

I therefore ask you to correct the injustice you have done me by publishing this rejoinder in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a forthright answer to the false accusation against me.

Respectfully yours,

SAM JAFFE.

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 11, 1940.

Representative WILLIAM LAMBERTSON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Have denied in the New York press your allegations as to my political affiliations. I have waited hopefully that you would make a public retraction of your statement. As one has not been forthcoming, to my knowledge, I request you repeat your charges outside the boundaries of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where I may take action. I consider your statement definitely harmful to my professional career and would welcome any proof you may have to offer, which I can readily refute.

HIRAM SHERMAN.

Mr. Alan Hewitt has sent me seven pages of denial and protest. Since this record has already carried Mr. Hewitt's denial I do not feel the space can be given to so lengthy a defense. Mr. Hewitt denies any association with the Theater Arts Committee, and I am inclined to believe him. I therefore offer my apology for having included him with the others in that membership. However, I may say that Mr. Hewitt denies none of the facts regarding his support of Mr. Jaffe and Mr. Loeb, but merely justifies that support by a defense of these two and of the Theater Arts Committee. I am again confirmed in my belief that Mr. Hewitt has allowed himself to be made use of by Communists.

SERPENTINE TRAIL OF COMMUNISM IN THEATER

This is not the place for the complete presentation of the evidence in my possession which led to my charges. However, a very condensed summary will complete this record, and, I hope, some day reach the members of Actors Equity Association, who are being victimized by the present state of affairs. I might say, victimized by their present union government.

In January 1934 a magazine called New Theater was launched in New York City as the organ of the League of Workers Theaters. The League of Workers Theaters had been organized in 1932 and made a "section" of the International Union of the Revolutionary Theater. The International Union of the Revolutionary Theater had "sections" in France, England, Germany, and the United States. Its address was post-office box 527, Moscow, U. S. S. R. The members of the League of Workers Theaters were numerous amateur groups throughout the country, such as the Blue Blouses of Los Angeles, the Workers Theater of Chicago, the New Theater of Hollywood, the Workers Laboratory Theater of New York. They also had certain professional theater organizations as members, among them Artef, the Theater Union, and the Group Theater, all of New York City.

On New Theater's editorial board were such well and widely known Communists as Nathaniel Buchwald, Joseph Freeman, Erwin Piscator, Jay Leyda, Romain Rolland. Hallie Flanagan was a contributing editor, as were Stephen Karnot, John E. Bonn, Virgil Geddes, Mordecai Gorelik, Ralph Steiner, Leo Hurwitz, and so forth, all later holding important positions in Government-sponsored art projects.

I believe the simplest way to give you a notion of the magazine and its affiliation with the Communist Party of the United States and International Communism is to quote at random from its various issues:

January 1934 John E. Bonn reporting the 1933 Olympiad of Revolutionary Theaters:

The Dutch section performed an antireligious play and a revue contrasting life in the Soviet Union with life in the capitalistic countries—two examples of the perfect agit-prop drama.

February 1934:

The International theme occupies a considerable place in the Soviet Theater reflecting the class struggle of the proletariat in the lands of Fascist dictatorship and in the land of crisis, unemployment, hunger.

* * * The revolutionary movement explodes the lies of capitalism * * * conservatism is based upon lies.

March 1934, Robert Gessner:

I offer my experiences as a propagandist, better termed a "revolutionary artist." * * * All revolutionary art aims to undermine the ideological structure of the middle class and consolidate the working class.

The Theater Union found itself compelled to choose some actors solely for their ability * * * but the more thoughtful have begun to rebel * * * among the younger, all of them are class conscious or sympathetic. * * * They have begun to read John Strachey and Marxist literature.

June 1934:

Our slogan: Theater is a weapon in the class struggle.

September 1934:

We must win over more and more competent artists. We must indeed professionalize the revolutionary theater arts with their assistance and assist them in revolutionizing the professional theater arts.

January 1935:

On the fifteenth anniversary of the Soviet, the Cinema Editorial Staff Sovietskee Kino and Cinema Workers send warm comradely greetings to the New Theater and Workers Cinema League. Congratulations on first all-Soviet issue. * * * Forward with united front against fascism and war for revolutionary art.

November 1934:

From the Second United States Congress Against War and Fascism, held in Chicago, Alice Evans, delegate of the League of Workers' Theaters, sends the following correspondence:

"* * * A pause comes after the singing, and then Harry Ward, national chairman of the League Against War and Fascism, makes a quiet announcement:

"'We will have a demonstration of solidarity from the ranks of the armed forces of the United States. I will ask the audience to be quiet and cooperate in getting through this as quickly as possible, so there will be no disastrous results.'

"Quickly the lights are dimmed, the microphone and speakers' table are moved back. The wide auditorium is hushed. Three thousand three hundred delegates, representing 2,000,000 workers and farmers, lean forward in their seats. Another pause.

"On the stage comes a young man in khaki uniform, the upper half of his face masked. 'In the name of four divisions of the National Guard of the United States, I bring greetings to the Second United States Congress Against War and Fascism. * * * We are organizing anti-strike-duty groups within the National Guard, and we pledge ourselves to carry out the decisions of this congress.'

"As the National Guard man walks quickly off the stage, another young man in khaki, similarly masked, takes his place. A deeper voice this time, less tremolo, more power, more grim certainty: 'As a first lieutenant in the United States Army, I bring greetings not only from myself but from six score soldiers in Michigan, Wisconsin, and Illinois. Our presence at this congress is our answer to the bosses, who try to use the Army to defend their profits against the rising upsurge of the masses of American people. More and more soldiers stand ready to fight with the working class, pledging themselves to turn imperialist war into war against the bosses. Long live the revolutionary struggle against war! Hail the workers', farmers', and soldiers' government of the United States!'

"When it is over and we are back in our seats, beginning to catch breath, there is a glow on every face. * * * A taste we have had—a fleeting foretaste—of the revolution. This single dramatic incident of two young men in khaki, blindfolded to prevent detection, voicing proletarian solidarity, has crystallized for 5,000 people the meaning of the Congress Against War and Fascism. There was never a more smashing proof of the efficiency of dramatic method in winning masses of people to acceptance of an idea and participation in a struggle."

And so it goes. There can be no doubt whatsoever that New Theatre was a Communist organ devoted wholly to advancing the revolutionary cause through the theater. And there can be no doubt, after a careful reading of the 12 magazines issued through 1934, that the editors and contributors were proud and enthusiastic workers for revolution. They say so themselves, over and over again.

AGENTS PROVOCATEURS IN EQUITY

Now in the fourth issue, April 1934, we come suddenly on something of great interest to the members of Actors Equity Association as events proved. The cover carries a smash headline "The Awakening of the Actors—Storm over Broadway." Five pages, about a quarter of the magazine, are devoted to "the real story of the opposition movement in Equity, what brought it about, how it developed, its aims, and what it signifies for the welfare of the actors." It tells the story of what New Theatre calls a mass revolt, a dispute between the manager and actors of Sailor Beware over a salary cut. The date was March 5, 1934. "In a spontaneous revolt" against the bureaucratic and reactionary leadership of Equity meetings were held, nominating committee members, who controlled the election slate, were chosen to be presented to the Equity meeting on March 21—the rank-and-file movement was on its way.

There is no question that New Theatre was the official spokesman for the new faction and consistently propagandized and recruited for it. In every subsequent issue of New Theatre the rank-and-file movement was publicized, advertised editorially, and supported in every possible way. In May they offered "because the matter is so important, the editors will send a copy of the April issue to any actor requesting it. Let us hear from you now."

To again resort to quoting at random, June 1934:

Of vital concern to the workers in the American Theatre is the rise of an actors' movement within the Actors Equity Association with a program in opposition to the prevailing policy of the present high officials of Equity.

July 1934:

At annual election 7 out of 13 were candidates of the new faction * * * stagnant and bureaucratic leadership * * * doubtful tactics employed by Gillmore to obstruct or defeat this progressive group.

November 1934:

Actors who want to safeguard their rights should get in touch with the rank-and-file group through New Theatre.

June 1934—John Howard Lawson:

The season of 1933–34 has been tremendously significant * * * the revolutionary theater is on the threshold of its vital growth. * * * In 1934 this intensification of the class struggle is proceeding rapidly. * * * I am writing this present article in the hope that it will reach some of the stage employees who are affected by this problem. * * * At the present time it is urgently necessary to face the issue decisively and to help toward the building of the revolutionary theater. What does this mean in concrete terms? It means active participation in the rank-and-file movement in Equity and other labor organizations.

So it becomes clear beyond the shadow of a reasonable doubt that the rank-and-file movement in Equity, finally named the Forum, as New Theatre proudly proclaims in its March 1935 issue, is the leading fraction of the Moscow-controlled International Union of the Revolutionary Theatre directed to agitate, propagandize, discredit, and oppose the "reactionary" president, Mr. Frank Gillmore, and turn the Actors Equity Association to the revolutionary cause.

Leading fraction, by the way, is a Communist term. They use a very special vocabulary. Again I quote from a Federal document:

The term "leading fraction" refers to Communist under-cover men and espionage agents. The leading fractionists are those who carry out Moscow's instructions to bore from within the American labor movement. * * * They are picked for their ability to attain leadership or key positions in these organizations singled out for attack. * * * When they attain their objective, control of the organizations, they then are ready to turn them to the ends of the Communist Party. According to Communist rules, those who constitute the leading fraction must be careful to abide by the following:

1. They must be sure not to admit any connection with the Communist Party. In other words they must act under cover.

2. They must gain control of important positions in various unions.

3. Each union must be examined for weak points and openings so that the workings of the Communists will fit the situation.

It is significant that throughout 3 years reporting on the Forum, New Theater never once mentions the names of its leaders or central committee. The leaders of the Forum, as the records of Equity show, were Philip Loeb, George Heller, and Sam Jaffe.

One of the points laid down at the thirteenth plenum of the executive committee of the Communist International, held in Moscow in December 1933:

The third condition is the ability to combine methods of legal and semilegal work with methods of underground work. * * * For the period which is openly before us we do not need simply Communists but Communist underground workers.

B. Vassilev, central committee of the Communist Party, United States of America:

Bring into leading work workers who are unknown to wide masses and to the police * * * good conspirators and completely devoted to the cause of communism. * * * So, within the trade unions, within the International Labor Defense and other legal revolutionary organizations certain cadres of an illegal apparatus must be prepared. * * * It is necessary that at least one comrade who keeps the addresses, connections, etc., should not come to the meetings of the party committee.

If space permitted, I could trace Mr. Heller's and Mr. Loeb's policy and position on Equity issues and parallel them exactly with instructions from Communist Party documents in Federal possession. It is enough now to state what every member of Actors Equity Association must know or can easily verify. Mr. Loeb and Mr. Heller have stood and worked together without deviation since 1934, when they were openly sponsored by the Communist organ—New Theater. And the members of the Group Theater, the Theater Union, Artef, Theater Collective, Theater Arts Committee, and so forth, who in 1934 worked publicly for the Communist cause, have for 6 years, without deviation and with closed ranks, supported Mr. Loeb, Mr. Heller, Mr. Jaffe, Friends of the Soviet Union, the League for Peace and Democracy, and so on, ad nauseum. For 6 years at least, as my records show, they have followed the party line in its incredible gyrations, in abject intellectual slavery.

I have no doubt they will continue their denials of these facts. Let me then quote from one more source, the writings and teachings of their master, Lenin:

But is there such a thing as Communist ethics? Is there such a thing as Communist morality? * * * In what sense do we deny ethics, morals? In the sense in which they are preached by the bourgeoisie, which deduces those morals from God's commandments. * * * We say that our morality is wholly subordinated to the interests of the class struggle of the proletariat. We deduce our morality from the facts and needs of the class struggle.

* * * make any and every sacrifice, and even if necessary, to practice trickery, to employ cunning, and to resort to illegal methods—to sometimes even overlook or conceal the truth—and by every and all means carry on the work of communism.

And from a book published by the Communist Workers Library Publishers, of New York, by Johannes Buchner, The Agent Provocateur in the Labor Movement, I quote from page 51:

The general and fundamental rule for all Communists is: Make no statement. Of course, this does not mean that all questions are simply to be met with the answer, "I refuse to make any statement * * *." But the fundamental principle remains the same. No statements incriminating any comrade, no names, no addresses, not a single fact which would possibly be used directly or indirectly against the party, its organs, or individual members of the organization. * * * Absolute denial even when personally confronted with the persons and despite the evidence * * * since a categorical refusal * * * would convict you of being a Communist, you may permit yourself a few short statements calculated to obtain credence. * * * We must always conceal our plans and our ways of work from the class enemy. Political expediency here is everything.

THEATER ARTS COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker, I had prepared a lengthy account of my investigation of the theater arts committee, including some amazing correspondence I have had with that organization. However, since the Committee on Un-American Activities will doubtless investigate much more fully than I have been able, I shall confine myself to a few salient points.

The Theater Arts Committee was organized in the spring of 1937, following the call of the Communist International and the central committee of the Communist Party of the United States for a "broader united front" and "increased aid to Spain."

New Theater magazine folded the same month, April 1937, and the New Theater League, which was the name assumed by the League of Workers Theaters in 1935, retired to jurisdiction over the amateur Workers Theaters throughout the country, leaving the cause among professional theaters to TAC.

The editors of TAC in November 1939—the last issue of the magazine in which their names were published—were Edna Ocko, Robert Stebbins, Eleanor Flexner, and Robert Kingsley. The editors of New Theater, as listed in its last issue, April 1937, were Edna Ocko, Robert Stebbins, Eleanor Flexner, George Redfield, and Mark Marvin. Martin Harris also was on both staffs.

The last published executive board of TAC listed 28 people, of whom 20 had been affiliated with New Theater. Of the 36 members of their advisory board, 25 are or were members of two or more Communist front organizations. Mr. Harry Sacher, their counsel, was formerly a teacher in the Communist "Workers School" at 330 South Wells Street, Chicago, Ill. Mr. Bernard Reis, financial adviser, signed with Mr. Sam Jaffe the famous defense of the Soviet Union of last August, which states that all who would proclaim that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the totalitarian states are basically alike are Fascists.

The theater arts committee was affiliated with the League for Peace and Democracy and the Medical Bureau and North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, both proven Communist front organizations.

A cursory examination of the Daily Worker will reveal the Theater Arts Committee and its activities are favorably publicized from 6 to 12 times in any given month. And only Communist or Communist-controlled organizations are given such frequent and favorable publicity by this registered organ of the Soviet Union.

T. A. C.'s address was until recently 132 West Forty-third Street. The New Theater League was at the same address. Early in 1940 both organizations changed addresses. Theater Arts Committee has changed its address six times, its name four times, its publishing corporation recently. New Theater changed its address five times, its publishing corporation three times. But always the same leaders, the same supporters, and the same policy—strict conformance to the party line—are revealed in every activity of both. TAC members direct the New Theater school. TAC members win the New Theater playwrighting contests. The majority of TAC members are or have been connected with the Theater Union, the Group Theater, Theater Collective, Artef, Workers Laboratory Theater, all of these organizations being members of the former League of Workers Theaters, section of the International Union of the Revolutionary Theater; address, post-office box 527, Moscow, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The Theater Arts Committee bombarded the theater companies this past summer with propaganda for the American Peace Mobilization, to be held in Chicago under Communist leadership. Last spring it published The Actors Present War, a skillful and subtle piece of propaganda which seems a completely sincere and moving plea for peace until we come on a commendation of Soviet Russia as the only true neutral, the Communist slogan, "The Yanks are not coming," and a typical protest on "persecution, suppressions, and violations of civil liberties."

RESPONSIBILITY OF EVERY ACTOR

Mr. Speaker, the members of the various actors' unions need to get busy on a thorough, drastic housecleaning. I see no reason why they cannot follow the lead of the Civil Liberties Union, many States, and many labor unions, and rule that no member of a Nazi, Fascist, or Communist organization, nor any sympathizer with these enemy systems, may hold office.

In conclusion, I wish to thank Mr. Richard Whorf, Miss Peggy Wood, Mr. Hugh Cameron, Mr. Walter Huston, Mr. Alfred Kappeler, Mr. Robert Haines, Mr. William Gaxton, and the many others who have written me. I am sorry that I cannot introduce all the information or the varying points of view contained in that correspondence.

I would like to quote just three short letters, since they typify the opinion of the majority.

AUGUST 9, 1940.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LAMBERTSON: I noticed in this week's issue of Variety, a theatrical weekly, that you were endeavoring, without success, to secure the names of the various individuals connected with the leftist organization, known as the Theater Arts Committee, which was organized the latter part of 1938.

Enclosed is an original letter of solicitation received by the writer, September 1938, with the information on it, which I think you are desirous of obtaining. Also a page from the Film Daily of October 11, which I also kept.

I am a theatrical man and was approached to join this organization; but at the time, the whole thing smelled like an acrobat's trunk after a 3-months' lay-off, especially as I noticed on the executive board and the advisory council, certain members, who in the past would steal the bird seed out of a cuckoo clock; hence any noble motives that they had suddenly acquired to defend America, would be open to suspicion.

A man, named Robert Reed, was the organizing director at the time that this phoney outfit was first organized.

With best wishes, I remain,

Very truly yours,

———— ————.

P. S. You will notice that the Theater Arts Committee goes on record as being affiliated with the Medical Bureau and North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, also American League for Peace and Democracy—latter organization, as you know, contain such well-known Communists as Earl Browder, Clarence Hathaway, James W. Ford, James Lerner, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Ben Gold, etc.

---

410 PARK AVENUE, NEW YORK, August 23, 1940.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: I have just read the copies of your statements from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD regarding the communistic element which has slowly but surely been gaining a stronghold in the Actors' Equity Association. As a member of long standing and a stanch supporter of the organization, I can only say that I am shocked and disgusted at what has apparently been going on and am in thorough accord with everything you say.

This element must be stamped out. With the help of men like yourself I am confident we shall be able to eradicate this repugnant and cancerous growth.

Very sincerely yours,

CLIFTON WEBB.

NEW YORK CITY, August 21, 1940.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: I thank you very much for your letter and the extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The situation for us in the theater is most unpleasant, and your published statement confirms what has been common gossip for years, that the council of our association has been influenced by what is, to my mind, a most subversive element. I and many others would like to get rid of it. I feel that everyone in the theater should take the matter seriously, and I am most willing to do anything I can to fight this damaging element.

I regret very much that all your records were rejected and not published in the Equity magazine. This seems to demonstrate very clearly the domination of our council by the communistic element which you have attacked.

Very truly yours,

MARGALO GILLMORE.

If the many actors and actresses who have expressed themselves similarly are sincere and determined in their desire to clean up this situation, they can restore the old-time integrity and prestige of the Actors Equity Association. I hope I have helped. Mr. DIES' committee will undoubtedly help. But it is only the vigilance and sustained effort of the membership, the responsibility of the individual actor for his organization, that can correct the present sordid situation.

The Wild Bull of the Pampas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 24, (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM MONTGOMERY (ALA.) ADVERTISER

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, under the leave granted me, I present for printing in the Appendix the editorial from the Montgomery Advertiser of Montgomery, Ala., of the issue of September 21, 1940, under the heading "The Wild Bull of the Pampas, and Jack Dempsey."

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser of September 21, 1940]

THE "WILD BULL OF THE PAMPAS" AND JACK DEMPSEY

Dr. George Gallup, director of the American Institute of Public Opinion, said in analyzing his recent poll, announced yesterday, that if the Presidential election were held today Mr. Roosevelt's victory over Mr. Willkie would be of "landslide proportions."

Dr. Gallup need not have used the phrase. His figures speak much more eloquently of the facts: His count gives Roosevelt 38 States. His total strength in the all-powerful electoral college now stands at 453.

Willkie's is only 78. (Incidentally, but interestingly, Dr. Gallup reports that 85 percent of Alabamians are for Roosevelt.)

This sensational swing toward Roosevelt has occurred since the President swapped the 50 destroyers for the naval and air bases—that time when he shocked Mr. Willkie, the Union Leaguers, and, oh, ever so many other people because he did not consult Congress. You will remember the episode.

This man whom the St. Louis Post-Dispatch denounced in a purple editorial as a dictator and an irresponsible warmonger naturally did not refer his deal to the Senate, as it was not necessary under the Constitution and the statutes. But he did tell the American people all about it, and now the people, speaking through the Institute of Public Opinion, have validated the deal and declared their faith in the President's leadership in the potentially greatest crisis that this country has faced since Valley Forge.

We are assuming, of course, that the Gallup poll is as accurate now as it has fairly consistently shown itself to be in the past. "Old Grandma" crosses her fingers and trusts that Dr. Gallup is not heading toward as big a bust as the Literary Digest was in 1936.

Mr. Roosevelt has captured 10 States from the Hoosier flash in the last 10 days; a State a day is doing pretty well for a candidate who makes no (ahem!) "political" speeches and never mentions his opponent's name or even recognizes his candidacy.

In these 10 days the President's most significant gains have been in such pivotal Eastern States as New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and such pivotal Middle Western States as Indiana and Illinois. The President has not yet captured Indiana, but he has 49 percent of the votes there. Other Republican States are: Maine, Vermont, South Dakota, Iowa, North Dakota, Kansas, Nebraska, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. In all of these States the vote is close. Even in Maine and Vermont Willkie has only 56 percent of the votes. But even in the great pivotal States where Roosevelt is leading the vote is close. In New York, for instance, F. D. R. has only 52 percent against Willkie's 48, and the same in Pennsylvania.

The President's margin of electoral votes (the ones that really count) is all out of proportion to his popular vote. He has a majority of popular votes in this poll. The President has 55 percent of the popular vote, but it may yet run higher since the drift toward him has just begun. However, we shall not know until next week whether that drift has been checked by Mr. Willkie's recent campaign swing through the West. The Republican candidate has been greeted by great crowds. We should know by next Friday what sort of impression he has made upon these crowds.

The probability is that the swing toward Roosevelt is by now so far out of hand that the Republican candidate cannot regain his grip. Mr. Willkie will undoubtedly receive a great popular vote—that is, he would if the election were held today—but a great popular vote that is not quite great enough makes one look bad in the electoral college, and it is in the electoral college that Mr. Willkie, the new gallery god of American politics, will look bad, except in South Carolina. There even the popular vote makes a caricature of his candidacy. Score: 98 percent for Roosevelt. Tops. (This should be of special interest to Senator ELLISON DURANT SMITH and the much-loved Charleston News and Courier, to mention only two latter-day nullificationists.)

We think we can explain Bre'r Willkie's unexpected poor showing in the national polls. In the first place, his theory as to the best way to lay the champ low turns out to be all wrong. In the beginning, being a belligerent, forthright, colorful challenger, his theory was that he should step into the ring and slug it out with what he acknowledged as the champ. That tactic might have been fine and dandy if he and Roosevelt had started from scratch on an even basis. Then again it might not have been, since Roosevelt is the champ only because inherent in him are the rare qualities that make a champion.

But the Hoosier flash forgot that that man is also the President of the United States. The American people are jealous of the dignity and position of their President. If their ruling prince is doing well and there is a crisis in national affairs, they will have no patience with one who abuses their prince as if he were just another favor-seeking politician. That principle is old and constant, but the current challenger muffed it.

Mr. Roosevelt has not attacked Mr. Willkie—he has not even noticed him. Mr. Willkie attacked Mr. Roosevelt, the greatest politician that ever ruled this Nation, but in doing so he abused and misrepresented and misinterpreted the President of the United States.

Well, one cannot fool the people as easily as in the dead days of the dreary past. Today the people are "up" on their politics. They read daily newspapers, weekly magazines, and listen to hourly broadcasts on the radio. Today the people are not more scholarly than they used to be, but they know more. Their native wit is sharpened daily by the fresh impacts of information and suggestion. They are not as smart as Willkie and Roosevelt, to be sure, but they have the low-down on both. They know which one of them is really on their side. Talk about the democratic process all you like—but you watch the smoke that emerges from chimneys over the firesides of the American people in November. They know who's their honey. The fat coupon clippers who think the common people of America are too dumb to get out of a shower of rain are greater idiots than the plain people they scorn and ridicule. As we have heretofore said in this sacrosanct space, they never see a big train coming until it hits them in the belly and cuts a foot off. Then they get up, regather their busted galluses which they had but a moment before been thumbing arrogantly, go to a hospital, get their wounds dressed, and thereafter either vote for or pray for the Republican ticket. For more than 7 years they have confused the Republican elephant with one or more of the Apostles, notwithstanding that Franklin Delano Roosevelt, with all his manifest faults, is the greatest humanitarian statesman that ever sat in the White House.

Mr. Willkie meant well, but was and is inept. The Advertiser still thinks that the most comical episode in the long history of politics in the major American league was the achievement of this Wall Street lawyer, this utility executive, and but recently a ward-heeling Democrat, in drafting, sacking and putting in a concentration camp for the duration, the Republican Party, the old tormentor of the Democratic South. Every now and then, while sitting alone musing on the sins of this ribald and romantic world "Old Grandma" lays down her knitting and laughs indecorously at what Willkie, of all men, did to the Union Leaguers at Philadelphia.

At Philadelphia the challenger of "the champ" knocked the champ out of the ring in the first round. By the use of nerve gas he paralyzed the Republican opposition, and captured it. But Franklin D. Roosevelt, people's choice, was pushed back into the ring by the reporters, and yesterday we read the blow-by-blow account of the terrible second round. * * * The "Wild Bull of the Pampas" knocked or pushed Jack Dempsey out of the ring when they fought, but the champ hurried back into the ring, and in the second slaughtered his opponent, leaving him gasping, fit only for merciful hospital treatment.

As matters now stand we think the challenger should wait as long as Gene Tunney did. Gene waited until the champ had softened, even then he nearly lost his life, being saved only because of his greater stamina and a long count.

The "wild bull" of Indiana charged and hooked the champ, but he went to sleep in the second round. It was a gallant but reckless charge. There was no sense in it. Walloping Wendell had not been sufficiently seasoned in the preliminaries. Ambition—by that sin the angels fell.

The Radio Monopoly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest problems facing the American people, other than national defense, is to provide steady employment at decent wages for our millions of unemployed workers.

To my mind one of the greatest contributing causes for the lack of job opportunities is the substitution of power machinery in place of manpower in order to reduce costs and, secondly, the inadequate taxes levied on those corporations which, through the development of new and monopolistic methods, secure exorbitant profits on the actual moneys invested as compared with the high taxes levied on those competing industries which provide steady employment for many thousands of our workers at decent wages, the profits of which concerns are not at all excessive.

Illustrative of the above we might compare the meager profits of the press, newspapers, and magazines with vast sums of money invested in costly equipment and highly skilled manpower with the profits of a competing government-protected monopoly—radio broadcasting.

It is well to bear in mind that licenses for radio broadcasting stations are issued wholly within the discretion of the Federal Communications Commission, and are authorized by the Congress provided that the holders of such licenses presumably serve public interest. These licenses, or governmental franchises, are issued without the payment to the Government of even the proverbial penny even in these days when the need of Government revenue is greater than ever.

Yet the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is replete with citations, in the official reports of the Federal Communications Commission, wherein the holders of these licenses of governmental franchises have sold this governmental property for sums ranging into the millions of dollars.

A free press is widely recognized as one of the real bulwarks of a free democracy. The press of America is free because it is beholden to no governmental power or no one or few groups of individuals.

The editors of our thousands of newspapers and magazines, located in almost every community in our land, are free from any concentrated control on the part of any group or groups.

These publications to continue to be free must, however, secure sufficient revenue from advertising to pay the wages of their skilled workers, to pay for the costly machinery necessary for the production of their newspapers and magazines, and to pay the high taxes which the Congress and the States have levied upon them.

It might be well for our tax experts to look into the comparative profits of these two types of competitors for national advertising. For years we managed to get along without radio broadcasting, while I doubt if our Nation and our people would be as well off today had we not had, since prior to the founding of our country, a free and militant press. In passing, I might add it is not my desire to in any way cripple or hinder the radio broadcasting industry. That industry, as does the theater, as well as the press, furnishes information and pleasure to many millions of our people.

However, I repeat, one of the essentials for the preservation of a free democracy is a free press. I doubt if any newspapers or magazines, with possibly rare exceptions, can show profits averaging even 10 percent on the actual investment during the past 10 years.

Newspapers and magazines provide profitable employment, I understand, for well over 100,000 highly skilled American workers, the weekly wages of which will probably average close to $50 per week or some $2,600 per year. On the other hand, it is my understanding that the radio broadcasting industry, as represented by some 705 radio stations officially reporting to the Federal Communications Commission, provides steady employment for some 11,000 workers at an average weekly wage of less than $30 per week, other than some 2,600 musicians and artists who receive an average of $46 per week, plus an additional 1,000 workers, on part time, who average some $15 per week and some 2,350 musicians and artists, on part time, who average some $18 per week.

In competition with our free press we find a radio broadcasting monopoly, wherein two great combines, controlled by a relatively few men, located in one city, can and do dictate as to what radio programs the American people will listen to when they listen at all.

Recently, the Monopoly Investigating Committee of the Federal Communications Commission reported, after an exhaustive 2-year study, that these two radio monopolists during the past 12 years of their existence had received in net earnings, after the payment of taxes and all other necessary expenses, a total of some $45,000,000 on total cash investments, at the most, of less than $4,000,000, a yearly average, for each of the past 12 years, of almost 100 percent in net profits on their actual investments.

For the information of those interested, I quote from the Summary and Conclusions of the Federal Communications Commission Committee Investigating Radio Monopoly the following excerpts—page 20:

> The net earnings of Columbia, during the 12-year period of its existence, have been $22,522,471. Of this amount $16,872,863 (more than 13 times all cash ever paid into the corporation) has been paid to its shareholders in dividends; the remainder is invested largely in current assets. The net earnings for Columbia for 1938 were in the amount of $3,541,741.

And, from page 22, referring to the National Broadcasting Co., I quote:

> The total earnings (net) during the period of its existence (12 years) have been $22,319,833. Since it began paying dividends in 1934 (6 years ago), it has paid to its parent company $18,100,000

(cash dividends of $14,900,000, lease negotiations fees of $2,200,000, and research and development fees of $1,000,000). Of the remainder ($4,219,833), losses on bad financial investments not related to broadcasting have consumed $1,171,763, and $673,333 have been charged off of the goodwill and other intangible values purchased by National. As of the end of 1938, there remained in the company $2,374,735 as earned surplus.

The earnings (net) for National for 1938 were in the amount of $3,434,301. Its investment in tangible property at the end of 1938 was $4,284,032. (Of this amount, $2,346,420 was invested in land and buildings alone.)

Columbia has never received but $1,648,167 from its shareholders, and of this amount it was required to pay out $1,163,860 in 1932 to Paramount-Publix Corporation, one of its shareholders, in the reacquisition of its own stock.

This left an actual remaining cash investment of only $484,307.

The total capitalization of National Broadcasting Co., as shown by the report of the Federal Communications Commission, was never greater than $3,300,000. This makes a total actual cash investment in both companies of $3,784,307, on which net earnings during the past 12 years have amounted to some $45,000,000.

From page 15 of the committee's report I quote:

In 1938 out of the amount retained by Columbia and National ($32,046,218) they paid to themselves as depreciation (1938 alone) $2,860,470 and, after paying all other expenses, had left available for dividends $6,976,040. The dividends actually paid (1938) are not available in this record. They paid dividends for the preceding year, however, of $5,635,006, or 67.5 percent of the net income for that year.

In addition, Columbia, with remaining cash investment of only $484,307, charged off as depreciation, for the 5-year period 1934–38, inclusive, $2,560,379, or more than five times the actual remaining cash invested in that company.

In view of the need on the part of our Government to secure additional and necessary revenues to pay the costs of our national defense, it is my belief that our tax experts might well compare the yearly profits which have accrued to this governmentally promoted radio monopoly, considering the small amount of cash actually invested, with the meager profits of its advertising competitor, our free press, our newspapers, and magazines.

Recently, John B. Haggerty, president, International Allied Printing Trades Associations, comprising the five international printing workers' unions, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and president, International Brotherhood of Bookbinders, delivered a short but able address on this subject, which I herewith include as a part of my remarks. I have no hesistancy in recommending to every Member of the House that the facts contained in the remarks presented by President Haggerty at the Golden Anniversary Convention of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants Union are very informative:

RADIO ADVERTISING THE FRANKENSTEIN OF PRINTED PUBLICATIONS—DEPRIVES THOUSANDS OF PRINTING TRADES WORKERS OF THEIR JOBS—RADIO BROADCAST STATIONS OBTAIN GOVERNMENT MONOPOLY LICENSE—FOR WHICH THEY PAY NOTHING TO THE GOVERNMENT—AND HAVE REALIZED PROFITS OF MILLIONS THROUGH TRANSFER OF THESE LICENSES—PROFITS OF ONE RADIO COMPANY, IN 4 DEPRESSION YEARS, ALONE $17,000,000 ON CASH INVESTMENT OF LESS THAN $1,600,000—CONTINUANCE OF A FREE PRESS AND A FREE DEMOCRACY IS THREATENED—WHAT ARE YOU GOING TO DO ABOUT IT?

The following taken from the address of John B. Haggerty, president, International Brotherhood of Bookbinders, and chairman, Board of Governors, International Allied Printing Trades Association, at the Golden Anniversary Convention of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants Union, Pressmen's Home, Tennessee, September 9, 1940:

"While the subject I am about to touch upon is somewhat far apart from what I have just stated, it is of vital interest to labor, particularly in the printing trades field, and deals with radio advertising.

"In its first stage, radio appeared to the press as a novelty, with the result that the press gave it millions of dollars worth of space gratis as it always has for professional baseball. The press was gullible enough to give radio far more free space that radio could have ever hoped to purchase. Radio programs were featured much the same as a band concert, and the press played up these radio artists in the theaters while the theater managers played up these radio artists in the papers. This, of course, was fine for the owners of radio stations out selling time to national advertisers.

"It was not realized by the press that through such publicizing on the air it was building up for itself most severe competition. Little did the press appreciate that the radio would spell finish to all sport extras, and as a result of all this the daily newspapers soon heard radio's slogan: 'You get your news first by radio.' This is true, and the radio listener—and almost everyone has a radio—now gets the news on the air as soon as the editor. The press must now realize that it has helped to create its own Frankenstein.

"Commercial advertising is the principal lifeblood of national magazines, newspapers, and farm publications.

"Many thousands of skilled printing-trades workers are dependent for their jobs on the ability and the success of publishers of these magazines, newspapers, and farm publications securing sufficient advertising income, through the printing of advertisements or products sold nationally, to meet their weekly pay roll.

"During the last decade a new and already highly dangerous competitor has entered the field of advertising and has each year deprived additional thousands of our workers of their job opportunities.

"I refer to radio broadcasting, which, for the year 1939, has diverted from printed publications advertising income direct to the radio stations alone of some $170,000,000. This sum of $170,000,000 represents only the amount paid directly to the radio stations. In order to arrive at the true amount of advertising diverted from printed publications in 1939 alone, it would be necessary to add to this $170,000,000 the estimated additional $200,000,000 spent in 1939 for artists, actors, bands, and telephone costs which made the spending of this $170,000,000 with the radio stations advisable.

"Contrast this $370,000,000 spent in 1939 for radio advertising with the total advertising income of $525,000,000 spent with all the newspapers, daily and Sunday; the $150,000,000 spent in 1939 in all our magazines; and the $17,000,000 spent for advertising in all our farm publications. You will readily see that all of the workers dependent upon the continuance of newspapers, magazines, and farm publications for their jobs should speedily realize that this new type of advertising competition menaces not only the security of their jobs but also will have a tremendous influence on their wages and conditions of employment.

"The diversion of advertising income from printed publications to radio broadcasting during the last 10 years surely warrants action on the part of every person interested in the printing industry, whether such persons are employers or employees.

"We, as workers, naturally look to the employers to protect their investments, or, better said, their markets. However, the fact that the employers have not protected either their investments or their markets does not excuse the officials and the members of the printing-trades unions from protecting the job opportunities of the skilled workers in the printing-trades industry.

"In 1929, when newspapers had an advertising income of some $800,000,000; when magazines had an advertising income of $240,000,000; when farm publications had an advertising income of $35,000,000, radio broadcasting stations had an advertising income of but $40,000,000.

"In the succeeding years radio broadcasting advertising income increased yearly by the many millions of dollars, while the advertising income of newspapers, magazines, and farm papers continually decreased.

"Considering only the direct advertising income of the radio broadcasting stations in 1939 of some $170,000,000, and, leaving aside the estimated additional $200,000,000 spent collaterally in putting these radio broadcasting advertisements across, we find that newspapers in 1939 received some 16 percent less, magazines received some 17 percent less, and farm papers received some 50 percent less of the advertising dollars spent than they did in 1929. A different story is found when we learn that radio broadcasting stations, which received only 3 percent of the advertising dollars spent in 1929, in 1939 received almost 20 percent directly of the advertising dollar.

"However, if you add the $170,000,000 which the radio broadcast stations received directly and the estimated $200,000,000 which was spent collaterally to make this radio advertising possible, you find that this new competitor in 1939 received some 70 percent as much as the total amount received for advertising by all of the newspapers and almost twice as much as the total amount spent for advertising in all of the magazines.

"In the case of magazines and newspapers, the owners have necessarily invested many millions of dollars. Likewise, we, representing the workers, have an investment of some 175,000 skilled workers, the majority of whom have served an apprenticeship of at least 5 years in acquiring their skill.

"However, the radio broadcasting stations have comparatively a small cash investment and likewise they provide employment for only a few thousand workers.

"It might also be well for us to bear in mind that the owners of printing establishments and likewise the workers employed in such plants have no Government guaranty of a monopoly in their community. They must face the competition of any person who can purchase or secure printing machinery or who has the skill necessary to produce printed publications.

"The radio broadcasters receive a license from the Government, for which they pay nothing to the Goverment, and also they hold a monopoly in the community in which they operate.

"In passing, I might add that the recent report of the monopoly investigating committee of the Federal Communications Commission concludes that even 'our democracy is threatened' by this radio monopoly. I quote from their report, as follows:

" 'To the extent that the ownership and control of radio broadcast stations falls into fewer and fewer hands, whether they be network organizations or other private interests, the free dissemination of ideas and information, upon which our democracy depends, is threatened.'

"During the past 10 years we have seen a steady decline in the number of newspapers and magazines published. On the other hand, we have seen a continual increase in the number of radio broadcasting stations licensed by the Government.

"Government reports show that the total cash investment in the Columbia Broadcasting System is less than $1,600,000. Yet, during the depression years of 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938, this radio broadcasting company received on its cash investment of less than $1,600,000—after the payment of all necessary expenses—a net broadcast income of some $17,000,000.

"The profits of this company are cited simply as illustrative of the millions which this new competitor—radio broadcasting—has ready to expend in contrast with the cry of poverty which we so often hear from the publishers of newspapers and magazines, especially when we seek to better the conditions of the workers in those plants.

"The profits of the radio broadcasting stations, the diversion of advertising from newspapers, magazines, and farm papers, has already resulted in newspaper publishers spending millions of dollars, taken from the profits of newspaper publishing in the past, in the purchase of radio broadcasting stations.

"It is understood that many newspaper publishers contend that the purchase of these competitors for advertising, radio stations, was necessary to protect their local advertising field.

"During the past few years printed publications, especially the newspapers, although the same could well apply to magazines, have found another radio worm diverting their advertising.

"An advertising agency or persons experienced in advertising solicitation secure a license to operate a radio station in one community and then secure additional licenses for booster radio stations in localities, say 25 or 30 miles away. In those localities, with an investment of a comparatively few thousands of dollars they erect a radio transmitter, connected by telephone with the major radio station, and, immediately they divert many additional thousands of advertising dollars from struggling newspapers and farm publications and thus destroy the opportunities for jobs of printing-trades workers employed in those publications.

"One not abreast of these conditions can well ask how has all this happened. How is it that the advertising of newspapers, magazines, and farm papers have been yearly reduced many millions of dollars while radio broadcasting direct income increased from $40,000,000 in 1929 to $170,000,000 in 1939?

"National advertising is handled, promoted, and placed by national advertising agencies. When we find a governmental agency, after an exhaustive survey, reporting that 90 percent of all network commercial programs are builded by advertising agencies, we find one of the reasons for this unusual condition.

"Newspapers and magazines pay to the advertising agencies a commission of 15 percent. Likewise the radio broadcast stations and networks pay to the advertising agencies a commission of 15 percent. If an advertising agency is authorized to pay out $1,000,000 for advertising in newspapers and magazines, they must necessarily contact several different publications and their net income is probably reduced to some 7 or 8 percent of this 15-percent commission. When the same agency has $1,000,000 to spend on radio advertising they contact but one or two radio networks and their 15-percent commission is practically net. Add to this net income the amounts which the advertising agency receives in additional commissions from artists, bands, etc., and you can readily see that the net cash income for the advertising agency is much greater, when they place their advertising with radio-broadcasting stations, than when they place advertising with printed publications.

"The officials of the printing-trades unions, through the board of governors of the international allied printing trades unions, comprising the five international printing trades unions, of which I have the honor of being chairman of the board, realizing the inactivity of the newspaper and magazine publishers have been studying this situation.

"The last meeting of the board of governors of the International Allied Printing Trades Association, after considering some preliminary surveys made, created a committee on radio, consisting of your able and influential president, George L. Berry, Edward J. Volz, president, Photo-Engravers International Union, and myself, as president of the International Brotherhood of Bookbinders, to act on this important question.

"The committee will soon, I hope, be in a position to decide upon definite plans which will protect the job opportunities of thousands of printing-trades workers by preventing the continued diversion of advertising from printed publications to radio-broadcast stations.

"Some months ago this committee addressed a letter to all newspaper and magazine publishers, setting before them certain information and asking their cooperation in finding some way to prevent the continued diversion of advertising income from printed publications to radio-broadcast stations and to protect the job opportunities of those workers dependent upon the publication of newspapers, magazines, and farm papers.

"The outbreak of the war necessitated, for the present, the lessening of our activities. In the meantime, we are accumulating additional data, and it is my hope that we will soon be able to lay before all of the workers in the printing-trades industry a definite plan which we can all support wholly with the one idea in mind of protecting the job opportunities of those dependent upon the printing industry for their means of livelihood.

"With men and management realizing what they are confronted with through the widespread activities of the radio in the advertising field, the question prompts itself, quite naturally, what will they do with the possibility of television, which will take salesmen off the road by sending their pictures into the homes, presenting fashion shows, vacuum-cleaning, and other demonstrations, cooking lessons, etc. So far, the radio, with its medicine shows has given only the dialog, but television will give you both the dialog and the motion pictures of actors and scenery in colors. This is certainly something to worry the printing-trades industry more than the radio, because the air will always be cheaper than newsprint.

"In closing, let me state quite specifically that in this short address I have only touched upon the highlights of this subject so important to all those sincerely interested in the success and advancement of the printing-trades industry, and especially the workers in this industry.

"I would recommend that every delegate to this convention, upon his return to his local union, call the attention of his union to this matter. I would further recommend that each union appoint a radio committee, and your committee, as well as the members of your local union, should call the attention of your candidates for Congress to the fact that this unbridled and unfair competition on the part of radio-broadcast stations, licensed by the Government, and for which license they pay the Government nothing, is depriving many thousands of printing-trades workers of their opportunities for jobs."

A Dirt Farmer Writes About Farming Under the New Deal—Says Roosevelt, Wallace, and the New Deal Have "Sold America Short"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, so many politicians are making a living or holding public office by the gentle art of telling the farmers of America how much they have done for them that it is interesting once in a whole to let an actual dirt farmer speak for himself in describing what these new dealers have done to him. The attached letter is from an actual dirt farmer in South Dakota and was written as an open letter in one of the prominent daily newspapers of the State. The author of the letter is a Democrat. The first-hand experience which he reports from his farming experiences under the New Deal indicate clearly that America's farm problem is still unsolved and is the No. 1 economic problem of this country. His letter merits the careful reading of everybody interested in rebuilding the basic industry of America.

This democratic farmer reflects the clear-visioned reasoning of the great bulk of American farmers. Their votes are not for sale. Their opinions cannot be force-fed by high-powered radio programs and Government propagandists. They are smart enough to know when a farm program is working for their advantage without being told by high-salaried Government agents and they are smart enough to know what is wrong with a program of restricted production at home and increased imports from abroad regardless of the finest phrases and the prettiest words of the world's best radio speaker.

America's dirt farmers know that any farm program to be permanently successful must pay full parity prices to the producer for all of his products consumed domestically; they know that half a farm cannot support well-rounded farm prosperity and a tax load levied against a whole farm; they know that good intentions do not mean good income, and that a conflict of policies means eventual bankruptcy for American agriculture. They know that a program designed to meet an emergency cannot be continued until eternity unless it does more than keep the farmer out of the poorhouse. They want a chance to succeed as well as security against starvation.

NEW DEAL FARM PROGRAM AN APPEASEMENT PROGRAM

I have voted for every farm appropriation bill coming before this Congress as benefit checks and parity payments much larger than those parceled out would not amply compensate our farmers for the growing disparity between the price of what they sell and the price of what they buy. But I have persistently pleaded with Congress to meet the challenge of actually solving the farm problem instead of "appeasing" it with checks.

These "subsistence checks" have kept the farmers from complete collapse but they have not made up to him the injury done by the New Deal's cruel program of steadily increasing competitive farm imports and its unique philosophy of paying one group of farmers inadequate checks for not raising crops while taxing them and all other citizens for reclaiming land in other sections to produce more of the same commodities. These payments were no gift to the farmers; they represent no accumulation of unearned increment. They were a pitifully poor substitute for a chance to make a profit these past 7 years; they offer no hope to the young man who desires to set up in the farming business with the hope of saving enough each year to buy and own his own farm and to retire with an independence in old age. Far from being "parity payments" they have not even been "adjusted compensation" for the nearly 8 years of lost opportunity on the American farm. It is no wonder Mr. Wallace talks so much about "appeasement." He should be the country's best authority on the subject. It is the basis of his whole farm program.

This letter from a dirt farmer, a South Dakota Democrat who reasons as he works, presents a real challenge to Congress to reexplore the farm problem with a determination to stick with the question until the American farmer is given the fair chance to which he is entitled. He who manages a farm and works from dawn to dark is entitled to a net profit for his labors fully as much as the owner of an industry who works from 9 to 5 and complains when the Government limits his net profit to 10 percent.

WALLACE URGES "CEILI'G" ON FARM PRICES

Recently this Congress passed legislation removing restrictions on the profit making of certain industries. Whether that action is just or unjust, it is in strange contrast with the public statement of Secretary Henry Wallace about a year ago when he threatened to "put a lid on farm prices" if they rose too much as a result of the European war. He could have saved himself the worry and escaped the embarrassment of going on record against giving the farmer a break because the big problem of the American farmer is still the need for a floor to hold his prices up to parity rather than a ceiling to keep them from going too high.

Were the former Secretary of Agriculture, now stumping the country in his effort to ascend to the Vice Presidency, as quick to plead for a floor to maintain parity prices for the farmer as he was to caution farmers that he would arbitrarily fix a ceiling if their products started to raise in price too fast, foreclosures would be less frequent on the farm today, and the men who do the farming instead of trying to farm the farmer would not be writing letters like the following to the newspapers of the land. The letter follows:

RAP AT WALLACE

TO THE EDITOR OF THE DAILY REPUBLIC:

Read with great interest your literary debate with the Honorable W. A. Prather over Secretary Wallace's assets as head of the Department of Agriculture. I, like W. A., also believe your claim that Wallace has done more for agriculture than any other man in the history of the United States is an amazing statement and must add that this belief, to millions of Americans, is an absurd assumption.

Why? Under the New Deal, of which Wallace is a member and strong supporter, agriculture has been dealt a raw deal. Agriculture has been sold down the river by Wallace, Hull, and all the "brain trusters" at Washington. Strong statements? Yes, but backed by the record. For 8 years I have been on the farm; for 8 years I have gained first-hand knowledge of agriculture and agriculture's needs, which is the backbone of the Nation.

We have been told that we have a surplus of certain crops. We have been told that the farmer should be on parity with industry. The Government has had us reduce our acreage, has given us parity payments, and soil checks, yet agriculture only gets 76 percent of parity. Our foreign markets have been lost. The A. A. A. lost them. The United States today imports more competitive farm products than it sells. While we were reducing our acres, we were importing competitive farm products to an equal amount to displace this reduction. American agriculture must compete with 25-cent-a-day Java and other foreign labor because of Hull and his "fuddy duddies" at Washington. The reciprocal-trade treaties with free trade helps 5 percent of the Nation and harms 95 percent of the Nation. Forty percent of the Nation live on the farm, yet they receive only 17 percent of the national income.

United States economics are governed by a 1–1–7 ratio. For every billion dollars agriculture makes, industry's pay roll is also a billion dollars and the national income is $7,000,000,000. Secretary Wallace himself has pointed out this fact several times, so if agriculture gets 80 cents for corn instead of 40, the national income is boosted by millions of dollars. The same goes all the way down the line with wheat, hogs, cattle, barley, oats, cotton, etc. Yet agriculture can't get parity prices (parity means an equal price for what he sells with industry for what they sell) for his products when he must compete with cheap foreign products and labor that are let in duty-free or practically duty-free under the Hull trade treaties, which are indorsed by Wallace. Industry is protected by tariffs—that was seen to by them in the Hawley-Smoot bill. Hull doesn't lower duties on them; just on agriculture. Thus, a large majority of the Nation suffers for a handful. Give agriculture parity tariff with industry and the Nation will again see prosperity.

Foreign products imported into this country displace millions of acres of American land and has conservatively been estimated to displace the labor of 6,000,000 men. Parity prices today would be about 80 cents for corn, $1 for wheat, $10 per hundredweight for hogs, $12 for cattle, $10 for sheep, etc. Because of the trade treaties, American agriculture, even with Wallace's parity and soil payments, is 25 percent less than it should be, which is robbing Americans of $20,000,000,000 a year income and 6,000,000 unemployed of work. Throw out Hull, Wallace, and the trade treaties, give us protective or parity tariff (equal tariff with industry, whether high or low), give 40 percent of the Nation more dollars and we (the agricultural half of the Nation) will buy more food, more clothes, more cars; likewise, labor will go back to work and have more money. Plants will expand; bang will go the surplus, unemployment and the depression. We can help the needy and balance the Budget.

America is unprepared. America is in debt. And America has been sold down the river because the New Deal gave America a shot in the arm in the form of huge spending and parity payments to farmers, instead of finding the sickness and getting to the bottom of it. The world was in a deep depression from which it grew back to prosperity. America still has 10,000,000 unemployed, 3,000,000 on relief, agriculture at 76 percent of parity, and a $50,000,000,000 debt because for 7 years the New Deal has failed.

No; Wallace has not done more for agriculture than any other man in the history of our country. No; a program like the one described in this writing would have done more for agriculture and the Nation than Wallace and his New Deal have done in 7 long years. No; the New Deal, with its Wallaces and its Hulls, has sold America short.

Yours for a real "new deal"; yours to Willkie, with his pledge of full parity and MCNARY'S support of the program herein outlined. Not Hull and his competition with 25-cent-a-day foreign labor and duty-free products. Not Wallace and his killing of pigs and plowing under of cotton while we imported like products. Not the New Deal and its 7 years of failure. Not the third termers who meddle in foreign affairs and are marching us down the road to war to turn our eyes from the sad and frightful situation of our home affairs.

True, I'm the grandson of W. A. Prather, but my politics are not necessarily his, for I am registered a Democrat, and I, like millions more, are at least waking up. We have been fooled. We are going back to sound Americanism.

JERRY PRATHER.

PLATTE, S. DAK.

Mr. Ladner's Support of President Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 24 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM PHILADELPHIA RECORD

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Philadelphia Record of the issue of September 11, 1940, under the heading "From His Own Camp." The editorial discusses the criticism of Mr. Willkie by Mr. Albert H. Ladner, Jr.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of September 11, 1940]

FROM HIS OWN CAMP

The gravest and most outspoken criticism of Wendell Willkie which we have seen in recent weeks was delivered on Monday by a Republican, Albert H. Ladner, Jr., a leader of the independents in his party.

Mr. Ladner announced that despite his party affiliations he cannot and will not support Willkie for President. He will work for the reelection of Franklin D. Roosevelt. And he called upon the 230,000 Pennsylvania Republicans who voted for him when he bucked the organization in the Senatorial primary last spring to follow him in this new crusade against Tory leadership.

His chief reason was the reason why many conscientious voters will decline to follow the "barefoot Wall Street lawyer." It is a result of Willkie's opposition to the first practical plan offered by Congress for possible conscription of any industry which refuses to cooperate in the national defense because of greed for excessive profits.

"I have two sons, both of whom hold commissions in the Pennsylvania National Guard," said Mr. Ladner. "I am willing that if my country needs them—and I expect that they will be called—they should and would be ready to make whatever sacrifices are necessary.

"How, then, can I conscientiously give my support to a candidate who places more value upon the dollars contained in the money bags of Wall Street than he does in the blood that flows through the veins of my children?"

The question is unanswerable. Not even in the Record have we used such strong terms as these—from a member of Willkie's own party. We know that they will be heard. Not only by the 230,000 unbossed members of the G. O. P. to whom he directs them, but by countless other Republicans who will refuse to place their faith and their country's fate in the hands of a candidate who believes money to be more sacred than men.

Hearings on Geyer Anti-Poll-Tax Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

LETTERS OF HON. LEE E. GEYER, OF CALIFORNIA, TO MEMBERS OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, in an effort to get the hearings on the Geyer anti-poll-tax bill printed, I have written two letters, the first one to all members of the Judiciary Committee and the second to the chairman of the subcommittee that heard the testimony.

The letters follow:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 13, 1940.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: As you are a member of the Judiciary Committee, I am appealing to you to assist in righting what I believe to be an injustice.

I do not wish to be understood as attacking the motive of any of my colleagues. I do believe, however, that it has been manifestly unfair to the Judiciary Committee, to the House membership, and to me that the hearings on H. R. 7534 have not been printed. I have taken this matter up both with the chairman of your committee, the Honorable HATTON W. SUMNERS, and with the chairman of the subcommittee, the Honorable FRANCIS E. WALTER.

I am attaching a copy of a letter sent to Congressman WALTER on August 24, 1940. This letter will state the case in detail. To date I have not received an answer to this letter. You will note by the letter to him that the hearings were completed on the 17th day of May. That at one time he ordered them printed and then had a change of heart.

I am asking that this committee investigate this matter thoroughly and give all persons interested the opportunity of receiving copies of these hearings. I should be most happy to appear before your committee with this request should you so desire.

Very sincerely yours,

LEE E. GEYER.

AUGUST 24, 1940.

Congressman FRANCIS E. WALTER,
United States House of Representatives,
Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Last Tuesday, August 20, when I inquired of the clerk of the Judiciary Committee, I was amazed to learn that the hearings on H. R. 7534, the Geyer anti-poll-tax bill, had not yet been ordered printed. My records show that these hearings were completed May 17.

I waited until the 4th of June before I first inquired of the clerk of the Judiciary Committee whether or not the hearings were ready for distribution. I was surprised to learn at that time that the hearings had not been ordered printed. The excuse given was that a copy of the testimony of former Congressman Maury Maverick had been misplaced and therefore the printing had been held up. During this time no notice was given this office to the effect that part of the testimony was massing. As soon as we learned of it, we sent to Miss Smedley, assistant clerk of the committee, our carbon copy of the testimony of Mr. Maverick, receipt for which I hold in my office.

On numerous occasions after this, when I would see you on the floor, I would inquire how the printing was coming along. On each occasion you would say that the hearings had been sent down for printing and would no doubt be back soon. For almost 2 months I waited for the hearings to be returned from the printer, and finally I called Miss Smedley and she told me that you had not ordered the material to be sent to the printer. This I related to you one day on the floor, whereupon you insisted that it had been done.

You will recall that to settle the argument as to whether or not the hearings had been ordered printed, we went to the telephone together and in my presence you called the clerk of the committee and found that you were mistaken for you had never given an order to have the hearings printed. At that time in my presence you ordered over the telephone the clerk to send the material to the printer for publication. This was no doubt done, for on July 29 the page proof was given us for correction and on August 5 the copy was returned to the clerk of the committee with all corrections made. The Government Printing Office informs me that they received the proof August 7 marked "O. K. for printing" and the next day, August 8, for some reason unknown to them, the copy was withdrawn.

I was astounded when you told me last week that you did not expect to have these hearings printed at all. You gave two reasons: First, that you didn't consider the bill constitutional, and second, that the hearings were not completed, since no witnesses had appeared against the measure. In regard to the first excuse you give, I do not believe this enters into the picture. So far as the second is concerned, I would like to state that at each of the six hearings you asked whether or not anyone cared to appear in opposition to the bill and that no one was there in that capacity. As you know, many bills have gone through committee unopposed, with the hearings printed for distribution. For you to state now, since the petition has been put on the desk to discharge the committee, that the hearings are not closed, would seem to indicate that you had changed your mind, since you told me so often that the hearings had been authorized for printing.

I do not wish to interpret this letter as impugning the motives of a colleague, but I do feel that you should take immediate steps to have the hearings available for all, lest someone might misunderstand. I trust that they will be available within a few days.

Very sincerely yours,

LEE E. GEYER.

Support of President Roosevelt by Daily World, of Atlantic City, N. J.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. SMATHERS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 24, (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ATLANTIC CITY (N. J.) DAILY WORLD

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial published on the front page of the Daily World, of my home city of Atlantic City, N. J., wherein it announces its support of the reelection of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The Daily World is a Republican newspaper which is published in a Republican community. The Nation is blessed with good fortune when the editors of this newspaper, and other real Americans, have the courage to place patriotism above profit and country ahead of expediency.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Atlantic City Daily World]

ROOSEVELT FOR PRESIDENT!

President FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR PRESIDENT: You are now engaged in a struggle to preserve our democracy, a struggle no less serious than those faced by George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and Woodrow Wilson. Unfortunately for the American people, this crisis comes at a time when you would ordinarily wish to retire to well-earned laurels after serving your country. But the seriousness of the times made your party almost unanimously demand that you continue to lead your country in this, our time of deadly peril.

We are an independent newspaper. We wish to continue as an independent newspaper. But we also wish to continue as free men. In the past this newspaper has almost invariably supported Republican candidates for public office. In the last Presidential election we took no sides.

We read that the great majority of newspapers in this country are against your candidacy for President, that the press is almost solidly arrayed in favor of Willkie. It is true that we have not approved of many of your advisers, policies, and acts; that you have cost us much money, time, and trouble with your numerous agencies. Nevertheless, here is one usually Republican newspaper that has been honestly convinced after months of soul-searching inquiry that your reelection is vital to our country.

While our influence is necessarily confined to the eastern part of sou h Jersey, perhaps we will mean more than that to your candidacy. Perhaps we will be an omen of good luck to you, a talisman of victory.

For, strangely enough, this newspaper has never backed a losing candidate. Every time we have placed our stamp of editorial approval on a candidate for public office—whether he be Governor, Senator, assemblyman, sheriff, mayor, or commissioner—he has been the winner, the ultimate choice of the electorate.

We have nothing against Wendell Willkie. We don't know him well enough to dislike him. He may be a great man. But we don't know.

And we do know, from 8 years of experience, you, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. We know that you have made mistakes, but that when you made mistakes they were sincere mistakes in an effort to do good. But, most important, we know that Franklin D. Roosevelt in his heart has the interest of the little man, the common people.

We do not have that certainty about Wendell Willkie. While his sincerity may be as great as Roosevelt's, we know that many of his important backers are men we distrust—big men with little regard for the man in the street.

It is a time when all Americans who love their liberty should come to the ultimate decision to elect Franklin D. Roosevelt to the Presidency of the United States for another 4-year term as a guaranty of their status as free men in the only democracy remaining in the world.

It is a serious decision for serious times.

Respectfully yours,

THE EDITORS, ATLANTIC CITY DAILY WORLD.

Roosevelt's Revolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 24, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, at last, in the public press and here in Washington is an editor with courage enough to accurately describe Franklin D. Roosevelt's drive to, as one of his supporters said, "remake America."

Time and again, on the floor of this House and in many other places, from 1935 on, I have called attention to the statement of Bainbridge Colby, Wilson's Secretary of State. He told us back in 1934 that:

> So completely has the administration turned its interest and its energies away from business recovery that it is openly charged, and indeed admitted, that a substantial number of the President's immediate advisers are not desirous of business revival, feeling that to prolong the depression will produce a better psychological background for the prosecution of their revolutionary designs. The overturn of our institutions, including the Constitution, is their avowed goal.

Now comes David Lawrence, who puts into print subsequent facts showing that Colby was right.

Lawrence asks, "What's the matter with American businessmen?" I ask, "What's the matter with Lawrence?"

Businessmen for the last 3 years have been kicked around, persecuted and their businesses hampered and some destroyed by the New Deal agencies—and that means Roosevelt; particularly by the National Labor Relations Board.

What is the matter with writers like Lawrence? They have been praising the New Deal and they are only awakened by the fact that the New Deal revolution is about to gain full fruition under the guise of a preparedness program.

These newspapermen begin to see the end of a free press, the suppression of their publications. When they have endured as much as have American businessmen, they will not be asking, "What's the matter with American businessmen?" They will be saying, "God forgive us for our own inactivity; our own lack of outspoken criticism and condemnation."

Lawrence's article, in the September 27, 1940, issue of the United States News, is as follows:

(By David Lawrence)

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH AMERICAN BUSINESSMEN?—TIMIDITY HAS REPLACED COURAGE AS BUSINESS LEADERS REMAIN SILENT IN THE FACE OF THE MOST CRITICAL CAMPAIGN IN ALL OUR HISTORY—RIGHTS OF FREE SPEECH ARE NOT CURTAILED BUT BUSINESS GROUPS ARE PASSIVE

The time has come to call a spade a spade in this campaign. It is a contest between two schools of thought—the group which believes in totalitarian regulation of everything by one-man government, and the group which still believes that free enterprise in a democracy can produce economic stability for America.

Businessmen far and wide say they believe in the free-enterprise system. They rightly express fears of confiscation which is embedded, not in the words of the laws passed by the New Deal, but in the regulations arbitrarily phrased and arbitrarily administered by appointees of President Roosevelt.

Businessmen have been complaining that the New Deal for several years has stopped the wheels of production and has prevented capital flow from bringing jobs to the unemployed. Businessmen privately declare their sincere conviction that with our heavy tax load and misuse of governmental funds for "pump priming," America is due eventually for a sad day of reckoning.

But what do businessmen do about it? Yes, they wear Willkie buttons and contribute the modest sums permitted under the Hatch Act—modest and infinitesimal because the New Deal spends the taxpayers' billions to get votes, where the businessmen are permitted to contribute only pennies.

But it isn't money that is needed to eliminate from public power the group of radicals who now are in the saddle. It is simple, old-fashioned courage. It is sacrifice. It is willingness to stand up under the still existent constitutional guaranties of free speech and free assembly and tell everybody within hearing of one's voice that unless America turns in the coming election from the dictatorship of a New Deal oligarchy, it will find itself in an economic chaos which will give America a dictatorship of radicalism far more intensified than anything the United States has ever dreamed was possible in this free land.

LABOR UNIONS WORK ACTIVELY FOR THIRD TERM

The New Deal is bent on confiscation of private property. It extols Government ownership and control. It wants to put America into the war, not necessarily to send troops overseas—it has promised not to do that—but to gain complete possession of all governmental force so as to be able to commandeer everything and confiscate anything which is needed to complete the Roosevelt revolution begun in 1933 by a group of radical advisers in whose hands the President has proved to be a puppet.

Radical labor doesn't remain silent in this campaign. Almost every week New Deal henchmen, working in and among the officials of labor unions in the A. F. of L., manage to get a public endorsement of the third term. John L. Lewis, of the C. I. O., has made his bargain with Mr. Roosevelt. The C. I. O. wants a Labor Board personnel favorable to its viewpoint and Mr. Roosevelt plans to comply. So the C. I. O. is swinging into line for the third term.

DICTATORSHIP CAN BE PREVENTED BY BUSINESSMEN

If labor leaders are misleading workers and telling them that they can count on partisan and biased courts and tribunals as long as Mr. Roosevelt is President, isn't it about time that American businessmen told the workers the truth, namely, that such a course can only lead to disunity and a paralysis of our whole economic system when we need unity for national defense?

Why are businessmen so reticent in this campaign? Can anybody recall in recent weeks a single speech of importance by any outstanding industrialist or manager of any large enterprise urging the public to support Wendell Willkie?

If businessmen really believe that Willkie sincerely stands for the free-enterprise system and that Roosevelt does not, is there any good reason why businessmen should not talk to their workers, their friends, their fellow citizens in every community in the land and tell them so? Of what are businessmen afraid? Of New Deal diatribes against businessmen for allegedly trying to coerce the workers? Undoubtedly there are here and there tactless employers who will use coercive phrases or who will lose their heads and make threats. There are tactless labor leaders who do and say the same sort of thing.

But American businessmen as a whole can be trusted to express in common-sense terms their understanding of what we need—an efficient and effective American economic system—a system that will protect the savings of the thrifty and prevent men, women, and children from going hungry when the dollar of America's wage earners becomes worthless in its power to purchase the necessities of life.

In Europe, businessmen were cowed into submission by dictatorships and so were the workers. Today American businessmen can prevent dictatorship by standing up and speaking their minds. They will risk only a bit of abuse by the new dealers, and this is not the kind of thing that courageous men have ever feared.

Are American businessmen aware of the dangers that face this country if a nomination obtained by illicit use of governmental power now gives the United States a third-term President? Is there any tradition or any constitutional guaranty which is safe when a group of men holding public power believes that the end justifies the means and that personal ambition must be placed above tradition and custom?

No better exposition of the case against President Roosevelt could have been written than that which the New York Times, the greatest newspaper in America, gave its readers on the morning of Thursday, September 19. The Times is not a Republican paper. It supported Roosevelt in 1932 and again in 1936, when the business and financial community in New York was hostile to a second term. The Times is a Democratic paper by tradition. It now asks its readers to support Wendell Willkie, and it gives three columns of well-reasoned argument telling why. It is an editorial that ought to be in the hands of every voter in every State in the Union, and there is no reason why every businessman should not reprint it and send it to his workers, his customers, his friends, and his neighbors.

ONE-MAN RULE, NATIONAL UNITY THE BIG ISSUES

There is no reason why businessmen should not call mass meetings of their employees—not on their own factory premises—but in public halls.

These meetings should not be addressed by employers as such, but as Americans who have much in common with their fellow citizens and who believe that in time of crisis it is necessary to speak out frankly, by every lawful means, in order to avert the catastrophe which faces the American constitutional and economic system if the principle of one-man rule is allowed to get its foothold.

Whatever admiration a voter may have for Roosevelt as a man, whatever gratitude a voter may have for various checks sent him by the administration, the simple question is whether America can protect herself in a world of war by having unity and industrial efficiency or by adding fuel to the fires of disunity and breaking down the economic system which is so vital to defense preparations and the safety of our men, women, and children.

FREE ELECTIONS ARE ESSENTIAL TO DEMOCRACY

The administration has been unscrupulous in its use of propaganda and misleading statements about defense.

It has failed to build up our defenses, preferring political expediency at every turn to the American welfare.

It has brought zealots and class partisans into public office.

It has forsaken the rules of fair play and morality in administering the laws of the land.

It has converted the courts into vehicles of political chicanery.

It has wasted public money.

It has weakened the fiscal structure of the Nation, and disrupted industry's productive processes.

It has preached hate and class war.

It has forfeited its right to the term "liberal" and has utilized every device of reactionary politics and reactionary government to gain power.

Let American businessmen, American civic leaders, responsible heads of fraternal, professional and trade organizations exercise their rights as citizens to urge the candidate of their choice. We cannot have a free election if any group is afraid to speak out and plead with its members or its friends to listen to sensible exposition of campaign arguments.

Wendell Willkie is today a lone campaigner. A timid Republican group in Congress gives him little aid, preferring the cautions of political restraint. They too, are governed by a fear of getting their fingers burned in the fray. They must get into the battle aggressively now.

Wendell Willkie won his nomination as he will win this election, by being forthright and outspoken, by being frank and honest, and above all, by refusing to be afraid of the combat itself. May American businessmen take a lesson from the man who almost alone won the nomination, but who must now have the cooperation of all those who profess to be his active supporters if he is to achieve victory for American freedom and responsible individualism.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

STATEMENT OF EMIL E. HOLMES

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of Emil E. Holmes, national deputy chief of staff, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, regarding H. R. 10113:

I am glad to accept an opportunity to cooperate with Congressman JOHN G. ALEXANDER in bringing before the Nation H. R. 10113, a bill to create a home-defense force. Congressman ALEXANDER has letters from most of the Governors dealing with this measure. The State executives provide some objections.

1. That Federal control of the home-defense forces would destroy State rights. This has not been its intent and could without much difficulty be overcome. The fact that Federal supervision and not control, except in event of an emergency so declared by act of Congress, should and would provide the benefits of a war-risk insurance for members of the home-defense forces. It would also provide a much more systematized and far-reaching care for the disabled. Some very sad cases came out of the home-defense forces in the World War, and the care provided by State organizations was inadequate.

2. One Governor suggests service by home-defense groups without pay. Modern warfare, however, shows that the home organizations may, in fact, be the deciding factor; certainly the fall of France is directly attributable to a weak home defense. This has been the situation in all countries which have been taken over by other powers in the last 2 years. Any military authority will agree that the United States is in a greater danger from within than from without, and that perhaps its most important arm of defense will be the home-defense reserves.

3. Organization of the home-defense forces under the supervision of Federal military experts will remove the danger of such home-defense forces being used as the storm troopers of ambitious State authorities. My own State of Minnesota has undertaken organization of a home-defense force, and it is highly debatable whether there is State legislative authority for such action.

It is a great pleasure to note the unanimous expressions of a need for a highly trained home-defense force; it is likewise a generally accepted fact that such forces are to be faced with a clever and most dangerous opposition. Can it be asking too much, that seasoned veterans be given preference in this important task, or are the Members of Congress going to let a condition in the defenses exist, comparable to that now existing between States, on the question of interstate commerce? Anyone can discover for himself in a very brief study of trade barriers set up by States that those authorities cannot be trusted in a national emergency and to carry out duties of the nature the home-defense forces will face. It requires national unity of the highest order.

EMIL E. HOLMES.

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL HINSHAW
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

September 24, 1940

ADDRESS BY MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM C. RIVERS, UNITED STATES ARMY, RETIRED

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, United States Army, retired, on station WEVD, September 19, 1940:

These is confused thinking about our national defense at times because some of those who study the question do so with the aid of the ordinary Mercator maps used in our atlases. Mercator maps are distorted for some areas of the surface of the earth as to both the distances and directions. A more accurate aid is a globe. Take in your hands even a 10-cent globe and look at the United States. You see our geographical position and our strategic situation.

I am glad of this opportunity to speak of our national defense. This is because the subject is of the greatest importance to all of us. Also, I wore the uniform for 47 years. After graduating at West Point I was in all our wars for about the last 50 years. These included the later red Indian troubles in the West, Santiago in Cuba, the Philippines, and France. In France I had a battle command in all our major combats.

I am also glad to talk about our national defense because of the wide circulation of an article in Harper's magazine for August. The article was written by Hanson W. Baldwin, and its title is "Wanted: A Plan for Defense." Baldwin speaks as though we have no plan for defense. He says "that neither the results achieved nor the programs planned meet our defense needs." On the contrary, I assert that we have an excellent and comprehensive plan for defense. Baldwin admits—I use his words—that "it is obvious that the funds appropriated for defense in the past 7 years have not been poured down a rat hole; it is also obvious that the administration of President Roosevelt has done more for defense than any other administration since the World War."

One of Mr. Baldwin's major complaints is "our defense program must be based on the starkest sort of reality." Now, I have been in a good many campaigns and battles. But I have never seen an order for a battle or a directive for a campaign that was based on stark reality. A battle order is based on a commander's estimate of the situation. Any commander who writes an order for battle is obliged to assume much concerning the exact locations of the troops of the enemy and the plans of the commander of the enemy forces.

Similarly the President and Congress at Washington are compelled to base our program for defense partly on the facts we know and partly on suppositions and assumptions. We know our general foreign policy. We also know, as Baldwin states, that we plan our defense policy to include any aggression in this hemisphere on the part of a victorious Germany. We must plan against the gravest danger which seems possible. We are obliged to assume in a comprehensive plan for defense that a victorious Germany will have Italy's aid and that Germany may be in possession of Britain's fleet.

President Roosevelt gave an excellent definition of defense in his letter of January 28, 1938, to Congress. He said, "Adequate national defense means that for the protection not only of our coasts but also of our communities far removed from the coast we must keep any potential enemy several hundred miles away from our continental limits." Baldwin says, "There can be and is virtual unanimity of public opinion on hemisphere defense, which is simply a strategic way of describing the Monroe Doctrine." Baldwin gives an excellent outline and description of what hemisphere defense calls for in both the Atlantic and the Pacific. Also concerning our need for bases and harbors other than those in the United States. It is clear that the Navy is our first line of defense. And that an excellent air force is of the greatest importance to the effective power of the fleet and of the Army. Also that at present we require a much larger Army for defending our harbors and coasts and for possible expeditionary forces to outlying places.

Laws have been passed by Congress and appropriations made or authorized for doubling the Navy and greatly increasing the Marine Corps. The Regular Army and National Guard are being also doubled. Our protective mobilization plan provides for a force, including the Army and National Guard, of 1,200,000 men within the next 6 or 8 months. Preparations have been made for manufacturing the necessary airplanes, arms, tanks, artillery—all the equipment for the large Army. Also for building shelter or quarters for the troops. The Army has been in the field maneuvering for the past year. The National Guard is being called out for continuous service in the field in order to improve the training and discipline of the units.

There is general agreement that we should not prepare to fight an enemy on our own borders or shores. Also that we should not send the Army or Navy to fight in Europe or in Asia. In the Pacific our excellent defensive line runs from the Aleutians, in Alaska, to Hawaii, and on down to the Canal at Panama. In the Atlantic the recent acquisition of the eight bases gives us a defensive line from Newfoundland down to the shoulder of South America. This general line is several hundred miles from our coasts. These new bases guard the five passes which enter the Caribbean from the Atlantic.

Three recent measures of the greatest importance to our defense are the new law for selective conscription of soldiers, the acquisition of the eight new bases in the Atlantic, and the authorization by Congress of the $500,000,000 to the Federal authority which is allowed to use such funds in developing our trade with the South American nations.

Defending all the Americas is a colossal task. The shoulder of South America is much nearer Africa than it is to Charleston, S. C. The shoulder of South America is nearer to Africa than it is to our new base in Puerto Rico. However, we have a new base in South America, British Guiana. In a military sense defending the Americas means in the first place working with the Latin American countries in the effort to aid them and unify them so that they may defend themselves. We must also take more effective steps to improve cultural relations with the other American nations to the south of us.

I conclude with urging two things of great importance to defense. First, Congress ought to carry out the suggestion of Mr. Willkie by passing a law to create a single Department of National Defense under a Cabinet Minister of Defense. Three civilian Assistant Secretaries of Defense would be in charge of the three coequal armed branches—the Navy, the Army, and the Air Corps. A small college of national defense would naturally form a part of the staff of the Secretary of National Defense—a place where a few officers of all the armed services could meet for common study, with a few civilian officials of the State, Labor, and Treasury Departments. The part of the unified and homogeneous Air Corps assigned to the Navy should be under Navy command and orders for duty and training all the time in peace. Similarly, for that part of the Air Corps with the Army—it should be under Army command all the time in peace as well as in war.

Another thing of importance for our defense is the American Fleet should be safely east of the Canal at Panama. This is made more important by our obtaining the new bases in the west Atlantic. The fleet seems now to be immobilized out at Hawaii, several thousand miles distance from the Panama Canal.

More than 5,000 of the some 20,178 Japanese residents of the Philippines, among the 16,000,000 Filipinos, have returned to Japan since the start of the China war. Several interesting illusions often come up about the Far East. One is the idea that—even with the colossal sum proposed, $350,000,000, Guam and Wake Islands—both in the western Pacific and in the midst of numbers of Japanese islands—can be made tenable fortifications. All we can make there are two salients, distant, lonely, and untenable salients. We buy tin in Europe and America—from those who have smelters to which they take the ore they get in the Netherland East Indies or in other parts of the world. Rubber we buy from men who have stocks of it in Singapore, Liverpool, or other markets for rubber. We could, if it were necessary, send ships by the Atlantic to actually haul rubber and tin from Java. We need not send by way of Japan at all. Then the cooperation in the Far East with the British Fleet. We all know Britain has had no capital ships east of the Mediterranean since the Agadir explosion in Morocco in 1911. It is inevitable that the peoples who live in eastern Asia will settle the future of eastern Asia—what President Roosevelt called a sort of Monroe Doctrine for the Far East.

ADMIRAL LEAHY'S OPINION

Admiral William D. Leahy gave to the committees of Congress 2 years ago his judgment in the most thorough discussion of the North Pacific Ocean we have had in 40 years. His opinion was definite and emphatic, as follows: "The Navy which America now has and the Navy which it will have when it is increased by the authority in this bill will be seriously inadequate to the task of sending a naval force to the Philippines. I said it would require at least three times this amount of increase of our Navy, and I doubt if we could—send a naval force to the Philippines—with three times the increase."

The Admiral said also: "The defensive line of the American Navy at the present time reaches from the Aleutian Islands to the Hawaiian Islands, to Samoa, and to the Panama Canal."

The following brief quotations are from Professor Griswold's able article in Harper's for August, on Our Policy in the Far East: "We have failed, as a people and a Nation, to discover in the Far East a region of vital interest to our strategic security and domestic welfare." And, "Geography is perhaps the strongest deterministic agent in international relations."

Dr. Griswold believes there is reason for trying to improve our relations with Japan. Also, that there exists a reasonable basis for such action.

NEW TREATY ADVISED

My own conviction is—after 10 consecutive years' service with the Philippine Government—that we ought to make with Japan a new treaty of trade and friendship. That the treaty should contain clauses indicating Japan's interest in the continued independence of the Philippines after 1946. Japan will not try to annex the republic of the Philippines. She will not make a division of her fleet and armies with Soviet Russia so near at the north. Many Japanese have left the Philippines to return to Japan since the start of the war in China. In any event, Japan will have much of the trade with the Philippines. Japan has not the power or the desire to attack the United States. The distances are too great.

I hope the Filipinos will obtain the independence they have so long desired and which we have so long promised them. I have affection and admiration for the Filipino people. But their country is too far from my country for continued political relations. The inevitable logic of geography is that we should control from the mid-Atlantic westward to the mid-Pacific, a matter of great expense. If we endeavor to maintain a Navy large enough to try to defend the indefensible Philippines, and to aid the defense of South America, it will fetch financial ruin to my own country.

Statements to the effect that the Filipinos no longer desire independence are erroneous. They are, I believe, put out by people who desire our permanent control of and responsibility for the distant Philippines.

John Gunther, who visited Manila, says on page 300 of his book, Inside Asia, that in his opinion the sugar interests of the Philippines oppose independence for the Filipinos.

Sugar people at Manila desire to continue sending their costly sugar to the United States free of all duty. Such a practice would be against the interests of the farmers in many of our own States.

Press reports give account of several unusual public addresses by President Quezon. Mr. Quezon is said to have declared that political parties are not needed in a democracy; that they should be abolished. President Quezon has been voted by the Assembly, at his request, many great additional powers over the liberties of individuals and over trade, commerce, labor, and other unusual "emergency" powers. The Filipino Civil Liberties Union has publicly stated its belief that this is an unmistakable sign that the President of the Commonwealth desires totalitarianism for the Philippines. I recollect recommending that Philippine independence be granted on July 4, 1940, when I testified before the Tydings Insular Committee in March 1939. Continuation of trade privileges ought to be at the same time granted the Filipinos for several years.

I very greatly doubt Baldwin's statement in his Harper's article—that "Our officers stand too much upon pomp and prerogatives of rank." A few officers of the Army or Navy may be so afflicted, but not many. You can find a few men so afflicted in any profession—among, say, lawyers, judges, journalists, and so on.

Let Us Stop, Look, and Listen—Part I

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in many of my discussions I have referred to the "unseen rulers," "world union," "world governments," and back-door executive advisers who have been guiding the hand which is writing death to the Republic; and, having writ, disappear in their temples of gold in "New Jerusalem, New York."

It is of these and others I shall now speak in an attempt to place them correctly in the picture I am about to describe.

The people to whom I shall refer are parasitic, and, like a parasite, they ultimately destroy the host upon which they have lived and grown fat. Sunlight is bactericidal, and under its rays microbia die. I shall turn such light upon those who are boring through the ramparts of our Republic and who are engaged in insidious destruction of the foundation of our Government, the Constitution of the United States. It is with this in mind that I am writing this article, and in the words of St. John, "And ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

Mr. Cecil Rhodes and Mr. Andrew Carnegie were interested in Britain, and in the return of the United States as a colony to England. Both of them hoped this reunion could be accomplished by educating the American people. Mr. Rhodes hoped that this education of American youth could be accomplished, as he said, "Under the spires of Oxford"; and to aid in such education Mr. Rhodes endowed scholarships in English universities in order to education Americans in English mannerisms, egotism, and snobbery.

Upon successful graduation in these perquisites, many of the students were placed in the very best positions to carry on the work of Mr. Rhodes. That work, as you know, was to destroy nationalism and faith in our own Government, to belittle America and our people, while praising England; to disparage our Republic and its government, while acclaiming the House of Lords.

The first organizations to promote reunion were strictly Anglo-Saxon and therefore unfavorable or cold toward the Asiatic and Mongoloid Jews. This, of course, was correct and their business, for the Jews are not Europeans; they are Asiatics and of a Mongoloid racial mixture. Let us remember, however, that these groups were pro-British and also cool toward this Republic and all it represents. It is in the knowledge of this that I am opposed to all who ignore the Constitution or constitutional government. I do not criticize the individual membership of the Anglo-Saxon federation. I deplore, instead, its un-American principles; and it is because of such principles and failure to appreciate our own Government that I oppose these organizations.

Let me make this point clear: The Anglo-Saxon Federation is, as near as I know, what the name implies—Anglo-Saxon, pro-British, anti-internationalistic, and anti-American. It is because of this that international Jewry is now coming out against the Anglo-Saxon Federation.

The British-Israel Federation is an entirely different movement, for while it presumes to be a Christian movement, it is in reality a subversive, un-American movement, financed by those who are interested in world government.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie's ambition, similar to that of Cecil Rhodes, was also to bring about reunion of the United States and the British Empire—and his idea was also to accomplish this by education, but on a much larger scale than that of his predecessor. In order that this may be clear to you, I shall quote from A Look Ahead, the last chapter in his book Triumphant Democracy.

> Time may dispel many pleasing illusions and destroy many noble dreams, but it shall never shake my belief that the wound caused by the wholly unlooked for and undesired separation of the mother from her child is not to bleed forever.
> Let men say what they will, therefore, I say that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and America united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again "The Re-united States," "The British-American Union."

Mr. Carnegie, like Cecil Rhodes, was intensely pro-British, and his fondest desire was—as the quotation shows—to reunite the United States with the British Empire. It was to accomplish this that Mr. Carnegie created well-financed endowments, so that there would be sufficient money to carry out his plan.

The point which we should bear in mind, is the purpose for which the Carnegie money was to be employed—and that was to undermine and destroy the Government of this Republic.

This attitude, of course, is perfectly normal in Cecil Rhodes, because he was a British subject, and made his money in the British Empire. It is not so easily understandable in Carnegie, for he, while he might have been a British subject, made his money in the United States and should, therefore, have been loyal to the country which gave him his wealth.

The point which all of us must remember is the purpose for which the Carnegie endowments were created and the manner in which this money was employed to exchange British for American traditions, in order to destroy patriotism in our people.

In order to understand this, we need no better evidence than the literature sponsored by the Carnegie Foundation. This literature is filed in all Carnegie libraries, and therefore accessible to the public. I have examined the titles and authorship of many of these articles, and I cannot find one which out and out defends the principles of this Republic, as set forth in the Constitution of the United States. The real Carnegie plan has gone far afield from that held by Mr. Carnegie himself. The cause of this may be found in the cosmopolitan make-up of the various officers, members on the boards of trustees, directors, and so forth.

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler is himself an internationalist, favorably disposed toward Britain, it is true, but particularly toward the League of Nations, or the so-called Federal Union, Inc. It is such literature which is now found in the public libraries, and it is not only subversive but is in reality the very cause for changes which have taken place in our educational system. No country can survive when its ideals are destroyed, and ours are steadily being undermined by the Carnegie literature. Surely no one will disagree with me, when I say that literature which belittles our own Government is not in the common defense, or for the general welfare of the United States, but is instead contrary to the basic principles of our Government.

The Carnegie endowments and financial aid may therefore be looked upon as a bribe paid to seal the lips of those who should warn the people of the danger which lies in the acceptance of Carnegie donations.

About 250 beneficiaries are listed in the 1935 edition of the Carnegie Corporation report. This list includes practically the whole educational field, from the highest to the lowest. It includes universities, colleges, medical schools, churches, social organizations, public libraries, and many other special organizations, for example: $50,000 to the American Bar Association, $50,000 to the National Occupational Conference, $538,000 to the American Law Institute, $50,000 to the Brookings Institution, $20,000 to the Church Peace Union, $130,500 to the Teachers College of Columbia, $24,000 to the Commission of Interracial Cooperation; and so the list goes on in the various fields of regular and subversive education. On the face of it, as listed, this may look all above board and is no doubt so held by many of the beneficiaries. It is quite likely that only a few of the endowees consider the ultimate aims of Carnegie and the result of the Carnegie propaganda.

Let us now, in all sense of fairness, evaluate the Carnegie activities in their true light. To do that, we must first of all begin with the principles stated by Carnegie himself—which were to restore the United States as a colony of the British Empire. In the second place, we must evaluate the Carnegie plan under the leadership of Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler. He has been a servant to the British Crown ever since he assumed office as director of this Carnegie propaganda to undermine America. He is still a servant to the same power, but has added another fetish to his worship, namely, the star of David. In this dual capacity, he cannot and is not operating in the interest of our Government, but is instead, as his own statements clearly prove, engaged in subversion of our Government, by his failure to support the Constitution.

Dr. Butler does not hesitate in his advocacy of our abandoning our sovereign status as a nation to become a mere cog in the contemplated international world government. He advocates this openly in his speeches; so it is not simply a statement made by me, but is instead a position which he has taken himself, of his own free will and accord. I wish to say, in fairness to Dr. Butler, that I do not criticize him as an individual, but I do criticize and deplore his principles—which are un-American and foreign to our form of government.

Our Nation is threatened today by a group of men, who because of their position in public, political, social, and private life, are not criticized for their subversive activities. I shall try to place them in their proper position, relative to their interest in the present war, which is now raging in Europe, by division in three groups: The first group is composed of those who are favorable to England; the second group is composed of those who for personal reasons hate Hitler; and the third group is composed of an admixture of both—or those who expect to make a harvest out of the present war.

It is these three groups which are now undermining America, and it is they who are clamoring for war. I venture to say that not one of the members of these three groups will enlist or even register on October 16. If they do enlist, they will be far removed from the actual field of combat.

It is a certain select few in these three groups who own and control the national press, radio, cinema, newsstands, and informative distribution of news, who know better than anyone else that control of gold gives them the power to buy and sell the rights and liberties of the people.

These people recognize the power of the press, so they buy it, because absolute control of the news is essential to their success. This ownership is first to protect themselves; second, to keep truth from the people; third, to falsify all information in order to deceive and confuse public opinion; and fourth, to instill and disseminate untruths against those whom they wish to destroy. It does not matter to them whether that be a friendly nation or patriotic citizens. The only thing that matters is whether or not any statement of fact threatens those who have bought themselves to power by the use of public money, gold, and credits.

There is nothing that hurts our Nation so much today as press control. But such control is imperative to those who are undermining America; for their protection lies in censorship of the press and in complete suppression of any information which may shed light upon their double dealing and intrigue. It should be clear to all that when the daily press—and I include all of the controlled press and certain broadcasters—join hands in an effort to suppress one or two persons, it is not because such individuals lie, it is because they are telling the truth. When these monetary interests cannot succeed in this suppression by legitimate methods, accidents often befall those who have the courage of their convictions, and whose interest lies in the welfare of the country instead of personal glory. To date they have been successful in these assassinations, but the day will come when aroused American patriotic people will drive these enemies of the United States from their temples of evil intrigue.

If there were some way to expose these international racketeers and to reveal them as they really are, not one of them would be in power a month after such exposure. They seem to have Congress "buffaloed," and the Executive appears to be one of those who is more interested in foreign governments than he is in the Government of the United States. It is in the recognition of this evil that I have taken the position that our interests should be entirely in the safety and the security of the United States.

There is much to do at home to set our Nation right, and money expended for such purpose would be an asset—while money expended in the aid of foreign nations to prolong an unnecessary war is an expense and loss to Christian civilization which can never be repaid for its losses in centuries to come. I, therefore, feel it imperative to say that Congress should give no aid to any foreign nation—no matter which one may ask for such help. It is a humane attitude, of course, for Congress to give aid, if possible, to people in stricken areas who may be suffering because of exposure and lack of food, but such help should be universal and not, as now, partial to one nation. Let us always bear in mind that the people themselves are not responsible for the misdeeds of their rulers. Surely no one can hold antagonism and hatreds toward the people of France, Belgium, Holland, Norway, Poland, or any of the countries which have recently been invaded. If we are to pursue and protect our principles, let us follow the teachings of Christ and help all who are in need of help. We are, however, doing the opposite, for we are furnishing instruments to kill and destroy Christian civilization by giving aid to the powers now at war. Who armed Germany? Was it the people themselves, or was it the people who control gold money and credit? Surely no one will contradict me when I say that Germany was armed with money furnished by the international American, English, and German bankers. In view of this, what is all this "hate Hitler" about? Is it a smoke screen the international bankers are employing in order to deceive us, or is it possible that Hitler has double-crossed the international bankers as they did Germany in 1917, when they traded their rights in a country in which they had lived for over 700 years for 30 pieces of Palestine silver?

LET US ESTIMATE POSSIBILITIES

I expect to see Bulgaria, Greece, and Turkey join the United European powers. After such consolidation, we may expect Arabia to join this coalition, in order to set itself free from British rule. These powers united will then take possession of the Mesopotamian oil fields and the Suez Canal. This will leave the road open to Africa for redistribution of colonies within that empire. Many of these states are not favorable to British rule, and it is quite possible that the Transvaal still harbors a grudge and would like to obtain the status of a free and independent nation. The same thing may be said about India, for that nation, as well as England and America is ruled and dominated by the international money changers. In such war, England like ourselves, will be at a disadvantage, in not having land contact with bases and sufficient war material to successfully conduct a war.

I do not believe that Germany will invade England unless that country is forced to capitulate to save her people from starvation and destruction by air. The present air war is no doubt to keep English forces at home, while preparations are made for a southern campaign, as I have already stated. The German air attacks on England are to destroy as much of the Navy and merchant marine as possible, and to destroy war industries and bases of supplies. While this is going on, plans no doubt are already in operation for a concerted attack in Asia and Africa. What plan could be more plausible or profitable to the central European nations than an invasion of Africa; invasion of a country in which may be found the most productive gold mines and the largest diamond fields in the world? Surely the war booty to be had in such invasion is preferable to risking defeat by an invasion of England.

A NUT FOR CONGRESS TO CRACK

In my discussion of this subject, I cannot refrain from looking ahead, and as I do, I recall the past and England's antagonistic attitude toward the United States.

Suppose England finds that she cannot hold out, and to save her colonies, she agrees with these united Central European powers to negotiate terms of peace. If this should occur, in what position will we be, in view of the fact that we have antagonized every nation in the world by our deliberate unneutral and unfriendly acts. Suppose England restores the former German-owned colonies to Germany, with further division of the Belgian and French possessions among Italy, Germany, and England. Suppose in such agreement, a plan is entered into by these three powers to invade the United States through Canada and other British possessions? In what position would we be, confronted by such united attack? Would we be able to defend ourselves with the Jewish army now organized and equipped, and the millions of Communists who sympathize with the Jewish radicals now in the United States? In what position would we be, with the communistic army now organized to the south of us in Mexico, and which by all reports is armed and ready to invade the United States, when such order is given. Could we today defend ourselves against an attack launched from Canada and from Mexico, particularly in view of the fact that British bases are located within a short distance of our eastern coastal areas?

Is it not possible, if confronted with such attack, we may lose our Pacific possessions to Japan and Alaska to Russia? And is it not possible that such invasion may be successful should the powers now at war in Europe join in a concerted attack upon the United States? It is quite likely that Great Britain may in the near future attempt to induce us to assume protection of Hong Kong, Singapore, and Penang.

Suppose that Congress should foolishly fall for such plan, what would be the consequence? Would not such act on our part terminate in a war with Japan, and would we not, in order to defend ourselves, be compelled to transport our Army to the Orient? If this should happen and war is declared, with our Army 10,000 miles removed from our shores, would we not in such procedure invite attack by the powers to which I have already referred; and is it not possible that such plan may be contemplated to destroy us?

These are a few observations and possibilities which Congress must bear in mind, for it alone is responsible for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States. I know Europe, and in the knowledge of European intrigue I trust no one; and least of all Great Britain—a nation which has double-crossed not only her own colonies but every nation with which she has had contact. I say, therefore, as I have said before, let Congress take charge and guide the destiny of this Nation, in the interest of the United States alone.

With me America comes first, and my opposition to foreign powers is not because I hold any animosity or hatred toward them, but is instead because my interest is solely within the United States and tied up in the security of our country.

Farmers in Eighth Congressional District of Michigan Take the Rap From Foreign Imports; Time To Call a Halt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the farmers of the Eighth Congressional District of Michigan are leading producers of a number of important commodities. It is one of the largest sugar-beet districts east of the Rockies; it is the biggest mint producer in the Nation; we supply great areas with our fine potatoes and we are a principal source of the Nation's navy-bean supply. Other major commodities are also produced in my district.

As result of New Deal tariff reductions the farmers of the Eighth District of Michigan do not find themselves competing with fellow farmers of America but they are forced to compete with cheap foreign imports. These farmers are taking the rap and it is time to call a halt.

Below is a table of a few principal items produced in the Eighth District of Michigan and the extent to which foreign imports compete with them. With these growing imports the comparison of average farm prices of the 12 Republican years and the 7 New Deal years is all the more interesting.

Official Department of Commerce figures

Import items	Unit	1938	1939
Cattle	Head	424,022	753,570
Dry and malted milk	Pound	80,735	2,465,032
Canned beef	Pound	78,597,007	85,862,876
Dry beans	Pound	5,748,329	6,132,141
Potatoes	Pound	45,820,283	93,859,166
Cheese	Pound	54,432,000	59,071,000
Oats	Bushel	7,183	4,293,009
Eggs in shell	Dozen	231,784	328,523

Anti-Semitism in This Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Times-Herald of Tuesday, September 24, 1940:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of September 24, 1940]

ANTI-SEMITISM IN THIS COUNTRY

It seems plain that anti-Semitism is on the rise in this country, chiefly because of the war.

BLAMING JEWS FOR THE WAR

Most of our anti-Semites—the Nazis frankly and the others not so frankly—argue that the Jews pushed England and France into declaring war on Germany because they wanted to get their revenge for the way Hitler treats the German Jews. We're told, too, that the Jews are pushing the United States into the war from the same motive.

One favorite anti-Semitic theory is that the Jews control most of the department stores, which do most of the big display advertising in the papers, and that thereby the Jews dictate the papers' editorial policies on foreign affairs.

As far as this newspaper is concerned, its publisher is prepared to testify under oath before any kind of congressional committee that no advertiser has ever, directly or indirectly, tried to influence its editorial policies on foreign affairs.

WE FEEL NO "INFLUENCE"

William Allen White's Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, from which we received 155 post cards over the week end asking us to root for release of 25 flying fortresses and 20 mosquito boats to Great Britain, lists very few Jews on its roster of more than 600 eminent sponsors—as well as very few persons of draft age. And the White committee is the most active single agency pushing us toward the war.

YEARS 1914–1918; 1939–19—?

The United States has one foot in the war and the other on a banana peel, true. And no doubt plenty of Jews would like to see us declare all-out war on Germany, on the theory that Hitler is a beast who ought to be exterminated.

But we do not believe the Jews are to blame as a race or a group for our rush toward Europe's latest war.

Certainly they weren't to blame in 1917. The Kaiser's Germany was friendly to the Jews. Albert Ballin, founder of the Hamburg-American Line, was a sort of personal financier to Wilhelm II; the Rothschilds were an honored house in Germany; Jewish scientists and scholars were legion, and highly placed, in the Kaiser's time. Plenty of German Jews in this country remained pro-German right up to the time we entered the war.

THE ROAD TO WAR

After we woke up from the World War nightmare, we took to blaming the munitions makers—merchants of death—and the international bankers for having got us into that fight.

We tried to insure against any more of such villainy by passing the Johnson Act against United States loans to foreign nations in default here and the Neutrality Act to prevent war-material shipments to any belligerent nation or nations.

Came the war of 1939–19—?; and now, at the end of its first year, we are well on our way into it.

The President has procured revision of the Neutrality Act to allow cash-and-carry arms shipments. The Johnson Act is under increasing attack, and will probably go when England's cash begins to run low. We've released 50 destroyers to England, in addition to a lot of World War left-over guns and ammunition; and now the 25 flying fortresses deal is warming up. Plenty of us wish we had more merchants of death. The loss of the Hercules powder plant is generally regretted.

WHY ARE WE GOING IN?

All this is being done, we are persuaded, with the approval of the majority of Americans.

Or, if it isn't, the majority have no chance to register disapproval. Both Presidential candidates are interventionists; there is no choice between them on this point, as there might have been if the Republicans had nominated Dewey instead of Willkie.

We think we are going into this war for the same deep, underlying cause that took us in last time—a cause which has nothing to do with the Jews, the bankers, or the "merchants of death." We believe the American people have a subconscious conviction that as long as Britain and the United States together have the world's biggest combined naval power these two nations can run the world; that we've got to hang together or we're likely to be hanged separately. Indeed, this war may be fought for the principal purpose of finding out if air power can conquer sea power.

So once again we seem to have given England a blank check, to draw on as needed. The outlook is dark indeed.

Let Us Stop, Look, and Listen—Part II

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, just when I begin to remove my war paint, store my tommyhawk, and take up my pipe of peace, some of my defamers of the air and in the press begin to shoot poison arrows in my back. These attacks after awhile become unbearable, and force me in self-defense to take the warpath.

It seems strange to me that my revilers cannot understand that nothing they can say now can hurt me more than what they have already said. I have only a name and a reputation—which I have made by fair dealings with my fellow men. These are intangible assets and cannot be destroyed by my defamers, no matter how much infamy they endeavor to heap upon me. Neither can my defamers hurt me after I leave Congress and when I am no more, for my beliefs and principles are recorded; and will some day light the way to the return of sound constitutional government.

My defamers should know that I am not alone in my belief in constitutional government; nor am I alone in the respect I hold toward the founders of this Republic; for there are millions who share this faith with me. My defamers should realize that there are millions of patriotic citizens in the North, South, East, and West, who would write in the name of a Presidential candidate could they in so doing, be assured that he would enjoin Congress to set this Nation squarely upon the Constitution of the United States.

The major political parties should realize that it is within the rights of the people to make a direct choice for President, by writing in a name, and that they might resort to such procedure in order to establish sound constitutional government. This is particularly true when political parties and the Government fail in their duty to the people. Such procedure is perfectly legal today, because changes in the Constitution have given the people control by direct ballot, and the power of selection and election is entirely within the hands of the majority of the electorate. It therefore behooves the political parties to note this fact—for the people may in sheer desperation, as I have already said, center upon a person of their choice for President, instead of accepting the political offerings of the major parties, who are sponsored by the same financial powers. As a matter of fact, hope for constitutional government will, I believe, depend upon such procedure, and I would therefore advise the best candidate to come out in the open for America, and for equal rights to all—with special favors to none.

Suppose one of the candidates makes a declaration of principles somewhat like this:

I believe in the Constitution of the United States and promise that I will readopt this document as a beacon light from which this Republic shall take its course. I do so in the common defense and for the general welfare of the United States.

I believe in States rights, and in the right of the State to regulate its own affairs within the State; and by two duly appointed representatives in the United States Senate to direct the Government of the United States in its foreign relations and among the several States.

I believe in this—first, because it is constitutional; and, second, because it will reduce the State and Federal operative costs in direct relation to the efficiency of each State government.

It should be clear by now that departure from the Constitution is responsible for the ever-increasing cost of the State administration and in a greater degree for the unwarrantable and excessive cost of the Federal administration. This has come about by overlapping functions of the State and Federal Governments, and by greater and greater centralization of power in the Executive. This centralization of administration powers has brought about a declining public interest in the State government. This is dangerous, for it can only end in total or absolute centralization of power in the Federal Government, while it at the same time destroys the government of the State. If this happens—and let me say that it is now near—we will be ruled by a dictator. I am reasonably sure that such movement is now contemplated by the incumbent administration, and should this come to pass there will be no freedom for business or labor, because all will be regimented by military force. The people themselves will be under constant surveillance by a secret service similar to that of Europe.

It is to prevent such change that I advise return to the principles set forth in the Constitution of the United States, for it is the only document which protects the people against Government usurpation of public rights. We must return to constitutional government, and this should be done in the common defense and for the general welfare of the people of the United States.

I furthermore believe in the constitutional rights of business to operate with utmost freedom and without Federal competition in the field of private industry. Therefore I believe that all Federal-owned and operated business should be liquidated or sold to private interest, so that it may, with other business, aid in employment and in the support of the Government.

I believe in sound, standardized, gold-secured currency, and, believing in this, I advise that the gold now in storage be set aside as security for the people of this Nation, instead of as it is now, controlled by private interests.

I believe in a foreign policy which deals with equal fairness to all nations and with absolute neutrality in peace as well as war. Our foreign policy should end at the 3- or 12-mile limit—whichever distance is agreed upon by international law. I furthermore believe in the freedom to establish military zones at reasonable distances from our shore in order to protect military and commercial operations, such as Bristol Bay operation in Alaska. I also declare that our foreign policy should be in our own interest and not in the interest of any specially selected nation. Our foreign diplomats should conduct themselves as intelligent Americans and not as old busybodies, meddling in every other nation's business. Our foreign policy today has been based mainly upon egotistical, explosive ideas of some individual or individuals, who have not the slightest idea of what a foreign policy actually means. Our foreign policy has consisted mainly in meddling, fooling, and fiddling with the affairs of other nations, until we finally by our interference have provoked a general European war. It is quite likely that we will pay for this crazy foreign policy in enmities and loss of trade that we will sustain when the war is over.

I believe that our merchant marine should be privately owned and operated with private capital, exactly on the same basis as any other private business. The way the merchant marine is handled by the Government is criminal, and will always be remembered as a collosal fraud. I grant that certain ships which may be called out as auxiliaries or secondary support in naval fleet operation, should be subsidized—and rightly so—because of losses sustained in special construction for such purpose.

I believe in a two-ocean naval fleet, with yearly replacements in all capital ships—so that the fleet will always be ready to meet any enemy, no matter from what quarter they may come.

I believe in full national defense—with fixed and mobile armaments suitable to meet attack by water or land. I also believe in a first-class air force, under command of air-minded men who understand aviation. I also believe in underground bomb-proof airplane factories. I believe the same provision should be made for the storing of airplanes, as nothing provides better protection than bomb-proof shelters. These should be constructed underground instead of in the open, where they can be destroyed by enemy air attacks.

I, furthermore, believe that ammunition factories should be located in sparsely settled parts of the country. Such location would furnish the greatest measure of protection from enemy attacks, no matter whether such enemies be saboteurs within the country, or agents provocateurs operating under instructions of foreign governments. Located in sparsely settled parts of the country, particularly in mountainous regions, such important war industries will also be reasonably well protected from enemy attack.

I believe in universal military training during school years—say, 3 months at the age of 18; 3 months at the age of 19; and 1 year at the age of 20. This last year should be set aside as an educational feature of the training, with scholastic credits. Such training would be of immense advantage to the youth, and to coming generations, for it would instill discipline, respect, and patriotism, which in turn would bring about a closer cooperation and understanding among our people.

Such arrangements would make it possible for us to operate with a small standing army, and yet be prepared on short notice to meet any requirement in the defense of our country.

I furthermore believe that for practical purposes consolidation must in the end take place in North America in order to protect this hemisphere from all foreign attacks. Such union should be accomplished in a peaceful manner, by agreement between the powers interested in such coalition. It must, however, be under the Stars and Stripes.

These are a few thoughts which a wide-awake condidate might have expressed, in order to instill greater confidence. I say a wide-awake candidate, because it is hopeless to expect any sound policy or the return to constitutional government by the present incumbent of the White House.

I often wonder what Congress and the people would think should one of the budding nominees propose a policy somewhat like this:

Members of Congress, over a period of 100 years constant departure from the Constitution and disregard of its principles have proven nearly disastrous to this Nation. We are today like a rudderless ship, drifting here and there without a fixed point of departure, and with an uncertain destination. In other words, we are lost, and have been lost for a number of years; and under the direction of an unseen power which has no interest in the United States. We are now drifting toward an unknown and hostile shore—where communism is rampant, and where dictators rule oligarchican governments. It is not my intention to blame anyone for this deplorable situation, and it would serve no useful purpose to do so. We must, however, recognize that we are far afield from the government which was given to us by the founders of this country in 1787.

It is well to bear in mind that Members of both Houses are responsible as individuals to the people who elected them to office, and jointly to the people of this Nation. With this in mind, it is my desire to inform Congress that from today you shall be responsible for the safety and security of this Republic—as provided for in the Constitution of the United States. Our trouble is not obsolescence of the Constitution, but is instead from our utter indifference to the principles laid down in that document. The Constitution delegates power to Congress, and to no one else. You are, therefore, responsible to the people who elect you to office for the administrative cost of the Federal Government, and for its operation in accord with the principles set forth in the Constitution. I am also in accord with this, and shall, therefore, take care that the law be faithfully obeyed. I shall begin with the fundamental law—the Constitution of the United States.

In line with this, I suggest that you begin by repealing all unconstitutional laws until all three branches of the Government operate again strictly within the Constitution itself. It is only by strict adherence to the Constitution that our Nation can survive, and it is only by full adherence and support of the law that our self-respect can be maintained. You and I want the Republic to survive, and all of us desire to maintain our self-respect as individuals and as a nation. It follows, therefore, that the first law to obey is that which gave independence and life to this Republic, and upon which it must rest to function, or else die. It is the law upon which our Government must rest and which it should be the first to support, instead of, as it is now doing, the first to destroy. Let us therefore place our Government squarely upon the Constitution and let us support and enforce this document with all the powers at our command.

In order that Congress may begin to function properly, I request that you repeal all extra-constitutional powers which you have unmindfully and illegally granted to the Executive. When these powers are repealed, he may begin to operate within article II of the Constitution, and this will restore powers now lost to Congress and allow it to operate as provided for in the Constitution. This will reduce operative costs of the executive department, without additional increase elsewhere in the Government. In reading the Constitution it is clear that all power in that document is granted to Congress, with very little power to the Executive, except in conjunction with the Senate, and the two complete powers, that is, to grant reprieves and pardons.

The Supreme Court was never established as a whitewashing outfit, to pass legislation enacted by Congress. Congress was supposed to be composed of able-bodied and clear-minded men, who would understand whether or not legislation was constitutional before enacted into law. Lacking such understanding, no one has any business to be a Member of Congress. The Supreme Court was never supposed to be tormented by having to pass upon dumb laws enacted to please some faction at home or other selfish interest.

At any rate, Congress from today shall assume responsibility for the common defense and the general welfare of the people, and in this position be able to operate and run this Government without any extra aid. Each State must assume its sovereign function and operate according to and with full responsibility of its reserve power in the Constitution. As each State begins to function, the Federal Government must recede from the State, in order to remove all overlapping departments and bureaus now operating in duplication of administrative and regulatory functions, and leave to the State the sole responsibility for its own government.

Federal employment should also be reduced in the same ratio as State administrative functions are resumed, with the ultimate object in mind to operate with less than 25 percent of the present employment list. This can easily be accomplished when each State assumes its full sovereign rights and operates its government as set forth in the Constitution of the United States.

It would also enable the Federal Government to concentrate its many elaborately housed departments into one structure, where each and every one will be employed in the exclusive interest of the United States. Such arrangement will leave the Federal Government free to represent the United States in its foreign relations and among the several States, as set forth in article I, section 8, of the Constitution. It will give the Federal Government an opportunity to promote friendly relations with foreign nations to rebuild and acquire foreign markets, in order to provide outlets for our surplus industrial and farm production. In such procedure administrative costs and taxes can be reduced without impairing the Federal income. As a matter of fact, the soundest policy for private industry is operation with the lowest overhead in order to reduce cost of production and permit such business to successfully compete in all markets. The same procedure is more important in a nonearning institution, such as a Government, and careful economic operation in all governments, no matter whether they be State or Federal, is, of course, sound and desirable.

What needs curbing more than anything else are the international and national bankers who for years have used the national monetary wealth to destroy independent operators and acquire their holdings by the free use of public money—which in no sense belonged to the international or private bankers. It is these Shylocks more than any other group of individuals who are responsible for the condition in which we find our Nation today, and they should, in common justice and decency, be placed in exactly the same relation to the Federal Treasury as private individuals occupy in relation to the banks. This, of course, will raise a furore among the money sharks, but it will also cut their power with one stroke of the pen and set our Nation right.

Drastic economy in the case of the Federal administration will show a steady increase in profits from the present taxable income. Reduction of taxes will lower the operative cost of industry, which again will result in low-cost production. This will in turn increase employment, prosperity, and soundness in our industrial business structure.

It should be clear that a Government which depends upon taxes levied upon business for its income, cannot engage in destructive competition with such business, without reduction and final depletion of its own income. The Government which engages in such fool-hardy venture—and particularly on borrowed money—is either engaged in premeditated and malicious destruction of itself, or else it is ignorantly incompetent. I cannot refrain from stating at this point that this is precisely the position of the present administration. The Roosevelt administration is engaged in a most damnable destructive policy, for which there is no excuse. Anyone, no matter how incompetent, realizes full well that this or any other government cannot borrow itself into prosperity, but will instead, in pursuing such contemptible policy, exhaust national credit, only to bring about national bankruptcy. If the truth were known, this is exactly what the Roosevelt administration has in mind.

Our people were prepared for that in 1934, when they were deprived of gold and gold secured currency and investments. With the present inflated currency and bankruptcy, no one will lose except the people themselves, for the international and national bankers are fully protected with the twenty-one billions of gold now stored in National Treasury vaults. This gold is not owned by the Government or by the people. It is instead owned and controlled by those who are holding the gold certificates, and by foreign nations who are holding private industrial stocks and bonds.

For anyone to say, as one gentleman recently stated on the floor of the House, that this gold is the property of the United States, is a most willful and deliberate falsehood. I challenge the Treasury Department or the Executive—it does not matter which—to come out and deny the statements I have made in this discussion, and say, that gold certificates now held by interests outside of the Treasury and by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve banks, are not a claim and a liability against the gold now stored in Treasury vaults of the United States.

I also challenge the Secretary of the Treasury and the Executive to successfully contradict me when I say that we are and have been using a fully inflated currency since 1934. Furthermore, when prices can no longer be manipulated, or price levels maintained, the present currency or money will collapse like a burst toy balloon. In other words, we will have the same sort of inflation which wrecked Germany.

Furthermore, I should like the Secretary of the Treasury and the Executive to successfully deny that the Inter-American Bank, which was recently created by an unconstitutional act of Congress, was set up to establish control of gold credit for North and South America; and that this control of gold and gold credit is to establish complete domination of Central and South American republics, similar to the control which the same people now maintain in the United States; to deny that such control of gold will enslave and destroy those countries, as it has all other nations which have been forced to submit to those whose god is gold and savior is a bribe; to deny that each and every Central and South American nation will be indebted to the international bankers on a comparative scale with our indebtedness to them at this time—which is approximately $60,000,000,000.

I also challenge the President to deny that the present strife in Europe is a war in which the international and Jewish bankers are risking the lives of every Christian foolish enough to fight for them, in order to regain control of the Central European nations, and to force those nations to accept gold credit in return for Jewish domination of all industries and profitable business within those countries.

I challenge any expert to give one intelligent and good reason which will prove that we will not meet with dismal defeat should we join England in the present war. It should be self-evident that our entrance into the war, no matter whether it be in Europe or in the Orient, is bound to meet with failure—first because of the distance from bases and supplies; second, because we are fighting for a cause in which the English themselves have no faith, and which they understand much better than we do in the United States.

The people of England know that they are dominated by a Jewish government, exactly in the same manner as we are dominated by the same tribe in the United States. It is also well to bear in mind that inasmuch as the French and English Navies jointly could not cope with a fleet of rowboats, the English Navy now alone and in need of drydocking and repair cannot engage in successful combat.

Finally, I challenge anyone in the administration to produce one real proof that we are threatened by invasion from any foreign nation except the Jewish refugee communistic army, which has the approval of the War Department and the blessings of the President and his unseen secret advisers.

The public has been fooled for a long time; as a matter of fact, ever since 1933; but they are gradually awakening, not only to the dangers and purposes of the Roosevelt administration, but they are actually realizing and recognizing the powers that are directing the Roosevelt administration as a destructive agency to the Government of the United States.

Distinguished Democrat, Former Congressman Charles H. Martin Heads Willkie Democrats in Oregon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. CHARLES H. MARTIN

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I include a prepared statement by the Honorable Charles H. Martin, former Democratic Governor of Oregon and former Congressman from the Third Oregon District, which I have the honor to represent at this time. General Martin has to his credit a distinguished record in the United States Army, having attained the rank of major general. On his retirement from the service he took an active part in the counsels of the Democratic Party, having been reared, as he states, in the atmosphere of traditional democracy. My State honored him by electing him to the office of Representative in Congress and later called him to serve as Governor of the State. He was the Democratic candidate for these offices. He has now accepted the chairmanship of the Willkie Democrats in Oregon. Governor Martin's statement is as follows:

I was reared in an atmosphere of traditional democracy; in fact, my father, Senator Martin, of Illinois, was such a strong Democrat that he actually voted for Douglas against Lincoln in 1858. As a lifelong Democrat myself I have always cherished the traditions of that great party. I feel that a third term for any President is hostile to the fundamentals of our American system and especially the Democratic Party that I know. I could not conscientiously, therefore, support any President for a third term. There are other reasons why I feel that a change of administration this year is essential to the best interests of the American people.

NO MAN INDISPENSABLE

I agree with Mr. Willkie that the first essential to a strong national defense is social and economic recovery here at home; the elimination of class warfare—a divided house cannot stand; a revival of the will to work and an opportunity for all to work at gainful wages.

I cannot concede the indispensability of any one man to administer the affairs of our Government; that is the totalitarian way, not the American way. Our American system was never designed to serve the power lust of any one man.

The destiny of our country will be safe in the hands of Mr. Willkie. Our paramount need today is the services of a trained business executive who can straighten out our financial muddle before national bankruptcy overtakes us and direct the course of our defense-preparation program efficiently. Mr. Willkie meets these qualifications with an outstanding background of successful experience and with his keen understanding of the needs of the American people is exceptionally well qualified to do the hard job ahead. Furthermore, he has been a soldier—an American combat soldier in the last war.

I feel a lot in common with Mr. Willkie, having been raised just across the Wabash from his boyhood surroundings. Like Mr. Willkie, I, too, feel that my party has left me—I have not left the party.

PRAISES M'NARY

We in Oregon as well as our neighbors in other Pacific Coast States should feel especially proud of the fact that our own Senator McNARY has been selected as a candidate for Vice President and Mr. Willkie's running mate. His selection greatly complements the high qualities possessed by Mr. Willkie and insures a fair deal for the farmers, for labor, and all others. This is a fortunate choice for our community.

John Sharp Williams, the great Democratic Senator from the State of Mississippi, speaking on the floor of the Senate in 1913 on the proposal to limit the tenure of office of President, stated:

"Washington would not, Jefferson would not, Jackson would not, Grant could not, Roosevelt (Theodore) could not, and nobody ever shall."

I have agreed to serve as Oregon chairman of the Willkie-Democrats and will lend my support actively toward the success of the Willkie-McNary ticket. I call on all true Democrats who still believe in the fundamental traditions of our party to support me in this crusade.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Nation of September 21, 1940:

[From the Nation of September 21, 1940]

THE G. O. P.'S PROBLEM CHILD

(By J. Lacey Reynolds)

WASHINGTON, September 13, 1940.

At Philadelphia Wendell Willkie made a reputation as a heavyweight politician when he outsmarted the convention managers to clinch the nomination. By now it has become apparent that Mr. Willkie does not pack the terrific punch described in his advance publicity. He seems to belong in the preliminaries, not in the main bout.

His political moves during the past month suggest four weaknesses. First, in his acceptance speech at Elwood he showed himself to be no match for Roosevelt as a radio orator. His most ardent supporters concede that this will be a handicap. Second, he revealed that he was a poor judge of public sentiment by his stand on the draft-industry issue. Third, he has demonstrated a surprising lack of executive ability in dealing with the Republican organization. He has irritated the party wheel horses and failed to reconcile his defeated convention opponents. And fourth, on legislative matters he has kicked the shins of Republican Senators and Congressmen until they threaten to leave him to his fate and to look out for themselves for the rest of the campaign.

Willkie's attack on the Overton-Russell amendment permitting Government seizure of plants did much to tarnish his reputation as a political sage. Even a third-rate politician would have foreseen the inevitable political consequence of opposing conscription of industry while favoring conscription of manpower. When public reaction proved markedly unfavorable he was forced to claim that his stand had been misunderstood and to come out for "selective service" for industry as an alternative to the Overton-Russell amendment. His "selective service" was obviously nothing more than a smoke screen to permit him to escape from a position that was politically untenable.

His stand on the "draft industry" issue had particularly unfortunate consequences in the Senate. When the Overton-Russell amendment passed the Senate on August 28, 9 of the 18 Republicans answering the roll voted for it. They included such rock-ribbed conservatives as AUSTIN, of Vermont, DAVIS, of Pennsylvania, LODGE, of Massachusetts, TOBEY, of New Hampshire, and CAPPER, of Kansas, the last being one of the Senate's shrewdest readers of popular sentiment. Some of these Republicans had put themselves on record during debate as strongly in favor of plant seizure. "It seems unanswerable," said Senator LODGE, for example, "that if we are giving the Government the power to conscript manpower it is only just and fair to give the Government power to conscript industries which are essential to war services." The next day Willkie condemned plant seizure, thereby creating a situation in which the Presidential nominee ran head-on into a substantial block of his party's outstanding Senators.

Republican House Members had a similar experience 2 weeks later when Willkie came out in opposition to the Fish amendment to the conscription bill, which would have permitted 60 days for voluntary enlistments. Of the 169 Republicans in the House, 140 had already voted for the amendment. Minority Leader JOE MARTIN later tried to smooth things over by making it appear that it was just a difference of opinion over a minor amendment. But the 140 Republicans, including JOE MARTIN, knew better. This was not the first time that MARTIN, a stickler for teamwork, had been embarrassed by the lone-wolf tactics of the nominee. Many Republican Members, angered at being left out on a limb, vowed that they would cast off from the nominee and run their own independent campaigns. CHARLIE HALLECK, the Indiana Congressman who is considered to be Willkie's spokesman in Congress, hardly dared show his face in the House chamber for several days afterward. Bitter letters were addressed to Rushville. Typical of the reaction in the House cloakrooms was the comment, "I see where Willkie is heading a third-party movement." No doubt Willkie intended his repudiation of the Fish amendment to signify his ardent support of total defense and "short-of-war" assistance to England; high party strategists felt that some such step was necessary to combat Henry Wallace's charge that Willkie is the "appeasement candidate." But the Fish amendment was not the appropriate vehicle to use, under the circumstances.

The Republicans' current organizational difficulties may be attributed largely to Willkie's lack of political experience and his reluctance to take advice from the party bigwigs. He waited until his campaign plans were practically formulated early this month before calling in Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, one of his Philadelphia opponents and a skilled veteran. Senator TAFT, of Ohio, another convention opponent, has never been consulted. Little wonder that the TAFT people are not on the job for Willkie. The Republican nominee might also have benefited from earlier and more frequent conferences with his running mate, the wily Senator MCNARY. These old-time organization leaders have been ignored in favor of sponsors of the independent Willkie clubs, and the mounting friction between the two groups was the real reason party leaders from 21 States met at Rushville on Thursday, September 5. After the meeting, Willkie pledged his support and loyalty to the rank and file of the party, and the G. O. P. stalwarts left with a feeling that their nominee was finally awakening to the political realities of the campaign, that he would work with them in precinct and in Congress. Five days later he dropped his bombshell about the Fish amendment.

On his present tour through the West Willkie may turn out to be a master of back-platform campaigning, and if he does, this will tend to offset some of his past political errors. But so far the record is against him.

No Tax-Proof Shelters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am pleased to include therein an editorial from the October issue of the well-known and Nation-wide periodical, the Country Gentleman, entitled "No Tax-Proof Shelters." I believe the Members of the House, as well as others who read the RECORD, will appreciate the views expressed in this editorial.

[From the Country Gentleman of October 1, 1940]

NO TAXPROOF SHELTERS

Government expenditures, debt, and taxes are all going up this year. That is because national-defense costs have been added on without trimming down other expenses. About $1,000,000,000 of new taxes have been levied, but the rest of the increased debt is being charged to the future. Both the amount being spent and the eventual bill to be paid are beyond the ability of anyone to comprehend.

Yet the astonishing thing is that there is so little worry about it all. Farmers, who as a general rule are careful about their own finances, would be expected to be uneasy. Some are. But others take the attitude that Federal taxes don't reach such a lot of farmers. They won't be affected as much as other classes, so why worry?

It is true that Federal taxes do not fall upon farmers as directly as they do on some other groups. But taxes do not have to be paid first hand to work their punishing effects. Despite low prices for many farm products, the national cost of living recently increased for the third straight month. One of the largest increases was in food prices. Heavier taxes imposed on those who haul, manufacture, and distribute goods of all kinds figure in this spread. The people who pay these taxes naturally pass on as much of them as they can—in lower prices to farmers, in higher prices to consumers. Either way a sizable share of the taxes comes out of farmers' pockets, not only in the toll collected from their products but also in higher costs for the things they buy. The increasing tax charge that is finding its way into the price structure is making the struggle to restore parity prices constantly more difficult.

But there is another way in which growing Federal taxes are reacting upon the farm population. It is disclosed in a resolution recently passed upon by the board of trustees of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation. The resolution states that last year the farm bureau offered a State tax program that was generally recognized as sound. But since then the Federal Government has moved further into the tax field, expanding income and excise taxes, and thus preempting the items covered in the farm bureau's proposed taxation program.

So the resolution recommends that "the State should not now take on new activities or expand existing activities, wherever possible to avoid it, and that it should pare its tax program to the available income rather than plan to levy new taxes to meet an expanding program."

As Federal taxes increase—and they must if the Government is to make good on its obligations—the pinch on the State and local tax fields will grow harder. It will become more difficult for them to find sources of tax revenue not already being drained by Washington. A returning dependency on real-estate levies and still higher sales taxes would seem to be their own recourse if they are to continue their functions.

These State and local divisions of government are those nearest to the people, performing the services most needed by those who live on the farms and in the cities and towns. If they are starved out of the available tax fields or forced to lay insupportable burdens on their people, all will suffer.

There are no tax-proof shelters for anyone. As the ever-growing combination of Federal expenditures, debt, and taxes roll on, one thing will become painfully clearer—"the other fellow" isn't going to pay them.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 24, (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

LETTER FROM LAREDO TIMES

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in the Laredo Times of September 18, 1940, appears an open letter addressed to the President of the United States. Inasmuch as this particular letter deals in large part with my colleague the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and also with certain aspects of Latin American relations, I think it is of particular interest that the letter be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be so printed.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Laredo (Tex.) Times of September 18, 1940]

AN OPEN LETTER

President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT: Our own problem in the World War is more deep-rooted than facing the dictators of Europe. We ourselves probably contribute more to this disorderly condition than we realize.

In making this statement, let's lay down some facts that even the "crackpots" and "coattail hangers-on" in Washington can understand.

DENNIS CHAVEZ, of New Mexico, was opposed for renomination by some of the Democrats out of Washington, including your own son, Jimmie, who delivered a speech on the eve of the election for the Senator's opponent, Mr. DEMPSEY.

Yet of the 96 Senators, Mr. CHAVEZ is the only one of Latin-American origin. With the present problem of understanding the Latin-American countries, these Washington folk oppose the ablest man in the Senate capable of understandingly talking over our mutual problems with the republics of the Americas.

We know Senator CHAVEZ personally and have been with him on several occasions. There is no doubt but that he invited some of the antagonism of his fellow Democrats by possibly forgetting that parties usually fight their differences out within the party and support their party and their leader. We have noted Senator CHAVEZ has not followed this principle on several occasions. He also had the misfortune of his family getting bogged down in political hand-outs in New Mexico which went through the courts and smeared our friend, Senator CHAVEZ.

But these are human errors, and other party leaders have done this or other things. It does not detract from Senator CHAVEZ's unique and outstanding value to the Nation and to the party because of his Latin-American extraction. Four years ago last July, we had the pleasure of hearing Senator CHAVEZ address the Chamber of Deputies in Mexico City. At the same time and making addresses to the same body was our own Senator Connally, the then Senator McAdoo, of California, Ambassador Josephus Daniels, and many other notables of this country.

But the speech which received the closest attention and the most respect from this distinguished body of lawmakers and the great crowd in the galleries was that of Senator CHAVEZ. The remarks of Senator CHAVEZ were quoted more widely than that of all the other speakers combined. Though his Spanish was a little foreign to the Spanish spoken in Mexico City, the reception was tremendous.

We watched the reaction of the speakers closely because for more than 25 years we have been actively interested in the affairs of Mexico. We found that the people of Mexico felt that Senator CHAVEZ understood their problems far better and more clearly than the other distinguished representatives.

Senator CHAVEZ not only praised his Mexican listeners, but he condemned some of their acts and policies very frankly and openly but in a manner appreciated. He was not foolish enough to tell his listeners that everything in Mexico was fine and dandy—because he didn't think so.

This leads to a point which for several years now we have been trying to get over in Washington. We have tried to get the State and War Departments to understand how to reach a better understanding between Mexico and the United States as well as with all the Latin American countries.

Frankly, Washington has contributed damn little to solving this important problem.

The 40,000 population of Laredo, Tex., is about 90 percent Latin American origin. Three hundred feet across the river are 28,000 people in Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, and all but a small number of families are of Latin American origin. Laredo, Tex., is the only border town whose city and county government is controlled by a political machine dominated mostly by people of Latin American origin. It is the only town on the Mexican border in the United States where complete harmony between the various nationalities work out civic, social, and public life in every respect. This is not true in any other border town from the Pacific to the Gulf of Mexico.

Before Washington got busy and our State and War Departments robbed Fort McIntosh of its personnel, these two cities, Nuevo Laredo and Laredo, were used as a meeting place by the people of northern Mexico for sporting and social events, in which the army people of Mexico across the river would attend these functions together.

What did this mean? Simply that dumbness in Washington tore down the Army post on the border, where understanding between the people of Mexico and the United States was being brought closer together. The people of Mexico knew us and our problems, and we understood them and their problems. Everybody knows that meeting and mixing with the other fellow always helps to bring about better understanding and relations.

Again, we used to have a military band at this post. Ignorance and political sabotage in Washington robbed us of this, too. Here the main rail route to Mexico and the only highway gateway route, when high Mexico officials arrived, our band put the necessary feeling into the occasion. Washington, though, despite our continuous protest, is dumb about its Latin American policy. It almost destroyed Fort McIntosh and it tried to destroy the only Latin American who is a Member of the United States Senate.

Washington should wake up and find out why our relations and understandings south of the border are not better. They should honor a man like DENNIS CHAVEZ instead of trying to beat him.

Send Senator CHAVEZ rather than Roy Howard to visit all the capitals south of the Rio Grande and he will do in these republics just what he did in Mexico City 4 years ago, because they understand and trust him.

Oregon State Federation of Labor Meeting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

RESOLUTION OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a resolution adopted by the executive board of the Oregon State Federation of Labor at its meeting held on Saturday, September 14, 1940.

The resolution follows:

Whereas the decision of the National Labor Relations Board, in determining the bargaining unit for longshoremen of the Pacific coast, included all Pacific ports in a single unit; and

Whereas this ruling denies the longshoremen of a number of ports the privilege of selecting the International Longshoremen's Union as their representative for collective bargaining and thereby denies these workers the American and democratic right of free choice; and

Whereas the fruit of this unfair decision is now evident in disputes existing in the number of Northwest ports, such disputes disturbing and delaying marine transportation, which delays would be removed if the longshoremen were granted their democratic right of free choice of bargaining agency; and

Whereas the position taken by the National Labor Relations Board has the effect of placing all western longshoremen at the mercy and under the domination of Harry Bridges whose wish or whim becomes the law in determining the rights or privileges under which longshoremen may be employed; and

Whereas the western arbiter, acting under the unjust decision of the National Labor Relations Board, has ruled against the exercise of the inherent right of longshoremen in certain northwestern ports, especially the port of Tacoma, to choose the I. L. A. as their bargaining agency: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the executive board of the Oregon State Federation of Labor, That we protest the ruling of the National Labor Relations Board and call upon the Board to reverse the intolerable ruling and, if the Board fails or refuses to make such reversal and by that failure or refusal continues to violate the fundamental rights of workers, that we protest to the national administration against the ruling and call upon the national administration to appoint as members of the National Labor Relations Board persons who recognize the democratic right of workers to be represented in collective bargaining by the agency of their own choosing.

Third Presidential Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, September 24, (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

STATEMENT OF RICHARD F. CLEVELAND BEFORE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, under the leave granted me, I present for printing in the Appendix of the RECORD, the statement made this morning by Richard F. Cleveland, distinguished lawyer and son of President Grover Cleveland, before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee holding hearings on the question of a constitutional amendment to limit the tenure of office of President of the United States and place some control upon the exercise of political power.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT OF RICHARD F. CLEVELAND BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE ON JOINT RESOLUTIONS 15 AND 289

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall not try to review all the factors involved in this extraordinarily vital issue, but will summarize the considerations which I believe most important.

There is no doubt whatever in my mind that if the voters of the United States in 1940 sanction a third Presidential term they will remove our most effective check against the world's present tendency toward concentration of political power. That step is far more significant, of course, than giving President Roosevelt a third term. It is a landmark, a River Rubicon. It is true in all human affairs that after the first momentous overthrow of a restraint the succeeding moves in the same direction become easy and almost inevitable. A young person, for example, may struggle long and hard with his conscience against the first minor criminal offense, or even against the first drink or cigarette, but the second and third and fourth each become less of an issue and soon a habit. The alluring idea that "just once won't hurt" we know to be false.

The committee has already considered, from those better qualified to give it, the detailed history of the tradition against a third Presidential term, from Washington and Jefferson to the present day. That history conclusively proves that the wisest and soundest Americans, who created and preserved our Nation, knew the danger and repudiated it. Of course, if conditions were now different, we should not merely from sentiment cling to an outworn restraint. But with all the changes that have come over the world and this country, the problems of human behavior and political power have not changed. In these respects even Plato and Aristotle are contemporary advisers. The worth and independence of one human soul, and the structure of government and society to promote and protect that worth and independence, are still and always must be, the basic objectives of rational men. The social and political conditions which give individuals opportunity to develop themselves, we call democracy. There are two equally essential factors involved in that idea: One is that men should not be coerced by external restraint; the second, more easily overlooked, is the necessity for citizens in a democracy to contribute actively to the functions of their government and their society. Strong and beneficent paternal governments might be wise enough not to restrain their subjects, but the fatal disease of such power lies in sapping the independence of human beings by taking from them the duty of arguing, working, fighting, and thinking about the way they shall be governed.

Therefore, based upon the very nature of human beings—not from abstract theory—a paternal government cannot be a democratic government. It is hardly necessary to add that the American Constitution was conceived in that conviction, and that our machinery of government was deliberately set up to allow individuals and communities to be free, certainly, but also to work out and argue out and fight out their own salvation.

The central consideration in this issue is power. In a democracy individual citizens cannot give up their power even if they want to. The Germans wanted to give up their power and accepted Hitler because they were desperate and sought a master. It is possible to understand the surrender of liberty by the Germans, but unthinkable that we should follow them by taking the first step toward perpetuation of political power.

Very strong arguments can be made for centralization of power. Such government is simpler and more efficient in all mechanical ways. It permits prompt decision and action. We all feel impatience at times over the seemingly endless deliberations and arguments of legislative bodies when action is important. But I put it to the committee squarely that the democratic ideal cannot be realized in any other way. In 1789, when the Constitution was adopted, we had the choice between the somewhat clumsy and tedious processes of free government, and the smooth-running, efficient mechanics of powerful government. We have clung to our original choice of government all these years. When we made our choice and whenever we renewed it, we did it knowing that the growth of power was a practical danger only in emergencies. The consistent rejection of a third term has its only significance in emergencies, or when a powerful and popular President seeks to perpetuate his power. The arguments against a third term apply only to emergencies. An emergency is therefore the basic argument against a third term, not in favor of it.

Thus we face again in 1940 a clear, unequivocal choice between the advantages of concentrated political power, and the advantages of the democratic processes. If the temptation were not so great, because of Mr. Roosevelt's personal popularity, and the unprecedented political power which now attaches to the Presidency, there would be no issue. It is perhaps not improper to add that recent attempts made by the Executive to gain control of the judicial and legislative branches of the National Government show that the dangers of concentrated power are real and not imaginary.

I suggest that the so-called founding fathers in the beginnings of our free Government, and that this committee today were and are concerned not with intentions but with power. It is not necessary to charge extravagantly that Mr. Roosevelt wishes to be a dictator, or to challenge his good faith in any respect. It is enough that he, or any other man who follows him and seeks a third elective term, should thereby represent that we must repudiate our deliberate choice of the democratic processes, and that we must now feebly confess that our Nation can no longer produce more than one man fit to be President.

I solemnly believe that unless a third term for any man is forestalled by the voters in free election, or by suitable legislative action, we shall pass the great divide between democratic processes and power government.

William B. Bankhead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS H. CULLEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, it is not easy to find words adequate for expressing the profound sense of sorrow and loss occasioned by the death of Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, Speaker of the House of Representatives, Sunday, September 15, 1940.

The untimely death of our distinguished Speaker and my beloved friend has been a very severe shock to me. When I came to Congress on March 4, 1919, my friend WILL BANKHEAD was one of the first Members to greet me and he immediately showed his eagerness to cooperate and offer his advice and wise counsel to one less experienced in the procedures and traditions of this body. During those early days in my congressional career there was born a friendship with WILL BANKHEAD never to be severed but by death. I feel that I have lost one of my dearest friends in the House.

His great humanitarianism, his innate kindliness, and his respect for his fellow man was evidenced in his every activity. He was possessed of a fine sense of honor, and impelled by pure patriotism and a strong sense of duty to give of his time, his boundless talent, and unlimited energy in a fearless endeavor to render to his country the highest possible service.

His family, his colleagues in the House, and his host of friends mourn him. He will always be enshrined within our hearts as a true and noble character. Let us hope that the sterling qualities of his life may encourage others to follow and imitate his example.

Propaganda Stand Denied by MacLeish

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, in justice to Mr. Archibald MacLeish, the able and eminent Librarian of Congress, I desire to have printed in the RECORD the following article from the Washington Post:

PROPAGANDA STAND DENIED BY MACLEISH—NEVER ADVOCATED UNITED STATES AGENCY LIKE THOSE OF DICTATORS, HE SAYS

Archibald MacLeish, Librarian of Congress, yesterday denied that he ever had advocated a Federal "propaganda bureau similar to those maintained by the totalitarian countries."

His statement was in response to an editorial appearing in the Charlotte Observer, which was reprinted on the editorial page of the Washington Post on September 9.

At the same time MacLeish affirmed: "I do believe and I have frequently stated that democracy must become again a fighting faith, if it is to survive the present crisis.

"I have frequently stated," he continued, "and I believe that writers, teachers, scholars must throw themselves into the battle for the defense of democracy against fascism in the realm of ideas, as well as in the realm of things.

MUST DEFEND OURSELVES

"I believe," he said, "that this people and this Government must defend themselves against the lies with which fascism attacks them and attacks the democratic form of government here and in Latin America and throughout the world. I do not believe," he said emphatically, "I have never believed, and I have never said that a 'propaganda bureau similar to those maintained by the totalitarian countries' should be established in Washington or anywhere else."

Reason for the statement was expressed by MacLeish as follows:

"In its issue of September 9 the Washington Post quotes the Charlotte Observer as saying that 'Archibald MacLeish, Librarian of Congress, advances the proposition that the Federal Government should have a propaganda bureau similar to those maintained by the totalitarian countries.'

"The editor of the Observer has, presumably, his private means of discovering the opinions of his fellow citizens," the librarian said. "Had he consulted the public record, he would have learned that I have not only never advanced such a proposition, but that I am one of the last men in America who would.

LIES IN THE NAME OF LIES

"He would have learned that I have repeatedly and publicly expressed my hatred of the indecencies and falsehoods of totalitarian propaganda which lies 'not in the name of truth, but in the name of lies,' so that 'the common basis of communication without which a common culture cannot exist' is destroyed.

"He would have learned that I have repeatedly and publicly stated my conviction that democracy is worth fighting for precisely because democracy alone assures the freedom of individual opinion.

"'The essential characteristic of democracy,' MacLeish continued, quoting again, as he had just done, from previous public utterances of his own—'certainly the essential characteristic of democracy contrasted with any form of dictatorship—is this: That democracy is the one form of government which keeps the future open. Dictatorship suppresses doubt, liquidates dissent, polices imagination, freezes the human world in the form in which it is. Only democracy permits the future to occur, for only under a democracy can the scholar say "No," the scientist says "Perhaps," the poet say "Otherwise." This is the essential quality of democracy in action.'"

Bankhead's Passing Leaves Recollections

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, unlike material things the bonds of friendship and love are strengthened rather than weakened by a parting. Then it is that all memories of former associations crowd back upon us with a poignancy that is both tender and painful.

When the late Speaker, the beloved BILL BANKHEAD, was with us we felt honored when we conversed with him, but his presence was so commonplace that we sometimes forgot his many diversified interests and avocations. Now that he is gone we grasp at each recollection. So it is that I now recall in a special way my pleasure on more than one occasion when the Speaker and I discussed music or some kindred subject; and how our conversation usually drifted into recitations from Shakespeare. The Speaker knew Shakespeare as he knew the rules of the House. Often he would turn a phrase into a quotation from the Bard of Avon. His attachment followed naturally from his love of the stage.

This was but one facet of his nature. We who had the honor of knowing him recognized his qualities of statesmanship as did the Nation. But more than others, we understood why he was great, for we had the opportunity of observing these other sides of his character. Like Washington the engineer, Franklin the philosopher, or Jefferson the architect, Speaker BANKHEAD had diversified interests that were a part of him.

Although our hearts may be heavy with grief let us lift them up in gratitude for the privilege and honor that was ours in knowing one of the truly great men of this era.

Democracy in Missouri

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address delivered by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] at Moberly, Mo., on Saturday, September 21, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the democracy of the great State of Missouri, there is no honor greater in any political campaign than to be invited to speak in Missouri, for, if Virginia is the mother of Presidents, Missouri has been the mother of orators. If Pennsylvania holds the shrine of American independence, Missouri still is the home of individual independence today.

Great orators and great individualists, men of independent powers and strong in the power of independent words, have kept the name of Missouri in the forefront as the history of our Nation has unrolled.

And so I come to this rostrum inwardly quaking, for I feel all around me in the atmosphere of your State the traditions of such giants as Thomas Hart Benton, Sterling Price, Frank Blair, Senator Vest, and the immortal Champ Clark—men whose words could shake the Nation or bring tears to a crossroads crowd.

I kept remembering this as I came across the great river from your sister State of Illinois yesterday, remembering what a record for bold, courageous action lies stamped across the annals of your Commonwealth, and how that record is being maintained today by Senator BENNETT CLARK, one of the great leaders and parliamentarians in the history of the Senate, and by your other able and distinguished Senator, HARRY TRUMAN, whose reelection is a certainty. Senator TRUMAN will continue in the future, as in the past, to carry forward the constructive and liberal ideals of the Democratic Party. I also desire to pay my high respects and by tribute to your eminent governor, His Excellency the Honorable Lloyd Stark, who have been a close and valued friend of this administration. I bring to him the greetings of his old friend, Gov. Henry Horner, of my beloved Illinois.

It was Missourians, inspired by one of your boldest citizens, Frank Blair, who struck the blow in 1861 that held Missouri, Kentucky, and southern Illinois in the Union and decided the fate of the war in the West.

And on the other side in that same fiery era, it was Missourians, riding behind Joe Shelby in 1865, who were the last to wave the Confederate battle flag on American soil. They would not surrender when the Confederacy fell, and as they rode across the Rio Grande into Mexico, their beloved Stars and Bars still flashed in the sun.

True to their convictions at the start and at the finish of that war, Missourians made a great record in the sixties. Missouri has bred the bone and sinew of independence, and that is one particular reason I am happy to be invited here today, for your ideal has been one that I have tried in my own way to follow. A man has to listen to his conscience, and it leads him sometimes along a difficult path. It has forced me upon occasion to differ with the national administration, which I respect, and with the party I love. To oppose certain details of a major program that I approve has been difficult, but in the end it has made it easier to say, as I now do say, that in this hour of world crisis and national peril I not only approve but I thank God for the international policies of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

I feel this so strongly that I cannot refrain from making here and now a confession. Once in my seat in the Congress I became convinced that I knew more than President Roosevelt about a certain phase of international affairs. That was when the President in his famous speech dedicating a bridge in Chicago in 1937 said—I quote: "The peace of the world and the welfare and security of every nation today is being threatened." He saw war coming in Europe. He warned against it. He tried to get the civilized world to frighten off the aggressor nations by threatening a great quarantine.

When he made those bold statements I admired his bravery. I took off my hat to his inspired words about the beauties of peace and America's search for peace, but, like my friend the late Senator Borah, I thought he had gone too far in predicting war in Europe. We in the Senate had what we believed to be sound and good information that Germany, France, and England would not fight. We thought the President was wrong.

But what did time prove? It proved that he was right and I was wrong. Time proved that he had known exactly what he was saying. Events made it perfectly clear that he had better information than we. And it proved something else, something more important and vital still; it proved that his judgment, his instincts, his sagacity in international affairs have not been rivaled since the days of Abraham Lincoln.

When foreign nations threatened our shores in the 1860's, when indeed a foreign army did violate the Monroe Doctrine and did set up a crowned Hapsburg emperor in Mexico, Lincoln saved the situation—saved the republican institutions of the Western Hemisphere. With words now strong, now soft, with tact supreme, he kept pressing upon the invading powers, and in the end, when the United States stood ready with the largest fleet and the strongest Army in the whole world, the foreign powers withdrew without firing a gun at us. The Monroe Doctrine was reestablished and the Old World of Europe shrank back again to its original borders, and the United States went on to its destiny with social, political, and economic progress developing in the democratic way.

Since that day no other American President has shown the diplomatic skill, the steadfast courage, the concern for the whole Western Hemisphere that President Roosevelt has shown. That greatest of modern Secretaries of State, that cool, unruffled model of patient wisdom, Secretary Cordell Hull, from the native stock of Tennessee, has been at President Roosevelt's side to help achieve a peace, an understanding, an agreement with Latin America never reached before. The Habana Conference is destined to stand as one of the monuments to American statecraft because it is based upon the good neighbor policy, based not on aggression but upon mutual help, upon respect for our sister republics to the south.

Today the Monroe Doctrine, thanks to Roosevelt and Hull, is firmer than ever before, and the cause of democracy and self-government incalculably strengthened from the North Pole to the Straits of Magellan.

Now, when it is so desperately needed, the prestige of democracy rises in the New World as it sinks in the Old World.

Now, when danger menaces our institutions, we feel the strong hand of President Roosevelt guiding us toward a greater self-confidence, not only within our 48 States, but in the whole Western Hemisphere.

Where are our greatest factories for preparedness work to rise? Here in the midlands between the Alleghenies and the Rockies. The President has said so. The work of making us nationally so strong that peace will automatically come is sweeping rapidly forward, and soon the great Mississippi Valley will feel it, for from a military standpoint our main munitions plants, our chief airplane factories should be here in the interior. And under the impulse of this new necessity, forced on us from abroad, more and more of the Nation's production will center in this great valley.

Once again the Mississippi and the Missouri, the Ohio and the Illinois will be black with barges plying back and forth from New Orleans; the railroads will increase their activities in helping carry the surplus freight; our trade with South and Central America will grow beyond the dreams of any of us here today. New Orleans will be the great port of the midlands as it was a hundred years ago, with the river and railroad traffic bearing our products to the fleets that sail to the ports of sister republics. Already our South American trade has multiplied itself. The catastrophe of Europe had forced us to make good in a material way the spiritual good which President Roosevelt began preaching long before war broke—the good-neighbor policy between the American continents.

Thanks to him, and thanks to the Nation which has endorsed and applauded his next step of acquiring the airplane and naval bases in the islands of the Caribbean, the United States will be ready for any turn of events in the war overseas.

Suppose, if you will, that there had been no good-neighbor policy, no friendly, conciliatory, honest conference at Habana, no lease of those military bases in the islands and ports of the Caribbean—suppose the old imperialism of the past Republican regimes had continued to spread distrust in Latin America.

And then suppose the present war in Europe had come, and England had fallen, as it yet may fall before the onslaught of totalitarian force. Who would own all those islands, those possessions of the defunct Dutch, French, and British Governments?

Hitler would own them, for to the victor belongs the spoils. The totalitarian ideology, utterly foreign and hostile to our theory of government, would be at our doors ready and able to smash us.

But under the wise, the quietly energetic hands of Roosevelt and Hull, this Nation and South America have gone far in preparing against so cruel a danger. The sparks from the inferno overseas may yet fall on Greenland, on Newfoundland, on the Bermudas and imperil us, but we are far readier to stamp out the blaze than most people think. Our danger is still great, the work is only well begun. It must be carried forward by experienced hands.

Our ship of state is traveling through dangerous economic and military seas—the tremendous storm from abroad is lashing us. So far we are still safe, thanks to the firm hand at the helm—the hand that is guiding us toward the harbor of security.

Shall we now disobey the old adage of the sea which tells us "Never drop the pilot in a storm"? Shall we change over to a new pilot who has never been to sea? If we should change to the pilot our Republican friends are urging upon us, it would be years before he could learn the simplest laws of navigation, and we haven't time for that. We haven't a single minute to spare.

That is why President Roosevelt is not here today, touring the midlands, campaigning for reelection. He hasn't time to make the race for President. He has to stick on the bridge, he has to keep his hand on the helm, for the security of this ship of state is the first and foremost thing in his heart.

Let me, in this farming region, put it more in your and my own terms. When the wheat is ripe, you have to get the combine in the field quick or not at all. You must cut the grain before it shatters and is lost. You mount the combine and then just as you start out, someone comes along and says: "Here's a new driver. He says he can cut the wheat so not a grain will be lost. He hasn't ever driven a combine, but he has been reading about it off there in his office in New York, and he says he can do a wonderful job."

What are you going to say to that proposition? Why, before that new man could learn how to drive the machine, all the wheat would have shattered onto the ground, and as likely as not the combine would be wrecked to boot.

In other words, the Republican Party is now proposing nothing but that the Nation in a crisis should start experimenting with an unknown quantity.

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch, certainly no friend of President Roosevelt in this hour, but as we all admit, a newspaper of great independence, integrity, and intellect, put it well the other day—last Tuesday in fact—when it called Wendell Willkie to account for sniping at the President with an air rifle on trivial issues. I quote: "We imagine what voters want nowadays is a program they can ponder. Mr. Willkie, if he has a program, has failed to reveal it, except insofar as he accepts the President's own program. While Mr. Willkie promises jobs, he does not state how he is going to produce them."

And in that same issue the Post-Dispatch prints a cartoon showing the great issue of the day to be America's relation to the European war, and demanding that both parties stick to it.

With that we Democrats agree. We have recognized all along that there is really only one issue in this campaign—and that is the great international emergency and what we shall do to keep its sparks from setting our roof tops afire.

We have seen the forces which damn democracy and crush republican institutions start their cruel, brutal work in central Europe, start in Austria and come westward, crushing and smashing as they come. Austria falls, Czechoslovakia falls, Poland falls, Denmark goes down, so does Norway, Holland, Belgium, France, and this minute the bombs of nazidom are bursting on London.

Where will the bombs stop in their westward progress? Some in America are so fatuous as to dream in their smug fool's paradise that it can never happen here.

But it is the lesson of history that revolutions never stop till someone stops them either by use of force, or with the show of impregnable force. The latter course is President Roosevelt's.

Conquerors are never satisfied. The lust for power feeds upon itself and will not be curbed until it runs bang into some mountainous fortress which sobers the aggressor and makes him think before he batters out his brains. You can't reason with revolutions; you can't argue with madmen. All you can do is bar your doors and call out the police. And under President Roosevelt the United States is calling up its own police—armies of its own young men who will rise so strong, with their ships, their tanks, their planes, that Hitler, after one look at them, will turn back and leave the New World—North and South America—to itself.

The United States has found one man who has proved he can match Hitler in statecraft, and that he knows how to prepare a country so thoroughly that peace will be assured without a single shot ever being fired at or by an American.

Only last week in his masterful speech to the teamsters' union in Washington, D. C., President Roosevelt demonstrated his great diplomatic ability, the diplomacy which is based on common sense and his great and enduring love for human beings—and it is that kind of diplomacy, brains based on right instincts, which will bring us through. In giving anew his pledge to labor's rights, the President voiced once more his old hatred of war, the loathing of bloodshed and carnage which fills his heart.

What a travesty it is to say, as the Republican Party is now saying, in its desperate and frenzied search for issues, that President Roosevelt is hurrying America into war.

You and I know that he is leading us into a state of preparedness that will assure us peace, not war.

But since they have raised this issue, let us look at the kind of man with which they find themselves burdened in this campaign. Let us ask what kind of a President, what kind of a leader will Wendell Willkie be, granting that the national polls are all wrong and that he should by some miracle win the election.

Has there been one thing in Willkie's utterances to assure the Nation that he wouldn't go blundering and butting into calamity soon after becoming President? Has he talked or behaved like a leader who could keep the peace or use diplomacy or brains in an emergency? Again and again he has used rash, helpless, violent words that went far beyond anything President Roosevelt has said about powers that threaten democracy.

On May 28 at Akron, Ohio, he said: "It is clear that England and France constitute our first line of defense against Hitler * * * it is enormously to our advantage to have them win. I should like to make this proposition. I should like to ask Secretary Hull to ask the democracies publicly what help, short of troops, the American people can give."

In short, Willkie stands ready to strip the United States of all its armed forces, if need be. He stands ready to send them overseas. If carried out, this would leave us helpless should Hitler succeed in crushing England.

Willkie was ready in May to go beyond anything the President proposed.

In his Elwood speech of acceptance he spoke far more belligerently than President Roosevelt had ever done against totalitarian powers, and rushed on to shout a pugilistic defiance of Hitler—a vow to fight him in business or war, now and any time in the future. Is that the language, is that the mind, is that the temperament of a President?

Willkie in August was ready to commit the Nation to a belligerency beyond anything the President had considered.

No other Presidential candidate in the past three-quarters of a century has so clearly revealed his temperamental unfitness for the delicate task of guiding our ship of state. No other has shown such gross ignorance of recent history; no one made so many misstatements of fact. He has made them, I think, not in any attempt to deceive, but because he is by nature a hasty, blundering show-off; one who speaks before he thinks.

He spoke before he thought on the so-called conscription-of-industry amendment. This is, as you and I know, merely the policy of having capital bear the preparedness burden with men, share and share alike, and is one that the vast majority of businessmen acknowledge to be just and fair. But Wendell Willkie hasn't anything in common with the vast majority of businessmen. He is a corporation lawyer, the front for large investors, not the type of businessman that you and I know. And in his blundering rashness he blurted out a denunciation of this so-called conscription of wealth and industry and thus revealed where his real interests lay—right with the Wall Street financiers who fatten on small-business men and consumers and laborers alike. He ran true to his life philosophy in placing property rights above human rights.

Then when his Republican managers had spanked him in private for his colossal blunder, he came stumbling out with an even worse apology—he said he hadn't read the Overton-Russell amendment to the selective-service bill, which was the act in question.

Wouldn't the dictators of the Old World welcome an opponent of this kind? Is it any wonder that the Nazis and Fascists of Europe are all praying to such strange gods as they have for the defeat of Roosevelt and the election of Wendell Willkie?

Willkie has already dispelled the myth that he was a capable executive. He has torn to pieces the Republican organization. He has already insulted the whole city of Chicago recklessly, even flippantly, saying "To hell with Chicago." In that city he recklessly let escape over the radio such a flood of profanity as to offend thousands of middle western women who were listening in.

He is definitely not an executive—he is merely a bulldozing corporation lawyer who, with the power of big money behind him, is used to kicking everybody from his path, whether it be rival corporations or the little householder who thinks he is paying too much for electric light.

He doesn't take time to inform himself upon the subjects he wants to discuss. In Peoria, Ill., he disgusted thousands of listeners by declaring that President Roosevelt had telephoned European rulers and persuaded them to sell Czechoslovakia down the river. Even he hasn't tried to explain away that sheer invention. He has decided to let that one drop in the hope it will be forgotten.

He is like a conceited schoolboy who wants to sit in teacher's chair, ask all the questions, and give all the answers even if they are wrong.

This campaign comes down to one question, one comparison, one choice. Who of the two candidates is the experienced man, and who is the inexperienced man?

On the one hand is Roosevelt, trained as an Assistant Secretary of the Navy, trained as a Governor, trained as a student of history and statecraft—a man whose speeches show deep knowledge and a deeper understanding of the warp and woof of our national character. On the other hand is Willkie who may know corporation law and the devious contrivances of high finance, but who betrays in every word his ignorance of either history, current events, or the hearts of his listeners.

The Republicans present a man unprepared and inadequate. The Presidency would be too much for him. If he should make as many mistakes in the first month in the White House as he has made in his first month on the stump, what a shambles our national economy and our international relations would present. Can America afford to entrust its destiny to a man whose only talent lies in actions which delight the stock gamblers?

What America needs in this crisis is more of the tried and true guidance Franklin D. Roosevelt has been giving our Ship of State. From this meeting let the cry roll out across the Mississippi, across the Ozarks, across the Big Muddy to all the sister States, "the great commonwealth of Missouri will not drop the pilot in a storm."

Manufactured War Hysteria

REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 25, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in proposing the resolution which I intend to present, I do so because of a deep conviction that one of two situations must be true; either this Nation, without the knowledge of the Congress or the people, has been brought to the verge of war, or else there is at work in this country a propaganda machine designed to create a fear of war that is damnable in its conception and in its operation.

This Nation is today operating under a cloud of fear, a fear which I charge has been manufactured by the New Deal administration for the purpose of political expediency and in order to convince the people that our situation in the world is so precarious that we dare not "change horses in the middle of the stream."

Scarcely a day has passed for months but that some new fear—some new alarmist report—has been spread upon the pages of the press, inspired by some spokesman for the administration.

On the 16th day of this month the Chief of Staff of the United States Army, Gen. George C. Marshall, declared in a radio address that—it is the feeling of the War Department that the next 6 months include the possibility of being the most critical period in the history of the Nation.

He declared further:

The situation today is utterly different from that of 1917. Then we were at war, but we foresaw small possibility of military danger to this country. Today such a possibility trembles on the verge of becoming a probability.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the newspapers carried headlines such as:

United States future critical, Marshall declares, calling more guards.

In the next deck of the head it reads:

Military danger seen within the next 6 months by the Chief of Staff.

Then the newspaper account goes on to state:

Warned by Gen. George C. Marshall, Army Chief of Staff, that the United States faces a prospect of military danger which "trembles on the verge of becoming a probability," a second increment of 35,700 National Guard men today began preparations to sever connections with civil life for a year, beginning October 15.

Mr. Speaker, it must be perfectly obvious to any thinking person that alarmist reports of this character going out over the Nation stir up the fears of the people and keep them so unsettled that the normal activities of the country are seriously and adversely affected. Not only is that true, but we also find other stories going out, such as the one which I desire to put in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The Washington Daily News of September 20 had a story at the top of the page under a two-column head. The head reads as follows:

Army checking up on casket supply.

The article goes on to state:

The War Department is making a survey of the supply of caskets and the production facilities of casket manufacturers in this country.

This information came out incidentally at a board meeting of the Advertising Funeral Directors of America at the Mayflower, Wednesday.

Confirmation was sought at the office of the National Casket Co., whose manager, T. Robert Walmsley, said the survey had been in progress 2 or 3 years. Recently, he added, it had been pushed more vigorously.

* * * At the office of the Assistant War Secretary, Maj. A. Robert Ginsburgh, admitted that such a survey had been in progress but denied that it had special significance.

"We haven't stopped surveying the casket industry for 20 years," he said. "It is just a part of our routine of Army necessities. We have surveyed caskets as we have artillery, airplanes, and other materials of war.

"After all," he said, "if you have 1,000,000 men under arms, even in peacetime you are going to have some casualties; some men are going to fall off trucks and have other accidents and illnesses.

"Then, too," he continued, "when you have an army you have to figure it's going to fight some day. Fighting means casualties, and casualties call for caskets. That's all there is to it. Just a simple matter of being prepared with essentials. We survey everything from armor plate to underwear."

Think of it, Mr. Speaker. That sort of story going out to the fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters of the sixteen or seventeen million young men who are going to be registered in the next few weeks for military service.

It does no good to try to waive these things aside, Mr. Speaker. These reports are alarming the Nation, they are upsetting the activities of the Nation, they are preventing proper attention to our domestic problems, and they are giving a false issue to the people in this campaign.

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if General Marshall was correct in his statement that "It is the feeling of the War Department that the next 6 months include the possibility of being the most critical period in the history of this Nation," and that "The situation is utterly different from that of 1917. Then we were at war, but we foresaw small possibility of military danger to this country." I say, Mr. Speaker, if General Marshall was accurate in those statements, and if he was accurate in the next statement, "Today such a possibility of military danger trembles on the verge of becoming a probability," then this Congress and the people ought to know something about this danger.

What is the military danger to the United States which "trembles on the verge of becoming a probability"?

From what foreign power or powers, Mr. Speaker, is such a military danger to the United States to be apprehended?

What active steps have been taken by any such foreign power or powers toward making such military danger to the United States probable?

What additional steps by any such foreign power or powers are necessary to render such military danger to the United States actual?

What steps, Mr. Speaker, are necessary to be taken by the United States to prevent the possibility of such military danger to this Nation from becoming actual?

On what date may it reasonably be anticipated that such military danger to the United States will become actual? When will we topple over the brink on the verge of which, the Chief of Staff says, we are trembling?

What section or part of the United States, Mr. Speaker, is most likely to be subjected to this military danger, upon the verge of which the Nation trembles at this hour?

What factors render the possibility of such military danger to the United States greater now than it was in 1917?

What other facts are in the possession of the Secretary of War, Mr. Speaker, tending to substantiate, or explain, or supplement these statements made by the Chief of Staff of the United States Army respecting the military danger to the United States, upon the verge of which the Nation now trembles?

These, Mr. Speaker, are questions which concern not alone this great bureaucracy that has been built up by the New Deal. They are questions that concern this Congress, sir. They are questions which concern the very lives of the men who are going to do the fighting and the bleeding and the dying, if there is any fighting and bleeding and dying to be done. These are questions which concern the heart and the happiness of every father and mother and brother and sister of every man who is conscripted into the ranks of the armed service.

These statements ought not to go out to the country unless they are true—unless there is some basis in fact for them—and if such stories are true, then certainly the Congress and the people ought to be told something about this impending, this grave, threatening military danger upon the verge of which the Nation is trembling and which may overtake us within the next 6 months before we can conscript an army, before we can train the men, before we can provide them with any of the modern implements of warfare—of defense, let alone of offense.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am, in all earnestness, submitting this resolution, and I plead with this House to adopt it in order that we may find out the truth about these reports.

Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced the following resolution:

Whereas in a radio address on September 16 last the Chief of Staff of the United States Army stated that "* * * it is the feeling of the War Department that the next 6 months include the possibility of being the most critical period in the history of the United States * * " and that " * * the situation today is utterly different from that of 1917. Then we were at war, but we foresaw small possibility of military danger to this country. Today such a possibility trembles on the verge of becoming a probability. * * *"; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to transmit forthwith to the House of Representatives the following information:

(1) What is the military danger to the United States which "trembles on the verge of becoming a probability";

(2) From what foreign power or powers is such military danger to the United States to be feared;

(3) What active steps have been taken by any such foreign power or powers toward making such military danger to the United States probable;

(4) What additional steps by any such foreign power or powers are necessary to render such military danger to the United States actual;

(5) What steps by the United States are necessary to prevent the possibility of such military danger to the United States from becoming actual;

(6) On what date may it reasonably be anticipated that such military danger to the United States will become actual;

(7) What part of the United States is most likely to be subjected to such military danger;

(8) What factors render the possibility of such military danger to the United States greater now than it was in 1917; and

(9) Any other facts in the possession of the Secretary of War tending to substantiate, explain, or supplement the statements made by the Chief of Staff of the Army respecting military danger to the United States.

World Mother of Mother's Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERIDAN DOWNEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the extension of remarks of Hon. Michael J. Stack, of Pennsylvania, in the House of Representatives in 1938, relating to World Mother of Mother's Day.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. STACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Baltimore & Ohio magazine:

"[From the Baltimore & Ohio magazine]

"THE MOTHER OF MOTHER'S DAY

"(By Margaret Talbott Stevens, editor)

"The splendid work of Anna Jarvis, Philadelphia, whom we know as the founder of Mother's Day, is growing more and more widespread. This year she participated in a number of interesting activities in connection with the celebration of the occasion.

"In paying a tribute to the founder, John Wanamaker once said: 'I would rather be the accepted author of Mother's Day than to be King Edward VII (1906) of England.'

"MOTHER OF MOTHER'S DAY

"Mrs. Anna M. Jarvis, the mother of Mother's Day, was a B. & O. mother, and the inspiration for the founding of Mother's Day by her daughter, Miss Anna Jarvis, of Philadelphia. The Jarvis family came to America in 1618 and settled in Virginia.

"WITHOUT PUBLIC SUPPORT

"With no money to support her work save her own limited funds, Miss Jarvis for years has labored until now 50 countries of the world, even Asia and Africa and in distant island possessions, celebrate the day without commercialism.

"MOTHER'S DAY FLAG DAY

"After long effort Miss Jarvis succeeded in having the Congress pass a resolution for the annual display of the flag on Mother's Day.

"Addresses have been made in the Congress in honor of Miss Jarvis as the founder of Mother's Day.

"OBSERVANCE

"Here in America we wear carnations and give gifts to our mothers.

"In Mexico, on Mother's Day, the thatched adobe huts as well as pretentious palaces are decorated with flowers in honor, or remembrance, of mothers. It is a lovely custom, and one for which Miss Jarvis ever will be honored, not alone for the thought which prompted its founding, but also for the labor of love over a long period of years which has brought about its world-wide establishment."

OTHER TRIBUTES

"For many years it has been an established custom to set aside annually a day devoted to the honoring of mothers."

"Let us remember first our devotion to her, the greatest mother of all time, who gave to us the Holy Christ Child." (Gov. Martin L. Davey, of Ohio.)

"You may be sure that Mother's Day in New York State will be duly and appropriately observed in keeping with the finest traditions of motherhood." (Secretary to Governor of New York.)

"Alabama would be derelict in her duty did she not join through her citizens with other States in the Nation paying tribute to mother." (Governor of Alabama, Hon. Bibb Graves.)

"The extraordinary growth of Mother's Day is the natural reaction of the thought of Anna Jarvis, who, sorrowing for the loss of her own mother, desired to dedicate a particular day to the memory of all mothers.

"Mother's Day is now observed in many lands. * * *

"In veneration and love of motherhood, I take pride in proclaiming Mother's Day, and observance in schools and colleges." (Governor of Maine, Hon. Lewis O. Barrows.)

"From a modest beginning through the efforts of Miss Anna Jarvis, its founder, Mother's Day is now observed even to the farthest confines of civilization.

"It is my desire that memories of our State's mothers will linger like a halo in the heart and mind of our entire citizenship." (Governor of Mississippi, Hon. Hugh White.)

Gov. R. S. Vessey, South Dakota, over 30 years ago, said:

"Never before did a celebration spread so widely in such a short period as Mother's Day founded by Anna Jarvis, of Philadelphia."

"Twenty-two years ago (1914), after long effort, Miss Anna Jarvis succeeded in having passed by the United States Congress a joint resolution for the annual display of the flag on Mother's Day, the second Sunday in May, and each year thereafter Old Glory has been displayed on Mother's Day from our National Capitol, American consulates, homes, and churches. * * *

"I wish to remind the citizens of Massachusetts that this (Mother's Day) is truly one day in which we can concur unanimously in our reverential expressions of love and devotion to the greatest of all ideals." (Governor of Massachusetts, Hon. Charles F. Hurley.)

"The presence in Harrisburg this evening of Miss Anna Jarvis, of Philadelphia, is bound to arouse a new and wider interest in the observance of Mother's Day. * * *

"To her, as to all persons whose ideas find wide acceptance, there must be a peculiar satisfaction as Mother's Day approaches.

"The inventors of electric light, the discoverer of radium, the X-ray, and other blessings to mankind have had their deserved exaltation of soul when they survey the consequences of their work, but so have such persons as Miss Jarvis, who have given to the world an idea that summons love and devotion and ennobles mankind as a necessary result." (The Patriot, Harrisburg, Pa.)

BOSTON'S GUEST

"Last year Miss Anna Jarvis, of Philadelphia, founder of Mother's Day, was the guest of the city of Boston, the greatest honor the city ever accorded a woman for personal achievement." (Boston Post, 1925.)

HISTORIC RECORDS

"Mother's Day was founded by Anna Jarvis, of Philadelphia, who designated the second Sunday in May, and Friday preceding for schools, as the time, and the white carnation as the badge" (Webster's New International Dictionary).

"Mother's Day was founded by Miss Anna Jarvis, of Philadelphia" (Winston's Dictionary, Philadelphia).

Other dictionaries, reference works, encyclopedias in United States and foreign countries credit Anna Jarvis as originator of Mother's Day, as do leading organizations and persons.

Back of other historic records have been the unique original features, plans, methods, unrecompensed and consecrated life-work of the founder, which developed the achievements of the incomparable all-nation Mother's Day.

The National Debt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. SMATHERS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ARTICLE BY JUDGE FRANK SMATHERS

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator of my native State of North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], made a statement sometime ago:

A New Deal national debt of seventy-five billion is a national calamity, exceeded only by a military invasion by Germany.

To this statement, one of my brothers, Judge Frank Smathers, who summers in western North Carolina, made a reply which was published in the Waynesville Mountaineer, under date of September 19, 1940. I ask unanimous consent that his reply be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Waynesville (N. C.) Mountaineer of September 19, 1940]

TOPICS OF THE DAY

(By Judge Frank Smathers)

EDITOR OF MOUNTAINEER:

"A New Deal national debt of $75,000,000,000 is a national calamity, exceeded only by a military invasion by Germany," so says the senior Senator of North Carolina.

By every innuendo and implication, that statement was intended, and is, an indictment and accusation that the Roosevelt administration has about wrecked the economic structure of America.

Many of the Senator's admirers will take exception to that accusation—for the reason that such a national debt does not prove national bankruptcy or a calamity, nor is it just or fair to attribute the plight of the National Budget to Mr. Roosevelt's administration, alone.

The national debt of America cannot be accurately and justly appraised except in the light of a "word picture" of which it is only an integral part. World economy is so sensitive and so integrated that what hurts one part hurts all parts.

America, taken singly, as the Senator does, and viewed only in the light of its own past, her national debt naturally seems appalling and ruinously disproportionate. But when studied and valued in the light of world conditions and in comparison with other nations of the world, then we have just cause to pat our own chests with pride and rejoicing—as the following facts and figures will show.

America's national debt of today is "chicken feed" compared to that of all the larger nations of Europe, most of which are admittedly and hopelessly bankrupt.

If America is broke, the rest of the big nations have long since "expired in a debtors' prison."

1. America's debt burden is no greater in 1940 than in 1920—because the interest rate has been reduced one-half.

2. The Government's credit was never better nor stronger than today, as evidenced by the fact that every time the Government borrows money it is oversubscribed 20 times.

3. America's per capita debt is far less than that of England or any other belligerent or neutral nation.

4. Before the fall of France, she was pouring over forty billions annually into her war machine alone—60 percent of her national income. England was even pouring more into her war machine, and over 50 percent of her national income. It must be far greater now. Russia, Germany, Japan are pouring still more into their war machines.

5. The merchant-marine trade and colonies of Denmark, Holland, Belgium, et al., are all destroyed, absorbed by Germany.

6. Europe's economic life and trade is distorted beyond all recognition.

7. All nations have adopted iron-clad control of exports and imports, and are rationing all internal supplies and resources.

8. England is already employing two foreign currencies—the pound and the Black Bourse. Germany is employing the barter and blocked currency exclusively. All rich men of Europe are liquidated, cleaned out, except England's, and there it looks inevitable—with all taxes at dizzy heights and worse yet to come.

9. With all the world at war, fighting for life and existence; with all labor, capital, trade, industry, agriculture, and currency under State and national control; with bankruptcy and unbalanced budgets universal, with millions idle and starvation stalking the streets; with more than 50,000,000 employed in Europe, making munitions alone; with the gold and hard money systems of free trade and free enterprise strangled or "gone with the wind"; with the money incentive for the moving of goods and employing of men, superseded by a governmental incentive to employ idle men and machines and feed the starving, regardless of cost or profit—it seems strange that a wealthy nation like America, so blessed, unbleeding and unbroken, should become so alarmed over an unbalanced Budget; especially when it costs little Switzerland three hundred and sixty million a year to stay out of war. If we were in her shoes, we'd be spending proportionately fifteen billion annually instead of nine billion, which includes all New Deal "squandering" for relief, public works, farmers, home owners, bankers, railroads, and other big-business barons now grumbling about taxes, and an unbalanced Budget.

Owing to world conditions Mr. Hoover started the march of public spending. Mr. Roosevelt has had to continue it as world conditions got worse instead of better—through no fault of his or Mr. Hoover. Yet, Senator BAILEY would leave the impression with the young Democrats of this State, that Mr. Roosevelt's management of the Nation's finances is a national calamity, exceeded only by a German invasion.

A War on Two Fronts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able editorial published in the New York Daily News of September 25, 1940. The editorial appears under the heading "A War on Two Fronts." As is well known, the New York Daily News is a strong supporter of the administration.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Daily News of September 25, 1940]

A WAR ON TWO FRONTS—JAPAN AND INDOCHINA

Another sharp statement registering Secretary of State Hull's disapproval of Japan makes United States-Japanese relations a little worse than before. This time Mr. Hull, who, of course, is the Roosevelt administration's official mouthpiece in affairs like this, objects to Japan's grab at French Indochina.

What moral objection there can be to the grab escapes us. France grabbed Indochina in 1863, after 30 years of off-and-on warfare between the natives and French missionaries backed by French soldiers. France is now three-fifths occupied by the Germans, and the government of the other two-fifths of France has consented to the Japanese Indochina grab.

Yet Mr. Hull complains that the Far East "status quo is being upset * * * under duress." What business is that of ours? What duty have we to preserve the status quo in the Far East?

IF HITLER WINS, WHAT ABOUT US?

Aside from the moral angle, there is a practical angle to all this, and a potentially dangerous one.

Though we hope it will not come to pass, it is possible that Hitler may conquer Great Britain and organize Europe into one big German farm, factory, and arsenal, as he hopes to do. That would give him, among other things, a shipbuilding capacity between four and five times as big as our present shipbuilding capacity.

We are already frankly helping Great Britain by every means short of war. Our administration is committed to that policy, and Wendell L. Willkie says he will carry it on if elected.

At the same time, we continually scold Japan. Anything Japan wants to do our Government is against.

If Hitler wins, wouldn't it be natural for him in due time to try to get his revenge on us from the Atlantic side and to tell his semi-ally, Japan, to close in on us from the Pacific?

WHAT IS OUR PACIFIC POLICY?

In such a war on two fronts we might very easily come out second best. Fighting a war on two fronts is regarded by military men as extremely dangerous—something a nation should avoid at almost any cost. Fighting a war on two fronts was one of the big mistakes that cost the Kaiser the World War—and a mistake which Hitler has carefully avoided up to now.

Yet, with all due respect for its sincerity and moral ideals, our Government is laying its lines for just such a war on two fronts.

Oh, for the good old days when the United States was able to mind its own business and stay at home and let the foreigners go in for all this welt politik.

WE GOT ALONG WITH BRITAIN

The common-sense policy would seem to be to try to get along with Japan. We got along with the British Empire to the east of us through all the decades following the Civil War, when Britain was the most powerful nation in Europe. Why can't we get along with powerful and expanding Japan to the west of us—make the Pacific a highway of international trade and friendship, as the Atlantic is between wars?

How To Murder a Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, September 25 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK DAILY MIRROR

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the New York Daily Mirror of September 23, entitled "How To Murder a Democracy."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Daily Mirror of September 23, 1940]

HOW TO MURDER A DEMOCRACY

The technique of setting up a dictatorship in a great nation has not changed very much since Napoleon was "elected" emperor.

The contemporary "crisis men" in Russia, France, Japan, Italy, and Germany employed about the same technique.

A study of their success discloses that in each case this one step was essential to their schemes:

Slow destruction of the people's respect for and faith in their elected representatives—in Germany it was the Reichstag; in France it was the Chamber of Deputies.

In the United States of America it is Congress that must be discredited before a dictatorship can be set up.

MAKE PEOPLE DESPISE THEIR CONGRESS

Congress, functioning as it was intended to function, becomes the essence of what Lincoln described as "government of the people and by the people."

Congress is not such a body today. Ask yourself, or the average American, adolescent or adult, what he or she thinks of Congress. The answer will run something like this:

"Congress is like a man riding backward on a train—he sees things after he has passed them."

Recent history has demonstrated that as one man or a small and determined group of men succeed in making the people despise their elected representatives, their Congress, then does it become easy in time of a crisis to persuade the people that they must place total power into the hands of some "indispensable man."

Nowhere has that process been better analyzed than in the "non-political" speech that Candidate-President Roosevelt made on free radio time Friday.

He was describing how the National Socialists slowly robbed the German people of their "free elections" by first destroying their faith in the process of democracy.

"A decade ago," said Third-Term Candidate Roosevelt, "the German people despaired of the processes of their democracy, which were based on the free use of the franchise.

THEN BOAST OF "SPECIAL APTITUDE" FOR RULING

"They were willing to lend ear to a new cult called nazi-ism (EDITOR'S NOTE.—It was called national socialism)—a minority group which professed extraordinary patriotism, and offered bread and shelter and better government through the rule of a handful of persons boasting special aptitude for government.

"In those days loudly professed emphasis was placed by this special group on their own purity of purpose.

"Nothing was ever said about abolishing free elections. But you and I know the subsequent history of Germany.

"The right of free elections and the free choice of heads of government were suddenly wiped out by a new regime, still professing the same purity of purpose.

"It is a travesty on fact to claim that there is any free choice of public officials in that nation today, or that there ever has been one since 1933 * * *."

And thus, without meaning to, Candidate President Roosevelt has voiced the motives of the rapacious, brazen plunderbund of machine politicians that "drafted" him for a third term in Chicago.

The Presidential candidate of these politicians professes to view the loss of "the right of free elections" in Germany as a special hell on earth.

But to the political bosses behind the third term, men like Boss Hague, of New Jersey, Bosses Kelly and Nash, of Chicago, Boss "Jailbird" Pendergast, of Kansas City, Boss Crump, of Tennessee, Boss Jimmy "Big House" Hines, of Manhattan, and Boss Ed Flynn, of the Bronx, the loss of the "right of free elections" is a made-to-order heaven.

AND THEN THE PLUNDERBUND MUSCLES IN

If the creatures of this plunderbund take over the Halls of Congress as they have usurped this Nation's city halls, government "of the people and by the people" through a freely elected Congress will have been murdered in the United States of America.

Public Opinion Polls and the Maine Election

REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, to the inexperienced observer the feat of Dr. George Gallup, of the American Institute of Public Opinion, in predicting correctly a Republican victory in the Maine elections this month establishes beyond question the accuracy of his poll as a barometer of the opinions of the American electorate. Yet a scientific evaluation of the Gallup forecast for Maine and a comparison with the record of the poll in the past indicate that such is not the case. Certain fundamental questions with regard to the techniques employed remain to be answered, and with the poll now in its fifth year, the burden of proof is still upon Dr. Gallup.

In the first place, Dr. Gallup freely admits that "some margin of error is involved in every sampling operation, due to the size of the sample itself." In the Maine election, for example, there were 95 chances out of 100 that the average error would not exceed 4 percent. Since this is a "plus-or-minus 4," the range of the poll would be 8 points and would in a close contest make accurate prediction at best a hazardous affair. Furthermore, if the 4-percent error is as Dr. Gallup claims, there would be a 50–50 chance of it favoring any one party. This, however, is not the case.

The institute's poll in Maine reported in a last-minute check that Congressman RALPH O. BREWSTER would defeat former Gov. Louis J. Brann for the Senate by receiving 62 percent of the total vote. Actually the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], according to figures released by Dr. Gallup himself, received 58 percent of the popular vote, or an error of 4 percent in the estimate. It will be noted, however, that this error showed a Republican bias.

For the Governorship, Sumner Sewall, Republican, defeated Fulton Redman, Democrat, 160,743 to 91,856. Mr. Sewall thus gained 64 percent of the total vote cast. But since the institute poll had predicted that he would receive 68 percent, a second error, again favoring the Republicans, and this time also of 4 points, is to be noted.

In the 1936 Presidential election, presumably with the same possibility for error, Dr. Gallup failed to predict in a single State the correct percentages of the Roosevelt-Landon vote. But what is more significant, in 46 of the 48 States his error favored the Republicans. In size, it ranged from 1 percent in Arkansas to 14 percent in Arizona, with a median at 5, 1 point outside his self-established margin of reliability, and with 25 States actually exceeding the possibility of error. In only 2 States did the poll favor the Democrats, and then by only a single percentage point in each.

The 4-percent Republican bias in the Maine prediction, instead of testifying to the accuracy of the polls, raises anew the question whether the basic cause for error in the Republican favor has been removed. Undoubtedly the institute's techniques have been improved since 1936, but is there evidence to show that this tendency to err on the side of one party, and one party alone, has been remedied? To this, Dr. Gallup has yet to give a satisfactory answer.

Since the failure of the Literary Digest, the polls have made an earnest and honest effort to win popular approval. Yet their tendency to guard their techniques as secrets of the trade has raised certain questions as to their basic reliability. On the fact of it, through pamphlets, magazine and newspaper articles, and books, the polling people have appeared willing to inform the public of their methods. Such is actually not the case. Their explanations have been little more than broad generalizations, and the important information has been withheld. If, as the polls claim, the element of time between the final sampling process and the election may be partially responsible for the changes that occur, is it contended that in over 90 percent of the cases, the Democrats conduct a more energetic last-minute campaign than do the Republicans? This seems highly unlikely. If such is not the case, there is all the more reason why a careful examination of polling methods and devices should be undertaken.

The Gallup poll claims to take a representative sampling of the population, based on several classification break-downs. Among these are age, sex, party, income, and rural-urban distribution. Where does Dr. Gallup acquire the information for such an analysis? What statistics does he use? Since the Literary Digest owed a major proportion of its error to its failure to acquire an accurate economic break-down, it would be interesting to know if the Gallup poll is suffering from the same disability. Unfortunately, the question has never been answered, and we are left only with the assurance by Dr. Gallup that his cross section is valid—plus the election results. The latter are not reassuring.

Assuming, however, that the basic economic break-down is correct, the problems of the interviewer in making his classifications are far from simple, and demand policy decisions on the part of the poll's administrators. It is easy enough to determine by observation a voter's sex, and possibly even his political party. But fitting him into an economic grouping is another matter. Dr. Gallup himself—the Pulse of Democracy, pages 169 to 170—has testified to the inability of people to determine their own economic strata, let alone their willingness to confide it to an interviewer. How, for instance, is such information obtained? Will the process submit to examination by reputable scientists?

These and other questions as to his techniques, Dr. Gallup has steadfastly refused to make clear to the consumer public. What percentage of the electorate has no choice of either issues or candidates? What percentage refuses to state its choice? How large is the sample? What areas are visited?

While it should be clearly understood that errors made by the poll in Maine do not necessarily indicate that similar errors will be made elsewhere, the fact that an underestimate of Democratic strength in Maine corroborates a deficiency known to exist in the poll during the 1936 campaign places upon Dr. Gallup the necessity of making his workways public if he is to expect public acceptance of his device. There is no desire to impute motives to polling officials; yet if the poll is as great an instrument of democracy as Dr. Gallup in his recent book holds it to be, it is essential that it interpret correctly. Another failure such as that of the Literary Digest would tempt Congress, as in many similar situations, to take steps to protect the public.

As pointed out above, the poll, to make the claim of accuracy, must do more than select the winner in any particular contest. The Roosevelt campaign in 1936, and most of the intervening elections which the institute has measured, have shown a clear-cut majority in favor of one side or the other. It will be recalled that where the difference was great enough, or where its "blind spot"—economic distribution—failed to be a determinant, the Literary Digest was tolerably successful until 1936. In the case of an election where the voting would be as close as indicated by the Gallup poll of the campaign on August 25, this year, the latter might as easily be in error. For instance, in the poll of that date, President Roosevelt was accorded 247 electoral votes and Mr. Willkie 284. In doubtful States (those States where a 4-percent error would throw to the other candidate) were 16 States, or 71 electoral votes for Roosevelt and 125 for Willkie. Under these circumstances, and by virtue of its previous Republican bias, one would not expect Dr. Gallup to declare these States for either one man or the other. Indeed, by virtue of the Institute's consistent error in the favor of the Republicans, it would seem more logical to correct the poll by taking some number, such as 3 percent, from the Republicans and giving it to the Democrats. This would transfer 115 electoral votes to the President, giving him a total of 362 and Willkie 153.

The most recent Gallup poll—September 20—however, shows such overwhelming sentiment for President Roosevelt that percentage studies appear a matter of minor importance. Yet it should be recalled even here that 18 States are in a position to change in the party columns by virtue of the 4-percent error. This is enough to elect either candidate, since the group of doubtful States contains such key States as New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. With a correction for Republican bias, however, Mr. Willkie would take only Maine, Vermont, and South Dakota.

Any discussion of polls is not complete without a discussion of the interpretations made upon them. Great care must be taken that the interpreter is himself not showing a partisan interest. This is particularly to be feared on the part of the newspapers, already strongly pro-Willkie. While there is no desire to suspect the Institute of partiality, it is nevertheless important, considering the media in which the polls appear, to keep a watchful eye against false and misleading interpretations. The professional apologists should be scrupulously avoided.

On these same lines, it should be borne in mind that with only slightly over a month of the campaign remaining, President Roosevelt will find it necessary to win only 61 electoral votes in addition to those States which he carried in 1936 by a 2-to-1 popular majority. These are: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nevada, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, and Wisconsin. Of these, according to the Gallup estimates, only North Dakota is outside the fold, and the defection here is of fairly recent origin.

The burden of proof, then, is still upon Mr. Willkie—and Dr. Gallup.

What Are We Going To Do About Indochina?

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH B. SHANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have asked unanimous consent that I may address the House for 1 minute so that I may include therein the following editorial taken from today's Philadelphia Record, based upon the importance of our staying out of trouble in Asia. It is a splendid peace document, I think, and should be read by every American.

[From the Philadelphia Record of September 25, 1940]

WHAT ARE WE GOING TO DO ABOUT INDOCHINA?

Japanese troops have moved through French Indochina. The French Government has given its permission.

Yet Secretary of State Hull again denounces Japan, and presumably France as well, on the ground that the deal was made under duress.

It was made under duress. But what are we going to do about it?

Are we going to war against Japan; and if so, why?

It is clear by this time that Japan is not going to be deterred in her war with China by statements of Mr. Hull or anybody else.

The fact that we do not recognize this conflict as a war does not make it any the less a war, and we are naive, indeed, if we do not expect it to be fought as a war is fought.

The Record has proposed that the United States adopt a new policy in the Far East instead of fanning the flames by selling Japan munitions and then denouncing her for using them.

The Record proposes to policy of offering to mediate the war and bringing peace to the Orient—a peace which can and should benefit China, Japan, and the United States as well.

There are reasons to believe both Japan and China would welcome such a move. There are reasons to believe both of them would thank us for helping to end strife which gives every sign of going on for years.

The Record has been denounced—and also praised—for advocating this course. To the criticisms we merely say that we are proud to sponsor any move which will bring peace to other nations and security to our own.

If there is something shameful in proposing peace, our world, indeed, has gone mad.

Because this question of French Indochina involves not only our peace but our total defense as a Nation and our liberties, we think it time for every citizen to face the facts.

Five years ago the Record warned that "the anti-Japanese movement is a trade war disguised as a moral crusade." We showed then, by the statement of Walter Runciman, of the British Board of Trade, that the United States was being counted upon to protect British interests in her trade rivalry with Japan—even though our own chief oriental trade was with Japan.

Today there is still no other explanation for our persistent meddling in the Far East, our gambling with war there when we face a far greater menace on our Atlantic frontier.

True, the Japanese are denounced on a moral basis. Nor can anyone deny that their grabs are in the very best imperialistic fashion. To say that we cannot, therefore, maintain peaceful relations with her is as absurd as to say that we should not help the British because the British Empire was built by the same kind of imperialism, or because England refuses to give India her freedom.

No one can obscure the record of Japanese oppression. But neither can one deny the immeasurably blacker record of Soviet Russia, which has not only grabbed in every direction, which not only has an alliance with the world's greatest menace, Hitler—but also has a record of bloody immorality without parallel in the modern world, even to the point of destroying her own religions.

Yet it is no secret that our State Department has been trying to appease Russia—in an effort to egg her into a war against Japan.

That very fact throws all morals out the window.

If we can try to appease Russia, let's quit talking on a moral basis. In fact, the only basis which we, as a nation, can afford to adopt is:

What's best for the security of the United States of America?

What is?

We think we know some things that are not.

We certainly don't think messing in French Indochina, when we're arming ourselves against Hitler, is best for United States security.

We don't think leaving ourselves in a position of having to fight on two fronts—the Atlantic and Pacific—at one time, is best for our security.

We don't think that trying to appease Hitler's ally, Stalin—after he's bluntly turned us down—is best for our security. Especially when he's building new fortifications across the straits from Alaska.

We do think that peace in Asia, a peace which will leave both Japan and China our friends, will add immensely to our security and our economic strength.

This is not a question of morals. It is a question of military necessity. The Indochina crisis threatens the show-down.

Sooner or later we must choose—choose between enmity or friendship with Japan; choose between Japan and Russia; choose between having to defend ourselves against enemies on both coasts or on only one.

What are we going to do?

Hon. William B. Bankhead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON A. ROMJUE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks relative to our former and deceased Speaker of this House, Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, I wish I could find language to properly portray the splendid character and achievements of this much beloved and appreciated man, but that is beyond and above any words I can summon to my command. I am sure when the membership of this House learned of his passing it was with universal regret, for I verily believe every Member of this body loved and held in the highest esteem this noble character.

He was the seventh Speaker under whom I have served as a Member of this body, every one of whom were fine, outstanding, and able presiding officers. I at all times maintained and enjoyed a cordial and friendly relationship with each of them, but I think I never enjoyed a closer or more intimate friendship with any of them than with Mr. BANKHEAD. Speaker BANKHEAD and I came into this body at the same time, and we soon formed a fast and genuine friendship that endured throughout the remainder of his life. As a member of the delegation that accompanied his remains to its last resting place, Jasper, Ala., I found at his home at Jasper just what one would expect to find in the way of a great attendance of thousands upon thousands of his devoted friends and constituents whom he had so honorably represented in this House. I verily believe that no such great gathering of people were ever before assembled on one occasion in his home town as were there at his funeral.

In company with Mr. Kelly Herring, who seemed to be employed in Speaker BANKHEAD's agricultural interests, Representatives TABER, CARLSON, CASE of South Dakota, and myself, were driven out to his farm while at Jasper. Speaker BANKHEAD, like all great statesmen who have grown up from or close to Nature or rural surroundings, had manifested an interest and devotion to that which was so near his heart. As my mind ran back somewhat over a portion of the history of our country I silently recalled how President Jackson, President Jefferson, and others who, when they had reached a ripe old age, being worn with hard work and devotion to duty, had in their declining years sought peace and quiet among the trees, birds, and domestic animals. These men had gone back to a place of anticipated rest. Speaker BANKHEAD was no doubt looking forward to the time when he might find opportunity to enjoy and embrace a closer communion with a more restful peace and time.

I do not believe I ever served with a more fair and just man—highly intelligent, immeasurably fair and impartial, yet firm and decisive was he.

A devoted friend, a most helpful soul has gone its way, but his great service to his State and his country can never be fully measured, nor will it ever be forgotten.

I shall not attempt to detail his fine service as a Member of this body nor as Speaker of this House. It is so outstanding and well known that the fullest praise could add but little, for it is so superb it stands out like the brightest star that was ever flung into space.

Gone is our friend, but not forever, for we shall meet again.

The Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW EDMISTON

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

LETTER FROM A CONSTITUENT

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, under permission to revise and extend my remarks and include therein a letter from a distinguished West Virginia lawyer, a constituent of mine, I wish to call attention of my colleagues in the House and all readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the thought conveyed by Mr. Snider's letter to me certainly in every way answers those citizens of our country who are opposing President Roosevelt on the sole ground that they do not believe in a third term for any President. Mr. Snider's letter, to my mind, definitely answers those citizens. I hope that many of them will read it and profit thereby. It seems to me, at this critical time in our history, we must not overlook the many good things that the Roosevelt administration has accomplished for this country. We must not lose sight of the fact that if we are to stay out of the present world war, our chances of so doing are so much greater under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Cordell Hull than they possibly could be under any other leadership in the country. To throw all of these advantages overboard for the feeble prejudices against a third term is not only anticonstitutional but is anti-American.

ANTI-THIRD TERM IS ANTI-CONSTITUTION

Hon. ANDREW EDMISTON,
Member of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR ANDREW: The framers of our Federal Constitution debated thoroughly the question of limiting the term to which a President of the United States could be elected. They did not decide the question. They left it open. It can be changed by a constitutional amendment and only by an amendment. No one President can change it, nor two, nor three, nor four, nor can all the Presidents change it. Nor can precedents or custom change it. It is still open; therefore:

1. Anyone who would exclude the people from electing a President to a third term is against the Federal Constitution.
2. Anyone who would exclude a former President from being a candidate for a third term is against the Federal Constitution.
3. Any man or woman who votes against President Roosevelt solely because he is a candidate for a third term either knowingly or unwittingly will vote against the intention of the Constitution.

Respectfully,

MILLARD F. SNIDER.

The National Commander of the American Legion Pledges Prudence and Common Sense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. COFFEE
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 25, 1940

SPEECH BY RAYMOND J. KELLY

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein a speech by the eminent retiring national commander of the American Legion, the Honorable Raymond J. Kelly.

This speech, it seems to me, reveals a splendid understanding of the issues in America today. It admonishes us that we should be broad and tolerant in our attitude toward others; that we should free ourselves from hysteria and emotional impulses; and that we should unite our peoples by eliminating sources of misunderstanding and acrimony.

I commend the reading of this speech to all patriotic Americans. It is in the best tradition of the American Legion. It is worthy of wide dissemination throughout the length and breadth of our land. It reveals a sound and sensible comprehension of the situation prevailing today with respect to national defense.

The speech follows:

"Congress rejects Stanton-Frye-Lincoln conscription plan for universal selective service."

"National Union Party at Baltimore almost unanimously nominates Lincoln—Intricacies of Lincoln's hand in the the nomination of Johnson for Vice President. Navy-yard labor strikes."

"Chase's resignation from Cabinet is accepted by Lincoln. To visitors who relate gloom to the President, Lincoln states, 'This administration will not be reelected.' McClellan rejects unity proposals."

These highly descriptive headlines which I have just repeated to you were, as you may have guessed, some of the highlights of 1864, another election year of crisis.

Their striking similarity to existing conditions in this country requires no further emphasis or comment.

I have related them to you to illustrate a point all of us are begnning to realize, namely, that types of self-government such as ours do not function normally or most effectively during periods of political unrest preceding our national elections each 4 years.

This is a fact we must face. It is a fact which is elemental in the understanding of the delays which all of us deplore in the effort to strengthen immediately our armed defenses.

But there is one fundamental difference in the conditions of the year 1864 and the year 1940. Then we were a divided Nation involved in a tragic and bloody conflict where millions of fellow-Americans were arrayed one against another.

Today, we are not at war.

In my opinion there is no more important mission for thinking Americans than to give their best efforts to the job of reducing and if possible eliminating the type of war hysteria and fear which in the end most likely may lead us into conflict.

We are at a critical period in our national psychology. The chances for war or for peace have been increased rather than lessened by the pulling and hauling of preelection controversy.

Looking back, a short 6 months ago, we were then a united nation in our determination not to be drawn into the conflict.

The growth since late spring of a spirit of fatality, of predestination on our part as a people to enter this war is the very national factor most likely to plunge us into the holocaust.

As national commander of the American Legion, I wish to condemn with all the responsibility and influence which goes with that office the growth of this feeling of inevitability of our war involvement.

I believe it is my solemn duty to point out to my fellow citizens that the sound policy for our country is to strengthen our national defenses to the utmost, and as efficiently and expeditiously as possible, but these armed forces must be to defend America first, last, and always.

I do not charge that this shift of public opinion toward the position that we are headed for war was directed or intentional. I make no accusation that it was inspired or deliberate.

I believe it has resulted largely from a national fear, bordering on panic, which spread throughout the Nation when a few short months brought the virtual conquest of nearly all Europe by a ruthless and superbly organized military machine.

That this new technique of conquest constitutes a grave menace to our national integrity, we must accept as a hard-bitten reality, in this materialistic world in which we now find ourselves.

Our Government and our people themselves became involved in a great rearmament problem with the appropriations of billions of dollars and the conscription of the Nation's manpower. The movement to increase the powers of the Federal Government progressed to the point that under certain circumstances it can take over and operate private industry to speed up and increase rearmament. These factors intensify the tendency for thinking in terms of war involvement as contrasted with the necessity of keeping the peace.

Today we no longer possess as a united people the will to remain at peace. The danger of this state of mind is obvious.

These are the preliminaries serving to condition and cushion our minds for that final plunge into war. Our one chance to remain at peace is for the Nation to reappraise the national perspective. We must sanely and soberly readopt the outlook that peace, not war, is the goal.

I, for one, am not convinced that it is necessary to whip the American mind up to a frenzy in order to get necessary action to enlarge our national defenses. I am confident that we as a people have the good sense to appreciate what is needed and to go about the job with intelligence.

This problem of national defense is not new to the Legion. No other organization in the country today subscribes more heartily to the efforts now being made to build these defenses.

It is easily understandable that the Legion should feel the way it does about national defense. For 20 years, the pronouncements of the Legion in connection with the interrelated problems of national defense and Americanism have proved prophetic in their truth.

We called the turn.

The problems of national defense would simplify themselves if we possessed an adequate definition of our national defense requirements. Such a definition is lacking. Day to day the objectives seem to change. It may be impossible to anticipate what may be required of our Army, our Navy, our air force, without knowledge of what the future holds.

We cannot rely on soothsayers to predict who might be our enemies or where the fighting might occur. If attack should come, it is safe to assume, I believe, that it would not be by any one nation, but by a group.

The most popular and widely used phrase today in connection with the problems of national defense is that of "bottlenecks."

It is totally unfair to conclude that these bottlenecks are of current origin. Senseless criticism of their existence will not aid in their solution.

We must appreciate that American industry and enterprise have never been geared to the complex problems of modern, total rearmament.

Just because we suddenly decide overnight to rearm does not bring us to the status of an accomplished fact. To believe so is the height of absurdity produced by a policy of wishful thinking.

Intelligent, patriotic Americans are attempting to make sense and to bring order out of the apparently uncoordinated efforts to do everything at once to rearm.

Many of these are men in whom we have every confidence. They are men who have proved their ability to handle matters of this magnitude. They are men who know the problems of American productive industry.

There is no magic wand to be waved over the dollars of national-defense appropriations transmuting them into planes, tanks, or the highly specialized mechanical training to meet modern war requirements demanded of soldiers and sailors.

In short order we are asking these men to retool virtually the factories of the greatest industrial nation on earth. That much of this work is necessarily on paper, does not mean that all possible progress is not being made.

If waste occurs, let's appreciate that there is no truer adage than "haste makes waste." If all other considerations are sacrificed to the demand for speed in rearmament, we must accustom ourselves to something less than idealistic exactitude of efficiency in what we get for the huge sums expended.

It is my personal belief that some of the bottle-neck trouble is the result of the natural desire for the latest and most advanced type of defense weapon, to produce only the best designed tank, battleship, gun, motor, plane, or bomb, rather than to standardize immediately upon what we can actually produce at this time.

If we are to have an Army of more than 1,000,000 men by 1941, I would rather see our soldiers armed with adequate numbers of weapons presently designed, even though they may be 1930, 1935, or 1939 models, than have them inadequately equipped with a scattering few experimental weapons of advanced design.

There is no thought in my mind of having other than the best armament possible to produce for our fellow countrymen who will handle these planes, guns, ships, and tanks. The best is none too good when it means the conservation of the lives of the best young men of America.

But it is my belief that the crying present needs are those of quantity rather than quality production of arms. The time element is all important.

There will be bad headaches ahead in this rearmament program. Their extent can be minimized if those responsible for munitions and armament procurement on the part of the Government accept the advice and the unrestricted assistance of the experienced men who are on the firing line of industrial production. At all hazards, Government and industry must work together. There are too many indications evidenced that they have been at cross purposes—at loggerheads.

Possibly this has been caused mostly by these jittery times with their increasing likelihood of misunderstanding and acrimony, serving only to defeat rather than to aid the progress of national rearmament.

"He who lets his country die, lets all things die;
And all things dying, curse him.
But he who helps his country live, helps all things live;
And all things living, bless him."

POEM FROM PUBLIC OPINION

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein a brief piece of poetry from the September 1940 issue of Public Opinion, a monthly magazine published at San Antonio, Tex., and edited by the distinguished liberal thinker, J. A. Appler. The poem was taken from a recent issue of War Cry.

Because most of the States have completed their primary campaigns and, in many of them, mud slinging characterized the utterances and activities of some of the candidates, I think it is singularly appropriate that this poem should be thoughtfully read and studied.

In this time of great national crisis it is well that candidates for office avoid the slinging of mud, the dissemination of slanders and the undermining of public confidence in prominent citizens. Now, more than ever, is there imperative need for the inculcation in the public mind of confidence in our Government and its institutions. How can we resolutely and determinedly resist any possible invasion from a potential foe if we are disillusioned, soured, or disgusted with our domestic institutions and leaders?

MUD SLINGERS

They pick the mud from the garden of life—
The garden that's full of beauty;
They sling the mud in the faces around,
Regardless of love and duty.

Real mud is made for the sowing of seed,
For beautiful plants to grow in,
For strength God gives to the laborer's arm,
To spade, to rake, and hoe in.

The mud they sling is the fault they find,
The gossip, scandal, unkindness;
They see no flowers in the garden of life,
Because of their soul's dense blindness.

The mud they sling is with cankerworms filled
It soils the world all around them,
And eats the hearts that the Lord hath made
For love and truth to surround them.

Then leave the mud in the garden of life,
And gather the fragrant flowers—
The flowers of charity, kindness and love—
To cheer someone's lonely hours.

Opposition to Adjournment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR, OF OHIO

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered last night over the radio:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, on last June 4, President Roosevelt stated his opinion that Congress might just as well adjourn in a couple of weeks and go home. He said the national defense would not require the presence of the lawmakers in Washington. He also said that we could serve no other purpose except, perhaps, the laudable one of making speeches.

On June 19, ladies and gentlemen, I stated to the Members of the House of Representatives that an unparalleled crisis confronts this Nation, and that that crisis demands that Congress remain in session continuously and indefinitely. At that time I pointed out that events at home and abroad, national policies, and international relations were changing from day to day. Decisions had to be made on questions that would affect the lives and fortunes of our people for a generation to come. I pointed out further, fellow citizens, that many of those questions required decision and approval by the Congress, and that they must not be left to the judgment of any one man.

I further pointed out, ladies and gentlemen, that Congress ought to remain in session to share responsibility for the defense program and exercise its judgment as to the extent of American commitments and involvement in the present world turmoil.

I said then, that in a world at war, when every day brings possible complications closer to the United States, there existed a necessity for Congress to remain in session and perform its constitutional duty as a check and balance on the executive department of the Government.

Now, since that day on June 4, when President Roosevelt expressed his opinion that the Congress might as well adjourn and go home, unless it wanted to remain in session for the purpose of making speeches, the Congress has passed 12 appropriation bills, totaling fourteen and one-half billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money. It has authorized the construction of a two-ocean Navy. It has given the President authority to call the National Guard into service. As it was pointed out editorially a few days ago, it has enacted the alien-registration law; the second Hatch Act; a law to regulate investment trusts; it has adopted a bristling restatement of the Monroe Doctrine. The Congress since that date has confirmed the appointments of a new Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary of War, and Secretary of the Navy, and has before it for confirmation the appointment of a new Secretary of Commerce and a new Postmaster General. This Congress, since that day on June 4, when the President insisted that we go home, has passed a billion-dollar defense tax bill and is at work on a new excess-profits tax; and, most important of all, it has completed action on a bill to conscript manpower.

Our President may be the indispensable man, but, notwithstanding his "indispensable foresight," as one editorial writer put it, he could not foresee the necessity for these far-reaching measures back on that June day when he so gaily bade the Congress pack up its grips and leave the Nation's defense problems with the executive department of the Government.

Now we are again talking about adjournment. The administration leaders in the House propose that Congress adjourn sine die at the end of this month, which would mean that there would be no Congress at Washington in October, November, and December—indeed, not until the new Congress convenes in January.

What will happen in the next 100 days is anybody's guess, but one thing is certain: No similar length of time was ever more important or more dangerous. London could be wiped out and England fall, though God forbid. The British Government might be forced to capitulate and yield its navy; or it could come, bag and baggage, to Canada, the land we are already pledged to defend. The Mediterranean could be turned literally into an Italian lake and the Suez Canal—Britain's life line—into an Italian creek. Gibraltar, symbol of security, could crumble into axis hands and in the Orient—but what's the use of spending space on all the obvious and perilous possibilities?

The minority leader favors 3-day recesses but not adjournment. In spite of the threat of the majority leader that unless we agree to adjournment there will be no recess and we will be kept continuously in session, I believe the Congress ought not to adjourn; because if Mr. Roosevelt, back on June 4, could not foresee all of the necessary acts of Congress which he has since insisted that Congress pass, then he cannot see from now until the end of 1940 what may arise to demand the presence of the Congress at Washington.

The idea of our vast defense program is to keep us out of, not to get us into, war—to stay "short of." Congress is the great restraining influence. It is the deliberative body, whereas the executive branch is the body of action. The fathers planned it that way—check and balance.

The deliberations are often irritating and seemingly futile, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing, but that's not so in the larger concept of our democratic process. Something definite and vital is signified in that plan of the fathers—that we look before we leap. The job of Congress is the looking job. Otherwise we might as well have a one-man system and be done with it.

But, believe it or not, under the perilous circumstances which now prevail, Congress is thinking about quitting—for a hundred days.

It is insisted by the administration leaders that if there arises a need for Congress the President can call us back into extraordinary session. This would create a needless and very great expense for the taxpayers of the country, and the point is that we could not be called back into session unless the President chose to call us back.

Now, my fellow citizens, let's look over some of the unfinished business that now remains before the Congress, and see for a moment whether or not it is wise for the Congress to adjourn and leave the whole question of the national defense and our foreign relations in the hands of the Chief Executive.

Who knows what lies ahead of the Congress of the United States? Who knows what questions of vast importance to the security and the welfare of this Nation may have to be decided before January of 1941? Who knows whether or not it is safe for Congress to leave Washington permanently and go back home, even to conduct a campaign, under conditions whereby it cannot reassemble unless the President should choose to call it back into extra session? Who could foresee, on that last June day what the Congress would be called upon to do between that date and now?

The people are fearful of allowing this situation to drift on under the control of the President of the United States, with Congress gone.

Regardless of the merits or demerits of the deal in which the 50 destroyers were traded for airplane and naval bases, the secret method by which the destroyers were traded away has disquieted the people. It has made them uneasy. It has made them fearful.

They are afraid not only because of the methods adopted in conducting this deal, but they now realize that the President would, if he felt so disposed, conduct other negotiations and present the Congress other accomplished deals, so to speak; and if Congress is not here to check him, no one can say to what limits the Executive might go in these trades and in what way he might involve this country in foreign war.

These are the reasons the people are afraid. These are the reasons the Congress should stay in session. These are the reasons why we should not adjourn. If we only recess, as the minority leader suggests, then the Congress can reassemble itself if its Members feel their presence in Washington is necessary to the welfare and the security of their country.

The people have begun to wonder how the thousands of machine guns and the hundreds of thousands of rifles and the other equipment that we now find we have turned over to Great Britain, diminishing our own national defense by just that much, managed to be turned over without the public knowing anything about it. We read, on the one hand, that our own National Government has to use trucks or farm machinery, and guns simulated out of timber, for training purposes, while at the same time we have sold or given away to Great Britain the machine guns and the rifles and the tanks which might be used to train our own troops. The people are beginning to wonder why it is that acres and acres of perfectly good war tanks are obsolete because they cannot travel more than 3 miles an hour, cannot be used to instruct and train our own troops, and yet Canada is eagerly buying them up in order to train her troops.

There are too many inconsistencies, too many contradictions, and too much suggestion of secrecy about all of these things for the Nation to rest easy if the Congress adjourns sine die.

All of this is not to say that Britain does not need our help. All of this is not to say that we should not give our help to Britain. But all of this is to say that these things are the business of the American people; they are not the personal private affairs of the President of the United States. If this country is going to denude itself of many of its items of defense in order to help one of the belligerents, then the people ought to know that. If this country is going to be led into war by anybody, the people ought to know that in advance. If anything is to be done that may compromise our neutrality and now or later bring us face to face with war, then the people ought to know all about that.

It is now manifest that unless the Congress does stay in session, unless the Congress does keep itself in position to inquire into the transactions, unless the Congress does remain in session so that it may take the proper steps to demand and to secure the information for the people relating to all of these transactions in these foreign relations, then the people cannot know, they will have no way of finding out what is going on until the new Congress assembles next January. At that time it is entirely reasonable to believe that the Chief Executive might present to the new Congress a whole group of "accomplished deals" similar to the destroyer deal.

Under the Constitution, and under the American way of government, my fellow cititzens, it is the function and the responsibility of the Congress to stay on the job whenever the people's rights and the welfare and the security of this nation are to be safeguarded. You all realize, of course, that now, as perhaps never before in the history of this Nation, the Congress is the guardian of the people's liberties and of the peace of this Nation.

I am of the firm conviction that with the European situation as it is and as it is likely to be during the next few weeks, it seems important that every Congressman should stay on the job, through the entire fall if necessary, instead of leaving one man in charge. It is my firm conviction that it is the duty of Congress to remain in session during this crisis so as to be in instant readiness to perform the duties placed upon it by the Constitution. Any other course would be a serious neglect of the Nation's vital interests.

During this period of emergency—when a Congressman votes to go home—his people should vote to keep him home.

The Illinois Waterway

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune of September 23:

[From the Chicago Tribune of September 23, 1940]

WATERWAY OF GROWING VALUE

The Illinois waterway extends 320 miles from Chicago to Grafton, Ill., on the Mississippi River. In spite of the handicaps occasioned by the reduction of water from Lake Michigan through the waterway to 1,500 cubic feet a second, ordered by the Supreme Court on January 1, 1939, traffic on the waterway has been steadily growing. Five and one-half million tons moved last year as compared with 4,446,000 tons in 1938. The 1940 movement is expected to reach 8,000,000 tons. The projected depth of the waterway is 9 feet, but during the present season, with more than an average amount of rainfall, barges have been forced to limit their draft to 8 or 8½ feet.

Expert witnesses have testified that deposits of sludge or partly treated sewage have accumulated on the bottom of the Chicago River to a depth of 2 to 4 feet all the way from Damen Avenue to Joliet. Illinois has appealed to the Court for permission to increase the diversion from 1,500 to 5,000 cubic feet a second until the end of 1942, when it is claimed the sanitary district's sewage-treatment plant expansions will be in full operation. The Illinois plea is being opposed by certain Great Lakes States.

It is difficult to understand this opposition. Even if the sanitary necessities of Illinois citizens are ignored, the commercial advantages of the Illinois waterway to the States bordering on the Great Lakes should be sufficient to bring about their approval of the slight increase in diversion requested.

The waterway has cut the cost of coal, oil, and other heavy products, to the benefit of these States, either directly or indirectly. One oil company brings large amounts of oil to its Indiana refinery by barge because that method is cheaper than its own pipeline. Shippers in Wisconsin have received decreased freight charges as a result of lower barge and rail combination rates via Peoria or Chicago. Paper from Northern States is moving through the waterway to southern destinations and there are prospective movements of cotton from the South to northern destinations via the same route.

As a facility for national defense the waterway is important to the whole country. Its fullest utilization should not be hampered nor prevented by the jealous, sectional desires of a few States which are acting contrary not only to their own selfish interest but the interest of the entire Nation.

An Unsound Commitment

ARTICLE BY WILLIAM LAVARRE

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by William LaVarre, an expert on Latin-American affairs:

SOUTH OF THE BORDER—UNCLE SAM, TENANT?—MERELY LEASING NAVAL AND AIR BASES IN THE BRITISH WEST INDIES, WITHOUT NATIONAL TITLE, WILL BRING US ONLY LIABILITIES AND INTERNATIONAL HEADACHES—ARE WE TO SPEND MILLIONS IMPROVING ENGLAND'S LONG-MILKED CARIBBEAN POSSESSIONS AND PROVIDING EMPLOYMENT FOR FOREIGN LABOR, COMMERCE FOR ENGLISH PROFITS?

(By William LaVarre, Fellow, American Geographical Society, Expert on Latin-American Affairs)

Before he left London on his propaganda mission to the United States, Sir George Paish, former economic adviser to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was told to stop talking about exchanging West Indian Islands for American planes, ships, and to promote instead the idea of merely leasing naval and air bases in the Caribbean to the United States for 99 years. A few weeks previous to his mission, Sir George had publicly proposed at a London dinner that some of England's possessions could be profitably swapped for American war materials, and thus circumvent the embargo of our Johnson Act.

"The danger of our not being able to command enough cash to buy what we need," Sir George had said, "is a matter of life and death. The time is more opportune than ever before for ceding some of the West Indian colonies. Surely out of this vast Empire of ours we can spare one or more of the West Indian Islands."

A number of Americans who heard this speech were amazed that Sir George, an Englishman of the old school, so wholeheartedly fell in with an American wish to secure United States Caribbean fortifications. On the other hand, many British folk who heard it thought the old diplomat had become too mellow with age. Neither the Americans nor the Englishmen knew that Sir George's motives were just as shrewd as usual. One of the most expert horse traders of the British Empire, Sir George had just finished reading a highly confidential report which had been delivered to the colonial office by England's Royal Commission Investigating Conditions in the British West Indies. The commission's report was so malodorous that it had been hastily locked up after Sir George looked at it, and has been seen by very few other people.

The report of the Royal Commission Investigating Conditions in the British West Indies would be, however, of great interest now to our naval and military authorities and to United States Congressmen. It dissipates all glamor and romance about the West Indies in its first sentence. It tells things about Jamaica, Trinidad, Barbados, St. Lucia which no tourist booklet ever dared divulge. Studying the increasing strikes, riots, hunger marches, and "down-arms-day" unrest, to which the foreign office had been deaf and blind as long as possible, the royal commissioners stated the following facts: A great part of the British West Indian population of 2,500,000 (natives) were only occasionally employed. The majority of the people were underfed. Housing conditions were deplorable, in the plantations as well as in the towns. Sanitation in 90 percent of the area was described as "nonexistent." A large section of the population of each island suffered from malnutrition, especially the children. Infant mortality, due to lack of prenatal and infancy care, was increasing.

The Royal Commissioners minced no words in blaming the West Indian disaster on Colonial Office policies which administered each island solely for the purpose of securing for England cheap tropical imports and selling high-priced English exports—and not for the economic benefit of the islands or their inhabitants. Planters had to export their crops at low prices to London and pay high prices for English imports. English banks loaned only for export crops which the Colonial Office wanted, sugar, cocoa, tobacco, and such annual crops as England could profitably use. They would not finance planters for the production of diversified crops which the people of the island needed or which could be sold outside the British Empire. The banks, at high interest rates, would finance high-priced purchases if made from English manufacturers, but not those which local importers might obtain at lower prices from non-English sources. The colonists were no better off in 1940 than the colonists of the eighteenth century had been.

The commissioners charged several governors with incompetence; asked that the islands be immediately cleared of their increasing slums; that garden plots be provided for unemployed and poor families so they could grow their own food; that a free meal be provided each day for each child in each school, and that an immediate grant be sent to West Indian treasuries to finance the crisis of unemployment and social welfare emergencies. An annual dole of at least £1,000,000 ($5,000,000) was urgently advised.

Sir George Paish, studying this disagreeable news at a moment when his charts showed him increasing English war costs, decided quickly that the time, to use his words, was "more opportune than ever before" for ceding some of the West Indian colonies to the United States. But, just before sailing for America to unload two of the most unprofitable islands on the United States taxpayers, his advisers hit upon an idea that seemed to the House of Lords a much better proposal: Instead of getting rid of an impoverished island, why not lease a little section of it to a good tenant for a few years, let him do a lot of work, spend much money locally, increase jobs, pay rolls, and local commerce, which would not only relieve the House of Lords from having to dig into already heavily taxed English estates in order to support the West Indies, but provide such a business boom for the West Indies that the islands might soon be producing a profit for England's colonial office. If the United Stats could be sold the idea of spending millions of dollars in pay rolls, giving thousands of jobs to Jamaicans, Trinidadians, St. Lucians, and unemployed Barbados, and perhaps even providing immediate employment for the unemployed of British Guiana and Honduras, two birds could be killed with one stone—or rather, tenant. England's war debts would be canceled and England's future colonial losses underwritten and subsidized. In addition to this economic miracle, a mere tenant would build fine airports, marine bases, paved highways, and other property improvements, at no expense whatever to the colonial office.

Thus from three directions at once has a campaign been launched upon us to secure our signature to 99-year leases for 18 naval and air bases in exchange for the cancelation of $4,000,000,000 worth of British 1918 war debts and 50 United States destroyers. Simultaneously with Sir George's personal appearances in the United States (and he had cleverly secured advance lecture engagements which, if not canceled, would take him from coast to coast) Viscount Halifax issued a statement in the House of Lords, from whose estates taxes otherwise would have to come to finance the West Indies, that such a leasing arrangement has already been agreed upon in principle by the American administration.

If this is a fact, then the American people had better wake up or we who have already been drained by taxes to offset House of Lords debt defaults since 1918 will be committed, without any chance of public or congressional discussion, to assuming British West Indian liabilities which will drain us for another 99 years. We should find out just to whom Viscount Halifax refers as the party of the first part. Whom have we got, in London or elsewhere, who has committed or can commit the people of the United States to such an international liability? For us to assume the burden of investing in fortifying islands to which we will never have title, or providing pay rolls for foreign labor rather than our own citizens, would be sheer stupidity. But it looks as though someone has promised to do so, for Winston Churchill has also announced his official confidence that "His Majesty's Government is well pleased to accord defense facilities to the United States on 99-year-lease bases. Undoubtedly," he added, "this process (of leasing) means that two great organizations of English-speaking democracies will be somewhat mixed up together in some of their affairs."

"Somewhat mixed up," is a masterful example of understatement. We would be so mixed up that, like the two families who tried to share the same apartment, we'd all end up quickly in the divorce court—or worse.

It is incredible that we Americans could have been pledged, even in principle, to assuming all Caribbean defense costs without any title, for assuming additional liabilities without any tangible, practical, assets. But Viscount Halifax and Winston Churchill, in London, say we have. Sir George Paish on this side of the Atlantic insists we have. And soon, from Nassau, England's new Governor General of the British West Indies, no less a salesman than England's former king-emperor, the Duke of Windsor, plans to issue a congratulatory proclamation. President Roosevelt, when asked to comment on the who, when, and why of this English optimism, also increases the mystery by answering enigmatically that excellent progress is being made but that he cannot go into details because the subject was too involved. Too involved for whom?

If there is going to be, through this leasing scheme, some preliminary form of "union now" with England's liabilities, and we are going to be soon "somewhat mixed up together," it seems to me that we ought at least be allowed to argue the subject in passing. I think that, before any such commitment is made—to lease pieces of islands rather than invest in clear titles—we should have time to consider several facts: That the West Indies are not today in abject poverty is due to United States investments in developing the Panama Canal, which created new international trade routes that brought shipping lanes past the British doorsteps (and to which thousands of Jamaicans, Trinidadians, and Barbados rushed for employment). But, whereas Puerto Rico, to which we obtained title, does 94 percent of its trade now with the United States, thereby helping to balance our investments in its Caribbean fortifications, the British West Indies send 85 percent of their trade away from the United States.

No matter how much we would invest in fortifying British island tips and bays, no matter how many millions of dollars we contributed to British West Indian labor prosperity, we would not increase our share of the British West Indian trade. Trinidad, for example, in spite of the large United States investments in asphalt, oil, and international air terminals, does only 5 percent of its trade with the United States.

Jamaica, from which the English chased the Spaniards in 1665 and which Englishmen made the center of their profitable Caribbean slave trade, is becoming volcanic with increasing labor unrest. There have been riots even in the British naval docks. If we merely leased tenant's quarters on Jamaica we would have no authority whatever to administer community assets so that the people of Jamaica would benefit. The Colonial Office in London would benefit by every dollar the American Government spent.

The advantages of additional air and naval bases in the Caribbean are urgently evident but these should be established on totally United States administered islands, or internationally partitioned halves of islands, permanently ceded to us for value received. Any actual step in the direction of joint occupancy where we are spending all the money and England is getting all the profit—and non-Americans all the new jobs and pay rolls—is unthinkable until after all such proposals have been discussed by the American people and its constitutional authority—Congress.

There is no doubt that, under war dictatorship, Winston Churchill, Viscount Halifax, and Sir George Paish's economic friends may well be able to decree what England and the British West Indies, and their people will do. But there is still a great deal of difference in the theory of democracy as seen through English and American eyes. We have given, as yet, no authority to any man or any small clique of ministers, with or without portfolios, to sell out even paper assets or old warships for 99 years of increasing liabilities and international complications. We can share the North American Continent with Canadians, ancestrally (for Canada is a dominion, not a colony), and we are good neighbors, and we each have clear title to our own property. But we can't share British West Indian islands successfully as tenants of London's often changeable but always self-centered Colonial Office.

LETTER TO THE HONORABLE MARTIN DIES FROM MRS. JAMES CUNNINGHAM GRAY, OF BOSTON, MASS., WITH AFFIDAVIT

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and affidavit from Mrs. James Cunningham Gray, of Boston, Mass.:

BOSTON, MASS., June 23, 1940.

Hon. MARTIN DIES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. DIES: It has been called to my attention that on page 2386 of volume 3 of the hearings of the Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, and on the testimony of John C. Metcalfe, that my name is listed as being present at a "national confederation" in 1936 of a group of Americans who met, according to your report, at Asheville, N. C.

I request that you kindly retract this statement, as it is absolutely false.

I did not attend any "confederation" at Asheville, N. C. Never heard of such a "confederation" and was never in Asheville, N. C., in my life. My name was used without my permission or knowledge.

I am a patriotic American citizen, proud of the country in which I live, and proud of the early history of my forebears who fought and died to make this great country what it is.

For the sake of accuracy of your own report and in justice to myself, I ask the privilege of making a sworn statement, to go into your report as well as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

That a false statement of this sort against a patriotic citizen can get into a Government report is an amazing fact.

I will appreciate an early reply.

Sincerely for America,

GRACE GRAY.
(Mrs. James Cunningham Gray).

AFFIDAVIT OF MRS. GRACE GRAY, OF BOSTON, MASS.

Whereas my attention has been called to the fact that on page 2386 of volume 3 of the hearings of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, my name is listed as being present at a national confederation in 1936 at Asheville, N. C.; and

Whereas the testimony of one John C. Metcalfe to this effect is untrue;

Now therefore, I, Grace Gray (Mrs. James Cunningham Gray), of Boston, county of Suffolk, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, on oath depose and say that I did not attend any meeting of any confederation at Asheville, N. C.; that I have no knowledge of any such confederation; that I have never been in Asheville, N. C., in my life; and that if my name has been used as a member of any such confederation or group, it has been used without my knowledge or consent.

I further depose and say that I am not a member of any group or organization engaged in subversive or un-American activities of any nature.

GRACE GRAY.

Tinkham on the Monroe Doctrine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Sunday Post of August 18, 1940:

[From the Boston Sunday Post of August 18, 1940]

TINKHAM ON THE DOCTRINE

Our sturdy Representative from the Tenth Congressional District is noted for his long-sustained crusades for the retention of fundamental rights.

He, GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM, has let his record in Congress supplant campaigns for reelection.

In this he has been uniformly successful. He has been able to hunt lions in Africa while aspirants to his seat have hunted flaws in his record.

Now he is off on another issue and, while it has not yet become a dominant question before the Congress, his persistent voice eventually will be heard, for it deals with a forgotten tenet of American foreign policy, but one which cannot be long denied.

Mr. TINKHAM recognizes, as do all Americans, that about the only consistent doctrine we have ever followed in our relations with regard to the rest of the world was that enunciated by President Monroe in 1823.

This Monroe Doctrine was the result of the communication of the then foreign secretary of Great Britain, George Canning, to the American minister in London, Richard Rush.

Canning suggested that Great Britain and the United States issue a joint declaration of policy to the effect that recovery of Spain's American colonies, then independent, in the Western Hemisphere was hopeless and that neither Great Britain nor the United States could see with indifference the acquisition of these colonies by any other power or powers.

President Monroe deliberated over this message with John Quincy Adams and others and, December 2, 1823, he sent a message to Congress which embodied Canning's idea but eliminated Great Britain as an active partner.

The message took the form of two broad delineations of national policy.

The first of these is that we will not tolerate conquest of present Western Hemisphere nations by outside powers, or any further colonization.

The second part has been forgotten and, since 1917, ignored.

This part is the one which deals with noninterference with the internal affairs of Europe and the relations of European nations with each other.

Congressman TINKHAM decided some months ago that, with the growing importance of the Monroe Doctrine as a protection against foreign military footholds, the other part of it should be revived.

Monroe said, "Our policy in regard to Europe remains the same, which is, not to interfere with the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve these relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting in all instances, the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none * * *."

He goes further and says, "In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense."

To show violations of this part of the doctrine, Mr. TINKHAM has reviewed the entire foreign policy of the past few years, starting with the attempt to embargo oil to Italy during the Ethiopian conquest.

He mentions other violations such as the subsidization of China in the Japanese war, the President's quarantine speech, the sending of officials to Czechoslovakia to back up England's agenda; the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's loan to Finland, and other utterances and acts.

The attitude of the administration on this portion of the doctrine has been that it is impossible for the United States to remain aloof in the world of today; that after aggressor nations accomplish domination of the European continent they will assault us.

In view of the latter conviction, the administration feels that it is up to us to place as many obstructions as possible in the way of victory of the dictatorships and to aid their enemies as much as possible, short of war itself.

Thus it can be seen that Mr. TINKHAM'S proposed revival of the long-dead noninterference clause of the doctrine is at odds with the present policy.

It will remain to see which will prevail, or if the revival comes too late. But it is axiomatic of the TINKHAM system that he clings to his principles with bulldog tenacity and a parliamentary skill born of honest convictions and long experience.

If the future is anything like the past, he will stick to his guns so ardently that the issue will never be forgotten.

The Naval Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LANSDALE G. SASSCER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE EVENING CAPITAL, ANNAPOLIS, MD.

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Speaker, our United States Naval Academy, located at Annapolis, is one of our most historic and efficient educational institutions. It has been for many years one of the strongest contributing factors to our national defense.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Evening Capital of Annapolis, under date of September 17, 1940.

This editorial sets forth effective and logical reasons why there should be no dismantling of the functions performed at the Naval Academy, and gives practical justifications for the extension of the present facilities.

[From the Evening Capital, Annapolis, Md., of September 17, 1940]

KEEP DOWN TO EARTH

The proposal to establish a second naval academy on San Francisco Bay, with an initial appropriation of $10,000,000, now pending in Congress, is just another example of faulty reasoning under the stress of strengthening the national defense.

With all the hysteria abroad in the world today it is essential that all public officials and particularly Congress keep down to earth and be sure that the huge sums being spent for national defense go to bolster points of weakness.

It is but natural that Representative TOLAN, of California, might conceive it valuable to his State to have another naval academy on the west coast. But is it valuable to the Nation?

The matter has been discussed many times in the past, and the general consensus of opinion has been against the proposal. Nothing has happened to change this viewpoint.

Many intangible things play a part in the effectiveness of a fleet and one of the strongest is tradition. Since the Naval Academy was established in Annapolis tradition has grown through the years. The youthful plebe imbibes it during his first year. The battle flags in the museum, monuments on the grounds, tales of prowess on athletic fields, the silent dow of bronze tablets in Memorial Hall, speaking with vigor, despite their silence, tell a story of men who have died to make the Navy great.

In this cradle of the Navy this tradition becomes a part of the character of the midshipman—it creeps into his mind and heart—and in time of stress, when his great hour arrives, it serves as a torch leading to correct decision.

One has only to picture Commodore Dewey heading into Manila Bay and having in his mind the question "What would Farragut do?" to place a proper value on tradition. The great fleet of England, sweeping the seas of its enemies, is held together by the deeds of the men who battled the Armada, the achievements of the immortal Nelson and hundreds of others whose lives are linked with the present by an invisible bond.

No, you cannot found a new Naval Academy and build this spirit, this tradition, with stone and iron. It takes lives, blood, and time—particularly time.

The proper training of the naval officer cannot be had in duplicate institutions. The midshipmen must live together, study together, absorb the same background in the same way, so that when they become officers they will be interchangeable gears in the great machine that is the United States Navy. There must be uniformity of training and thinking, more than in any other profession.

Two Naval Academies, functioning under different Superintendents, could not be synchronized. Differences would inevitably creep in, different traditions would grow in the two schools and eventually there would be two groups of officers, fundamentally strangers to each other. They would lack that common knowledge of the basic life at the academy which now knits the officers corps into one.

Inevitably with two institutions, the tendency of clique rule would have to be faced. Human beings, built as they are, tend to have those they know around them. This would be bad for the fleet. This clique rule could start in athletic rivalry—harmless in itself—but nothing could keep it from extending into the fleet. Even to risk it might be fatal on a day when the salvation of the Nation may depend on harmonious action of all.

Aside from these reasons it is a waste of money to found a new institution. The present Naval Academy has cost about $30,000,000 to construct. A start from scratch on the west coast would soon boost the original $10,000,000 asked to a much greater sum.

More could be achieved and the Nation better served if $10,000,000 was allocated the present academy for enlargement. Then the existing plant would be able to expand to take care of all demands of a two-ocean Navy.

Congress Is Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OSCAR YOUNGDAHL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MINNEAPOLIS TRIBUNE

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Minneapolis Morning Tribune of Monday, September 23, 1940:

[From the Minneapolis Morning Tribune of September 23, 1940]

CONGRESS IS NEEDED

Again an effort is being made to reach agreement on adjournment of the present Congress. If the Senators and Representatives want to abdicate all the power of the legislative branch in this time of emergency, they can adjourn and leave everything to the President. That would not be in the line of duty, for the time more than ever demands that all the functions of government continue in operation.

Members are anxious to get home, not to rest but to campaign. Their impatience is understandable. Their political fences need attention. Yet the best campaigning a Congressman can do today is to stay faithfully on the job at Washington.

In an ordinary year Congress might well have quit work in June, when Mr. Roosevelt opined that further session could serve no purpose except the "laudable" one of making speeches. The country was of different mind, and Congress stayed on. Since the President's effort to hand Congress its hat, he has called on it for another $5,000,000,000 for defense, has demanded and obtained the conscription bill, and several other measures important to the defense program.

There was fear last June that with Congress out of the way, the President would push the country immediately into war. Congress remained in Washington to serve as a check on Executive rashness. It has cooperated to the full in the preparedness program, and has been much more amenable to the President's will than before. Still Congress retains its power as a coordinate branch of the Government, and there is quite as much reason for keeping that power alive as there was in the early summer.

Congress still has important business on its calendar, such as the Walter-Logan bill for regulating the power of boards and bureaus, and amendment of the Wagner Act. It could slow down activity and still take care of pending business in the next month or so. Recesses of a week or two would do no harm, but if the Houses adjourn now, the legislative branch of the Government will suspend until next January, barring a special-session call by the President. Four months that lie ahead may be packed with action and with emergencies greater than we have had since June. The Seventy-sixth Congress should not quit.

National Unity Means National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED. V. IZAC

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have been making a study of the subject of national unity as an adjunct of national defense.

When the Dies committee was first authorized I feared that the policy of its chairman would hinder rather than enhance national unity. I believe these fears have been justified by subsequent events.

We must not forget that America is a melting pot into which has poured a steady stream of varied populations for 150 years. We are all products of this blend of nationalities, and most of us love to be known as Americans. It is true that there lingers in the minds of many just a trace of racial pride and racial consciousness—a pride of origin which is inherent in the human race. And I believe we cannot hope to make a better and a stronger nation if we permit attacks by some on those whose origin is different from their own.

Some of the finest citizens in our country are here because of the revolutions in Europe during the middle period of the nineteenth century—as for instance that liberty-loving and freedom-seeking group of German blood who came to this country during the German revolution of 1848. No finer citizens are to be found here than these pioneers and their descendants of today.

Now we hear there are nearly 4,000,000 aliens in our country and of course at times like these many become suspicious of all who cannot show a naturalization certificate. But I find from my own observations that many of these so-called aliens are more patriotic than some who have achieved citizenship. I find, and these facts are corroborated by the Department of Justice, that many aliens have erroneously believed that they were citizens. This is often due to: First, the alien or his father may have voted in a State which granted this privilege to those who had made their declarations of intention; second, some children have erroneously believed that their fathers were naturalized before the children reached the age of 21 years; or third, the father may have died before final papers were issued and the children thought that he was a cititzen.

Some, particularly older persons, feel that the naturalization procedure is too complicated. A few are unable to speak English, as required by statute. Some find the required filing fees difficult to meet for economic reasons.

I believe, however, that if we should appraise the degree of patriotism with which one is imbued on the basis of citizenship we should be making a grave mistake. Of the 5,160,864 immigrants who have come into this country since the World War only some 2,000,000 have become naturalized. Does that mean that there are 3,000,000 disloyal to our institutions? Certainly not, because investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation proves that most of the leaders of groups such as Fritz Kuhn who advocate foreign political and religious philosophies have already become naturalized citizens and therefore cannot be called aliens.

As I delved deeper into this problem I came upon more facts. In the last decade 1931 to 1940 our immigration rate into the United States has been only one-tenth of the preceding 30 years. Yet there have been established more foreign and un-American groups than in any similar period in our history. So this leads to but one conclusion. And that is that during the past 8 or 10 years there has been a movement of foreign origin to build up an organization to espouse a certain philosophy and thus aid a cause inimical to our own best interests. And this is being built around a nucleus of not aliens, not social outcasts, but of American citizens.

So when we blast in the press and from the rostrum against the aliens in our midst and thereby bring suffering and disgrace to many innocent people we are completely missing the mark.

I am now positive in my own mind that for the last several years there has been an organized effort on the part of Hitler to build up in this country an auxiliary which would come to his rescue at the crucial moment. He has sent his emissaries who waste no time in taking out citizenship papers. Most of these immigrants have served in the German Army. He did the same thing in Holland, Belgium, Denmark, and Norway. With this "fifth column," as it is now designated, the field of resistance was smoothed in those countries. Here in America the bund, headed by Hitler's agents, grows and grows, adding citizens and aliens alike, until such time as it becomes strong enough to dispute with democracy the advantages of totalitarianism.

Mr. Speaker, I have watched the technique employed by Hitler in those countries his armies have already conquered. He secretly plants in each country a sizeable nucleus of army personnel whose duty it is to contact Germans already in the victim land and with them to form a "fifth column." On the eve of the invasion this group seizes all communications facilities such as telegraph and telephone exchanges and radio stations; all utilities such as gas, electricity, and water-distribution systems; all transportation systems, or at least the essential and strategic points thereof; municipal and government headquarters and offices, including the ministries of war and navy; and the principal newspaper offices and news bureaus. With these in his hands the invaded nation falls an easy victim to the invader.

If there is no other way to avoid suspicion at the large number of strangers entering the friendly countries, Hitler attaches his secret army to the various German consulates and embassies where they are protected in their spying and scheming under the cloak of diplomatic immunity; and if they are not numerous enough for the work in hand the needed number is dropped at the proper moment by parachutes from invading planes.

So it is with this knowledge and to anticipate some of the moves directed at the United States that I have introduced certain bills which I give here in detail and for which I ask the consideration of Congress. The first, H. R. 10492, which will limit the number of "fifth columnists" under the guise of diplomatic attachés is as follows:

A bill limiting number of diplomatic or consular officers or attachés accredited to and maintained in the United States by any foreign power

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the total number of diplomatic or consular officers or attachés accredited to and maintained in the United States by any foreign power may, in no case, exceed the number of such officers or attachés accredited by the United States to and maintained in such foreign country.

The second, H. R. 10446, which will prevent information of ship movements and other information of military or naval value from reaching potential enemies is as follows:

A bill disqualifying any member of the Communist Party, the German-American Bund, or certain other organizations for licensing as operator of any radio station on any ship of the United States

Be it enacted, etc., That title III of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"DISQUALIFICATION OF OPERATORS

"SEC. 363. (a) No license as operator of any station on any ship of the United States shall be issued under this act to any person who at the time of application for such license is, or at any time prior thereto has been, a member of the Communist Party, the German-American Bund, or of any organization subject to foreign control which engages in political activity.

"(b) The Commission shall, subject to the provisions of section 303 (m) (2), suspend the license of any operator, insofar as such license authorizes the operation of any station on any ship of the United States, upon proof sufficient to satisfy the Commission that the licensee is, or at any time has been, a member of the Communist Party, the German-American Bund, or of any organization subject to foreign control which engages in political activity.

"(c) For the purposes of this section—

"(1) an organization shall be deemed to 'engage in political activity' if the purpose or aim, or one of the purposes or aims, of such organization is the establishment, control, conduct, seizure, or overthrow (either immediately or at some specified or unspecified time in the future) of Government in the United States, or of any State or political subdivision thereof; and

"(2) an organization shall be deemed 'subject to foreign control' if (A) such organization limits its membership to individuals who are not citizens of the United States, or limits its membership in such a manner that at least a majority of its members are individuals who are not citizens of the United States, or (B) such organization solicits or accepts financial contributions, loans, or support of any kind, directly or indirectly, from, or is affiliated directly or indirectly with, a foreign government or a political subdivision thereof, or an agent, agency, or instrumentality of a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, or a political party in a foreign country, or any international political organization, or (C) such organization's policies, or any of them, in relation to its political activities are determined by or at the suggestion of, or in collaboration with, a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, or an agent, agency, or instrumentality of a foreign government or political subdivision thereof, or a political party in a foreign country, or an international political organization."

And the third, H. R. 10520, which will cancel the citizenship of those immigrants who have come here for the express purpose of aiding foreign governments against the land that gives them sanctuary is as follows:

A bill to provide for cancelation of citizenship in the case of certain naturalized citizens of the United States

Be it enacted, etc., That any naturalized citizen of the United States shall be considered to have given cause for the cancelation of his citizenship if such naturalized citizen at any time within 20 years of his admittance into the United States advocates, or is a member of or affiliated with any organization or group that advocates, the substitution of a totalitarian form of government for the constitutional democratic form of government of the United States.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to secure information relating to acts and circumstances described in section 1, and, in any case where a naturalized citizen has given cause for cancelation of his citizenship, to certify the facts to the Attorney General for the institution of an appropriate proceeding in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of naturalization of aliens, within whose jurisdiction such individual resides or may be found, for the cancelation of citizenship of such individual, and such court shall have jurisdiction to cancel such citizenship. Any individual whose citizenship is so canceled shall be ineligible thereafter to become a citizen of the United States.

Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, national unity will never be attained in this country by attacking those among us who love America but who do not agree fully with all our views. But national unity and therefore national defense can best be served by taking such steps as I have outlined to prevent the agents of foreign powers from betraying America to the totalitarian dictators.

Agricultural Subsidies to the Average Farmer Are Small

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, the farm problem of the United States is one that has caused diligent study by many of the leading men of our Nation.

The farmer asks only for a fair consideration of his problem. He asks, and is entitled, to the same benefits of legislation that are accorded other groups. Equality to the farm people should not be complicated if the rest of society wishes to extend this equality.

As long as we have 10,000,000 unemployed people in this country, labor and business have a problem. As long as banks are filled with unused funds, all society has a problem.

FARM PROBLEMS

The Federal Farm Board has had $500,000,000 to stabilize the prices of farm crops and of this amount $175,000,000 have been recovered. The present farm program has distributed over $3,000,000,000 but the farmers' share of the public debt has been increased $6,000,000,000. As the public debt increases, likewise there is an increase in the invisible farm mortgage on every acre of land in this country. The New Deal has put a $1,000 invisible mortgage on every farm in the United States. In terms of cropland only, every billion-dollar increase in the public debt represents 75 cents per acre mortgage.

The following table shows the payments under A. A. A. programs for 1936–39 in Wisconsin and the average payment received by each county during the period 1936–39:

Number of farms in Wisconsin, 199,877.

Average A. A. A. and parity payments, $10,744,162.

Average A. A. A. and parity payments for 1936–39, $51.

Average A. A. A. and parity payments, 1934–39, $39.

Average A. A. A. and parity payment per county, 1934–39, $157,320.

One insurance company in 1937 received $257,000 in A. A. A. payments; one corporation farm received $112,000 in 1938 and $122,000 in 1939.

Farmers' checks of $39 average are more than offset by the increased hidden taxes of the New Deal and by the decreased farm income of the New Deal.

Dairy products average 25 to 30 percent below the pre-New Deal prices.

From a careful study and consideration of all the problems involved, the following deductions are made:

First. Agriculture is entitled to subsidies as long as other groups are subsidized. We must remember that tax-exempt bonds are a subsidy to capital.

Second. We should not have a program that promises money to our people when there is not anything left in the United States Treasury to promise them.

Third. We must have a pay-as-you-go program.

Fourth. We must realize that all the subsidies so far granted are still a part of the public debt and must be repaid with interest when the great day of reckoning comes. It may appear that Peter is being robbed to pay Paul, but Peter and Paul will both be robbed if the Budget of the Federal Treasury is not balanced.

Fifth. The most fertile and productive farm can be depleted of its fertility and still have the owner receive checks under the guise of soil conservation.

Sixth. We cannot continue to subsidize one-third of our crops at the expense of the rest of the producers. Cotton farmers alone have had 69 percent of the parity payments and one State, Texas, has had 27 percent of the parity money in 1 year.

Seventh. We cannot continue to subsidize each farm $175 or more each year in some States and subsidize the farmers in other States with an average of $7 and have such a program in the realm of common sense or common justice.

Eighth. We must have an agricultural objective, which objective for social and economic reasons should be the largest possible number of farms owned and operated by the owner.

Ninth. We must realize that subsidy checks, to be of material benefit, must reach the hands of the real farm people of our country. In 1937, one insurance company alone received $257,000 on its farms. This is more than the average payments received by all the farmers in the average county of the United States.

Tenth. It is time to realize that the farmers of this country are being deceived when they are promised moneys that can only be given them by continual borrowing and increasing the public debt. This is equally true of other groups of our society in the promises made them.

Eleventh. The American farmer is entitled to the American market insofar as he is able to produce and supply this market and American labor is entitled to this same consideration. Any other program would be for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many. The fact that 25 to 50 percent of the Federal loans are delinquent and the fact that the farm prices are being maintained at such low levels is evidence that we must have a more fair and just approach to the farm problem of this country.

Twelfth. A program that is fair to all farmers must be evolved and this can be accomplished without Federal domination. The philosophy of the McNary-Haugen and the so-called cost-of-production bills are still much fairer approaches to this problem than the cross-purpose schemes of the New Deal.

Address by Hon. Henry T. Wickham to Virginia Legislature

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. HENRY T. WICKHAM

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address made to the joint assembly of the State Senate and the House of Delegates of Virginia on February 23, 1940, by the Honorable Henry T. Wickham, president pro tempore of the Senate of Virginia.

Senator Wickham is 90 years of age. He served in the State Senate of Virginia more than 50 years ago. He is one of the most loved of all Virginians, having the confidence and respect of the entire State. He is the only living Virginian who was taught by Gen. Robert E. Lee at the institution later known as Washington and Lee University after the War between the States.

His address is so illuminating that I ask the privilege of its insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. Ashton Dovell, speaker of the house of delegates, introduced Senator Wickham, as follows:

"Mr. President, Your Excellency, and gentlemen of the joint assembly, we are met to do honor to a distinguished Virginian, and at the same time to witness the enactment of a scene without parallel in the memory of those present.

"With the poet, the solemnity of this occasion and the contribution which our distinguished patron and fellow member is to make, makes us pause, and feel that 'deep within us somewhere there is a something that stirs at times and breathes upon the dying embers of the soul and fans it into flame.'

"Today we see it touching the stringed instrument called the mind and producing another note of genius. It is what we look upon as the divine within us. It is the power that ever urges us upward and onward along the path that no man sees. It has given us the iron roadway, the belted wheel, the churning screw, and the wings of canvas which now beat the air and add the highways of the eagle to human paths.

"Out there in the hills it has builded every home, and here on the coastal plane it has touched the spark on every hearth. It is the spirit of the pioneer, of the individual; it is what has made Virginia great.

"Today, Hanover is proud, and all Virginia is honored. We are met to greet another of Hanover's sons, one who has lived the span reaching from the dark period following the War between the States to the present hour when war clouds hover once more—a man who has seen the past, who is heartily in love with the present, and who faces the future with vigor and is unafraid.

"The county of Hanover has made another great contribution, and the name of another Hanoverian is being written high on the scroll of Virginia's honored sons. You will not find in him any of the attributes of the demagog, or of the autocrat, for he is a simon-pure Democrat, possessed of rare courage and high honor, those virtues so preservative of all other virtues and, with it, the pride that belongs to a king and the simplicity of a shepherd, which bind him so everlastingly to the hearts of his comrades and associates in these halls and outside alike.

"After all, the contribution of great men, and the solution of great problems constitute Virginia's first claim to fame, and we are glad to acknowledge that like the contribution by the Grecian archipelago of Leonidas and Pericles, and the honor thus brought to Greece, Hanover has made a contribution of which she too may justly be proud. Our associate, the distinguished senator from Hanover, has the cosmopolitanism of a Jefferson, the penetrating analysis of a Marshall, and the patient wisdom of a Madison. Yes; he typifies the humbleness and fidelity of that great Virginian about whose life he will reminisce, Gen. Robert E. Lee.

"He is the patriarch of his people; yes, more than that, he is the patriarch of this body, and whatever the future may hold for Virginia, he has made a contribution that challenges every living Virginian. He knows that States may fail and a complete centralization prove to be the wisdom of the future, but that the poetry of life will still find its home in the old order, and that those, like Senator Wickham, who love Virginia best, will live longest in song and legend, song yet unsung and legend not yet crystalized.

"Gentlemen of the joint assembly, will you arise:

"Senator Henry Taylor Wickham, I have the honor to present to you the General Assembly of Virginia, in joint session."

SENATOR WICKHAM'S ADDRESS BEFORE THE JOINT ASSEMBLY

His Excellency, the Governor of Virginia, Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, my colleagues—may I be permitted to say my dear colleagues—of the general assembly, ladies and gentlemen, I greatly appreciate the high honor of your invitation to address the assembly and to recall some personal recollections of Gen. Robert E. Lee and the Arlington family.

Some explanation is due to account for the circumstance that I myself happen to have recollections of them.

My grandmother, Mrs. Anne Carter Wickham, died on February 25, 1868. On the 4th of March, 1868, General Lee wrote my grandfather a letter. Here it is—I will read it:

LEXINGTON, March 4, 1868.

MY DEAR MR. WICKHAM: I grieve most deeply over the great sorrow that has fallen upon you and your house. Death, in its silent, slow march, is fast gathering those whom I have longest loved, so that when he shall knock at my door I will more willingly follow.

She whom we mourn is among those who I have longest and most dearly loved. She was the favorite of my mother, the object of my boyish affection. In the long years of manhood, she has always lived in my memory. And the farthest recollection of her brings me nothing but pleasure.

May He who has dealt the blow in mercy temper its affliction, and enable us to say, Thy will be done.

Yours in true friendship,

R. E. LEE.

Mr. WM. F. WICKHAM.

There was intimacy between the families of Arlington and Hickory Hill. Sometimes in her periodic visits to Arlington my grandmother would take me with her. I remember my first visit, which made a deep impression upon me. I was between 5 and 6 years old and had rarely been away from home. The great pillars at Arlington, the view of the river and the distant city were wonderful to me. I had never seen such a sight before. General Lee was away. The elder children were away. Mrs. Lee and her younger children and some of their young friends comprised the family. I was much younger, was country bred, and did not know any of their games, and was esteemed trundle-bed trash. In fact, I was a rank outsider. General Lee had given his children two Mexican mustang ponies. Their names were Mexique and Santauna. When they were brought out, I took heart of grace, for my grandfather had given me a little horse, and I could ride literally almost by the time I could walk. So, when my turn came, I scrambled upon either Mexique or Santauna, and thinking to "show off," jerked the bridle. Instead of "showing off" the pony t ok the bit in his teeth and ran away down the slope toward the stable, stopped short with his forelegs stiff, and I ignominiously went right over his head, to the consternation of the grown-ups and the wild hilarity of the youngsters. Greatly disheveled, I rejoined the group pleading anxiously for another chance. I knew my grandmother was always ready to give me another chance.

I remember the first time I saw General Lee. Whenever he was stationed in Washington or on furlough it was his custom to take the boat at Alexandria for Aquia Creek; there he would take the train for Taylorsville, where he would be met by a conveyance from Hickory Hill, where he would spend the night and next morning be forwarded to the White House, where he would stay for such time as his business required, and then return to Hickory Hill, spend the night, and next morning be forwarded to Taylorsville on his way home.

Now, my grandmother had frequently told me about Robert Lee, what a splendid man he was; what a great soldier he was; and what he had done in the Mexican War. I never saw him in uniform. His clothes were just like what grandpapa and papa wore. While I did not doubt for a moment what grandma said, yet I wondered. Some friend had given me a boy's book called the Rifle Rangers, describing the adventures of a certain young Captain Haller, who had in fact won the Mexican War. In the confidence of youthful ignorance, I believed this book to be true history Was it not in print, and I could read it. One morning while we were waiting for breakfast I rather timidly took this book, showed it to General Lee, and asked if he knew Captain Haller. He took the book, looked at it, and returned it to me, and said he did not know Captain Haller. This was a great shock to me. Could it be possible that he could be the great soldier grandma said he was and not know Captain Haller? Just at that moment I received another shock. My little sister, just 2 years younger, came dancing into the room, and I became painfully aware of how greatly General Lee preferred the society of little girls to that of little boys. I do not recall seeing General Lee again until I reported as a student to him at Lexington in September 1865. But I did see members of the family many times, and it is difficult to disassociate in my recollection the general from the Arlington family.

John Parke Custis was the son of Mrs. Martha Washington, wife of General Washington, by her first husband, by whom she had four children—Elizabeth, who married Mr. Law; Martha, who married Thomas Peter; and Eleanor (Nelly), who married Lawrence Lewis. George Washington Parke Custis, son of John Parke Custis, married Mary Randolph Fitzhugh, and they were the parents of Mary Custis, wife of General Lee. Their children were Gen. G. W. P. Custis Lee, Gen. William Henry Fitzhugh Lee (Rooney), Mary Custis Lee, Anne Carter Lee, Agnes (Eleanor) Lee, Robert E. Lee, Jr., and Mildred Lee. Martha Custis, wife of Thomas Peter, was the sister of George Washington Parke Custis and aunt of Mrs. R. E. Lee. One of the daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Peter was named Martha. She was the first cousin of Mrs. Lee, and she married Capt. William G. Williams, United States Army, who was killed while leading a charge in the Battle of Monterey, Mexico. They had three children—Lawrence, William Orton, and Martha, known in the family as "Markee." These three children were the great nephews and great niece of Mr. Custis and second cousins of his grandchildren. Mr. Custis, after the death of Captain Williams, took their three children to Arlington and brought them up with his grandchildren. It was a gay and happy family. Fate smiled; not one realized that the finger of fate was about to write a tragedy unsurpassed by the Greek dramatists of old or that the little thread of my life would be woven in the web. Lawrence and "Markee" stayed with the North. Orton Williams and Agnes Lee were boy and girl sweethearts. Orton came South, and under the following circumstances I met Lawrence Williams.

On May 4, 1862, my father was desperately wounded at Williamsburg and was brought home. On May 27 occurred the battle of Hanover Court House, in which the Confederate forces were severely defeated. Part of them retreated by the River Road through Hickory Hill plantation. It was a memorable day for me. When the sounds of the fighting came near there was much excitement at the mansion. Unnoticed, I crept away to the brow of the hill and witnessed, from the distance of about a quarter of a mile, the last stand of the routed soldiers. Next morning a Federal scout tied his horse and came up the walk holding a piece of paper in his hand. My grandmother advanced to meet him, and I was with her. He said, "Is this Mrs. Anne Wickham?" She replied, "Yes." He said, "I want some of your good brandy." She asked, "How do you know I have any?" He said, "This note says so." She said, "Why, you wouldn't read a lady's letter." And he said, "Stop preaching, old woman, and bring me the brandy." She said, "If I bring you the brandy, will you go away?" and he said, "I will, if you bring it quick."

So she brought the brandy and he went away. Later in the day the Federal picket line was extended beyond Hickory Hill and Col. Lawrence Williams, who was in command of the picket line and who knew about us, and who had learned that a wounded officer was there, came to the house. Nothing could have exceeded his courtesy, and he later brought General McClellan's staff surgeon, who, after examination, said my father would die if the attempt to remove him was made, and took my father's parole as a prisoner of war. Lawrence Williams was young, handsome, and dashing. He had a way with children. He came several times and would make his horse, which was a very fine one, jump over the yard fence for our amusement.

After the seven days battles around Richmond Agnes Lee and Mrs. Lee paid us a little visit, and I rode with Agnes Lee over the battlefield of Hanover Court House. I do not recall seeing any of the Lees till December 1862. Shortly after the battle of Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862, Mrs. Lee and Agnes paid us quite an extended visit. My sister and myself each have independent clear memory of what happened at Hickory Hill. William Orton Williams (known in the family as Orton) was an officer on the staff of General Hood, who commanded the army of Tennessee. Learning that a battle was imminent, he got a furlough and served as a volunteer aide to General Lee at the Battle of Fredericksburg. After the battle he came to Hickory Hill and joined Mrs. Lee and Agnes there. He was handsome and charming. My sister remembers that his presents to Agnes were a pair of ladies' riding gauntlets and a riding whip. I remember about the horses being brought out and their cantering off from the gate. There is another reason for the accuracy of our recollection. Children have keen perception and find out much more than people think. Orton was in love with Agnes. It was the first romance of our lives. He was the Prince Charming and she the Sleeping Beauty that our fairy-tale book had made us acquainted with, and we became excited partisans of Prince Charming and believed the Sleeping Beauty would awake, and they would ride away together and live happily ever after. We could not understand it at all when one day after a long session in the parlor (from which we children had been warned to keep away) he came out, bade the family good-bye, and rode away alone. We could not understand it.

The next recollection I have of the Lees was just after the cavalry battle of Brandy Station which occurred on June 9, 1863, in which Gen. W. H. F. Lee was badly wounded. His wife was Charlotte Wickham, a daughter of the house, and she and Mrs. Lee, Agnes, and Mildred were on an extended visit to Hickory Hill. So it was decided to send him there, and on June 12 he arrived with his brother Robert, who was on his staff, in charge till his wound was healed. Robert brought with him the letter from General Lee to Charlotte, which he refers to in his recollections, but which Rev. J. William Jones records in full in his personal reminiscences, in which he says "Tell Cousin Anne I am rejoiced that Williams is unhurt, though pretty Lucy might like to see the ambulance driving up again. I want all the husbands in the field, and their wives at home encouraging them, loving them, and praying for them."

Time passed quickly. I was made generally useful running errands, and bringing hot water from the kitchen. As a reward,

I was permitted to stay in the room when his wounds were dressed. I saw a large hole where the bullet went in, but there were two holes some inches apart where parts of the bullet came out. This was strange. There was much discussion about the rules of civilized warfare. The northern cavalry had just been armed with a new weapon used for the first time at Brandy Station, the Spencer carbine, which had a soft-nosed bullet with a zinc cap on the back designed to become detached and remain in the wound and cause gangrene, blood poisoning, and death. This was fired so close that both the bullet and the zinc cap went through.

On the morning of June 26 we had just finished breakfast and were assembled on the front porch, when, as so graphically told by Robert Lee in his book, we saw a number of hostile cavalry come at full speed up the lawn. Robert ran to the office where his brother lay. Was told to make his escape. He ran across the yard and concealed himself in the great box bushes, where he saw his brother placed on a mattress and taken away in the carriage, a soldier on the box and a mounted guard surrounding him. That truly was a day that stands out in my recollection. The raiding party was led by Colonel Spear. He did not come to the house, but I remember hearing Mrs. Lee say she knew him when he was a sergeant in the Second United States Dragoons when General Lee commanded it. I recall the great dignity and calm of Mrs. Lee and the anguish of Charlotte, who had borne up during Fitzhugh's removal, but broke down afterward.

The purpose of Spear's raid was, in addition to the capture of General Lee, the destruction of the bridges across the South Anna River, about a mile north of Hickory Hill House. They were defended by a bridgehead fort of good size and strength; the garrison consisted of a North Carolina company of about 40 men commanded by Colonel Hargrave, who defended himself manfully, as stated in Colonel Spear's official report.

Spear's force consisted of 1,500 cavalry and a battery of artillery. My cousin, Frank Nelson, and I had long earnestly desired to own a revolver. We knew the only way to get them was from the body of a dead Yankee. When the sound of the firing ceased we thought our time had come, so we slipped away and proceeded toward the bridge. We had approached to about 400 yards of the bridge when a bugle sounded, and instantly we heard the zip! zip! zoo! of Minie bullets. That sound is unmistakable, and once heard is never forgotten. We did not get the revolvers, but retreated in great disorder, dodging behind the shocks of wheat until we reached the River Road, where we saw a large number of our colored people seated on the bank. We joined them and I saw the advance scouts; then the advance guard; then followed a number of soldiers on horseback, each with a dead Yankee on the pummel of the saddle, head hanging down on one side and feet on the other. Their blouses had slipped down and the wound and blood showed. Then followed the wagons commandeered from South Wales and Hickory Hill with the wounded. The Confederate dead were left with orders to the Negroes who did not join them to see to their burial. Then followed the battery and a strong rear guard. As the latter were passing, I saw a number of our colored people, men and women, get up from the bank, run alongside, grasp the hand of the horseman, swing up behind and go away. The large majority, however, stayed. Next morning Moses Napper and Scot Davis, who had been given to Charlotte by her grandfather when she was married, came back to the house and said that in the confusion they had slipped away, crossed the river, and taken the horses off to the big woods of New Design, and that when a scouting party of the Yankees had gone to the house at North Wales, where old uncle lived, and when they found the horses gone they got very rough and had beaten him, injuring him severely. Grandpa and grandma took the buggy and went over to see about him. He was in bed. The house servants were faithful. He was in no immediate danger. When they returned they told Mrs. Lee of his condition. She had written General Lee the details of the capture of their son, and she wrote again to the general, telling him of the treatment to which his old uncle had been subjected. In his reply, General Lee wrote, "The consequences of war are horrid enough at best, surrounded by all the ameliorations of civilization and Christianity. I am very sorry for the injuries done the family at Hickory Hill, and particularly that our dear old Uncle Williams, in his eightieth year, should be subjected to such treatment. But we cannot help it and must endure it." The Lees remained at Hickory till they went to the Hot Springs. On August 7, 1863, Mrs. Lee wrote this letter to my grandmother, extracts from which I will read:

"Hot Springs, August 7th, 1863.

"Tho you will not write to me, dear Cousin Anne, yet I know it gives you a great deal of trouble. I will be magnanimous and write to you, though I have not much to tell you that is pleasant.

"Poor Charlotte has been quite sick for the last week, with a doctor attending her. I have been truly grieved for her, especially as I am personally able to do so little for her, but she has her two servants, Annie Leigh, and the girls who attend to her. I am sorry, too, my dear Cousin, not to report to you a more decided improvement in myself. I find some little relaxation in my knees and do not sit down with quite as much pain and difficulty as when I was with you, but do not walk any better. I cannot scarcely expect a rapid change, but did hope by this time to be able to move about with some facility. I must wait and pray for this and for many other blessings that the Almighty sees fit to withhold.

"Tell Ma Fan [another daughter of the house] I got a sweet letter from Leigh, telling me all he knew about poor Orton. I have not yet replied to it; but if she should be writing, will she tell him I got it? I have heard since from his sister Martha, and she tells us she wrote to the Illinois chaplain who was with him and administered the communion, and he told her there was a letter written to us which was sent into the rebel lines, but which we never received. Markee got a few lines, his last words, which she transcribed for Agnes—'Do not believe that I am a spy. With my dying breath I deny the charge. Do not grieve too much for me. I believe in Jesus Christ, who came into the world to save sinners. Altho I die a horrid death, I will meet my fate with the fortitude becoming the son of a man whose last words to his children were, "Tell them I fell at the head of my column." I remain with love to my sisters, brother, and relatives, your devoted brother.' Poor Markee is nearly heartbroken, as well she may be, tho somewhat comforted by the letter received from that chaplain telling her how earnestly he prayed in his last hours for an interest in Christ. Even in this terrible death, which I do not believe at all merited, God may, in His mercy, have taken him from the evil to come. 'What we know not now we shall know hereafter.'

"And now I want you to tell Henry what a comfort his stick is to me. I lay it beside me on my bed every night and can pick up almost anything with it from the floor. Indeed, I could not get along at all without it; and should I be able to throw aside my crutches, it will aid me in walking, as it is very strong. He can get me a handsomer one against my return.

"I also received a letter last night from General Lee, dated August 2nd, in which he says the enemy laid down some pontoon bridges and 'crossed his cavalry and a large portion of his infantry. It seemed at first as if it was the advance of his army, and as I had not intended to deliver battle, I directed the cavalry to retire slowly before them, but to check their too-rapid progress. Finding later in the day that their army was not following, I ordered out the infantry and drove them back to the river. Our loss was small. I suppose they intend to push on to Richmond, but trust they will never reach there.'"

The terrible death of Orton Williams was a shock to Agnes from which she never recovered. She became very quiet and pensive in after life. I do not recall hearing her laugh, and when she smiled it seemed to me that she was looking beyond.

Returning to Mrs. Lee's letter of August 7, 1863, I note particularly what she said about Charlotte. The next deep impression made on me was Charlotte's death. She never recovered, gradually grew weaker, and died in December 1863. She pined for her husband, who was confined in Fortress Monroe as a hostage to be executed, if two prisoners in the Libby Prison, who were under sentence of death in retaliation for the execution of Confederate officers by General Rosecrans in Tennessee, were executed.

When Charlotte was dying, she longed for her husband. Her brother-in-law, Gen. Custis Lee, a general officer of equal rank, a son also of General Lee, and unwounded, went, by permission of President Jefferson Davis, under a flag to Gen. B. F. Butler, who was in command at Fortress Monroe, informing him of Charlotte's condition, and offering to be exchanged and to take his brother's place as hostage under sentence of death. Butler telegraphed this to President Lincoln, who replied that the fate of war had placed her husband in such a perilous position, and that he could not permit the substitution.

I do not recall any incident connected with the Lees in 1864. The character of the war changed entirely. Raids were very frequent, and behavior toward the family at Hickory Hill was frequently very rough. We were often within the enemy's picket lines, and the house and plantation looted. But this is another matter from the subject of this address.

In September 1864, being a well grown boy of 14, I was sent with my cousins, the Oakland boys, to Washington College, where I remained until after the surrender at Appomattox. Bread lines were formed in Lexington and my cousins and I determined to walk home. We did walk much of the way and were treated with the utmost kindness by the people of whom we asked food and lodging at night. Finally we got home, and I saw the desolation of Hickory Hill. And the despair. I remained at home until September 1865, when we heard that General Lee would be the president of Washington College. My parents, like many, many other parents denied themselves the bare necessities of life that I might go back to Lexington to be under him. When I went into his office, which was in the westernmost of the three large buildings, he did not know me, and asked my name. When I told him, he was very cordial and said his family had not arrived but would soon come and that I must feel at home with them, and especially that I should come frequently to take Sunday supper, where there would always be a place for me.

After they came I found myself very welcome. I ran in and out and went many times to Sunday supper during the 3 years I was a student under General Lee. General Lee was always grave. I do not recall ever to have heard him laugh, but he had a warm, affectionate, and charming smile.

He had a plenty of humor and was fond of teasing, especially his daughters about their beaux, and Mildred about her cats, one of which was named Sidney Baxter, after a very reverend and aged predecessor of General Lee in the presidency of the college. I have many mementos of my associations with the Lees at that time, one of which is this letter which Agnes Lee sent me on my birthday, December 17, 1866. Here it is. I will read it:

"MY DEAR HENRY: I wish you had some of Annie's nice cake for your birthday, and hope this sample lunch will serve to make the day different from the others. I had thought of glass with a silver waiter, a scented note with Latin and Greek quotations, but, ahem, that will do for another occasion. I will wish you now in English alone many happy and studious returns of your birthday.

"Affec. your cousin,

"AGNES LEE.

"Dec. 17th, 1866."

She also gave me a photograph of herself, on the back of which I have pasted it.

I have referred to her smile. I wish you could see this photograph closely, "for on her face there is a smile, as holy, pure, and faint as lights in some cathedral aisle. The features of a saint." Here is a photograph of Mrs. Lee, given me by her while I was a student. I wish each one of you could see it, for it is unique.

I pause for a moment to ask Ebbie Combs, the clerk of the senate, whose record imports an absolute verity, to look at this photograph. I wish everyone could see it, but he can record your vote.

[Mr. Combs, taking the photograph, said, "It is signed Mary Custis Lee, and on the back are the words 'Colored for my dear Henry by his affectionate cousin, Mary C. Lee.' It is a beautiful picture of a very lovely and dear old lady."]

It is indeed a beautiful picture of a dear, dear old lady. The beauty of her soul and the happiness of her heart is reflected in the calm beauty of her face. The four and a half years she was with her husband in Lexington were the happiest years of her life. She gave me this memento because she wished me to remember her as she was.

Here is a photograph of General Lee and Traveller. General Lee is standing holding the bridle, both facing the camera. It is a rare picture, and General Lee signed it for me.

When I graduated, he handed to each member of the graduating class the diplomas. The night before I left I went to the house to take leave of him and the family. They all sent kind and affectionate messages to the family at Hickory Hill. That was the last time I saw General Lee, but I did see much of the family afterward, when various members visited Hickory Hill.

In September 1873, I was suffering from a severe attack of malaria. My sister and I were invited to pay a visit to Mrs. Lee. It was arranged that I should go, and my sister would come later. On September 21 Mrs. Lee wrote her, saying Agnes greatly desired to see her, and on October 1 Mrs. Lee wrote my sister and also my father saying that Agnes' condition had changed greatly for the worse and that my sister had best defer her visit. Here are the letters.

These are among the last Mrs. Lee ever wrote, for Agnes died on October 15, 1873 and Mrs. Lee died November 6, 1873.

I have often been asked my impressions of General Lee. He was always cheerful. He had a winning smile; but I never heard him laugh. He objected greatly to having Traveller's mane and tail snipped, which was frequently done by the girls for souvenirs, always to the General's indignation when he discovered the "snipping." I have often seen him ride Traveller to the baseball field where he would watch the game with interest.

General Lee had a remarkable faculty for recalling the name and the face. At a time when there were 400 students, when he would meet any one of them he would bow, and if he was not in a hurry he would pause, call the name, and make some kindly inquiry about the family.

I have been asked what impression General Lee made upon the student body. It is hard to describe it lest I be thought to exaggerate. But there was not a student who did not know about General Lee. In mental vision they pictured him as he stood on the hill at Fredericksburg in the moment of victory. They saw him as he rode Traveller to the front of his advancing battalions, where the cheers of his army rose high above the thunder of the cannon, the rattle of the musketry, the roar of the burning forest, and the shrieks of the wounded who were being burned alive in those fearful woods; they saw him at Gettysburg, where he said, "It is my fault"; they saw him that dreadful day when he spurred Traveller through the dense undergrowth at Spotsylvania to the head of the column, when the men caught the bridle and shouted, "Lee to the rear! We'll take the guns." And they did take the guns. They saw him in the trenches at Petersburg; they saw him on the hill above Sayler's Creek, where he formed in person his last line of battle; and they saw him at Appomattox. I will not say we worshipped General Lee, but there was a reverence too profound for utterance, and with that reverence there was a sympathy and a sorrow too deep for expression, causing an atmosphere in which we breathed the thought that "we must do what General Lee would wish us to do. Our fathers were his soldiers and obeyed his orders. We are his boys and must do what he would wish."

I saw a remarkable instance of this. I roomed in No. 78 North Dormitory with my cousin George T. Lee, a nephew of General Lee. The student I most admired was Gevens B. Strickler who roomed in No. 79. Both rooms opened directly on the campus. In 1861, he was a freshman and enlisted as a private in the Liberty Hall Volunteers, the college company, and fought through the war in the Stonewall brigade, becoming the captain of the college company. In 1865, he returned to the college in the sophomore class, of which I was a member. He was the best debater in the literary societies and the president of the Y. M. C. A. He and I were friends and we studied together between classes.

One day while we were so engaged, we heard the sounds of a disturbance on the campus and went out, and learned that some of the more venturesome students had gone downtown, gotten into a fuss with the guards of the "Freedman's Bureau," and had been badly beaten and put in jail. Rumor flies fast. The excited students poured from the classrooms, clamoring to be led to the rescue of their comrades. The 400 boys were out of hand. Strickler attempted no speech, but he went quickly among them. He kept saying, "Steady, men! Steady, men!" and I thought "Old G." felt he was back on the field of battle and the Liberty Hall volunteers were getting nervous. "Steady, men! Steady, men! Remember General Lee! No violence. Remember General Lee. Let the law take its course. You must do what General Lee would wish." After a while he quieted them and they dispersed to their several duties. I have never forgotten that scene.

One more "recollection" and I am done!

I have referred to my visit in September 1873. It was a sad visit. When I bade them goodbye, I wept and said I was close to the angels. During my visit I was told of General Lee's last moments. He came home from a protracted vestry meeting, where his last act was a contribution to the church. When he got back to the house, supper was on the table. Entering the room, he attempted to say grace, when his utterance failed and he was supported to his bed. For a few days he lingered, then lapsed into unconsciousness, and when the end came his devoted wife was by his side in her rolling chair holding his hand, and his son, General Custis Lee and his daughters, Agnes and Mildred, were by their mother. Just before the great soul left the body, he roused and murmured, "Tell A. P. Hill he must come up." And after a pause, he said, "Strike the Tent." No attempt to interpret these words has ever been given me by his family. Simply the words as stated.

Now I have heard many memorial addresses by most devout clergymen, and they, with the utmost reverence, likened his last words "Strike the tent" to the last words of the Saviour upon the cross at Calvary, "It is finished." I have never been able to accept this interpretation. General Lee's life was not finished. "Tell A. P. Hill he must come up" was an order. A battle order. An order anticipates action. So "Strike the Tent" was an order. An order requires action. No; I believe when he uttered those words that a vision of glory appeared before his closing eyes. A vision from the progress of the pilgrim. He heard a trumpet sound, and lo! a troop cometh, and encompassed by a cloud of witnesses a veteran pilgrim essays the flood. It is Valiant! It is our Valiant! It is Robert Lee himself! And as his feet entered the water he turned, and said to them upon the bank, "My sword I give to my successor; my skill and my courage to him who can get them, but my scars I take with me as evidence that I have fought the fight; that I have kept the faith." And just then a gentle voice from the bank exclaimed, "My husband, wait for me." And a soft, sweet, gentle voice called from the bank, "My father, wait for me." And he said, "I cannot wait, but you will come." So he passed over the river, and all the trumpets sounded for him on the other side, and soon, very soon, the tender feet of the saintly daughter brought her to the river's brink, and when she felt the water's icy chill she trembled, and angels came down from heaven and comforted her; and they upon the bank wept, and the sweetest singer in all our dear Southland lifted up her voice and sang the parting hymn:

"Ah! for the left; who can bear to miss,
Out of their lives this life, so rare,
Tender! so tender! an angel's kiss,
Hallowed it daily, unaware!
Gracious as sunshine; sweet as the dew,
Shut in a lily's golden core,
Fragrant with goodness, through and through,
Pure as the spikenard Mary bore,
Pensive as twilight! Calm as the dawn!
Agnes has gone."

She has gone to be the saint of the Daughters of the Confederacy. And then in a few days—very, very few days, the sorrowing wife passed the river. And the first to greet them on the other side was the beloved husband and father. And hand in hand they cross the green fields that lie beyond that swelling flood. And hand in hand they ascend that glorious stairway that leads to the coronation hall of heaven, and there they receive their crowns; their crowns of never-fading flowers, gathered from the margin of the river of their lives, and woven for their forehead by the angels in heaven, and there they hear the words, "Well done, good and faithful servants! Enter into the joy of our Lord!"

"Strike the Tent!" The battle flag is furled but the guidon is there, and it points the way; the way that leads to the firm foundation which was General Lee's favorite hymn. Strike the Tent! The battle flag is furled, but the guidon is still there, and it points the way. The way to a firm foundation, on which we can build a stronghold. A stronghold for our faith. A stronghold for our safe refuge. A stronghold where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.

Strike the Tent.

"The General has gone forward." And we can follow him still.

Governor Price responded to Senator Wickham's address as follows: "Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, members of the general assembly, ladies and gentlemen: In rising to express the appreciation of this joint assembly for the delightful address of the president of the senate on his recollections of the Lee family, I am deeply conscious of my inability to adequately execute the commission. It is perfectly evident from the remarks of the distinguished speaker that his contacts with this remarkable southern family have greatly enriched and inspired his career and that these early associations have proved a profound benediction to him.

"The very mention of the Lee family arouses in the breast of every true southerner a feeling of profound gratitude and reverence. It is to be hoped that the reminiscences which we have heard today will create a new interest in the great heritage which is ours and give us an increasing appreciation of our beloved Southland and the distinguished leaders who have immortalized it by sacrificial service. Nowhere in the world could this particular occasion be duplicated. Here in the capital of the Confederacy and in the General Assembly of Virginia we are permitted to listen to a student of General Lee and to have him give us a very touching account of the South's great leader.

"May I express our appreciation of the presence of so many guests who have come to join us in paying tribute to the illustrious son of Hanover County, the genial and capable president of the senate. Our best wishes go with him in his continued service to the old Commonwealth whose interests have always been so near and dear to his heart."

The Test of Americanism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

ADDRESS BY J. EDGAR HOOVER

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of J. Edgar Hoover, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, before the Twenty-second Annual National Convention, American Legion, Boston, Mass., September 23, 1940:

The American Legion is an important bulwark of our national security. Today, your organization takes on an added significance in a period of emergency, when all real Americans are united in a determination to protect our Nation. Fortunately, the Nation can depend upon you. You have been proven in the crucible of experience.

In other lands, once free peoples are now subjected to the oppression of dictators. Fear and intolerance have taken the place of freedom, while force has become a dominant factor in world affairs. But of greater importance, American democracy once more is on trial. America must face facts. America must realize that the legions of force are making tremendous sacrifices for an ideal—an ideal which aims to destroy everything we hold dear. The people of the United States, in defense of their homes and their beliefs, must unite with that same singleness of purpose for which our forefathers fought in 1776 and for which many of your brothers-in-arms died in 1917.

From across the seas have come emissaries from totalitarian governments, seeking to undermine our nationalism and to implant their doctrines of hate. In spreading propaganda, these subversive forces have become more brazen. They have penetrated into every realm of decency, seeking allies in our schools, our churches, and our civic organizations. Ever on the alert to capitalize on popular trends, they have joined reform organizations and civil liberties groups, and have played dominant roles in some of the pacifist blocs. Wherever they go, they contaminate, because of the indifference and apathy of too many of our citizens. As a result, our America is at the crossroads.

The time has come when we must make a choice. We can either resolve to protect our temples of liberty, or we can go blindly along believing that all is well. If we follow the latter course, we will some day find our liberties suddenly blacked out by the tyranny of a foreign dictator.

Our people are accustomed to taking liberty for granted. As a result, they have ceased to think seriously about it. But the foes of America have much to say about it. They construe liberty as license, and clamor for even greater license. Liberty and license are as far apart as liberty and tyranny. License breeds tyranny.

In recent days, insidious forces have sought to obstruct our national preparedness program by proclaiming that the strengthening of our Army and Navy abrogates liberty. The Communists, the bundsmen, and their allies of totalitarianism are seeking to weaken America's defense. These traitors, who shout of liberty as they seek to destroy it, tell young people that they should refuse to take up their country's arms.

Americanism is on trial. Its real test lies in the ability of red-blooded Americans to meet and defeat the "fifth column" of destruction, which is already at work. A knowledge of the lurking menace is necessary. Also, there is need to avoid confusion if America is to remain strong. This can be achieved only through clear thinking and positive action. We must understand the problems of the day and how they can best be solved. We must understand that the priceless heritage of a free people is liberty. It is also their greatest achievement. But it must be rewon in each generation, through eternal vigilance and positive action.

Mere lip service to the letter of our democracy will not suffice. We need understanding, and we need a renewed dedication to the spirit of liberty. This will not be easy to do. For a people to remain free, they must be courageous, self-reliant, willing to face the storms of life. Liberty is for the strong in spirit, not for the weak.

Action is necessary to prevent the blood-stream of America from contamination. There can be no procrastination. That this situation exists is no reflection upon the sincerity of the American people, but it does demand that we think straight and seek the truth. In this, the American Legion has set the pace. The necessity for its program, scorned and ridiculed by the Communists and their fellow travelers, has been thoroughly established.

This Nation will be everlastingly indebted to you Legionnaires for your devotion to the principles of our democratic Government. Born of devotion and sacrifice, the American Legion is a reassuring force in the preservation of our internal security. There is a need for your program in every community in the land.

Designated by the President to head the Nation's attack against foreign spies, saboteurs, and subverters, the Federal Bureau of Investigation is proud of its close cooperation with your organization. As the present emergency intensifies, it is only natural that we should depend increasingly upon you for assistance. You have never relaxed your vigilance against the foes of democracy. But now the time has come for you to broaden your program. Ever on the alert to practice Americanism, you must now redouble your efforts to teach Americanism. In short, this means that we must again emphasize the fundamentals that have made America great.

It is a sad commentary indeed that the teaching of religion has been so sorely neglected, because Americanism finds its most lofty expression in terms of spiritual development. The Ten Commandments cannot be improved upon, nor can the Sermon on the Mount be surpassed as a guide for ethical conduct. Yet the godless forces of totalitarianism scoff at everything spiritual and religious. They have used every device at their command to place their mouthpieces upon lecture platforms and in educational institutions to expound in a subtle manner, at times with a veneer of patriotism, their un-American theories.

Intellectual freedom is American. Intellectual license and debauchery is un-American. In righteous indignation it is time to drive the debauchers of America out in the open, where their true purposes may be revealed.

If their motivations are sincere, but due to ignorance, they have no right to instruct in the mental and spiritual development of America's youth. And if they espouse foreign causes, then they should be stopped from further debauching. There is no place in America for traitors steeped in the tyrannical and alien ways of life. American educational forces must come to grips in a unified manner with the needs of the hour, for the general purpose of stimulating the American people to renewed faith in democracy and a willingness to sacrifice in its defense if necessary.

You veterans need not be reminded that you took something into the first World War far more vital than your service equipment. You took something into that war which was not lost in the trenches or on the battlefield, and you brought something home. That something was a soul quality which found spiritual expression in a pattern of citizenship based on the cherished ethics of a Christian civilization. And you brought something home besides scars and haunting pictures of ghastliness and memories of fallen comrades. You returned with a consciousness of the ideals which have preserved our American standards.

It augurs well for our country that you tried and trusted men and women of America should be fused so closely in one great patriotic fraternity. That you have remained militant is a reassurance of the continuing health and vigor of our national morale. It is heartening that you are still militant as the poisonous shadow of dictatorship spreads over Europe and millions of persons, once free, become the puppets of pitiless power.

Yours is a worthy purpose—that of acknowledging your God and serving your country. Cooperation between you and the F. B. I. to this end will raise an insurmountable barrier against successful invasion of our country by any destructive influences of foreign origin.

As the eyes of dictators turn to America, let us be quickened in our efforts to strengthen our defense by the stark realization that their peoples cannot order their own lives. Contrast this horrible picture with life in America, where freedom is guaranteed as an inalienable right. These rights are even extended to the enemies within our midst who prosper and progress as our indifferent citizens lower their guard against the false fronts and insidious advances of domestic foes.

Over a year ago, the President of the United States directed the F. B. I. to lead the American crusade against spies, saboteurs, and subverters. This responsibility was gladly accepted. That the F. B. I. was feared by the forces it was pitted against was attested by the campaign of vilification and hate that was directed against it by Communists, their fellow travelers and mouthpieces. Falsehood after falsehood was spread, in high places and low, with the hope that a public esteem won by deeds and not words would be weakened.

The Communists, cheered by the underworld, looked forward to the day when the machinery of the F. B. I. would be hampered in carrying out its sworn duty of protecting America. In the face of a record of achievement which made homes safer, these same forces clamored for the dismantling of the F. B. I. But their scurrilous lies remain unproved and unprovable—for they are baseless.

A "fifth column" will never succeed in our country, because we of law enforcement are ready to meet its every advance. Never has there been such unity and cooperation in law enforcement, which recognizes the necessity for coordinated effort.

In the American way, we are quietly demonstrating that the horrors of the Gestapo and Ogpu are un-American and that a national police force as such is unthinkable. As the emergency continues, however, the Communists and the alien propagandists will continue to direct their vituperations against law enforcement, because they realize their cause is hopeless unless law enforcement can be weakened and discredited. That will never happen so long as all American citizens support law enforcement as you have done.

The American way of living will endure only if it is proved to be efficient. The beauty of its ideals and the wisdom of its conduct will be safe only when we demonstrate the ability to function better than bloody-handed dictators. This we can do only through self-sacrifice and a dedication to the common cause of protecting that which we love. America can endure only if we prove ourselves to be stronger than our enemies. We must demonstrate unmistakably our efficiency in government by a willingness to abide by our laws.

If we Americans ever needed clear vision and a firm grasp of fundamentals, today is that day. There are strong forces at work in this country that deliberately seek to overthrow our liberty. We are deluged with foreign "isms" of all kinds. If we are to continue as a free people, what we need is more Americanism. We need it not as a vague ideal, but as a practical, living force in our everyday lives. It is the only sure antidote for foreign "isms."

In the present crisis, there is no need for citizens to band themselves together to take charge of a situation already under control. That we must meet and conquer a "fifth column" of destruction is a common resolve, but we must do it in an orderly and proper manner, through the existing machinery of law enforcement.

I look to the American Legion to overcome any wave of hysteria that may sweep the country. Our task is too important to be interfered with by untrained or self-seeking individuals and publicists who talk much but do little.

The spy, the saboteur, and the subverter must be met and conquered. In doing this we must be certain that the innocent are not injured. You can be of valuable assistance at this time by reporting directly to the F. B. I. acts which you believe inimical to the national defense. These facts can then be evaluated by trained investigators.

Foreign foes in America do not limit their activities to any one locality. Each of their vicious deeds is a part of a greater conspiracy to cripple America. Ill-timed action in one community might reveal little and yet make futile Nation-wide investigative activity which has been carried on by the F. B. I. for months.

The President of the United States recognized the necessity of treating internal security as a national problem. On September 6 last year he called upon all law enforcement to report to the F. B. I. any information "relating to espionage, counterespionage, sabotage, subversive activities, and violations of the neutrality laws." In this manner bits of information from the East can be fitted into smatterings of evidence from the North, South, and West, revealing the complete operations of the enemy within our gates. The coordinating and handling of these matters is the responsibility of the F. B. I., with its Nation-wide scope of operations.

To make effective present plans, it is imperative that complaints and information regarding those who would subvert the Nation be promptly furnished the F. B. I. so that action can be taken today, for tomorrow might be too late. Once we have the facts, intelligent planning and action can follow. If found to be a matter of a local nature, arrangements have already been made to enlist the assistance of cooperative local, county, and State law enforcement agencies.

For years there has been a constant infiltration of foreign isms into every walk of life. With premeditation, foreign powers have been sending their agents to America. Once here and established, they have embarked on a recruitment campaign, enlisting the disloyal and the malcontent. They have sought the protective cloak of citizenship and they stop at no ends to achieve their despicable purposes.

In meeting these termites who are burrowing deeper and deeper into our social order, careful planning, tactful endeavors and persistent efforts are necessary. Counterespionage becomes effective only when foreign agents are placed under surveillance, their contacts observed, their methods of communications established, and sources of information ascertained and later controlled. The effectiveness of our efforts cannot be measured by glaring headlines of wholesale arrests of would-be spies, saboteurs, and subverters. Publicity, and even prosecution, do not prevent subversive activity. They merely transfer it into unknown channels, where the work must be done all over again.

Every time a self-appointed crusader starts beating the tom-toms of racial hatred and prejudice, he makes it that much more difficult for the constituted authorities to carry on. These individuals, before considering the careful planning that has been made to meet the foe, flush the quarry with premature announcements and ill-advised action, causing irreparable damage and invariably accomplishing nothing. The preservation of our internal security is a duty too sacred to be toyed with by psychopathic publicity seekers or to be used by greedy self-seeking politicians as a means of attracting attention.

Already a "fifth column" of destruction is on the march. It manifests itself in many forms, always disguised by a disarming front. These cowardly subverters seek to confuse by propaganda, paralyze by intimidation and in every conceivable manner to slow up production of defense materials. They know no rules except to destroy, they have no code but to subvert, with the hope that ultimately America, weakened internally, will crumble before an invading force or foreign-inspired domestic upheaval.

To keep America strong, we must keep it unsullied by foreign influences or foreign ideals. We have no place for the scheming peddlers of foreign isms who owe allegiance to other lands. As a people, we have lived too long in a fool's paradise. We have argued that two broad oceans were unconquerable fortresses. We now are awakening to the grim reality that the issues are too vital for us to take any chances.

We of law enforcement, in our own sphere, have been preparing for years. The problem of training that confronts America in connection with the increasing of our Army and Navy also confronted law enforcement several years ago. The F. B. I. met it with a far-flung training program, centered around the F. B. I. National Police Academy. Every phase of law-enforcement skill and science was given to police officers.

This campaign for universal training in law enforcement has achieved success. That is why I say the vigilante approach to our present problems is not only unnecessary, but inadvisable. In this you can be of service. The problems of law enforcement are perplexing enough without the meddling of gossip-minded or publicity-seeking individuals. You can help us by keeping down undue hysteria and letting us proceed in our work in an orderly manner.

A vital test of Americanism is the revival of the pioneer spirit of our ancestors. As a people, we have become soft. Modern science has poured the fruit of its inventions into our laps. Physical effort has been minimized. We have been led to believe that struggle was not an essential part of our environment.

But now we have awakened from a poppy-scented dream, and must face the bitter truth and struggle for our national existence as never before. A hard road lies ahead. To traverse it, we must be physically, morally, and mentally fit. Even though the Nation's future is clouded, if we all do our duty, the sun will rise again upon a land safe and free and the menace of the hellish hordes of hate will be met and overcome.

The United States of America and all that it stands for is not an experiment, and has not been since it was founded. It was a success from the day Washington took office under the Constitution. It is a success now in a world of toppling and clashing failures. And it will stand as the founders conceived it, if you actually will it to stand against the voices of totalitarianism which are engulfing the rest of the world. The United States of America has been, is now, and I believe will be, the greatest and freest country to live in on the face of the earth.

Let us then dedicate ourselves to the preservation of the heritage of the American way of living. Let us accept the sacred trust which has been placed upon us by other generations who have shed their blood to fulfill their obligation to America. Already the enemy is gnawing at the vitals of our American institutions. To counterattack, let the call of Americanism sound from coast to coast. Let us unite in dedicating our lives and energy, our efforts and aspirations in a crusade for America. It will be triumphant if every citizen lives the inspiring tenet of the American Legion—"For God and country."

George Washington Did Not Oppose a Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

EXCERPT FROM LETTER OF WASHINGTON TO LAFAYETTE

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an excerpt from a letter written by George Washington to Lafayette, dated April 28, 1788. The complete text of the letter is printed in volume 9, pages 354–359, Sparks' The Writings of George Washington, published in 1835, a copy of which is in the Library of Congress.

In his letter, after frankly and fully expressing his views upon various questions of public concern, Washington turned to the question of the eligibility of the President to succeed himself in office after having served "a certain course of years." Upon this question he expressed his views in the following paragraph:

WASHINGTON TO LAFAYETTE

There are other points in which opinions would be more likely to vary. As for instance, on the ineligibility of the same person for President, after he should have served a certain course of years. Guarded so effectually as the proposed Constitution is, in respect to the prevention of bribery and undue influence in the choice of President, I confess I differ widely myself from Mr. Jefferson and you, as to the expediency or necessity of rotation in that appointment. The matter was fairly discussed in the Convention, and to my full conviction, though I cannot have time or room to sum up the arguments in this letter. There cannot in my judgment be the least danger, that the President will by any practicable intrigue ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less to perpetuate himself in it, but in the last stage of corrupted morals and political depravity; and even then, there is as much danger that any other species of domination would prevail. Though, when a people shall have become incapable of governing themselves, and fit for a master, it is of little consequence from what quarter he comes. Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man, who on some great emergency shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public.

Harry Renton Bridges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM HOBBS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, on June 13, 1940, the House of Representatives of the United States passed the Allen bill (H. R. 9766) providing:

That notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to take into custody forthwith and deport forthwith to Australia, the country of which he is a citizen or subject, the alien, Harry Renton Bridges, whose presence in this country the Congress deems hurtful.

Although favoring the objective, I deplored the proposed means for its achievement, voted against the rule and against the bill, and on pages 8201 and 8202 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date appear my reasons.

The House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization reported the bill favorably without having sought or had an expression of opinion from the Department of Justice as to the merits or demerits of the bill.

But when it went to the Senate such an opinion was asked and received. The Attorney General's letter, giving his opinion, is quoted as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
June 18, 1940.

Hon. RICHARD B. RUSSELL,
Chairman, Committee on Immigration, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This is an answer to your request for the views of this Department concerning the bill H. R. 9766, which provides:

"A bill to direct the deportation of Harry Renton Bridges.

"Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any other provision of law the Attorney General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to take into custody forthwith and deport forthwith to Australia, the country of which he is a citizen or subject, the alien, Harry Renton Bridges, whose presence in this country the Congress deems hurtful."

If this bill were to become law, it would be a historical departure from an unbroken American practice and tradition. It would be the first time that an act of Congress has singled out a named individual for deportation. It would be the first deportation in which the alien was not even accused either of unlawful entry or of unlawful conduct while here. It would be the first time that Congress, without changing the general law, simply suspended all laws which protect a named individual and directed the Attorney General to disregard them and forthwith to deport "notwithstanding any other provision of law." And it would be the first time since the alien and sedition laws a century and a half ago that any law would provide for a deportation without a hearing or without, indeed, the slightest pretense toward giving the accused what our Nation has long known as "due process of law."

The extraordinary character of the bill upon its face is even more impressive viewed against its background. This same alien has been accused, investigated, and tried at great length, and judgment has been rendered that he had not been proved guilty of the charges made against him. By this bill the United States would deny faith and credit to its own duly conducted legal proceedings.

We have in this country, subject to the jurisdiction of this Department, some three and a half million aliens. One of our great tasks is to assimilate them into our native culture; this can only be done by a deep respect for our processes and tradition. How shall we teach this respect if the Government itself will not abide by a decision in an individual case, and makes acts whose nature is not specified, but which must have been lawful when done, the basis of deportation without hearing? What becomes of equality before the law, of the impersonal and impartial character of our Government, if it is to select unpopular persons to suffer disadvantage or punishment?

I do not now consider whether such a law would violate the constitutional prohibition against congressional enactment of bills of attainder, or ex post facto laws, or the provision of our Bill of Rights which declares that "no person * * * shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." I do not now try to determine whether the language of this act would work an unconstitutional suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Nor do I inquire as to any breach of treaty engagements to render fair treatment to nationals of friendly powers lawfully in this country. The law makes me legal advisor only to the President and the Executive Departments, and my predecessors have held that they could not with propriety also render legal opinion to a separate branch of the Government.

But apart from any question of power, I cannot, as head of the department affected by this bill, answer with anything less than emphatic disapproval, your request for views upon it.

The Congress has almost unlimited powers over aliens. It has embodied its policies in general laws. If it is convinced, as I am, that recent experiences show the need for additional safeguards, by all means let us have them. We, who are administratively responsible for dealing with these problems, have advocated greater legislative precautions. But there is no condition, existing or threatened, which needs arbitrary legislation prescribing no rule of conduct, but merely imposing banishment by legislative fiat. The interests of this service can be best protected by enactment of clear and fair rules of conduct that aliens may know, so that those who obey may be unmolested and those who disobey may be expelled. And let any man be heard in his own behalf before he is doomed to exile.

Harry Bridges may be all that this bill implies of him. But certainly he does not deserve a place in our history as a martyr. He is insignificant compared to the issues presented by this bill. Our forefathers objected to a government where "whatever pleased the Prince had the force of law." The report of the House committee comes close to reverting to this when it says that deportation "without assigning any reason is inherent and asserted by this bill."

As an American I would not, for the sake of my own liberty, deny the protection of uniform and indiscriminatory laws, and of fair hearings to even the humblest or meanest of men. As an official of the United States I cannot in good conscience do other than recommend strongly against this bill.

With personal regards,
Sincerely yours,

ROBERT H. JACKSON,
Attorney General.

In my speech against the Allen bill I pointed to the fact that the Smith bill—H. R. 5138—had changed the law as declared by the Supreme Court in the Strecker case, so that when it should have been passed by the Senate and approved by the President we could deport Harry Bridges without resorting to legislative mob violence.

It was most pleasing to me, therefore, when, on August 24, 1940, the Attorney General ordered the Bridges case reopened and reinvestigated because of the change in the law wrought by the Smith Act:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
August 24, 1940.

Attorney General Robert H. Jackson today issued the following statement:

"On June 19, 1940, in response to a request from the chairman of the Committee on Immigration in the United States Senate as to my views on the pending bill to direct the deportation of Harry Renton Bridges (H. R. 9766), I stated that such a bill, if enacted, would be a historical departure from American practice and tradition, in that it would be the first time that an act of Congress had singled out a named individual for deportation notwithstanding any other provision of law. I indicated at that time that I felt that it would be wiser procedure to take whatever action might be desirable or necessary under authority of laws which apply equally to all.

"On March 2, 1938, the Secretary of Labor initiated deportation proceedings against Bridges. Before those proceedings were completed the Supreme Court handed down a decision in the case of Kessler v. Strecker, which laid down the rule that in cases of this type an alien must be shown to have been a member of a so-called subversive organization at the time the deportation proceedings were initiated. Accordingly the conclusion reached by the trial examiner in the case, Dean James M. Landis, of the Harvard Law School, dealt only with the question of whether or not Bridges was a member of the Communist Party at the time of the deportation proceedings. Dean Landis' conclusion was that the evidence 'establishes now' that Harry R. Bridges 'is' neither a member nor affiliated with the Communist Party of the United States.

"Since that time, however, in the Alien Registration Act of 1940, Congress enacted legislation specifically designed to alter the rule of the Strecker decision and to make deportable an alien who at any time in the past has been a member of a subversive organization.

"Since the transfer of the Immigration and Naturalization Service to this Department, it has been making a study of deportation cases, which, while properly closed under the preceding law, might possibly be reopened under the Alien Registration Act of 1940. Consequently, I have decided in respect to the Bridges case to instruct the Federal Bureau of Investigation to make a thorough investigation for the purpose of determining whether or not under the newly enacted legislation there is new or additional evidence which would warrant the bringing or reopening of deportation proceedings against Bridges.

"Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, is now on the west coast and will initiate the investigation immediately."

Recently the special committee on the bill of rights of the American Bar Association made its annual report. From it I quote:

"The scope and purposes of this committee can be fairly appraised only in the light of the tense and critical times in which we live.

"It is now apparent to all, except the willfully blind of the victims of foreign propaganda, that a serious threat overhangs the American way of life. No man is wise enough to judge the degree or imminence of that threat. But at best it seems clear that in order to ward it off, we must discipline and control ourselves in many ways that are unknown and unnecessary in quiet times. At worst we may be involved in a desperate struggle against vast forces requiring, as a condition of preserving our integrity and institutions, the mobilization of every tangible and intangible resource. In either case, we must, as a matter of common sense and prudence, submit to discipline and controls that will raise sharp questions in respect of customary 'civil liberties.'

"This situation presents two main sets of problems.

"On the one hand is the problem of so formulating indispensable restrictions that they will be, to the utmost practicable extent, within our general framework of government and constitutional guaranties. We must see to it that concessions of customary privileges and rights do not go beyond what is clearly necessary for national safety; and that such necessary concessions shall be withdrawn upon the passing of the crisis. This can be accomplished by vigilance and by insisting that unusual statutory restrictions on customary rights shall be made subject to renewal from time to time.

"What is most of all essential is to preserve constitutional methods and procedures, however severe the controls must become, since the observance of procedures has always been of the essence of English-American liberty.

"We cite two examples. A bill was recently passed by the House of Representatives calling for the deportation by name of a particular alien, Harry Bridges. We express no view as to whether this man should be deported. But on the question of procedure the bill in question, whether or not constitutional, seems plainly contrary to the spirit of our institutions. He, like any other alien, should have a hearing under a general law applicable to all under similar circumstances. We understand that the bill is at present not being pressed in the Senate, but that a new investigation is being made as to his deportability under the general terms of the amended Immigration Act. This course is proper, whereas the other would be contrary to the American constitutional system, at least in spirit if not in letter.

"Another example is the methods to be used in the suppression, if necessary, of organizations hostile to our system and likely to engage in activities damaging to our national security. Granting that such activities cannot be tolerated in a time of danger, the question of procedure remains. If and when such suppression is needed it should be effected under general laws providing for a fair hearing and not by mob violence or even by official violence, outside the law.

"In exercising vigilance in these directions such a committee as this can help to bring us through the present critical period without permanent impairment of our constitutional liberties.

"On the other side of the shield there is a task to be performed in opposing the perversion of civil rights in such a way that would make us impotent or cripple us in our opposition to foreign aggression and internal disintegration.

"A constitutional republic, no less than any other government, must have the power to preserve its own existence; and the safeguarding of free institutions must not be permitted to imply impotence against enemies either within or without the gate.

"There is such a thing as using alleged constitutional rights as a screen to hide efforts to undermine our system and defeat efforts to strengthen the Nation. There is a danger that by overzeal in some cases or a deliberate misuse of the slogans of civil liberty in other cases, the whole cause of safeguarding our constitutional rights may be discredited.

"Such tendencies should be resisted by such a committee as this, lest the cause of constitutional liberty be prejudiced, just as, on the other hand, this committee should firmly resist real and unjustified encroachments on constitutional rights and procedures, no matter how unpopular such resistance might become.

"The successful functioning of this committee requires at all times a sense of balance and proportion. Such a balance will be all the more needed now; but the importance of the committee's function is enhanced rather than diminished by the very difficulties of the present critical period.

"Grenville Clark, Chairman; Douglas Arant, Zechariah Chafee, Jr., Osmer C. Fitts, Lloyd K. Garrison, George I. Haight, Ross L. Malone, Jr., Burton W. Musser, John Francis Neylan, Joseph A. Padway, Charles P. Taft, Monte W. Lemour."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

RESOLUTION OF HENRY H. HOUSTON 2D POST, NO. 3, AMERICAN LEGION, GERMANTOWN, PA.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

HENRY H. HOUSTON 2D POST, NO. 3,
Germantown, Pa., September 18, 1940.

Hon. FRANCIS J. MYERS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MYERS: At the regular meeting of Henry H. Houston 2d Post, No. 3, Department of Pennsylvania, the American Legion, held on Tuesday evening, September 17, 1940, at its headquarters, 47 High Street, Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa., the following resolution was presented and unanimously adopted:

"Whereas at the present rate of burials there will be no available space for the interment of veterans in the national cemetery located at Haines Street and Limekiln Pike, Philadelphia, after December 1942; and

"Whereas there is no other Government-owned cemetery within a radius of 100 miles of this heavily populated area; and

"Whereas the great need for such place of burial is generally acknowledged: Therefore be it

"Resolved by Henry H. Huston 2d Post, No. 3, the American Legion, That the Secretary of War be urged to take the necessary steps to procure a suitable site for a national cemetery within easy access to metropolitan Philadelphia; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of War, the Congressmen from the first nine congressional districts of Pennsylvania, and to the two United States Senators."

Sincerely yours,

MARTIN B. MCCANN, Commander.
JOSEPH D. WALSH, Adjutant.

T. V. A. and Bonneville Yardstick Rates

OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday September 25, 1940

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, for more than 10 years I have labored incessantly, in and out of Congress, for cheap electricity for all the American people, and have done everything I possibly could to bring about reductions in light and power rates to the ultimate consumers of electric energy in every section of this country.

It has been a hard battle, and I am glad to say that in addition to the assistance of such stalwarts at the other end of the Capitol as Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, and Senator BONE, of Washington, we have had the support of the majority of the membership of this House. Our efforts have not been in vain. They have borne fruit most abundantly. Already we have realized reductions in electric rates amounting on an average to more than $580,000,000 a year since the creation of the Tennessee Valley Authority and the publication of its yardstick rates.

All who have opposed us in this fight have concentrated their fire on the T. V. A. and its yardstick rates. But their propaganda has strengthened our position by bringing this question to the attention of the American people, and in that way causing them to investigate and try to find out what electricity is really worth, what it should cost them; with the result that the T. V. A. and its yardstick rates have been vindicated, and the people of every State in the Union are clamoring for rate reductions such as have been enjoyed by the people of the Tennessee Valley area.

I have pointed out time and time again that, even with these reductions, the users of electric energy throughout the country are still overcharged something like $1,000,000,000 a year according to the T. V. A. rates. The records show that in 1938 the residential consumers alone were overcharged $297,935,000, while the commercial consumers were overcharged $330,909,000, according to the T. V. A. rates—making a total overcharge for these two classes of customers alone of more than $628,000,000 a year.

But the opposition attempts to offset these figures by saying that the T. V. A. rates are too low. Their chief spokesman in that regard has been Mr. Wendell L. Willkie, president of the Commonwealth & Southern, a utility holding company, and now candidate for President on the Republican ticket. The other day he spoke in Portland, Oreg., in the very shadow of the Bonneville Dam, which this administration has constructed on the Columbia River, and from which electricity is now being distributed throughout the States of Oregon and Washington; and, strange as it may seem, he never criticized one time the Bonneville yardstick rates at which this electricity is being distributed to the people of that area. He did not dare tell them that their rates were too low. I wonder what he will tell the people of the East about the exorbitant rates they now have to pay.

As chairman of the public-power bloc in the House, I am somewhat responsible for that provision of the act creating the Bonneville Administration which makes these cheap rates to the people of that area possible. When a measure was proposed which I felt would paralyze the operation of both Bonneville and Grand Coulee, so far as the distribution of power at reasonable rates was concerned, I conferred with the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] who introduced the bill that finally became law, and as a result of which the people of that great northwestern country are now enjoying rates which I shall show in a moment are a little below the T. V. A. yardstick rates.

Every member of the public power bloc in the House, which includes every Member from the State of Washington, rallied behind that measure which provides for the application of the yardstick so as to give the people of that great northwestern country the same benefits of cheap electricity in every home, on every farm, and in every business establishment that is now enjoyed by the people in the Tennessee Valley area. This now applies to the electricity to be generated at Grand Coulee, as well as that produced at Bonneville.

Let us see how these rates compare. We will first take the residential rates and will place side by side the T. V. A. yardstick rates and the Bonneville yardstick rates. Every one of you can draw your own conclusions.

Residential rates

T. V. A. YARDSTICK RATES

3.00 cents per kwh. first	50 kwh.
2.00 cents per kwh. next	150 kwh.
1.00 cent per kwh. next	200 kwh.
0.40 cent per kwh. next	1,000 kwh.
0.75 cent per kwh. for all over	1,400 kwh.

Minimum bill, $0.75.

BONNEVILLE YARDSTICK RATES

3.00 cents per kwh. first	50 kwh.
2.00 cents per kwh. next	50 kwh.
1.00 cent per kwh. next	200 kwh.
0.50 cent per kwh. next	900 kwh.
0.75 cent per kwh. for all over	1,200 kwh.

Minimum bill, $0.75.

Commercial rates

T. V. A. COMMERCIAL YARDSTICK RATES—FOR DEMANDS OF 10 KW. OR LESS

3.0 cents per kwh. first	150 kwh.
2.0 cents per kwh. next	350 kwh.
1.0 cent per kwh. next	1,500 kwh.
0.8 cent per kwh. all over	2,000 kwh.

FOR DEMANDS IN EXCESS OF 10 KW. BUT NOT OVER 20 KW.

3.0 cents per kwh. first	15 kwh. per kw. demand.
2.0 cents per kwh. next	35 kwh. per kw. demand.
1.0 cent per kwh. next	150 kwh. per kw. demand.
0.8 cent per kwh. all over	200 kwh. per kw. demand.

BONNEVILLE COMMERCIAL YARDSTICK RATES

Demand charge for first 10 kw. demand, or less $0.95 per kw. all additional kw. demand.

ENERGY CHARGES

3.0 cents per kwh. first	150 kwh.
2.0 cents per kwh. next	350 kwh.
1.0 cent per kwh. next	1,000 kwh.
0.8 cent per kwh. next	13,500 kwh.
0.6 cent per kwh. next	25,000 kwh.
0.4 cent per kwh. next	60,000 kwh.
0.3 cent per kwh. all over	100,000 kwh.

Thus it will be seen that the Bonneville rates are equally as low as the T. V. A. rates. In other words, we have carried the yardstick westward to the Pacific Ocean, and have provided for the people of the Columbia River Basin a supply of cheap electric energy that will add more to the wealth of that section, as well as to the comforts and conveniences of the homes and business establishments of its people, than anything else, yes, than everything else, that has been done for them in all the history of this Republic.

It is the greatest blessing from an economic standpoint this Nation can bestow, and yet it is one that will be self-sustaining and self-liquidating, and will ultimately pay back to the Federal Government every dollar it has invested. We are simply doing for the people in the Columbia River area what we are doing for them in the Tennessee Valley area, and what we expect to do for the people of every other section of this country. If we could spread these rates to every State in the Union, it would result in the further reduction of light and power rates to the residential and commercial consumers of this Nation alone, amounting to $628,000,000 a year—or more than the value of the entire wheat crop or the entire cotton crop of the United States.

That is our objective; that is the consummation for which we have been striving. We are gradually winning this battle. Along with these rate reductions this administration has developed a rural electrification program that has lighted something like 2,000,000 farm homes that never had electric lights in them before. Our objective now is to extend that service to all the other farmers of the Nation, and spread the cheap rates now prevailing in the Tennessee Valley area, and in the Columbia River area, to every nook and corner of the United States.

The Farm Program

REMARKS

OF

HON. R. T. BUCKLER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 26, 1940

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, agriculture and farming are the largest and most important businesses in the United States. Most of us know and will agree that when the farmers prosper, merchants and business people and the workers also will prosper and there will be good times in the land.

Despite the great importance of farming and the large number of people living on the farms in the United States, there are only six or seven actual dirt farmers in the United States Congress. As a dirt farmer myself, I am privileged to represent one of the most agricultural districts in the United States. I have had this privilege now for three terms in Congress, and, of course, I am anxious to be reelected, just as well as anyone else, for another 2 years.

However, I want to point out that since there are so many bankers and lawyers in Congress, it is no wonder that it is difficult to secure passage of good farm legislation. I have noticed during my 12 years in the Minnesota State Senate and my 6 years in the United States Congress that it seems to be the custom that lawyers and bankers are placed on the Agricultural Committees. Once in a while we are able to get one or possibly two farmers and agricultural-minded Members on the committee of 21 Congressmen. When I was in the Minnesota State Senate it was my great pleasure and opportunity to secure passage of a bill reducing the contract rate of interest from 10 percent to 8 percent and to get approval of my bill reducing the penalty and interest on delinquent taxes. I also was able to get approval of a bill prohibiting the rural-credit department from taking deficiency judgment after they had foreclosed their farm, and another measure which reduced the prices of Minnesota prison-made twine and farm machinery to the farmers of Minnesota.

As a Member of Congress for the Ninth District, I have not had the honor of passing any so-called major national legislation since this honor comes to but few men and most often only the chairman of a few of the large committees. However, I have fought and voted for legislation which I believe would benefit agriculture and the farmers and the whole Nation. Of course, I have been successful in passing a large number of bills of local, district, and State nature, and I have been greatly assisted in this by the present administration's party leaders in the House with whom I have become well acquainted. Therefore, I have been able to secure successful action on matters of interest and concern to my district in a larger degree than a Congressman who might represent, for instance, the Republican Party, which is in the minority in the House of Representatives.

I have been a farmer all my life, and I think I know some of their problems, and I am sure that I can offer some constructive observations and viewpoints in the efforts which will be made from time to time to improve the present farm program. While the A. A. A. is a start toward equality for the farmer, my firm conviction is that a program calling for the cost of production is needed. I myself have introduced a bill which will give the farmer cost of production for his products. I will continue to fight for this measure and quite a number of similar bills that have also been introduced in Congress. I have supported the farm program of the present administration; however, it must be improved, but it certainly is better than the do-nothing policy of the previous Hoover administration, and it is much more satisfactory than the old Federal Farm Board set-up. As you remember, when we had 40-cent wheat and 2-cent hogs and other farm-commodity prices in about the same proportion which bankrupted millions of farmers in this Nation. Most everybody else can pass on their interest and taxes but the farmers, being at the end of the line, do not only have to pay their own taxes but pay the other fellow's as well. The only reason the farmers all have not gone broke is because they have denied themselves of most of the luxuries of life and have worked themselves as well as their wives and children without practically any return.

Some improvements have been suggested recently, and additional improvements in the present farm program will be considered and adopted from time to time. The program today is a vast improvement over the one which was adopted when I first served during the Seventy-fourth Congress in 1935 and 1936. While I am cooperating in these suggestions to improve the present legislation, my efforts and support are being directed to a cost-of-production plan. If the people elect candidates who are friendly to and will support an adequate farm program, there is some hope of getting equality for agriculture.

Furthermore, I believe, with many others, that there is a place for more actual dirt farmers in the National Congress.

I am sure the voters of my own district, and especially the farmers, will be interested in knowing how the Members voted on the measure which recently became a law which provided for appropriations for loans on wheat and other basic commodities. In like manner on legislation which would provide for parity payments on wheat and other commodities. As the figures indicate most of the Republicans in Congress opposed the $225,000,000 parity program. The record of the Democratic Party is much more favorable to the farmers' interests. In other words, the money which now goes to the farmers and a loan on the wheat is available, not because of the Republican Party and its Members in Congress, but because of the present national administration and the independent and progressive Members in Congress. The vote on March 28, 1939, for $250,000,000 to provide for parity payments was: Democrats, for, 168; Republicans, for, 20; Farmer-Labor, for, BUCKLER; and Republicans, against, 135. On May 9 of this year the vote of appropriation of $212,000,000 for parity payments was: Democrats, for, 183; Republicans, for, 22; Farmer-Labor, for, BUCKLER; and Republicans, against, 131; and when the bill was before Congress to appropriate money for loans on wheat and other commodities the Democratic and Republican vote was about the same as was the vote on parity payments. Without the appropriation there could not be any loans made on wheat, which I understand is 76 cents per bushel in Crookston.

You there have a concrete example of the deep and abiding interest the majority Republican membership of the House took upon this most vital question for the benefit of agriculture. By their votes shall ye know them.

Among other things that have been accomplished in the last few years for the farmers is lower interest rates. You will remember when we paid 6 and 7 percent on farm mortgages, and at the present time it is 3½ percent on Federal land-bank loans.

Another great accomplishment is rural electrification for the farmers of the Nation. That was only made possible through the lifetime work of Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, who has fought for public-owned light and power. Such projects as Muscle Shoals and the T. V. A. have come about through him and the assistance of the present administration. If it had not been for the T. V. A. we never would have had rural electrification, which is a godsend to the farmers. We fought to free the Negroes 75 years ago, but now we have just started to free the farmer's wife by taking from her shoulders some of the burden she has had to bear for several generations. Although so far it has not been possible to electrify every home, I hope to see the time when every farm will be served by electricity.

American Farmers Will Not Be Deceived

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER M. PIERCE

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 26, 1940

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, there has come to my desk a very remarkable postal card addressed simply, "Rural, Star, or Post Office Box Holder—Local." It is sent under the frank of our colleague from Minnesota and my personal friend, AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I do not question the right or privilege of our colleague in exercising his franking privilege, but the facts and figures set forth on the reverse side of the postal card are extracts from a speech made by our colleague entitled "American Farmers Will Not Be Deceived," delivered in the House, May 14, 1940. As I read these figures and tried to understand them I became more impressed than ever with the fact that it is very easy indeed to draw incorrect conclusions from statistics specially selected.

I agree with my friend that "American farmers will not be deceived." Every American farmer knows that times are vastly better now than they were when the Democratic Party came into power in March 1933. Wheat in my section was 25 cents a bushel; corn, 10 or 12 cents in the Middle West. I myself sold good fat cattle for a cent and a half a pound. No amount of figures selected here and there can convince the American farmer that we are not better off now under the Presidency of Roosevelt than under the reign of Hoover. Fat cattle are high—exceedingly high. Wool in the Pacific Northwest has sold this year well into 30 cents a pound. It was selling for 8 cents a pound in 1932. The wheat and corn farmers will realize two or three times as much as they would have realized had it not been for the farm program. The A. A. A. has been an outstanding success, and not a failure.

True, we have not attained parity prices, but we have made long advances in improving the situation of the farmer everywhere, from coast to coast. He has had more money for his products. He has had better working conditions. He has had credit when he needed it. He has been able to borrow money on his farm at a lower rate of interest. Yes, our colleague and friend from Minnesota is right, "The American farmers will not be deceived."

FIGURES MAY BE MISLEADING

Opponents of our national farm program charge that the program has not given farmers high enough prices and incomes. They select their own figures on imports, and with these selected figures they try to prove that the present administration during the last 7 years has harmed the farmer. Here are the facts on farm imports, on prices, and on income:

Competitive farm imports during the 7 years before 1932 averaged 37 percent more than during the last 7 years, and total farm imports averaged 61 percent more in the earlier period

	Total farm imports	Competitive farm imports
Average, 1926–32	$1,728,600,000	$769,300,000
Average, 1933–39	1,074,300,000	562,000,000

Agricultural imports now are only about half of agricultural imports during the 1920's. Competitive farm imports in 1929 were about twice as much in value as they were in 1939.

FARM PRICES IN 1939 WERE 43 PERCENT HIGHER THAN IN 1932

The year 1932 showed clearly that imports are not an important factor in farm prices. In 1932 farm imports were lower than they had been in 25 years. According to the theory of those who so bitterly oppose farm imports, 1932 should have been a boom year for farm prices. Actually farm prices in 1932 were the lowest on record. Here are some average farm prices in 1932, compared with 1939 prices, and the percentage increase:

Product	Unit	Price, crop year		Percent increase
		1932	1939
Wheat	Bushel	$0.38	$0.70	84
Corn	Bushel	.32	.54	69
Cotton	Pound	.065	.091	40
Butter	Pound	.21	.25	19
Wool	Pound	.086	.223	159
Milk	Hundredweight	1.27	1.73	36
Beef cattle	Hundredweight	4.25	7.03	65
Veal calves	Hundredweight	4.95	8.42	70
Hogs	Hundredweight	3.34	6.23	87

FARM INCOME IS APPROXIMATELY DOUBLE THAT OF 1932

In 1932 farm income was $4,682,000,000. In 1939 it was $8,540,000,000, and for 1940 it is estimated at $8,900,000,000, including Government payments. Farmers have gotten this higher farm income during the 7 years of this administration, the very years when many so-called friends of the farmer have been claiming that farmers were being severely harmed by imports.

FARM BUYING POWER IN 1939 WAS EQUAL TO THAT IN 1929 AND NEARLY THREE-FOURTHS (72 PERCENT) LARGER THAN IN 1932

With their 1939 incomes farmers could buy as many of the things they needed as they could in the boom year of 1929, and they could buy 72 percent more than they could buy with their money in 1932. This takes into consideration prices paid by farmers and their interest and taxes, as well as cash farm income.

THE AMERICAN FARMER HAS THE AMERICAN MARKET

Farmers in this country produce practically 100 percent of the corn and hogs consumed in the United States. Our dairy farmers have 99½ percent of the home market, and our beef producers have nearly 95 percent of the domestic market. Farmers live by the income they get, and this income is far more important than the insignificant imports that enter the country. For example, the increase in beef income from 1933 to 1939 was about 22 times greater than the value of all beef imports last year.

THE AMERICAN FARMER'S STAKE IN THE EXPORT MARKET IS BEING PROTECTED

Agricultural exports are, roughly, four times as important to the American farmer as agricultural imports. Last year some 7,000,000 acres would have been required if all competitive farm commodities imported into the United States had been produced in the United States. At the same time, American farmers used more than 28,000,000 acres to produce commodities for export. To sacrifice the export market in order to keep imports out of this country is like asking farmers to trade dollars for quarters. By lowering trade barriers, the reciprocal trade-agreements program has made possible exports of our farm products. In the fiscal year 1939–40 the value of farm exports was 25 percent more than in the fiscal year 1932–33. Even in the war-torn world of today our trade policy is vitally important in our relations with the other republics of the Western Hemisphere.

Behind the smoke screen of opposition to minor imports of farm products, opponents of the national farm program seek to gain farm support for high industrial tariffs by offering farmers "paper" tariffs. But farmers know that tariff protection enables industries to charge higher prices for their products, while farmers do not get such help from "paper" tariffs. It is estimated that the tariff on manufactured products costs American consumers about $3,000,000,000 annually by boosting prices. The farmer's share of that cost is at least three-quarters of a billion dollars a year. This is a major reason why farmers must have payments and the protection that they get from a national farm program.

FARMERS ARE PRODUCING ABUNDANTLY FOR AMERICA

While opponents of the farm program are attacking a few imports, most of which have been attracted into this country because of higher prices for our farm products, farmers of America have gone steadily ahead. They have adjusted their acreage and are producing abundantly and more efficiently on fewer acres than they needed before. Their soil is enriched, ready to produce more if it is needed. The ever-normal granary is bursting with supplies. As the national-defense program gets into full swing, the predominant fact is that American agriculture is better prepared than any other part of our economy.

Third Presidential Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. BAINBRIDGE COLBY

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the statement by Hon. Bainbridge Colby, Secretary of State in the administration of President Wilson, on the resolution to limit the tenure of Presidential office to a single term. The statement was made before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee yesterday.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senators, at so late a stage in your hearings it is unnecessary for me to review the origin and the unbroken maintenance throughout our history of the tradition which bars a third term to any President. This has been ably done by speakers who have preceded me.

You are versed in the history of your country, and know well that the precedent established by George Washington has been followed and strictly observed until the present time—inviolate for 143 years.

The question before you is the measure of respect due to a great historical precedent which, through this continuous and universal observance since the country's founding, has ripened into an almost hallowed tradition and acquired morally the force of a constitutional limitation and practically the validity of positive law.

I say "universal observance."

The National House of Representatives, by a practically unanimous vote, in which all party lines were submerged, is on record that in its opinion "the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States, in retiring from the Presidential office after the second term, has become by universal concurrence a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

The Senate of the United States at a subsequent date expressed itself to the same effect, while periodically both major political parties have adopted at their national conventions platform declarations expressive of the same attitude, as, for instance, the Democratic Party in 1896: "We declare it to be the unwritten law of this Republic, established by custom and usage of 100 years, and sanctioned by the examples of the greatest and wisest of those who founded and have maintained our Government, that no man should be eligible for a third term of the Presidential office."

But the weightiest contribution to the argument against a third term—greater, perhaps, the future historian will say, than Washington's refusal of a third nomination or the warnings of Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson of the danger to our freedom in prolonging the Presidential tenure beyond two terms—is the contribution made by Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

The noble integrity of Washington was unable to envisage what we are witnessing with our own eyes at the present time and realizing in our own experience. "There cannot, in my judgment," said Washington, "be the least danger that the President will by any practicable intrigue ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less perpetuate himself in it, but in the last stage of corrupted morals and political depravity."

The vigor of the tradition against a third term springs from a perception of the evils which of necessity flow from the indefinite eligibility of a President for continuing election. Jefferson was strongly of the opinion that a definite period to retention of the Presidential office was necessary to safeguard our elective form of Government; that if some period was not fixed, either by the Constitution or by practice, to the services of the President, his office, though nominally elective, would in fact be for life, and would soon degenerate into an inheritance. The absence of a fixed limitation of tenure, he feared, would undermine the security of Republican Government. In fact, Jefferson went so far as to declare that should a President consent (I might remark, in parentheses, he could not conceive of a President actually seeking continuation of himself in office)—should he "consent to be a candidate for a third election, I trust he would be rejected on this demonstration of ambitious views."

Thus reasoned Jefferson, the man who above all, in the words of President Roosevelt "at all times looked the farthest into the future, examining the ultimate effects on humanity of the actions of the present." But, as I say, President Roosevelt has himself made a very great contribution to the case against a third term. By his course as a President-candidate prior to the nominating convention at Chicago, his direction of its proceedings, and his subsequent actions as its third-term candidate, he has contributed a perfect illustration of every danger and evil which Jefferson foresaw so clearly and against which he warned his countrymen so earnestly. He has taken it upon himself to nullify the precedent of Washington and the tradition established by Jefferson, not by showing either to be wrong, but by showing that he does not care what they thought. To their anticipations of grave abuses in any departure from so sound a principle, he has replied by providing the abuses.

He has brought the question down from the broad philosophical plane on which the effect of undue retention of the presidency on the permanence of the Republic, the integrity of our elective system, and the survival of representative government was discussed by men of learning, and disinterestedness, and handed it over to the State and county chairmen of his political following to do with it as they see fit, which means, of course, as their personal interests may dictate.

Unaffected by Jefferson's expressed hope that any President who would "consent" to be a candidate for a third election would be rejected, he not only "consents," but has with unremitting and eager zeal, sought a third nomination, and now seeks a third election.

Grover Cleveland warned against the power of the patronage at a President's disposal in forcing his renomination. The President has shown what huge proportions this danger can assume, and with what far-flung effectiveness it can be employed. Cleveland also mentioned as pitfalls in the pathway of an ambitious President, "the allurements of power, the temptation to retain public place once gained, and more than all, the availability which his party finds in an incumbent, whom a horde of office holders support with a zeal born of benefits received and the hope of favors yet to come."

All these influences, magnified and swollen beyond anything that has ever been known, we now see unleashed, shamelessly pressed into service, and openly exploited, in the effort to keep a President in office for a third term. The predicted is realized. The apprehended danger has overtaken and enveloped us. No longer are the evil consequences which flow from the indeterminate eligibility of a President for reelection, hypotheses for detached discussion.

The forebodings of Washington and Jefferson and Jackson are fulfilled and justified. No longer need we consider what may happen—what is certain to happen if a President sees fit to jettison this great national tradition. We know now both what may and what will happen, because we behold what has happened. We have before us a detailed graph and working model of the third-term issue in all its grievous aspects. We can see for ourselves.

A third-term candidacy for the Presidency, with its inevitable concomitant of abused Presidential power, affronts not only the national conscience of the American people but violates a basic principle which runs throughout the body of our law. I refer to the accountability of elected officials to the people at short and recurring intervals of time. This is the means we have established to secure our citizens in the control of their government. The theory of our institutions is that the people shall always have at hand the means of terminating the occupancy of an elective office. Anything, therefore, which weakens this control confided to the people, or which disturbs, balks, or falsifies a free expression of their judgment and wishes at the polls, either in the election of candidates or in their nomination at party conventions, is a blow aimed at our democratic theory of government. Our Government is not built upon the theory that the power we vest in an elected official shall be thrown into the scales of a political contest to be exercised in his own interest or to insure his retention in office. Indefinite tenure of a public office enables the incumbent to dig in and resist dislodgment. This is something the people will not tolerate. Their right to pass judgment on an elected official is a basic right. They will not suffer it to be wrested from them or made difficult of effective exercise.

De Tocqueville in his classic work Democracy in America anticipated with clear foresight the situation which confronts us today. Said he, "A candidate who is not the President, seeking the Presidency, is but an individual, while the President seeking renomination is the state itself, intriguing and corrupting with its immense resources."

Here the present issue is stated in its full breadth.

The unceasing tendency of our political development has been to augment the power of the Presidential office. The power to influence legislation, to influence the course of judicial decision, the power of appointment to lucrative office, the unreviewable discretion in the expenditure of the public revenues, the power to initiate policy, the power to determine the great issues of peace and war, and even the future and the destinies of the Nation, are in large measure in keeping of the President.

In a republic such powers should not be lodged in any man for more than a limited and fixed period, and then only under a strict accountability to the people, at recurring and frequent intervals, for their proper use.

We have seen that a tradition, no matter how cherished by the people, or long established, will not protect them against the use by an ambitious President of the vast resources of his office to prolong his tenure of it. We have seen how a national convention can be seeded and planted in the interests of a third term, and how it can be manipulated and forced into the service of a President's ambition, no matter how vaulting, unprecedented, and fraught with danger to our liberties such ambition may be.

Liberty in America and the perpetuity of our free institutions, in the light of the developments of the current year, evidently require a greater protection than is afforded by "unwritten law" or tradition, however sacred we may hold the latter to be. The will of our people must find expression, it is now perceived, in terms of tougher fiber than a tradition.

We now have reached the time, it is apparent, when this great basic principle of limited tenure of the Presidential office must be safeguarded by an express provision in our Constitution.

We must take up the burden which we have hitherto relied upon tradition to sustain.

A 6-year term for the President, without eligibility for reelection, it seems to me, expresses the prevailing judgment of thoughtful Americans on this vastly important subject. It expresses my own deep conviction.

This is my reason for accepting your invitation to appear before this committee, and for speaking as I venture to do, in favor of the pending resolution.

Position of American Legion on National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

RESOLUTIONS OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] was compelled to leave the Chamber. At his request, I desire to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD certain resolutions of the American Legion, which are printed in the publication which I hand to the clerk.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGION ASKS STRONG DEFENSE

These were some of the precepts adopted by the Legion:

"No more costly mistake in statecraft can be made than a program which envisages initial fighting upon our continental frontiers, thus bringing a war to our own homes. What happens in such a case is all too patent in the situation of the British Isles today.

"The two great natural bulwarks of our country are the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, but their value depends upon our physical influence therein.

"We want America strong enough to meet any possible invasion before it arrives and to turn the invader back so that our homes remain intact and our families secure.

"If fighting is necessary to defend the United States, we insist upon being prepared to do the fighting outside of the United States.

"We approve the recommendation made in 1919 by the Joint Army and Navy Board and repeated in 1938 by the Naval (Hepburn) Board, 'that Guam be fortified and garrisoned adequate to its defense against any force that could be brought against it.'

"We recommend that a sound, just, and mutually satisfactory arrangement be sought for the continuance and necessary strengthening of the military and naval defenses of the United States in the Philippines, as a measure essential to the welfare of both peoples and to the preservation of stability in the Pacific.

"We reiterate our demand, as expressed in Chicago in 1939, that the Panama Canal and its approaches be forthwith made impregnable against attack by land, sea, or air.

"We reaffirm our endorsement of the Alaska International Highway and recommend other means of communication and transportation be also established.

HELP FOR BRITAIN IS URGED

"We believe that a sound national-defense policy for this country requires that we should at this time give all practicable aid to Great Britain and those alined with her in their fight for freedom.

"Personal and political influences must not be allowed to interfere with the efforts of our defense agencies to provide for the protection of the Nation.

"Warfare today, more than ever, requires vigorous trained leadership of the highest order in all branches of our armed forces. The mediocre must be removed from important positions and the incompetent eliminated. Practical intensive training alone can produce the high standard of discipline, teamwork, and technique of weapons necessary to modern war and appropriate to the high qualities of the men in service."

The Legion also voted that the selective-service bill should be extended to provide a permanent system of universal military training.

The provision for more bases was contained under a program for naval expansion in these words:

"We urge additional bases for our naval expansion, and we endorse the principle of exchange obsolete equipment for needed air and naval bases."

The resolution on the "American column" was followed by another which called for the Legion to formulate immediately "a plan which will utilize the whole strength of the American Legion for any service which we may be able to give to the constituted authorities of the Federal, State, and local Governments in exposing and combating subversive activities and that we advocate immediate adoption of a plan in all departments and posts, such a plan to become operative when it is deemed advisable to aid our constituted law-enforcement agencies upon their request."

Endorsement of Mr. Willkie's Candidacy By New York Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM BRIDGEPORT (CONN.) TIMES-STAR

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting editorial from the Times-Star of Bridgeport, Conn.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Bridgeport (Conn.) Times-Star of September 20, 1940]

THE TIMES AGAINST

The most carefully argued endorsement of Wendell Willkie for President yet to appear was in the long editorial in yesterday's New York Times. It gives four reasons.

It feels Willkie is better able to organize national defense because business health is an essential foundation, and Willkie is a professional, Roosevelt an amateur, in business.

This seems to regard government as nothing more than a big business, a view we can't share. The Presidency is not like the job of running a factory. It is a job of leading a great and multitudinous people and a difficult Congress, requiring wholly different talents and training. At the job of the Presidency, Willkie is the amateur.

The Times, sure that Willkie shares its own approval of most of Roosevelt's social program, thinks Willkie better able to carry it out.

It should be said that the Willkie who spoke at Elwood approved the Roosevelt program, and the Willkie who spoke later at Coffeyville talked the other way. It might be well, before pinning faith on Willkie of Elwood, to wait and see which is the real and final Willkie.

Further, the Times sees the Roosevelt financial course as perilous. If feels that Roosevelt can't change it and adds that it will be "desperately hard" for anybody else to manage and control, though it might be well to let Willkie try it. So that point seems to answer itself.

Lastly, the Times fears the third term because less scrupulous men in Europe have rooted themselves in power by the idea that they and they only are fit to rule.

The sting of that seems to be drawn because the unscrupulous men of Europe fortified the theory of indispensability with secret police and spies, concentration camps, ballot-box stuffing, and terror which Roosevelt hasn't tried, doesn't seem to want to try, and couldn't get away with if he did try. We think this can safely be left to the people. If they don't fear it, it will be because they feel confident of their power to take away power when they choose.

Nonetheless, these are all substantial if not new reasons for being against Roosevelt—better reasons for being against Roosevelt than for being for Willkie.

Perhaps it would have been clearer if the Times had merely said, "We are against Roosevelt for these four solid reasons and that makes it necessary for us to be for Willkie because there isn't any other place for people who are against Roosevelt to go."

This is obviously a choice of the lesser evil for the Times, knowing all about Roosevelt, seems not to know any more than anybody else about Willkie, which as yet isn't much. It is a pessimistic choice and puts it up to Willkie to give his supporters in the coming weeks positive reasons for being for him, which we hope he will do.

The Drift Toward War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. DANAHER
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an interesting, timely and valuable address delivered last night on a coast-to-coast broadcast by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who still retaining his Army commission, and regularly participating in training maneuvers, has a rare insight into the factors in The Drift Toward War.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

All Americans are horrified at the savage news from abroad. The slaughter of innocents, the destruction of everything that makes civilization possible, the maiming of bodies, and the shattering of the human spirit are terrible beyond description. Frightful as these things are, in and of themselves, they become desperate when we realize that the motive for this holocaust is to establish an order which denies the dignity of the individual man, and thereby contradicts the chief purpose and aim of the American dream.

These great changes in Europe will surely affect our economic system, causing dislocation and unemployment. Moreover, we have not the right to assume that they do not actually threaten our vital safety. We hope that they will not. But we must be ready for the worst, and then if the worst does not happen we can return to more normal ways.

What must we do to be ready for the worst? We must first, I think, have clearly in mind that our real duty, as Americans, is to America. As American citizens we can have no other duty, we must be single-mindedly devoted to that duty, and we cannot have our loyalties divided by our strong personal sympathy for those brave men and women abroad who fight for their freedom. Our duty is to keep the United States out of this terrible war insofar as this lies within our power.

Broadly speaking, there are two ways in which we can get into war. One way is for a foreign nation to provoke us so that we have to fight. The other way is for us to provoke a foreign nation so that they have to fight. The best way to avoid involvement in war by the first method is to be so manifestly strong that no foreign nation will dare to molest us. Force is the only universally understood language in the world today. For this reason—and for this reason only—I favor building up our Army and Navy, and building them promptly—to a point which will make any foreign attack on the United States obviously and utterly hopeless.

Have we such an army and navy today? We have not. It was recently testified that we only had enough equipment to put an army of 75,000 men into the field completely equipped, and that it will not be until a year from next January that we shall have enough equipment for an army of 750,000—a figure only slightly in excess of the total of the late Belgian Army. It is stated officially that in the light of the European battle experience all of our airplanes were obsolete. It is not disputed that we have only one navy, and that it will take between 6 and 7 years to develop a so-called two-ocean navy. And the one navy which we now have must use the Panama Canal to move from ocean to ocean, and it is an utter impossibility to give that Canal 100 percent protection. Moreover, it will take 6 years to finish the double sets of locks at Panama, which will greatly increase its safety.

This is not a pretty picture, but it is a truthful one—which is not obscured by the fact that frantic and praiseworthy efforts are now being made to remedy the shortages. It is, moreover, hard to understand how we could arrive at this point in our destiny so woefully unprepared when we look at the warnings of the past few years. In the fall of 1938, for example, it was clear to all observers that the spectre of war, raging and terrible, was again at large in the world. But we did not heed it. I wonder why not? It was surely not due to a desire for economy. We were lavishing billions on all kinds of luxury projects. Even in the case of our military appropriation a large part of the funds went to caretaking and housekeeping and other noncombatant purposes. It is astounding to note that we spent a larger proportion of Federal funds on national defense in the fiscal year 1929 than we have in any subsequent year. Seventeen and seven-tenths percent of our Federal expenses went to national defense in that year, as compared with 11.2 percent in the year 1939. Even more astounding is the fact that in spite of threats abroad, we spent a smaller part of our Federal funds on national defense in 1939 than we did in 1938. I do not try to give the reason for this negligence. The stark fact remains that we are not prepared today to avoid the danger of war by being so strong that no one will dare to provoke us.

What has been our record since these first awful warnings of war became so glitteringly clear 2 years ago? Unfortunately, our record has been a wavering and a contradictory one, a record of bluster, a record of threats which we could not enforce. We apparently assumed that because we had more millionaires and skyscrapers and radios and sedans than any other country, we were therefore a great nation in a military sense. Of course, the dictators were not fooled. They considered us a puny nation from a military standpoint and ignored our threats.

It is a record which shows that we have not been clear in our own minds. We first enacted a law placing an embargo on the sale of arms to all belligerents. Then the very advocates of this scheme repealed it.

It is a record which extended understandable sympathy to the Allies at the same time that the extension of economic advantages to Russia proceeded apace.

We seem to have had every kind of a policy except a consistent policy of preparedness for America first. Of course, some will look at the great effort now being made to arm America and will conclude that we have learned our lesson, and that we are now united on our goal.

But the record of the years certainly holds no ground for the belief that these efforts are more than appropriations of funds and encouraging beginnings. Mr. William S. Knudsen, of the Defense Commission, who is surely a competent witness, says we will not have equipment for 2,000,000 men before the end of 1943. Senator BYRD, a most accurate man, says that the Army and Navy tell him that since May 1 of this year only 99 planes have been ordered by the Army and 244 by the Navy. We have words and inspection trips and publicity, but we do not see any new guns or planes or tanks. There is more talk about the ships and guns we are sending away than about those we are getting.

Moreover, we are still in the grip of misleading ideas.

What are some of these ideas?

We are told that the United States should actively take sides in this war because otherwise the United States will be alone. The word "alone" is uttered with a horrifying undertone. Yet is it not obvious that every nation is alone, that we have been alone for most of our history, and that it is far better to be alone than it is to have one's fate bound up with that of nations less fortunately situated?

We are told that our ships and our guns, if not actually our men, should take their place in the European struggle, and this statement is made on the grounds that to do so will keep the war away from the United States. This is a very dangerous hallucination. The same logic which says that our ships should be in European waters in order to keep the enemy away impels one to the further contention that it would be even better to have had our troops in the heart of Europe, which is at an even greater distance from our shores. Anyone with military experience knows that the question of where to place your outposts is a question of judgment—that they can be placed too close to your main body, and that they can be placed too far away. If your outposts are placed too far away, you get into needless fights which you often cannot win.

Is not the question of sending military equipment abroad an entirely military question, provided, of course, that we all agree that our first duty is to the United States? The decision as to where our outposts should be placed is a military decision, and so is the decision as to what the chance is that American equipment will be used by some hostile power against Americans.

I call attention also to the tendency to create fear and hysteria. I know that there are those who say that only by frightening people can we obtain preparedness. I cannot hold such a low estimate of the intelligence of the people. I think we can be alert without being alarmed.

Finally, we see a lack of frankness and a lack of candor in our official attitude toward the issue of war and peace. Policies which are universally popular are tied up with policies which are very debatable in order to pull us along. The law keeping American ships out of the war zone—a very popular measure—was tied up with the repeal of the arms embargo, and you could not separate the two. The acquisition of naval bases—a popular measure—was coupled with the sending of part of our fleet to the war zone.

An example of this lack of frankness is the so-called destroyer trade. It so happens that I was the first to introduce legislation, with my colleague Senator MCNARY, for acquisition of naval bases in this hemisphere. I favored outright American ownership and not a lease and a sharing of sovereignty—and consequent sharing of trouble—with some other power. We now have these bases on a lease in exchange for which we have agreed to send 50 destroyers abroad. This is the same as saying that we agreed to send a part of our Navy. Let us call things by their true names.

I ask you to consider some of the consequences of this act. First, we deplete our own admittedly inadequate one-ocean Navy.

It is said that we were not using these ships. I point out that we are not using the Army and Navy. We hope never to use them. We have them so that we shall not have to use them.

It is said that these ships were obsolete. I submit that they are not obsolete for the training of men in all the arts of seamanship, navigation, gunnery, and engineering. We do not know how many officers and men are being deprived of important training because of the loss of these destroyers, but there must be many. And in active battle service in the fleet they are far better than no ships at all.

A short while ago, as a Reserve Officer, I served a tour in a company of tanks. Some of these vehicles were obsolete. But men could be taught driving, repairing, tactics, gunnery, and signal communication in these tanks. And these tanks are better than no tanks at all.

Moreover, our 400 tanks here are worth more than 400 tanks in the Battle of Flanders. In that battle 400 tanks were destroyed in a day. They can be used over and over here to train separate sets of men.

I urge that our weapons be kept for our own defense. That is my personal plea. I submit further, however, that if weapons are to be sent abroad, it should be done in the open, after debate, with public participation by consent of Congress. If we really want to send weapons abroad, let us do it wholeheartedly and consciously—not slip sideways into the chasm.

Of course this is not the only aspect of the matter which should have been submitted to Congress. The sending of destroyers makes us a partner in the hostilities. Whether or not you agree with this, should not the people have a say in so vital a matter?

It makes the American people a partner in the enforcement of the blockade. Whether or not you agree with this, should not the people have a say in so vital a matter?

I submit not only that they should have a say but that we should know what more weapons of ours it is planned to send. With rumors current that two-thirds of our aircraft production is going abroad, the time has come for us to settle this question. Either we want to train American boys to fly military planes or we do not. If we do, the planes must be here.

We also hear of a plan to send 32 of our 4-engined bombers—the so-called flying fortress—abroad. We have 46 of these planes. No one has ever suggested that these ships were obsolete. They are so modern and up to date as to be almost unique. European nations, having to fight in congested areas, have not set so much store by the long-range plane as we have who are situated between two vast oceans. We must, of course, look toward Europe, but we must also look toward the Pacific and toward the Caribbean. These are areas in which long-range planes are of the utmost value.

I pass over the fact that we do not allow a man to fly one of these planes until he has been flying for 4 years. If these ships were sent abroad, they would almost inevitably be flown by inexperienced crews with a consequently greater risk of destruction or of falling into enemy hands. Very few pilots in Europe have flown a four-engined ship, or have had experience as a member of a crew of a four-engined ship. It is a very complex job and we cannot train men in the operation of these ships unless we have the ships. We ought to have a thousand of them; we only have forty-six. It would, indeed, be deplorable if we found ourselves left with only fourteen.

Nor should we forget that these planes cost about one-quarter of a million dollars and that when production really gets under way the time required to manufacture a flying fortress will be at least 1 year.

Moreover, the papers are full of stories that another deal is contemplated whereby our Navy is to be given the use of foreign naval bases in the extreme Far East. Singapore in Malaya and a port in Borneo are mentioned. Every high-school student knows that a base in the American hemisphere is one thing and a base on the opposite side of the globe is another. This would be a grievous, dangerous step toward trouble.

When matters of this kind, any one of which would be a major congressional issue in ordinary times, are settled secretly by the Executive, it is small wonder that American citizens ask themselves, "If the Executive can do these things without action by Congress, can he not also declare war without Congress?"

In conclusion I say: America faces certain dangers. America faces the danger of entering this terrible war because we are so weak that some nation will provoke us. The remedy for this is preparedness. America faces the danger of entering the war because we provoke some other nation. The remedy for this is national self-control and a leadership which thinks first of America always. America faces the third danger that if we should enter a war that we should not be successful, and then everything we prize would be destroyed. My fellow citizens, woefully unprepared America is in peril of entering this war—a war which would destroy this Republic as we have always known it. The dreadful drift is on, moving steadily and stealthily like a thick, dank mist across our consciousness. By preparing America, by being single minded in our allegiance to America, we can stop this fatalistic assumption that we are sure to get in. We need not get in. We must not get in. Let us stop this drift toward war.

Abuses on the Part of Certain Public Utility Companies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 26 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

LETTER FROM HON. HOMER T. BONE, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter addressed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] to friends in his own State and elsewhere dealing with abuses on the part of certain public-utility companies.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LETTER NO. 6 ON INITIATIVE 139

UNITED STATES SENATE.

DEAR FRIEND: Prison cells will house three officials of the Union Electric Co. of Missouri because they spent $525,000 to control elections and to corrupt public officials, and then lied about it on the witness stand.

"Since the * * * whisky ring fraud cases * * * there has never been anything that I know of in this court * * * that revealed the shocking, sordid details of official corruption * * * shown in this case," commented United States Judge Moore.

Such an experience may well serve as warning to power-company officers in other States, including our own.

Tactics of the companies in their attempt to put over initiative 139 by using fake committees and by lies and deceit, are reminiscent of power-company fakes and frauds uncovered in our State in previous years by Government agents. United States investigators again are quietly at work in Washington State to uncover power-trust abuses.

Cleverly, the companies have concealed the poison in No. 139 by drafting it to appear a simple measure to enable people to vote on bond issues. However, New York's Journal of Commerce reveals the purpose of No. 139 as utility men see it. This financial paper says in an article August 28:

"The proposed law lessens the bargaining position of the districts, and besides makes it extremely unlikely that a huge revenue bond issue would be approved in a public referendum * * *. Consequently utility observers are keenly interested in the decision of the Washington voters this fall inasmuch as approval of the amendment would be another strong indication—the third this year—of a swing away from public-ownership sentiment."

In other words, initiative 139 was deliberately designed to kill public ownership of electric utilities. It is directed against P. U. D.'s now, but later would be amended to cripple city systems also.

Tell power companies by your vote against this deceptive bill that you object to fakes and frauds, and that you want lower rates. Customers of private companies in our State paid $12,548,000 more for electricity in 1938 than they would have paid at Tacoma rates. Let's get rates down to the real cost of generating and distributing current. We want more rate cuts such as have been forced from our private companies, amounting to $12,000,000 in the last 5 years.

Private power companies say they are superefficient. If so, the Wall Street holding companies that run our plants ought at least to match Tacoma's low rates. I hope they can and will match them. But thus far, even with recent loudly proclaimed rate cuts, they don't come within cannon range of Tacoma or Bonneville rates.

"But," say the companies—and how often you've heard this—"we pay taxes and Tacoma light system does not." That plaintive wail is just more power company bunk. The fact is Tacoma light system pays about the same percentage of its gross revenue in taxes, free service, and cash contributions, as do private power companies in our State.

Just how much tribute the public pays for the dubious privilege of buying electricity from a private company instead of from a public plant is illustrated in a "tale of two cities," Alder and Elbe, in Pierce County. These towns are 6 miles apart. Alder residents buy public "juice," Elbe residents buy private "juice." * * * And Elbe people pay twice as much as those at Alder for the same amount of electricity.

Recent experience in public-utility districts proves they can and will reduce rates. On May 27, the Aberdeen World announced that Grays Harbor P. U. D. had ordered rates cut $150,000 a year beginning July 1. Residential rates were cut 22 percent, industrial rates 11 percent, city and school rates 25 percent. On May 24, Skamania County Pioneer announced a slash in power rates for that county as the result of P. U. D. action. Pacific County P. U. D. reduced electric rates 21 to 44 percent October 1.

Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes, when Governor of New York, urged that water-power rights be "preserved and held for the benefit of all the people, and should not be surrendered to private interests."

Safeguard your rights and your pocketbooks as Mr. Hughes urges. Vote "No" on No. 139 and if you have time, let me hear from you.

Yours sincerely,

HOMER T. BONE.

This letter has been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Seventy-sixth Congress, and is a part thereof.

Division in the Moment of Danger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 26, 1940

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, whatever may be said about the precedent-shattering effort of the President of the United States to win a third consecutive term, one thing is certain. His candidacy is dividing this Nation as it has rarely been divided before. Bitterness bordering on hatred, already encouraged by 8 years of class conflict under New Deal auspices, has reached its climax in the campaign now under way.

This is the moment when the New Deal is shouting from the housetops that America is in danger. This is the moment when the New Deal demands complete unity of action and unanimity of purpose. Yet, in spite of the talk, this same New Deal leadership is prompting the most vicious disunion in the history of our Nation. It is all the more vicious because it is so unnecessary.

We agree that our Nation must rearm for defense purposes. We agree that to achieve this rearmament, our people must be a house united. The President of the United States by his overambitious personal aspirations has given us instead a house divided.

How can we reconcile these contradictions? On the one side stand the new dealers, disrupting the Nation over an issue which should never have been permitted to creep into our midst. On the other side they stand proclaiming their desire for the perfect harmony which they have themselves destroyed. It is one more proof that our national administration constantly conceals from its left hand what its right hand doeth.

To achieve their purposes, the New Deal party is willing to create mass hysteria, to stimulate class hatred, to use the political machines which they have publicly denounced as corrupt and unworthy.

It is all part and parcel of the New Deal philosophy, a philosophy which regards the end as justifying every possible means. Confident that the Great Man knows best what is good for the American people, the New Deal is willing to sacrifice any and every American tradition which gets in its way.

The third-term tradition is dismissed. The traditional division of powers among executive, legislative, and judicial branches of our Government is brushed aside. The doctrine that our people have the right, freely and openly, to choose their own Representatives in Congress is attacked through a purge technique.

Each of these assaults upon American life is justified carefully. The European dictators, too, justified their assaults upon human liberty. They too explained every encroachment upon human rights to their own complete satisfaction. They found these things necessary. Emergency conditions, critical times, self-defense, these were their excuses.

We remain unconvinced. The New Deal has adopted ways of doing things totally alien to the American system. The people of this country must rouse themselves from their slumber to rout the forces leading us off the path of human liberty.

Our Country Is Not a One-Man Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 26, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. PHILIP PITT CAMPBELL

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. Philip Pitt Campbell delivered at Washington, Pa., on September 18, 1940:

Americans: I speak to you as patriots—not as partisans.

Our country never was and is not now a one-man country. Our Government was created a republic with three independent branches. It is now a bureaucracy under the control of the Executive.

I paraphrase from an immortal speech.

We are now engaged in a great political contest to determine whether or not we shall restore the Republic, and return the Constitution with its guaranties of a government by an independent Congress, an independent Executive, and an independent Supreme Court, guaranteeing personal security to every citizen, high and low, rich and poor, the right to each, in his own way, without a bureaucratic boss, to pursue his own happiness. The freedom and future welfare of 130,000,000 people and their descendants, for generations, are dependent upon the decision reached in this political contest.

The Republican Convention at Philadelphia was a deliberative convention. It had no bosses. The convention responded to the wishes of the people, and nominated Wendell Willkie for President.

The New Deal party, the holding party for the Democratic Party, held its one-man convention in Chicago. The will of its boss was obeyed. His henchmen, Hague, Kelly, Nash, and Hopkins, all of odious stench, carried out the details that were carefully prepared in advance—far in advance.

Many eligible members of the Democratic Party thought they had a right to offer themselves as candidates for the nomination at, what they thought, was their party's convention in Chicago last July. Every man, as his name was suggested, was turned down by the boss.

GARNER, of long public service and great ability, was turned down by the boss. Hull, another Democrat of long and conspicuous public service, in every way eligible for the nomination, was turned down by the boss. McNutt, a man of splendid ability and conspicuous qualifications, was turned down by the boss. Farley, who had hewn the wood and drawn the water for the Democratic Party through national campaigns and, in every way, qualified for the nomination of his party for the Presidency, was turned down by the boss.

You will recall this was all done before the convention met. No member of the Democratic Party, now a subsidiary of the New Deal party, for a reason of his own, met the approval of the boss. No man mentioned was fit, either for the nomination or for the Presidency, according to the whim of the boss.

That left the New Deal boss in the hands of his henchmen and obedient Cabinet officers, who had been crossing the country, fretting the air with appeals for the necessity of shattering the traditions of a century and a half by nominating the boss—Roosevelt for President for a third term. The boss was nominated.

That formality having been carried out, the boss nominated his running mate over the groans of a paralyzed majority of the convention.

Willkie and MCNARY were nominated by a free convention. Roosevelt and Wallace were nominated by a convention bossed by one man to the same effect as Stalin or Mussolini or Hitler boss conventions and elections in Russia, Italy, and Germany.

The campaign, to make a choice between candidates so nominated has just started.

The nomination of Willkie and McNARY has been accepted by the people and press of the country with much enthusiasm. A woman in Virginia, with a delightfully mellow southern accent, whose ancestors have voted the Democratic ticket ever since the party was organized by Thomas Jefferson, said: "I certainly believe that Mr. Willkie's nomination was in answer to prayer."

Many Democratic newspapers of long standing and great influence, among them one that has supported, with regularity, every Democratic candidate for President of the United States for the last 100 years, have announced their determination to support Willkie and McNARY for President and Vice President of the United States on the Republican ticket.

Each of these Democratic newspapers has given its reasons for supporting Willkie, the Republican nominee, as against Roosevelt, the nominee of the new dealers in the Chicago convention for a third term.

Some of the reasons given by these newspapers for supporting Willkie are:

The defaults, deceptions, maladministrations, frauds, waste of revenues and borrowed money, the increase in the national debt, the violations of the Constitution and the traditions of 150 years, breaking the promises made in the platform of 1932 by the New Deal President.

These Democratic newspapers charge that the New Deal was guilty of trying one foolish experiment after another at the expense of industry and agriculture.

They charge the losing of the cotton market that had been available to the cotton planters of the United States from colonial days down to the date that the New Deal was inaugurated.

They charge the bartering away of the foreign markets for the grain and meat products of the American farmer.

They refer to the hostility that Roosevelt has shown for business and businessmen during the 7½ years he has been President.

All the charges made by these Democratic papers are known to be true. They are of the gravest character. They impose a solemn duty on all the people to look through the smoke screen that has been artfully thrown to conceal them.

The New Deal has substituted public relief for private employment as a means of individual subsistence. This policy of the New Deal is destroying the self-reliance of the individual. It is deadening individual ambition and blighting the spirit of individual hope. This is one of the sure ways to pave the road to a one-man government.

The New Deal has spent and wasted much of the savings of the past and has mortgaged the earnings of many generations of Americans in the future. This is another way to pave the road to dictatorship.

Roosevelt and his henchmen continue to fan the flames of class hatred among the citizenship of the United States. This is another way to prepare the road to dictatorship.

The New Deal is pampering failure and penalizing success. This also prepares the way to a benevolent dictatorship.

The New Deal has already rated our country as a one-man country, and is offering that one man as its candidate, for a third term, as President of the United States. That is a long step in the direction of an absolute dictatorship.

If Roosevelt can nominate himself for a third term, he will have a weaker America to oppose him for a fourth and fifth and sixth term. Then he can say to weaklings the New Deal has made of strong American citizens, "Why all this silly trouble about elections? I now proclaim a Roosevelt dynasty." Jimmie or Elliott heirs.

Our people, with rare exceptions, have been taught the value of a dollar. From their youth up they have been taught to earn or produce something for themselves. As a rule the young men and young women of our country, rich and poor, have had the aspiration to do something for themselves. They know the conditions of American life. They know that debts must be paid; they know that interest reduces the amount available to the family for other expenses.

A reckless spendthrift is a rare exception in our country. Only a few have had the habits of a spendthrift in youth and young manhood or have lived on an income from a spendthrift's trust. Men so pampered do not know either the habits or the aspirations or hopes or fears of the average citizen of the United States. The cases are rare where a man has a maternal table spread before him all the days of his life.

The people of our country have always wanted the right to earn their own way. They do not want our industrial depression made permanent and appropriations made annually for their relief.

Wendell Willkie, the nominee of the Philadelphia convention for President, knows the way the average American makes a living. He has had to earn every dollar he has spent or saved. He earned the price of his own education.

He perfected himself in the law. He acquired a knowledge of economics and business management. He studied and majored in the political history and experience of mankind. He did all this on his own initiative and at his own expense.

He made an outstanding success in his profession as a lawyer. His ability in business management was such that a board of directors, confronted with a most difficult problem in business management, selected him to work out their problem for them. Willkie succeeded.

During his life he has dealt with every problem that has confronted him without endeavoring to distort the facts that were in the problem. He knows the truth when he sees it. In dealing with the public he has told the truth. He has not indulged in deception or demagogy. He has dealt with the law as a science that protects the rights and redresses the wrongs of persons.

He knows our domestic and foreign problems. He will deal with both as he has dealt with the affairs of the business enterprises of his clients and employers. He has shown his ability and honesty in the conduct of everything he has undertaken in the past. Willkie has mastered all his problems.

He has enlightened the minds, awakened the consciences, and refreshed the souls of the American people by the courage and clarity of his statements with respect to current questions, at home and abroad, that are of great moment to the people of the country.

When he had an offer of support from a man who is reputed to have great influence over a minority group, Willkie said, "I do not want his support. I am not interested in the support of any man who is associated with or entertains the beliefs that I understand this man entertains."

Willkie has the kind of cerebral and abdominal equipment that will be required in the next President of the United States. He will be confronted with problems that require both ability and courage of conviction.

No doubt, you have either heard or read the political speech of Candidate Roosevelt to the Teamsters' Union in Washington. If you have, you will recall that he related the fiction, for the nine hundred and ninety-ninth time, that on March 4, 1933, the New Deal led the forgotten man into the more abundant life. He endeavored to leave the impression with the teamsters that all that has been done to advance the welfare of those who earn their living by their own efforts in the United States has been done since the 4th of March, 1933.

Candidate Roosevelt cannot be ignorant of what has been done for every branch of American labor by intelligent and aggressive labor leaders: Martin Irons, Terrence V. Powderly, Sam Gompers, John Mitchell, William Green, J. L. Lewis, and many others, who, for more than half a century, have successfully represented the aspirations of every branch of labor in America. These great labor leaders did not fail in their efforts to advance the cause of those for whom they spoke. They had the cooperation, in all their efforts, of executives and legislators in the States and in Washington through all those years. Volumes of laws were enacted for the benefit of labor before March 4, 1933. Candidate Roosevelt must know this, but assumed he could deceive the teamsters.

He omitted to tell, however, that since March 4, 1933, American labor has suffered the disasters of more strikes than in any other like period in the history of the country, from which laborers have suffered along with their employers.

He did not tell of the many different varieties of New Deal crises and emergencies that have followed each other in rapid succession since March 4, 1933. He did not tell of his annual demands for increased appropriations for relief for every year since March 4, 1933. He merely admitted that after 7½ years of the New Deal, millions are still out of employment. He did not answer the indictment of the Roosevelt administration that John L. Lewis made before the mine workers, January 24, 1940. I quote the indictment:

"As the current year opens, the Democratic Party is in default to the American people. After 7 years of power, it finds itself without solution for the major questions of unemployment, low national income, mounting internal debt, increasing direct and consumer taxation, and restricted foreign markets. There still exists the same national unhappiness that it faced 7 years ago. Labor and the people are losing confidence. They fear for the future, and rightly so." John L. Lewis speaking.

The issue in the campaign of 1932 was 10,000,000 unemployed. Ten millions are out of work in the campaign of 1940.

Roosevelt did not tell the Teamsters' Union and the radio audience that was listening to his political speech that he had asked and that Congress made the relief appropriation for the current year available for spending prior to the 5th day of November 1940. It makes a sizable campaign fund.

He did not tell the millions that are idle and those that have work that he has saddled their children, for generations that are not yet born, with a burden of debt they will be groaning under when they are reading the miserable history that is recorded of the New Deal period.

Roosevelt speaks of the beginning of the New Deal as Stalin speaks of the beginning of bolshevism, as Mussolini speaks of the beginning of fascism, as Hitler speaks of the beginning of nazi-ism. All of them make the date of their assumption of dictatorial power the date they think should be the year 1.

The fact that the boss of the New Deal stresses so much the date of his inauguration makes it the more important for the rest of the American people to recall July 4, 1776, and September 17, 1787, the dates upon which the American people declared their independence and made a fight for freedom, and on which the Constitution of the United States was adopted.

It was on those dates that the greatest advance for the well-being, comfort, and happiness of mankind began. It was on those dates that men and women assumed personal responsibility for every obligation in life. They took inspiration and hope from the guaranties of the Constitution. Citizens became masters of their Government; they were not mastered by it. They supported the Government; they did not ask the Government to support them. They grew strong by the assumption of personal responsibilities to themselves, to their families, to their country, and to God.

They developed the arts and sciences. They entered new frontiers that were not on the map. They created new opportunities and started new industries. They made the impossible possible, they made the impracticable practicable. They made dreams come true. They initiated conversation between their homes and their places of business. They made their voices heard across continents and over the seas. They made is possible for song and speech, originating in centers of art and learning, to be heard in the remotest places of the earth.

They created luxuries that became necessities. They made instruments that relieved labor of its drudgery. They struck the word "toil" from the American editions of the dictionaries. They shortened the hours of labor. They lengthened the span of human life. They made living better and more comfortable. They made and wore better clothing. They provided and ate better food. They built and lived in better houses. They revolutionized local and long-distance transportation. They made new and profitable employment for millions of men and women and provided profitable investment for billions of capital. They created the billions of new wealth that the New Deal has been wantonly squandering.

These achievements were carried on from generation to generation. They included every phase of American life—the farmers and the laborers in every branch of industry. They increased the products of labor. The hope of personal reward for personal effort, under the guaranties of the Constitution, inspired the ambition of millions who participated in raising the scale of wages and the standards of life to the high plane upon which the people of the United States have, for more than three-quarters of a century, lead the rest of the world.

It may seem strange to you, but all this was before the 4th of March 1933, the date on which Candidate Roosevelt, the head and boss of the New Deal, threw the Constitution of the United States, together with the Democratic platform of 1932, into the trash can.

Since March 4, 1933, new enterprise, new investments, new inventions, new employment, new opportunities for labor have been waiting for the end of the New Deal. The betrayal of the Democratic Party by the flagrant violations of pledges solemnly made in its platform of 1932, and adopted 100 percent by Roosevelt when he flew to Chicago and accepted the nomination, and the contempt of Roosevelt and other New Dealers for the Constitution of the United States, so astounded the country that the people have feared to undertake anything new in which capital could employ labor. So 10,000,000 are out of employment during the campaign of 1940.

The great problem that confronts the American people in this campaign is the problem of restoring the rights and opportunities guaranteed by the Constitution to the citizens of the United States, and of passing these rights and opportunities on to posterity.

We must, in this campaign, restore the Republic, with the Constitution, and all its guaranties. We must pass the Republic on to future generations scarred, to be sure, by the alien political and economic philosophies that were foisted upon it by the New Deal, together with the burden of debt that the New Deal laid upon it. It is the last hope of those who love liberty.

Under Wendell Willkie's leadership, as President of the United States, the country will be taken out of a New Deal receivership and the people will again take up active life as a free people. They will create new opportunities. Labor and capital are beckoning from over the horizon beyond the November election. They are ready to go—they are waiting for the green light.

New frontiers are awaiting in the creative arts and sciences, in architecture, in building, in chemistry, in the creation of new products, in the distribution of all products from points of production to places of consumption. The country is anxiously awaiting the solution of the problem of profitable production and distribution of the products of agriculture and industry, so that no one, anywhere, need fail to secure an abundance of the necessities and comforts of life.

Opportunities to serve mankind are boundless in all these fields, and merely await the removal of the dead hand of the New Deal that has been holding back private enterprise for more than 7 years. On November 5, let us hope that Willkie will loose that hold on labor and capital that is deadening private enterprise.

I repeat, this has not been and is not now a one-man country. The welfare of one hundred and thirty millions of American people require that it shall no longer tolerate a one-man government.

Let it not be said of us that we have been beguiled by empty promises, eloquently crooned to us through the air, of better ways of life than the fathers ordained and established for themselves and their posterity.

We have a debt to our ancestors. We must pay it. We have a duty to posterity. We must perform it. We must meet both obligations on November 5, the last day of a campaign for a restoration of the Republic and of the American way of life.

Our ancestors gave their treasure and the best blood of every generation for more than a century and a half for the liberties and opportunities they bequeathed to us.

Millions of helpless little ones and countless millions yet unborn appeal to us to bequeath to them the liberties and opportunities our ancestors bequeathed to us.

We must not default in the debt to our ancestors and we shall not fail in our duty to our posterity.

"Our father's God, to Thee,
Author of liberty,
To Thee I sing.
Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light.
Protect us by Thy might Great God our King."

What Washington Would Say Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

ARTICLE BY GEORGE E. SULLIVAN

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Mr. George E. Sullivan entitled "What Washington Would Say Today":

WHAT WASHINGTON WOULD SAY TODAY

(By George E. Sullivan, member of the bar of the District of Columbia)

It is my firm conviction that, if George Washington—the Father of his Country, and the wisest and truest friend of mankind to come upon this earth since the Divine Saviour—were able to speak to us today, he would say substantially as follows:

Friends and fellow citizens, the period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the office being coveted by one seeking a third term in violation of American tradition, and who deems himself so indispensable that he actually assumes an attitude of generous self-sacrifice in being a candidate, the counsels of one who has been respected as the Father of the Republic may not be unwelcome at this time.

1. Clinton Roosevelt: A century ago, in 1841, a much earlier Roosevelt—Clinton Roosevelt—sought to impose upon the American people the old deception of collectivism, as a substitute for this Republic. His book, the Science of Government, published in 1841, embodying his deceptive propaganda, is in the Library of Congress (JK 216 R. 78, Rare Book section). Although loaded with professions of purpose to promote "the general good," the book boldly advocates regimenting workers generally (both factory and farm) like "soldiers in an army." Your forefathers were too wise to surrender constitutional American liberty at the behest of this earlier Roosevelt, whose work antedated Karl Marx's by 7 years. They were unwilling to give away their birthright for either a mess of pottage or collectivistic slavery of any brand. They knew the collectivistic idea had received thorough trials in the early 1600's in the Virginia colony and in the Plymouth colony of Massachusetts, under the most favorable conditions, yet destroying initiative and thrift, converting such colonies, respectively, into half military camp and half penal colony, and making abandonment of collectivism imperative to keep the settlers from starving to death. Your forefathers also knew that the settlers always referred to that period as the "years of slavery."

2. Franklin D. Roosevelt: Less than a century after such unsuccessful attempt of Clinton Roosevelt, another Roosevelt, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, is found to be extensively and persistently engaged in imposing upon you a creeping collectivism, as an experiment to create a supposedly better social order for your general welfare. His so-called New Deal is far from new, and bears a strong resemblance to Marxian sabotage, some features of which so recently, under Blum, undermined France, and made her an easy victim of Hitler. Roosevelt's persistent opposition to balancing the Budget is steadily producing ultimate bankruptcy, in strange accord with the diabolical advice of Lenin and Stalin to cause "practical bankruptcy" to make a victim nation "fully ripe" for Communist take-over. (Foundations of Leninism, by Stalin, p. 95.) Mr. Roosevelt has arrogantly belittled your Constitution as a product of "horse and buggy" days. His flagrant contempt for the salutary warning of the Father of his Country, "Let there be no change by usurpation," is quite obvious. He has brazenly urged Members of the House of Representatives not to "permit doubts as to constitutionality, however reasonable" to block legislation sought by him (vol. 79, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 14363). He has created a veritable labyrinth of bureaucracies, and is constantly gathering to himself new powers. He has even boasted about the building up of "new instruments of public power," which in other hands could "provide shackles for the liberties of the people." You are thus, in effect, warned that his continuance in office may be essential to protect you against shackles which are ready and waiting. The idea of a return to fundamental Americanism, and eliminating altogether all illegal instruments of power capable of providing shackles, does not appear to have occurred to the person chiefly responsible for such "instruments," and who is willing to violate the Republic's tradition against a third term for President. If your forefathers had the good sense to refuse to surrender constitutional American liberty at the behest of Clinton Roosevelt, why should you not right now call a halt upon your surrender of it at the behest of Franklin Delano Roosevelt?

3. Henry A. Wallace: Mr. Roosevelt's running mate on his third-term ticket is none other than that well-known apostle of scarcity, his former Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace. In 1936, Mr. Wallace was the author of a book Whose Constitution? which leaves no doubt about his perfect harmony with the head of the ticket in the collectivist field, and also in resenting the checks and balances in your Constitution. Consequently, he would appear to be no more qualified to take an oath to support your Constitution than the head of the ticket.

4. Defeat Roosevelt-Wallace: No greater service can be rendered this Republic, and perhaps to civilized society, than the crushing defeat of the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket. Let no Senator or Congressman who so far betrays this Republic as to support said ticket be ever entrusted again with public office. Every community should see to it that no one is chosen for the Electoral College who will under any circumstances vote for the Roosevelt-Wallace ticket.

5. Elect only 100-percent Americans to Congress: Be not satisfied to only defeat Roosevelt and Wallace. That is imperative, but not enough. The new Congress must be composed of 100-percent Americans of real courage and ability, who will permit no coercion or interference by any Chief Executive, and will institute impeachment proceedings for Executive misbehavior, regardless of the political affiliations of the Chief Executive. The people have the right to rely upon Congress for prompt and effective action in such matters.

6. Local self-government: Local self-government, functioning honestly and intelligently in each community, is indispensable to the continued existence of this Republic. Recent efforts by crackpot intellectuals, cleric and lay, to defeat it by substituting occupational voting for geographical subdivisions, ought to be indignantly spurned. The Constitution of this Republic places very important and responsible powers in the various local communities, including choosing able and honest representatives to the Electoral College and to Congress. Such communities may freely spurn all outside influence and propaganda, national or international, and may even vote contrary to the much-advertised Gallup poll. These local communities would do well to emphasize that minority rule will not be tolerated, and that minority groups might as well cease their efforts to dominate the communities, because majority rule is going to prevail.

7. Write-in ballots: Write-in ballots constitute the effective remedy in local communities in many situations. For instance, in the First Congressional District of Montana, a mere plurality vote—less than a majority—nominated both of the party candidates for Congress in that district, and in each instance nominated a candidate with a radical record. Through the extensive use of write-in ballots, the voters may ignore both of such candidates, and send to Congress someone who can represent the district and the Republic more creditably. In these perilous times, when the very life of the Republic is at stake, the free use of these write-in ballots becomes a vital citizenship duty.

8. America for Americans: American citizens should not be crowded out of employment and livelihood by an ever-increasing influx of aliens from abroad, and officials responsible for this outrageous condition are unworthy of public confidence. The admission of more aliens at this time is a form of national suicide. Let the true American slogan "America for Americans" be hoisted and honored, and let the sly internationalists who would dishonor it, and their wily supporters, fold up their tents and disappear.

9. Christian civilization: This Republic is dedicated to liberty, based upon the proposition that all men are created equal—not in any narrow sense of Jews only being "men," or fellow Jews only being "neighbors," but in the truly Christian sense of the Good Samaritan parable, in recognition of the universal brotherhood of man. When Christian civilization shall be obliterated from this Republic, the Republic itself will perish. Let no one persuade you otherwise. This Republic is the product of Christian minds and hearts, and Christian culture, and was inspired by Almighty God. In the light of the record since 1933, it is difficult to understand recent assurances by the third-term candidate that he is endeavoring to preserve Christian civilization. Yet it must be preserved in this Republic, to assure equal rights to all American citizens, without regard to the racial stock from which they sprang.

10. National defense: Reasonably adequate preparation for national defense is ever imperative to safeguard against both internal and external danger. Overgrown military establishments, however, are inauspicious to liberty and jeopardize the loss of all liberty rather than providing desirable national defense in a republic. This Republic's chief danger today is from within, and from forces which have long been coddled by the administration in power. Can any sane-minded person depend upon this same administration to furnish you protection against such forces? And, with such conditions uncorrected, the Republic can no more protect against external aggression than a person whose inner organs are disrupted by cancer can protect himself by wearing a coat of armor. Why are the very officials who are aware of and responsible for the present plight of the Republic exhibiting such feverish haste in the taking of steps tending to involve this Republic in war? Is it to so weaken this Republic and also Nazi Germany and Japan that Soviet Russia, which is so pro-Jew that anti-Semitism is punished as counter-revolution, may be the only sizable power left to pick up the wreckage and destroy Christian civilization? The courting of war is, of course, a further violation of American tradition.

11. Menace of hyphenates: Perhaps the greatest menace to this Republic today is its hyphenates. No adherent or supporter of any other organized political nationality can be at the same time a citizen of this Republic. Undivided loyalty is, and must be, demanded. Individual Germans, Italians, British, political Jews, and others must wholly abandon all such political connections, whether national or international, before they can be eligible for American citizenship. The sinister Anglophile propaganda of deception during the last half century, including pollution of American textbooks, seeking surrender by you of the precious heritage of independence, for which your forefathers suffered and died, is the work of designing and unscrupulous British hyphenates. The Declaration of Independence truly narrates the insufferable grievances which compelled the Colonies to separate from Great Britain, whose aggressions are so extensive that the sun never sets upon her domain. Nazi and other kinds of hyphenates should also be identified and their purported American citizenships revoked. Hyphenates usually disguise themselves as real Americans, but their conduct sooner or later reveals them.

To illustrate: No true American can be induced to do or say anything tending to impair or destroy the faith of the American people in the Father of his Country, or in the soundness of the warnings in his Farewell Address. Yet as late as February 1940 Congressman SOL BLOOM, who is listed prominently in the latest Who's Who in American Jewry, burst into the public press with the pointed assertion that when said Farewell Address was released the author of it was so unpopular that he "couldn't have been elected dog catcher." What was his real purpose if not to suggest that the persistent New Deal violations of the warnings in said address were not violations of anything worth while? BLOOM did not allow himself to be deterred from his purpose even by the fact that he had specially committed himself to the honoring of said author when he took the chairmanship of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission. It would seem to be incumbent upon BLOOM to explain his connections, purpose, and objective in thus reflecting upon what true Americans deem sacred. It may throw further light upon the alien or international vintage of the New Deal. The much-advertised columnist, Walter Winchell, whose name is also carried in the latest Who's Who in American Jewry, might also explain why, in February 1938, he charged that the Father of the Republic "wanted to be called 'High Mightiness'" and "never was a general." Winchell's connections, purpose, and objective might also be enlightening. He could hardly have intended to inspire respect and admiration for the Father of his Country, but instead the reverse. Why? It seems inconceivable that anything more charitable could be said about either BLOOM or Winchell than that they must be hyphenates of some sort rather than 100-percent Americans. Perhaps the noted Jewish writer, Maurice Samuel, gave the true explanation in his frank book, You Gentiles, published in 1924, in which he said:

"Our Jewishness is not a creed—it is ourself, our totality" (p. 73).

"We will forever destroy because we need a world of our own" (p. 155).

However small the number may be, it is certainly not true that no 100-percent Americans are to be found among citizens of Jewish stock.

12. Deceit must end: If this Republic is to be preserved as such, there must be a prompt removal of those now in control. If this is not done, it will be plain deceit to continue to call this Nation a republic, the Statue of Liberty should be cast into the sea, and the Nation's Capital should be given some alien or international name suited to what is substituted for the Republic, instead of further insulting the Father of the Republic by continuing to use his name for the Capital of such alien or international substitute.

Why Rob the Aged?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 26, 1940

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how long those who are paying social security taxes will continue to suffer and permit the New Deal spendthrifts to squander the funds which are intended for old-age protection. The failure of those most vitally affected to protest against the unconscionable misuse of their funds by the administration leads one to wonder which is the more powerful force in government—fact or propaganda.

Hitler proclaims the doctrine that—

The skillful and unremitting use of propaganda can persuade people to believe that heaven is hell or conversely that the most miserable existence is paradise.

Has this foreign totalitarian technique been imported and put to use here?

Those who have listened to the soft and honeyed words about the retention of "all social gains" need only examine the record to find that this administration has collected and spent nearly $2,000,000,000 of the old-age security funds. To be exact, the tax collections under the Federal old-age and survivors' insurance benefits, title 2 of the Social Security Act, as of August 31, 1940, totaled $2,005,696,643.67.

Of this sum the administration has spent $1,728,100,000 for the operating expenses of the Government. Thus, eventually this sum of $1,728,100,000, together with interest, will have to be fully met by further taxation. Is this what President Roosevelt means when he refers to the retention of all social gains?

But this is only part of the story. In addition, I find that as of August 31, this year, there was a balance in the unemployment trust fund of $1,800,000,000, for which I O U's have been issued. At the present time the current collections for unemployment taxes far exceed the withdrawals from the fund by the States, so that the balance in the fund is steadily increasing or, rather, there is a steady increase in the deposits of I O U's—which must be paid by future taxation.

There is no doubt whatever that the money collected to protect the aged in the sunset of life, and the unemployed, has been squandered along with other wasted billions. The victims of the cunning I O U device, employed by the New Dealers, have not protested because of the persistent Government propaganda to the effect that none of the social gains are to be surrendered. It is evident now that the old-age annuity trust funds will be collected and expended for the running expenses of the Government so long as the present wild and reckless Roosevelt administration is continued in power. Every dollar of the billions to be collected in the future for the security of the aged and the unemployed will likewise be spent and will have to be paid again by the taxpayers unless Congress puts a stop to the racket.

Congress, when it passed the Social Security Act, never contemplated that the pay-roll taxes would be diverted to purposes other than to meet the problem of old age and unemployment. The Congress acted upon the ever-repeated assurance of President Roosevelt that the Budget would be balanced; that the social-security taxes could be used to reduce the then-existing Government debt instead of increasing the debt by printing new bonds in exchange for the cash collected in pay-roll taxes.

Honesty and fair dealing on the part of the administration with those who are compelled to pay the tax require that immediate steps be taken to prevent the further dissipation of these and other trust funds. The Congress cannot escape its responsibility for the misuse of these funds, for it is fully aware now that a Federal debt of $49,000,000,000, which, if contingent liabilities are included, is nearer fifty-five billion, with increasing annual deficits, places old-age security in a most precarious position.

The Roosevelt New Deal administration has already reduced the income of banks, insurance companies, foundations, hospitals, colleges, churches, and eleemosynary institutions by approximately one-half since 1933.

Why should Congress by its inactivity refuse to stop further raids on the much-heralded social gains? Is Congress, in the light of the facts, going to adjourn without taking effective action to protect the old-age annuitants and the unemployed from the destruction of their promised future social security?

Let us hear no more about retaining social gains until there is some evidence of an honest intention on the part of the Roosevelt administration to preserve and protect these so-called gains, instead of destroying them.

President Roosevelt and the Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, September 25, 1940

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, as election day draws near, it has become evident that an overwhelming majority of the American people are convinced that the safety and salvation of America and the American way of life can only be maintained and assured by the election of President Roosevelt.

The social gains of the last 7½ years have buttressed and preserved our economic system; the President's foresight and courageous leadership have assured us a national defense which will make this Western Hemisphere impregnable from any attack.

Consequently, the American people determined months ago that they would not hand over their Government and their country to the Republican Party and its vacillating candidate in these perilous days of war, world confusion, and chaos, but rather would rally to the side of their President and follow his leadership in keeping America out of war.

Therefore, as the days and weeks passed, people of all parties and all creeds and all races came to recognize more and more, the greatness of our President and were convinced of the wisdom of his foreign policy.

The trend to the President has turned into an avalanche, which is frankly admitted by all political forecasters. The Republican high command practically concedes the reelection of President Roosevelt.

But the Republicans now believe the way has been found to sabotage the President's next administration and tie his hands, namely, by the election of a Republican Congress. To this end they are bending all their efforts and are now seeking to trade votes in every election district in the country.

I am reliably informed money is being poured into congressional districts which the Republicans consider close. Local sentiment for home-town boys is being fostered, and voters are being told, "Go ahead and vote for the President, but give us a break; split your ticket and vote for the Republican candidate for Congress." By these subtle methods the hate-Roosevelt crowd hopes to defeat the President's friends in Congress who have assisted and worked and labored with him, and thereby ultimately destroy his domestic and foreign program.

Without a Democratic Congress to enact into law the necessary legislation to bolster our foreign policy, our Nation will be forced closer to the brink of war; without a Democratic Congress to defeat any and all attempts to emasculate and rip apart the fabric of social legislation which has been woven over the last 7½ years, the country will be in constant turmoil and a state of helpless confusion.

President Roosevelt needs loyal soldiers by his side in this great crisis; he must have Congressmen and Senators who believe in him, who will work with him and not against him, who will stand shoulder to shoulder for the defense of his policies; who will strike against and fight against intolerance, bigotry, and foreign isms; who hate war just as he does; who will crusade against nazi-ism, communism, fascism, and

"fifth columnists"; who will march with him to keep America free.

I know the American people will not fail President Roosevelt, for he has never failed them. I know they will not fail his friends and his supporters, be they local, State, or National candidates. I know they will elect to the House of Representatives and the United States Senate men who have proven by their votes and their deeds that they sincerely believe in the President's policies.

Let us beware of those who praise the President but seek to elect to Congress men who are his political enemies.

Let us beware of those who give lip service to President Roosevelt and the Democratic Party but are using every means to defeat for Congress men who have stood beside him when the battle was raging.

Report of Representative Schwert to the People of the Forty-second District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PIUS L. SCHWERT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 26, 1940

Mr. SCHWERT. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to have this opportunity to render a report and to give a brief account of my record to the citizens of the Forty-second Congressional District of New York. For the past 21 months I have represented the good people of this district. Members of this Congress have set a peacetime record in the manner in which they have remained in session 18 complete months and a portion of 20 of these 21 months. When the pages of history are written, I believe they will show that this Seventy-sixth Congress has done much to improve and protect the American way of life.

It has been my privilege to represent this great cosmopolitan Forty-second District since January 1939. The district is composed of every race, creed, and nationality, comprising in the aggregate an exemplary cross section of genuine Americanism surpassed nowhere in these great United States. Proud have I been—and even more grateful—of the opportunity to represent these generous citizens, to whom I am greatly indebted. Though I am proud of my district and proud of the people who elect me, I want to be modest about my own record of service. I have tried hard to justify the confidence and to please my constituency, although at times I knew I could not wholly satisfy the cross-current of varied and complex opinion of all of my people on a particular question. I have done my level best, and today I invite the closest scrutiny of my record.

POLICIES OF MY OFFICE

Always to give the best in response to all calls, communications, and inquiries; to maintain an office in Buffalo as well as in Washington, and to see the public personally every opportunity I had to be in Buffalo; to see all visitors from western New York who might journey to Washington, or who might be living in or near Washington because of employment there.

Always to vote on measures as God gives me the light to see the right, for the benefit of the Nation and the majority of my people.

Always to treat capital and labor fairly and equitably, knowing that the harmony of both is essential to a successful economic structure in our democracy.

COMMITTEES

During the year 1939 I served on the following committees: Census, District of Columbia, Expenditures in the Executive Departments, War Claims, and World War Veterans' Legislation. These gave me experience and an insight into questions and problems pertaining to the various census enumerations made by the Government and its departments, pertaining to city government and its many ramifications, pertaining to executive-department expenditures, and the claims and legislation arising from the World War and the veterans who took part in that war. Early in 1940 death caused a vacancy in one of the major committees of the House. I was absent—because of illness—but the Ways and Means Committee offered a resolution naming me to fill the vacancy. The resolution was adopted, and, as a result, I had to resign from the committees previously named and was made a member of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, which handles all legislation relative to postal matters within our own country, between our country and our possessions, and between our country and foreign countries. This act of the Ways and Means Committee—remembering me during my absence—was greatly appreciated.

LABOR

Support has been given by me to legislation of benefit to labor. I am for Federal protection of the right to collective bargaining and consistently supported legislation for the man and woman who live by daily toil. The best conditions available must be maintained for the man who works. His efforts have built the great structures and industries of America; these assets must in turn pay him the fair chance which he deserves. Legislation involving mergers has been before us, and I have opposed legislation of this type which would cause loss of jobs. With all types of labor in my district I have also opposed legislation that would be unfair to water and motor carriers. In other words, I have supported all legislation which I felt was beneficial to any part of labor, but not legislation which, while benefiting one group to some extent, would finally result in harming another group. Labor representatives have approved this stand.

FARM COOPERATION

Farming sections make up much of my district. I favor organization of farmers, just as I favor organization of laboring men. I favor farmers' cooperating in any way they can. Having been born and raised in the country, my personal contacts and personal dealings with farmers have assisted me in dealing with their problems. Early-morning market reports were available this season because of my efforts, made at the request of farmers' representatives. I have always sought to bring the problems of our farmers to the attention of the proper agencies of government and have not cast a vote detrimental to agriculture in my district.

OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

For the aged who may or may not have had a really fair chance in active life the country should strive to provide freedom from worry and want in old age. The social-security law was a beginning, but it does not do the job right. There should be an old-age pension, paid by the Federal Government, without harassing the old folks as under present procedure. As a matter of principle and justice, the old folks in all States should receive the same amount monthly. I have on every occasion signed every petition to bring old-age-pension and general-welfare legislation before Congress for action, as well as working amongst my colleagues in behalf of this legislation, and voting for it when vote has been taken. This Congress has failed to make the progress I thought it would make in this matter, but the problem is too important to be forgotten or pigeonholed. The fight for justice to the aged must be carried on.

VETERANS

As an ex-service man, my membership on the War Claims and World War Veterans' Legislation Committees was greatly appreciated. I have favored every bill in the interest of the veterans of the World War and earlier wars, as well as legislation for their widows and dependents. My active support of this legislation is well known. Said support shall continue, for it is my firm belief that our Government should remember and compensate to the fullest those who have fought for our country's welfare. Our veterans should not be neglected in these times when our attention is so frequently directed to problems growing out of another war. During this session I supported legislation to repay travel allowance to Spanish War veterans and to liberalize pension provisions for World War veterans. I hereby acknowledge the fine cooperation I have received from each and every veterans' organization.

STREAM POLLUTION

Legislation for the preservation of the purity of our rivers, lakes, and streams has received 100-percent support from me. The sportsmen and all lovers of the out-of-doors have noted my support in behalf of conservation of natural resources and the conservation and propagation of game and fish.

POSTAL SERVICE

My predecessor, Senator JAMES M. MEAD, as chairman of the House Post Office and Post Roads Committee, did yeoman work in improving our Postal Service throughout the Nation as well as in our own district. His efficiency as chairman of that committee is known throughout the country. As a member of the committee during 1940 I am pleased to report that I have been privileged to check many rural routes for improved and new service, city deliveries for possible additional service, new location and new equipment for post offices. Though all requests have not been granted, I have worked continually for efficient and improved Postal Service throughout the district.

THE YOUTH PROGRAM

The work of the Civilian Conservation Corps has been of great value to our young people. When a reduction of one-third of the number of camps was on the program last year I joined a group to defeat the reduction and to keep the camp program at about the same level until the first of the year.

The National Youth Administration has been of much benefit in enabling our young folks to continue their education and to obtain training, out of school, to assist them in earning a livelihood. My best efforts have been given for a continuation of this program.

All legislation and appropriations for vocational education and Federal aid for our school system have had my support.

Projects for school buildings and school improvements have received my aid. In these cases the principal credit belongs to the school boards and the teachers having the vision to initiate and push these projects, but it has been a pleasure for me to cooperate in every possible way that this work might go forward.

INDIAN MATTERS

With a portion of an Indian reservation in my district I have given much thought and study to the Indian problem. In many cases the Indians need assistance in education and health matters. Our Indians are sound, practical, and patriotic citizens. They want only what is their right and just due. As one of their white chiefs, I have made diligent effort to analyze their problems.

FEDERAL AID

Careful consideration has been given all legislation under the heading of Federal aid, such as that given by the Work Projects Administration, the Farm Security Administration, the Home Owners Loan Corporation, the Federal Housing Administration, the Farm Credit Administration, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Public Works Administration, the United States Housing Authority, and others.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

In the neutrality legislation, amendments to keep United States ships out of combat areas and to keep United States citizens off ships of combatant nations received my active support. These changes have assisted materially in keeping us out of the present war.

As one who loves peace and who is anxious to promote amity amongst nations, I am unalterably opposed to war. Nevertheless I favor adequate national defense. Thus, I have supported the recent rearmament program; and following passage of many amendments, which improved and made the legislation fair and just to all, I accepted the training-program legislation.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Believing that the final answer to many of our problems lies in the proper solution of our unemployment situation, I joined with 70 Members of the House in a study of this question last winter. This was not a regular activity of the House of Representatives. It was voluntary action on the part of all of us, and we formed a nonpartisan unemployment conference. The purpose was to study unemployment from every angle in an effort to remedy the economic situation. The members of this conference met in weekly sessions for many months, examining the unemployment problem, its causes. and its cures, to the end that relief might be replaced by recovery and that labor throughout the land could find steadier and more profitable employment. Careful, written reports were made by 14 subcommittees, and a list of 12 causes of unemployment and 16 approaches to its cure were officially approved by conference members. These reports and recommendations have been published as a House document, known as Document 850, and are available for study. Our conference plans to press for action on this problem as soon as the emergency matters dealing with the national defense are completed.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, the foregoing is a brief résumé of my 2 years in the House of Representatives. It has been made as brief as possible—and still it gives my stand on most phases of the legislation taken up by the Seventy-sixth Congress.

Today the tragedy of the world events is the greatest since the dawn of history. Thus, Mr. Speaker, I say that to be an American is one of the grandest things that can come to any man. It is my hope and my firm belief that a God-fearing, God-serving, united people, those of us who have the privilege of living in the greatest republic in the world, can, and will, carry forward the torch of freedom, holding it high above the clouds of today's storms, so that generations yet unborn can see its light and follow it—and that we may, in our own way, be able to preserve for posterity this freedom which we now enjoy and which was handed to us unsullied by our forefathers.

My stand on peace and war has already been given to my district. I will only repeat that I will support that part of the 1940 platform of the Democratic Party which reads, "We will not participate in foreign wars, and we will not send our Army, naval, or air forces to fight in foreign lands outside of the Americas except in case of attack." That policy must be adhered to, so that the common, average citizens of this country may continue to live simply, happily, and safely in a land which is a democracy.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, may I urge that all of us resolve anew to bend our efforts toward carrying forward and safeguarding the principles of liberty, so that America, conceived in liberty and born in freedom, shall continue to grow to great heights, and that the principles of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln shall not perish from the face of the earth.

Resolution of Polish Army Veterans' Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN LESINSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 26, 1940

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a resolution from the Polish Army Veterans' Association of America, Inc. The Polish Army Veterans' Association was organized during the last World War and fought in France. It has as its officials the following honorary members: I. J. Paderewski, Gen. J. Haller, Dr. T. A. Starzynski, and honorary chaplain, Rev. M. Godlewski.

Its present officers are: L. C. Kajko, national commander; J. Dec, senior vice commander; S. Wojtusik, junior vice commander; L. L. Krzyzak, adjutant general; and A. Zakiewicz, treasurer.

The present Polish Army Veterans' Association of America, Inc., like the Polish Army which is now fighting alongside the British Army in defending England, is offering its services in defense of this country.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1940.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT, THE DEPARTMENT OF WAR, AND TO THE GOVERNORS OF THE STATES OF THE UNION, Greetings:

The Polish Army Veterans' Association of America, an organization composed of former soldiers of the Polish Army who served in the first World War and representing 27,000 men of Polish extraction, who volunteered for service in 1917–18 from the United States, wishes hereby to offer the services of these soldiers-veterans in the Home Guard, which under the present defense program is to take place of the National Guard called up for service in the Regular Army.

Inasmuch as we are a representative body of men who originally enlisted as volunteers from the United States for service in the Polish Army and were repatriated in 1920 and, having served side by side with the American Expeditionary Forces on the western front, we feel that we should be considered as fit material for any auxiliary service in the defense program of this country.

As loyal American citizens, who now are too old to come under the Selective Service Act but willing and ready to serve this country in any capacity and, having an average of 2½ to 3 years of active military training—we hereby offer our experience and ability to serve the United States at any moment and assure the Government of our readiness to answer your call at any time.

We trust that our offer will be taken under serious consideration and assure you of our fullest cooperation in any and every manner of service we may be called upon to perform.

Respectfully submitted.

POLISH ARMY VETERANS' ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
By L. L. KRZYZAK, Adjutant General.

Gettysburg Address, 1940 Version

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 25, 1940

LETTER TO SIOUX FALLS (S. DAK.) DAILY ARGUS-LEADER

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following reader's letter which appeared in the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Daily Argus-Leader. It speaks for itself, and it does so most effectively.

GETTYSBURG ADDRESS, 1940 VERSION

To the EDITOR OF THE ARGUS-LEADER:

Eight years and $40,000,000,000 ago there was born on this continent a New Deal, conceived by the Democratic Party and dedicated to the proposition that only one man in this country was big enough to be President.

We are now engaged in a great political campaign, testing whether this deal or any other deal costing forty billions and dedicated to such a proposition can long endure.

We are listening for the great crooner of that campaign. We are listening to hear his explanation of the forty billions, of W. P. A., A. A. A., and N. R. A., and total defenselessness. His silence on these subjects speaks loudly.

In a larger senselessness, he speaks loudly of Hitler and Mussolini, impressing us that the battle is between them and him; that he is the only brave man, living or dead, who can lead the opposition to them.

It is for us, as Americans, to dedicate ourselves to the proposition that America is still the land of opportunity. The American people will little note nor long remember what he says this year, but it can never forget what he has done the last 8 years.

And that from the memory of the pioneers of this Nation and their stalwart sons who have tramped the pages of history we take increased devotion to those principles which have made us a nation. That we may not become a government of the Roosevelt, by the Roosevelt, and for the Roosevelt until Roosevelt shall perish from this earth.

Report on Industrial Mobilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 26, 1940

REPORT OF MR. MARTIN SWEENY, PRESIDENT OF THE COMMODORE HOTEL OF NEW YORK CITY, TO MAYOR LaGUARDIA

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the membership of this House a portion of the report submitted to the mayor of the city of New York by Mr. Martin Sweeny, president of the Commodore Hotel in New York. This report contains many valuable suggestions in connection with our program for national defense.

I respectfully request that the members of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs make a careful study of this report with the view to recommending to the President the desirability of adopting the suggestions of Mr. Sweeny. I believe it important that the many facilities available in New York be used for the various activities of the Government in the present emergency.

I heartily endorse all the proposals contained in the Sweeny report and trust that they will be given serious consideration.

The report follows:

A MEMORANDUM TO THE MAYOR—NEW YORK—THE LOGICAL CENTER OF ADMINISTRATION OF INDUSTRIAL MOBILIZATION AND OTHER EMERGENCY ACTIVITIES CONNECTED WITH THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

With the mobilization of American industry and other measures related to the national defense already moving swiftly through the planning stage, it seems timely and constructive to suggest, for reasons which will be set forth below, that the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense—as well as many of the subordinate and coordinating boards and bureaus—be located in the city of New York.

It is in point, however, first to call attention to the fact that New York now faces a period when, unless protective measures are taken, low-ebb business is an alarming possibility. The war has ended ocean travel and, with it, all its related transient business. The freight movement which has been created is artificial and likely to cease overnight. Because New York is not a so-called heavy-industry center we can expect none of the direct advantages of the employment and business booms which will accompany quantity production of the materials of defense in, say, Detroit and Pittsburgh. All this—and most of its economic benefits—are bound to bypass New York. And to this it should be added that an examination of the future must not fail to consider the effect of a possible totalitarian victory in Europe: It would destroy much of America's foreign trade, not alone with Europe but with South America as well; it would reduce the port of New York to a low rank among the shipping centers of the world. Already, according to Iron Age, reports are coming from South America that Germany is offering steel for post-war delivery at prices well below ours.

It is for these reasons, as well as for the peculiar advantages it would have as the administration center of war-industry activities, that New York should be brought immediately to the attention of the President. The locating here of the tremendous administrative organizations that must be set up would give the city its one chance at a share of the Nation's war business. It would immediately place on an earning basis thousands of square feet of dead space in office and loft buildings. It would provide, directly and indirectly, employment for thousands. It would bring other thousands of needed workers from out of town to occupy apartments now vacant. It would attract a great transient population of those whose war-related interests would bring them here to occupy hotel accommodations. There would be a consequent flow of money where it is badly needed. These, briefly, are the advantages which would accrue to New York.

But there is another side to this suggestion; The advantage a New York location would have for the men who are taking over the gigantic task of gaiting industry to meet an unprecedented demand and coordinating its operation with the needs of the Military Establishment.

First, New York would afford them direct contact with the executives of the major industries whose home offices are here—the men with whom they will be constantly dealing. There would be a consequent saving of time, and time is of paramount importance.

Second, New York would afford them direct and time-saving contact with the Nation's financial leaders, who are located here.

Third, New York offers the advantage of adequate housing facilities already in existence and office and loft space ready for occupancy, as compared to Washington, which is underbuilt. And in the matter of apartment and hotel and office accommodations in Washington, it might not be out of place to recall that twice within 25 years the Capital has proved complete inability to handle housing and office-space emergencies. In 1917, Washington, even with its temporary living quarters which were built at great expense—and scapped later—was crowded to a point where men and women lived and worked in chaos. That same condition was approximated in 1933 when a mushroom working population was produced by the needs of N. R. A. and other business relief agencies. Today, Washington, with its facilities taxed almost to the limit, is in no position to meet the situation any more adequately.

Fourth, New York is readily accessible by air and by rail. LaGuardia Field, its new airport at North Beach, not only is equipped with the most modern facilities for handling traffic but is less than half an hour away from the heart of the city; two of the country's great railway systems bring their trains to midtown. Again, here is time saving for those whose vital work will require swift movement to and from the offices of the Advisory Commission. In comparison, Washington loses once more: The commercial airport there is already considered inadequate, and certainly it has not the capacity for the traffic that is bound to develop.

Fifth, New York's communication system is capable of handling the enormous telephone and telegraph traffic which the war-industry administration will produce. There would be no need to set up large-scale temporary installations such as were required at the Capital during the last war—and such as would have to be set up there again.

Sixth, the city's transportation system and its supplemental bus lines not only solve our normal travel problems but are geared to accommodate instantly a sudden increase in population.

Seventh, New York's facilities for feeding additional thousands are well known. With hotel dining rooms and restaurants available everywhere there would be no spectacles such as Washington witnessed in 1917–18, when war workers waited in queues at restaurant doors and menus were exhausted—the result of inexperienced management attempting to take care of crowds.

It may be objected that geographical separation from the War and Navy Departments, with which the Advisory Commission and its various subexecutives will have so much vital business to transact, would prove to be a disadvantage, a handicap, to the work in hand. That objection will not stand because the Commission and the various Army and Navy bureau chiefs, no matter where located, will use liaison aides for keeping each other informed as to requirements and accomplishments and progress. It is not the function of the war-industry administration to design war equipment or to tell the Army or Navy what supplies they need to fight a war. Their job is to learn what materials will be required and to mobilize and coordinate the great industries to produce them. They must be able to assure industry adequate supplies of raw materials, to facilitate production, to cut away the red tape, and to set up the machinery of defense for a rapid and vital expansion. This is a great business undertaking, and it can be accomplished more efficiently in the world's greatest business city than in the center of national politics. The Anglo-French Purchasing Commission, charged with the task of emergency buying and with the whole country to choose from, made that decision long ago and has been here since the outbreak of war.

It is respectfully urged that this matter be presented at Washington.

MARTIN SWEENY, President.

Congressional Election—A Continuous Performance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. U. S. GUYER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 26, 1940

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, as the biennial election for Representatives approaches I am often asked why anyone wants to be a Member of this forum fashioned for us by our forefathers in the Constitution, wherein one is in a perpetual campaign for votes and becomes as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTWRIGHT] has said, "A walking petition for votes."

In an address 4 years ago on the floor I said:

It is one of the inexplicable mysteries of life in which one surrenders his peace of mind, his tranquillity of soul and life under his own vine and fig tree for a disappointing, disillusioning ignis fatuus in the morass of public life. Yet, arduous as the duties are, we are loathe to leave its unrivaled associations, and every Member may refer with pride to his membership in this forum of the people.

That explains roughly why many of us seek this office, but more particularly just now when the gluttons for power at home and abroad seek to make this a totalitarian world. We Members, who are a part of the Government and know firsthand what has taken place heretofore and see clearly what is taking place at this moment, may well claim the privilege of staying in our posts for what we can do to strangle autocracy and rampant bureaucracy and disguised dictatorship at home.

The late Champ Clark, of Missouri, former Speaker of the House, has so lucidly pointed out why Members with experience, training, and seniority are best fitted to meet such a crisis, and how unwise it is to continually change Members of the House, that I have asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks including the address referred to.

THE MAKING OF A REPRESENTATIVE—REMARKS OF CHAMP CLARK AT THE WASHINGTON PRESS CLUB RECEPTION, THURSDAY, MARCH 16, 1916

(Printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 17, 1916)

It is a high honor to be a Representative in Congress, if for only one term, and with the number of terms the honor increases in geometrical rather than in arithmetical proportion. A Member's usefulness to his country should increase in the same proportion. A man has to learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

"Poeta nascitur non fit"—a poet is born, not made—says Horace; but Congressmen—that is, useful and influential Congressmen—are made largely by experience and practice.

The old Charlotte district in Virginia knew this and kept John Randolph, of Roanoke, in the House till he became a great national figure. Then the Old Dominion sent him to the Senate, and General Jackson sent him to St. Petersburg. There are sporadic cases of similar action in other districts.

It is an unwise performance for any district to change Representatives at short intervals. A new Congressman must begin at the foot of the class and spell up. Of course, the more brains, tact, energy, courage, and industry he has, the quicker he will get up. If he possesses these qualities, and if his constituents will keep him in the House, he is as certain to rise as the sparks are to fly upward. No human power can keep him down. It is only fair and rational to assume that every Representative's constituents desire to see him among the "top-notchers."

Take the present House and see how long the men who hold the high places have served. I cannot name all, but a few as samples.

Mr. Speaker Cannon is serving his fortieth year. He holds the record, or, in pugilistic parlance, "he holds the belt," for length of service in the House in our entire history. In several Congresses he was chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations and then was Speaker 8 years; only one man, Henry Clay, having been Speaker longer.

I am serving my twenty-second year; Minority Leader Mann is serving his twentieth year; Mr. Kitchin, chairman of Ways and Means, his sixteenth; Mr. Fitzgerald, chairman of Appropriations, his eighteenth; Mr. Moon, chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads, his twentieth; Mr. Jones, chairman of Insular Affairs and "father of the House," his twenty-sixth; Mr. Flood, chairman of Foreign Affairs, his sixteenth; Mr. Hay, chairman of Military Affairs, his twentieth; Mr. Glass, chairman of Banking and Currency, his sixteenth; Mr. Adamson, chairman of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, his twentieth; Mr. Stephens, chairman of Indian Affairs, his twentieth; Mr. Slayden, chairman of the Library, his twentieth; Mr. Henry, chairman of Rules, his twentieth; Mr. Lever, chairman of Agriculture, his sixteenth; Mr. Padgett, chairman of the Navy, his sixteenth; Mr. Lloyd, chairman of Accounts, his twentieth; and Mr. Sparkman, chairman of Rivers and Harbors, his twenty-second. There are other big chairmanships, but these will suffice to show that as a rule the big places go to old and experienced Members, for most of the men who rank close to the chairmen are old timers. The same thing holds good with reference to members of the minority. As an illustration, Messrs. Gillette and Cooper, who are serving their twenty-fourth year, are the ranking Republicans on Appropriations and Foreign Affairs, almost certain to be chairman thereof should the Republicans ever again have a majority in the House, as in that event, in all probability, Mr. Mann will be Speaker, unless he is nominated for President next June.

Go through the whole list and you will find, with few exceptions, that the men of long service have the high places.

New England and the cities of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh have understood the value of long service all along, and, having elected a fairly good man to Congress, they keep him in the harness.

The Member of longest consecutive service is called "the father of the House." Five Philadelphians in immediate succession bore that honorable title—Randall, Kelley, O'Neill, Harmer, and Bingham. Then it went to Mr. Dalzell, of Pittsburgh. When General Bingham announced the death of General Harmer, his immediate predecessor as "father of the House," he stated that the five Philadelphia "fathers of the House" had served a total of 147 years, and he served 8 or 10 years after making that interesting statement.

In the second and third Congresses in which I served, Maine, with only four Members, had the Speakership and the chairmanship of the great Committees on Ways and Means, Navy, and Public Buildings and Grounds—a most remarkable circumstance, giving the Pine Tree State an influence in the House and the country out of all proportion to her population and wealth. These four men—Reed, Dingley, Boutelle, and Millikin—each served in the House 20 years or more. Other States might profit by her example.

No man should be elected to the House simply to gratify his ambition. All Members should be elected for the good of the country.

The best rule, it seems to me, is for a district to select a man with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous, and keep him here so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high position and influence in the House. His wide acquaintance with Members helps him amazingly in doing things.

I can speak freely on this subject without violating the proprieties, for my constituents have kept me here 22 years, and for 20 years have given me nominations without opposition, for all of which favors I thank them from the bottom of my heart. Their generous action and unwavering friendship have enabled me to devote all my time to the public service. I have not been compelled to spend any portion of my time in "mending my fences." My constituents have attended to that. God bless them.

One other thing: I do not know what committee assignments you new Members secured. If they are good, you are to be congratulated. If bad, do not be cast down. No congressional tenderfoot ever had poorer assignments than I had—Claims and Old Pensions—but I never complained or kicked. I went to work as though those committees suited me exactly. Here is an illustration of what may happen and how luck plays an important part. I was next to top Democrat on both Foreign Affairs and Patents for 8 years—never advanced a peg so far as committees went. Just when, at the beginning of the ninth year on those two committees, I was about to become top Democrat on Foreign Affairs, Hon. John Sharp Williams, then minority leader, assigned me to the foot of Ways and Means, and at the end of 4 years through the happenings of politics in five different States I jumped from the foot to the head of the Democratic minority on Ways and Means. So it may be with you. Events over which you have no control may advance you more rapidly than you dream of or hope for. My advice is this: "Whatever your hand finds to do, do it with your might."

Hon. James A. Farley

MAGAZINE AND NEWSPAPER ARTICLES

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I dare say that no man in the whole history of our country has laid aside the mantle of office more graciously and princely than our former Postmaster General, James A. Farley. His personal charm is universally conceded, his fidelity and loyalty to cause and friends everywhere extolled, and from every section of the country comes a chorus of praise and appreciation of his rugged honesty of mind, heart, and soul. When the historian of tomorrow records the events and happenings of today he will reserve a niche wherein to place the name and character of Hon. James A. Farley, enshrining it with the Latin proverb: qualis vita, finis ita.

I therefore, Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, insert a number of magazine and newspaper articles concerning Hon. James A. Farley that measure and extol his character and service far beyond my limited power and capabilities.

[From Rural Letter Carrier]

FAREWELL, DEAR JIM!

(By Charles H. Bailey, Rural Letter Carrier, Colon, Nebr.)

Dear Jim: it's hard to realize
Our ways have reached an end,
The pleasant ways we've known so long
Seems parting friends from friend;
Somehow it seems you've found a place
In every postal employee's heart,
And now we learn with keen regret
That you and we must part.

Yes, Jim; you've been a dandy boss,
Our work has been a pleasure,
The memories of the recent years
Will be our richest treasure;
We didn't mind the mud and rain
Nor when the snow kept piling,
For well we knew that back of us,
Our Jim would be there smiling.

Some winds blow north, some blow south,
While some blow east or west,
We labor here a little while
And then pass on to rest;
But when we meet beyond the seas
Where all our journeys end,
We hope you'll be as glad as we,
That you have been our friend.

We hope the hands which take the reins
Your able hands surrender,
Will build within our ranks again
A friendship quite as tender;
So, au revoir, dear brother, farewell!
But in life's twilight dim,
We hope to meet the "boss" again—
Our good old friend, genial Jim.

THE MEASURE OF A BIG MAN

Few Americans have served in Presidential Cabinets in the United States who, upon resigning, have dropped their portfolios with the plaudits of both political supporters and opponents ringing in their ears. When that occurs, it can be truly said that the one who has been so commended has been a good public servant and has done his work well and faithfully.

James A. Farley, who has ably served the country as its Postmaster General, is leaving the Cabinet of President Roosevelt with the commendation of both Democrats and Republicans. The retiring Cabinet member Thursday was publicly recognized for his services by the Senate. It was not unusual that the Democrats should pay tribute to him but when numerous Republicans joined them, it evidenced the fact that a big man, perhaps the ablest man of the President's Cabinet, was leaving the Government service.

We have not always agreed with some of the things Mr. Farley has done as Postmaster General. We were disappointed when he refused to issue a stamp in commemoration of the four hundredth anniversary of the coming of Fra Marcos de Niza to the Southwest last year. We believed then, and we still believe, that that historic event was as deserving of recognition in that manner as was the four hundredth anniversary of the coming of Coronado which is being observed this year. Mr. Farley, however, disagreed with us and no stamp was issued.

Despite that disagreement, we must recognize Mr. Farley as one of the ablest heads of the postal service we have had in this country. We believe it is with genuine regret that those engaged in the Postal Service in the Nation witness his departure from it.

Two great tributes were paid to Mr. Farley in the Senate Thursday. One was by Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, a political opponent, when he characterized Mr. Farley as "one of the greatest and most colorful figures in a generation and one of the rarest human souls in our time." The other was paid by Senator ELLISON D. SMITH, a Democrat, who said that when Farley "made a promise, he kept it." No greater praise may be given anyone than that statement.

[From the Boston Sunday Post of September 1, 1940]

FARLEY LEAVES

As James A. Farley left office yesterday after nearly 8 tempestuous years one may readily agree with the sad-eyed janitor who reluctantly took down a picture of the late Will Rogers. According to the janitor, the autographed note on the back "says it quick, but says it all." The line reads: " To my close personal friend, Jim Farley, a practical politician and a gentleman—a rare combination."

[From the Fort Worth Star-Telegram of September 1, 1940]

AN ABLE PUBLIC SERVANT RETIRES

The retirement of James A. Farley today as Postmaster General passes as a routine procedure since Mr. Farley's resignation was announced some weeks earlier, to become effective August 31. Likewise, in a campaign year, more emphasis was given to Mr. Farley's surrender of his duties as Democratic national chairman than to his impending departure from the National Cabinet, because of possible political implications of the first change.

But since Mr. Farley today ceases to be a public servant, a full realization is possible of the loss occasioned by his retirement. The people admittedly lose a most capable Postmaster General, who has given the best possible service for the last 8 years; and the Post Office Department loses an administrative head who was able to inspire both the respect and regard of the entire force with whom he has served.

The Post Office Department will go on as usual, and it is testimony to Mr. Farley's efficient administration that the varied work of that Department will continue without dislocation. The best executive, whether in business or government, is the man who so perfects organization that it can continue without him. Jim Farley is such an executive, and it was this demonstrated ability which caused him to be drafted for two important executive posts in private business.

The Post Office Department under Mr. Farley's direction has become one of the best run large-scale enterprises in the entire country. During the unprecedented years of the present administration the Department has handled its ordinary tasks well and has assumed extraordinary duties without interfering with the speed and efficiency of the mail service. Registration of aliens is a recent case in point.

But no doubt Mr. Farley and his legion of friends take the most pride in the regular work of the Post Office Department. The principal functions of handling mail and parcel post are now performed so well by the Post Office Department that the public is able to take them for granted. Likewise, Mr. Farley's foresight and progressiveness have enabled him to expand the comparatively new Air Mail Service to volume proportions that have permitted a lower postage rate.

Mr. Farley leaves a working personnel in the Post Office Department which is both efficient and loyal. At many times in the past those workers have given public testimony of their high regard for "the boss," who was friend as well. In such respects, Mr. Farley has displayed the qualities of leadership which have marked him as an exceptional man in public affairs.

It is somewhat difficult to think of Jim Farley solely as the retiring Postmaster General without recalling his immense value to his own party as its national chairman. The first Roosevelt nomination in 1932 was due primarily to Jim Farley's organizing genius, and that same ability, coupled with such other capacities as executive direction, figured largely in subsequent successes of the Democratic Party. Jim Farley knew thousands of loyal Democrats throughout the country, just as he knew innumerable postal employees. He was able to call them all by name, carried on correspondence with them, and, in addition to their support as Democrats, Jim Farley won their friendship and affection as was shown by the ovation given him at the Chicago convention.

Mr. Farley will be sorely missed by these fellow Democrats, the rank and file of his party, and of the Post Office Department. His absence from Cabinet meetings and at the councils of his party likewise will be felt. Jim Farley's genial personality, his poise, his cool judgment, and his friendliness have been invaluable assets to the administration, and, in fact, to the whole country. Jim Farley always keeps his head; he knew the virtue of silence; he is a leader of men because he first is a master of self. He is a shining symbol of the self-discipline which every American needs. Private business gains and Government loses immeasurably by the withdrawal of Mr. Farley from public service. And the Democratic organization may find it has lost its great balance wheel, as well as the most astute generalissimo it ever had.

Jim Farley's success at his new tasks is certain because his varied capacities, his energy, loyalty, and other qualities have been well demonstrated in the nearly 8 years of his dual role of Postmaster General and national party chairman.

[From the Tulsa (Okla.) World of September 2, 1940]

MR. FARLEY RETIRES

James A. Farley is leaving political and official life. He now goes out as Postmaster General; he was already out as national Democratic chairman. He is out for reasons of principle.

Mr. Farley appeared in national life more than 7 years ago. He was an original sponsor for Franklin D. Roosevelt and was very largely responsible for his election as President. Both the notable Roosevelt campaigns were managed by Farley, and he came through them with a record as a clean, expert, and extraordinarily able politician. He made a most excellent Postmaster General. His work has rarely if ever been excelled in either of these positions, and he held them simultaneously. Through this public service Mr. Farley built himself into popularity and usefulness and now, as a plain citizen, he is highly potent and very generally respected.

[From the Grand Junction (Colo.) Daily Sentinel]

WITH A NATION'S RESPECT

One does not have to deal merely in platitudes when it comes to paying tribute to James A. Farley in connection with his retirement from the President's Cabinet and from the Democratic national chairmanship. Extravagant statements could be made and still could be kept within the bounds of sincerity. We haven't any hesitancy in saying that the President's Cabinet is all the weaker because of Mr. Farley's retirement. We know whereof we speak when we say that the ablest man that ever directed a Democratic national campaign relinquished that job when Jim Farley quit.

There is this to be said, without the slightest exaggeration (and such exaggeration is always needed in most cases of this kind, whether on the Democratic or Republican side), that James A. Farley retires from these two high-ranking positions retaining to the fullest degree a nation's respect, regardless of politics, as to his ability, his sincerity, his cleanliness in public and private life, and his high standard of citizenship.

Not many times in the Nation's history has the United States Senate voluntarily and informally, with men on both sides participating, taken time out to pay tribute to a great political manager.

There is no need for anybody to deny a contention that the coming campaign is going to be aware of the absence of the great organizing ability and the remarkable personal influence of Jim Farley.

It has been our privilege to know Jim Farley personally for many years, and we are among the countless thousands who feel that the national tributes paid him have been deserved. He will be remembered as a great Democrat and a great party leader long after the names of many of the so-called new dealers who weren't fond of him have faded into oblivion.

[From the Hoboken Jersey Observer of August 31, 1940]

EXIT JAMES A. FARLEY

James A. Farley retires today as Postmaster General after almost 8 years of service, during all of which time, up to a few days ago, he has also been chairman of the Democratic National Committee. This was a difficult dual assignment in which a smaller man would surely have bogged down, either failing to attain a high standard in the administration of his public office or arousing criticism by his management of his party's affairs.

But Mr. Farley emerges from the test triumphantly. Perhaps he is not really a bigger man than he was when he entered the Cabinet, but he has risen inestimably in public esteem, and carries with him into private life the best wishes of all parties and factions.

In a day when Cabinet officers are passing so frequently as scarcely to attract any attention, the Senate paused the other day to pay tribute to his sterling public services, and these tributes came not only from Democrats but from some of the strongest party men on the other side of the Chamber.

[From the Catholic Review of September 6, 1940]

MR. FARLEY'S SUCCESSOR

It is our general policy not to take editorial notice of appointments to political office. However, we would note the appointment of Frank C. Walker as Postmaster General of the United States by saying that we do not think he can do better than to so resolve to so work that he will carry back to private life some day something of the esteem with which his predecessor, James A. Farley, was held the Nation over.

We are not referring to Mr. Farley, the politician, but to Mr. Farley the man. Mr. Farley has made his name one that is symbolical of sincerity and fair play. He is known as a man who never broke his word, no matter how great the pressure, no matter how demanding the call of expediency.

But the thing that has impressed us most about Mr. Farley is the esteem in which he is held by those who worked under him, the thousands of men and women in the Post Office Department.

Mail men, mail clerks and others will tell you unanimously, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the northern boundary of our country to the Gulf of Mexico, that Mr. Farley was more concerned with their welfare than with any praise from the country for the way in which he ran his office.

In other words, Mr. Farley was unwilling to save money at the expense of the welfare of those under him. He believed that the men and women of his Department were worthy of their hire. He believed they had the right to enjoy the comforts of life and to care for their families better than they had been enabled to care for them before he took office.

These men and women of the Post Office Department remember that there was a Postmaster General of some 25 years ago who was more concerned with his reputation for keeping down expenses than he was in seeing that the men and women of his Department were given a living wage. The Postmaster General to whom we refer deliberately frustrated a program to increase their salaries merely for the sake of his own reputation. As a result the employees of the post-office service suffered untold hardships at a time when other men and women were getting high wages.

Jim Farley was never that way. He conducted the Post Office Department with an efficiency that probably has not been surpassed in history. That is why there are millions of Americans who esteem him far more for his love for his fellowmen than for his political acumen and his many other gifts.

[From the Bridgeport (Conn.) Times-Star of September 3, 1940]

JIM FARLEY

A good clean-thinking and clean-living man stepped off the national stage this past week end when Jim Farley left the Government service and left politics to enter business.

He has been, by practically everybody's agreement, a first-rate Postmaster General. He has been also, by the verdict of the ballot count, a remarkably astute political manager, arranging things so that Roosevelt was nominated for the Presidency in 1932 and twice overwhelmingly elected. In the recent third nomination of Roosevelt Jim Farley played no part.

Now he goes out of politics, the immediate major interest of American males, and into two other interests of the people which are almost as important and which have the advantage over politics of being year-round and every-year attractions—baseball and "pop."

May the green ink which he made famous on his political letters shine verdantly henceforth on contracts bringing stars into the Yankee fold and on fine fat sales contracts for "pop."

[From the Washington Union Clerk of September 1940]

RESIGNATION OF POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY

Postal employees throughout the Nation will concur in the deserved tribute to Postmaster General James A. Farley contained in the editorial from the Washington Star of August 9, 1940, which is reproduced here:

"It was inevitable that James A. Farley, retiring from the chairmanship of the National Democratic Committee, also should resign his position as Postmaster General. The announcement issued recently, therefore, was not unexpected. But it does not follow necessarily that the news was received by the public without regret.

"Mr. Farley earned his place in President Roosevelt's Cabinet by political assistance rendered, then justified it by proving again as he had on several previous occasions the simple fact that he is a man of sound business acumen, skilled in the management of affairs and of people, efficient in the performance of administrative duty. His term as head of the largest organization of its kind in the world has been eminently successful. Understanding as he did that 'the final test * * * for any official is the record of his service' he applied his 'efforts and energies to the job of making substantial improvements * * * and to saving money for Uncle Sam rather than bothering about petty criticism in regard to details which, after all, were not extremely important.'

"Certainly there were mistakes during Mr. Farley's tenure. But of more lasting importance were such achievements as the inauguration of trans-oceanic air mail, the development of a vast building program for the rehousing of postal facilities throughout the Nation and the gradual improvement of postal revenues for work done for hire.

"Mr. Farley is honorably proud of his career in the Post Office Department. He has the right to look back upon it with satisfaction. The public in appreciation of his labors wishes him well in his new venture into private enterprise."

That the administration of Hon. James A. Farley, for the last 7½ years, "has been eminently successful" will not be seriously disputed by anyone not personally captious. In his letter of resignation, Mr. Farley attributed the success of his administration to the fine cooperation given him by postal employees throughout the service, from his associates in the Department to the last field-service employee.

Such cooperation is, of course, essential to the successful conduct of any institution of the extent and scope of the United States Postal Service. Cooperation of that character is not something, however, that "just happens." Human beings, and postal employees are no exception to the rule, react according to the treatment they receive and according to their confidence or lack of confidence in the justice they may expect from those in authority.

The success of his administration and the fact that there has been cooperation testifies to the confidence that postal employees have had in the fairness and humanitarian attitude of Postmaster General Farley.

To the commendation for efficient and extended Postal Service and sound business administration we would add that of the post-office clerks for the improved morale of employees and the many evidences of his desire to extend to them a fair share of the benefits of improved efficiency.

It was wise leadership that prompted the selection of veteran postal employees for the important administration posts. It was wise administration that prompted the promotion to higher positions in the Post Office Department and to postmasterships of more postal employees than ever before in a similar period. The last 7½ years have witnessed much progress in the development of improved personnel relationships. Postal employees experience sincere regret at the departure of Big Jim. We hope that his successor will be as successful and can assure him of the continued cooperation of the great army of postal employees as long as their confidence in worthy leadership can be maintained.

[From the National Rural Letter Carrier of September 7, 1940]

FARLEY FAREWELL AT DEPARTMENT

With hundreds of employees of the Post Office Department crowding the spacious reception hall of the Postmaster General, Second Assistant Postmaster General Smith W. Purdum gave vocal expression of the sincere regret on the part of the workers on Friday afternoon, August 30, at a farewell reception tendered Postmaster General James A. Farley.

At the conclusion of his remarks, Second Assistant Purdum presented the Postmaster General with a set of diamond cuff links and studs, the gift of the Department workers.

Herewith are the remarks both of Second Assistant Purdum and the response of Postmaster General Farley:

PURDUM REMARKS AT FARLEY FAREWELL PARTY

"Mr. Farley, for 7½ years you have been the head of the most important agency of our Government, having to do with the daily affairs of our people. You have been the leader of, and co-worker with a vast army of men and women in the Department and throughout the States of this Union and our colonial possessions. By your unexcelled leadership and great human understanding, the Postal Service has been placed on a plane supported by integrity, character, loyalty, devotion to duty, and service to the people.

"All of us here in the Post Office Department at Washington, and the thousands in the field, have a deep affection for you, and our love and respect for you is as constant as the throbbing of our hearts. Volumes might be written or spoken concerning yourself by those of us in the service, but no words can be found which could truly show the heartfelt feelings of those who have worked with you and for you.

"This official parting is, indeed, surrounded by a cloud of sadness but when we look forward and upward we see an opening in that cloud, and that is a bright light, which is a part of yourself yesterday, today, and tomorrow. In that light we see words of your splendid Americanism, your devotion to duty and your great understanding, coming from your mind and big heart—the words loyalty and devotion to duty, and give the best that is in us to the people of our country.

"Every moment in your tenure of office as Postmaster General you have been kind and considerate of us and have given us wise counsel, for which we are very grateful.

"Our regard and affection for you are such that they cannot, even in a minute degree, be shown in gold or precious stones, but we here felt that it would be proper and fitting to have you carry away with you a small token as a remembrance of those with whom you have come in almost daily contact.

"On behalf of my associates gathered here this token is tendered you with every good wish and that the blessings of a Divine Providence rest upon you and Mrs. Farley, Betty, Anne, and Jimmie for long life and happiness, and that you may long be spared to the people of our country for a further great service."

FARLEY REPLY TO PURDUM'S TRIBUTE

"Fellow workers, now this is not a pleasant occasion for me. On occasions similar to this, when other men left the Department I knew exactly how they felt and I felt for them. I came down here seven and a half years ago a total stranger. I didn't know one person in the Post Office Department. I was not here very long before I felt as though I knew everycne in the Department because the assistants who were in the Department at the time and those who came in shortly after made me feel perfectly at home, and in the seven and a half years I have been here, everyone connected with the Department in high and low positions have gone out of their way to be kind and considerate and helpful. I was away a great deal of the time on business, sometimes not in connection with the Department, but no matter where I went, no matter what I was doing, I knew full well that the Department would run along all right because those associated with me and conducting the affairs of the Department and its activities were competent and capable men who knew more about the Department and its activities than I did, because they had grown up in the Department.

"Whatever success I have had, if any, in conducting the affairs of the Department have been due entirely to the loyalty and support I have received from my assistants from the top to the bottom. I don't think any Postmaster General in the history of the Nation ever received the same consideration I have received, not only from the men and women in the Department here, but all over the country. I have traveled a great deal in connection with postal activities. I think it can be said without boasting that I met probably more postal employees than all my predecessors put together in the entire history of the Department. I have been in more post offices, visited more people in the Postal Service, and I was glad to do it too; I had a lot of pleasant experiences—some of them very funny.

"I am not going to say any more; I could talk for hours and talk all day and not say any more than I can say in a few words. I shall always be grateful to everyone connected with the Postal Service for everything they have done for me during my connection with it.

"I have been here 7½ years—longer than any other men were permitted to preside over the destinies of the Department with the exception of General Burleson, Gideon Granger, and Return Jonathan Meigs, Jr."

POSTMASTER GENERAL RESIGNS

It is with a positive feeling of regret that we hear of the resignation of James A. Farley as Postmaster General. From the standpoint of the employee personnel, Mr. Farley, or "Genial Jim," as press notices called him, was a good boss. He will be remembered by the men in post office workrooms long after less considerate Postmaster Generals are forgotten. He will be noted in history as the first man to hold that office with sufficient temerity and business acumen to place the blame for the annual so-called deficit where it actually belonged. We sincerely hope that his successor will be possessed of his understanding and democratic approach to personnel problems. We wish Mr. Farley all the success in his new business venture that his personality and ability will secure, and that is considerable.

[From the Catholic News of September 14, 1940]

REPRESENTATIVE CATHOLICS

The Constitution of the United States provides that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." When a person is appointed to public office he is appointed as a citizen and not as a representative of the denomination to which he professes allegiance.

It is natural that publications serving members of a particular religious group will record the fact when one of their fellow members has been honored by selection for high public office. But outside the publications of their particular denomination, the religious affiliations of Cabinet members are rarely published, except when such an officer is a Catholic. Few persons except personal friends and associates know the religious connections of non-Catholic officials, but practically every literate person in the Nation at all familiar with national politics knows from the secular press that the Postmaster General for the past 8 years was a Catholic.

Postmaster General James A. Farley was not a Catholic representative in the Cabinet, but the tributes being paid him now by political friends and foes, by the press of his party and by the opposition, indicate that he was a truly representative Catholic there. All unite in saying of him that his word has never failed to be as good as his bond, and that he has ever been the personification of integrity. This record, demonstrating his fidelity to Catholic principles, is the finest reward he could carry back with him to private life.

Mr. Farley's successor, Mr. Frank C. Walker, also goes into the Cabinet as a citizen and not as a representative in either a religious or a political sense of the church of which he has the privilege of being a member. But we may say that he also has been a representative Catholic, not a mere nominal one but a Catholic who has felt an obligation to take an active part in Catholic action, particularly in the field of charity, a Catholic who has exemplified Catholic principles in his daily life. The daily press asserts that the appointment comes to him unsought, and is accepted as a duty and at a sacrifice. We quote the Atlanta Journal when we say that "those who know him best pay him the high compliment of predicting that as Postmaster General he will prove a worthy successor to James A. Farley."

[From the Postal Record of September 1940]

POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY RESIGNS HIGH OFFICE

On August 31, 1940, Postmaster General Farley retires as head of the Post Office Department to accept an inviting offer from private industry, after having served with marked distinction in this high station for more than 7 years. This resignation was made public on August 8, by President Roosevelt, by publication of a letter from Mr. Farley and his own letter of acceptance. "I want you to know how much I appreciate the honor you conferred upon me and the trust that you placed in me," stated Postmaster General Farley in his letter of resignation, "when you appointed me to this important position in your Cabinet, when you took office on March 4, 1933." He likewise referred gratefully to the warm cooperation of his departmental associates, to postmasters and postal employees, Nationwide, throughout his entire term of service.

The two terms of Postmaster General Farley, dating from the 1933 depression low, now present a record of postal progress extraordinary. Mr. Farley, in his letter of resignation, referred briefly to certain major service accomplishments of this period. Postal revenue, now at an all-time high, totaled $766,000,000 for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1940. The Postal Service has been placed on a net self-sustaining basis. Postal labor hours have been reduced from 44 to 40 per week. Air-mail operations have been vastly extended, including the establishment of trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific service; postal expenditures have been reduced despite record receipts and volume, and an impressive total of outstanding services has been performed for other Government agencies. Paying tribute to the manner in which the Department's relations with its employees had been carried on, Postmaster General Farley said:

"Through our cooperation with each of the employees' organizations, we have succeeded in bringing about a new spirit of friendliness and devotion to duty in the ranks of more than 300,000 postal employees, and I doubt if the morale of the postal workers has ever been higher than it is at the present time."

Voluntary retirements from high office are not infrequent, but few are the occasions where a Nation-wide interest has been so manifest and rarer still, where press and public have joined so unreservedly in bestowing praise for service rendered, as has been accorded General Farley. It is a tribute of appreciation to achievement honorably earned and well deserved. Moreover, it reflects the mature judgment of the people.

In reviewing the administrative record of Postmaster General Farley during a period beginning with service deflation unprecedented, and despite all difficulties moving steadily forward to its present unrivaled eminence, there is none that can more fittingly testify to their regard for Postmaster General Farley than the great army of postal employees who have been privileged to work with and for him. Inspired with confidence by his cheerfulness, his friendliness, his high integrity, and his unfailing desire to be reasonable and fair, this association and its membership have responded gladly to his every service call.

Addressing the National Association of Letter Carriers in its 1933 Atlantic City convention assembled, 6 months after assuming office, Postmaster General Farley declared, "I believe in organization, because only through organization can great results be accomplished. There can be no doubt," he added, "that the condition of postal workers is much better than it would have been without the active work of the various postal associations." He also assured this vast audience that it would continue to be his policy "to discuss frankly with you and your representatives any matters that affect your welfare or the good of the service." Declaring his belief that the Nation was on the road back to prosperity, and that improved employment conditions would accelerate that trend, he announced, "I have directed that the payless furlough be suspended on September 30."

This policy, faithfully adhered to ever since, has been the dominant note in postal administration. On July 3, 1935, Postmaster General Farley, speaking on behalf of the President and himself, withdrew his previous objection and urged the enactment of the Mead 40-hour week bill. This bill, enacted on August 17, 1935, was made operative October 1, 1935, now almost 5 years ago. On June 4, 1936, largely through departmental cooperation, the Higgins 6-to-1 substitute ratio bill, which vastly improved substitute employment conditions, was enacted into law. Meanwhile, the observance of Christmas as a postal holiday has been substantially liberalized.

Addressing the 1937 Kansas City N. A. L. C. convention, Postmaster General Farley said, in confessing to a very warm spot in his heart for letter carriers, "There is something about you boys in gray that makes all Americans proud of you; that makes me proud to be your chief. To me it seems that a greater part of the good will we enjoy is brought to us by you."

Taking the postal service in its varied relations as his theme, Postmaster General Farley, addressing one gathering after another throughout his administration, drove home a continuing message of its growth, dependability, and usefulness. Invariably he exalted its history, its processes and policy, and invariably gave generous credit to his predecessors and all postal employees for the success achieved. His contributions to postal literature are now a great Service asset.

Postmaster General Farley now returns to private life with the universal esteem of the American people. We share in full the satisfaction that must come to him through doing a big job and doing it well, as he views the present healthy condition of postal affairs and its certain promise of greater usefulness. We would have Mr. Farley know how affectionately we regard him and how sincerely our best wishes follow him in whatever the enterprise may be that engages his efforts. Saluting him, we declare, "It has been a glorious 7 years."

[From the San Francisco Postmasters' Gazette]

SO LONG, JIM!

When President Franklin D. Roosevelt reluctantly accepted the resignation of Postmaster General James A. Farley from the Cabinet, effective August 31, 1940, he wrote: "All of us in the administration will miss you deeply. We count on seeing you often. I especially count on this after your years of close personal association. Our friendship will always continue."

That gracious expression of the President of the United States will strike a responsive chord in the heart of every employee of the Post Office Department and, even more particularly, of the postmasters of the Nation and the members of the National Association of Postmasters. It exactly expresses our feelings toward Mr. Farley.

But the President wrote as the head of the Government to a subordinate but important member of his Cabinet. Our expression is diametrically opposite because it comes from the employee to the executive; nevertheless the sentiment is the same. And therein lies the evidence of the unusual affection, respect and regard which Jim Farley inspired.

Whether in the White House, at the Cabinet table, or in the simple gatherings of friends; whether with his immediate assistants and the executives of the Post Office Department or in the more humble ranks of the workers in the field; whether with the United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives or the thousands of men and women who are just the good plain folks of our country; in a word, whether with the high or the low, the rich or the poor, the prince or the pauper, Jim Farley registered and left the indelible impression of his magnetic personality.

As an organizer he stands without a peer in American politics. As an executive, among other things, he can proudly point to the accomplishments of the past 7 years in the United States Post Office, where 6 out of those years show a postal profit in remarkable contrast to the records of his predecessors. Because loyalty is one of his outstanding characteristics, he commanded in his leadership a respect, an enthusiasm, and a devotion which few men in public or in private life have inspired. In a more personal sense, he has guided his life by such high conduct and ideals as to be an inspiration for every man. As a friend, there was no cross too heavy, no road too rough, no hour too early or too late for Jim Farley's big broad hand not to be helpfully outstretched to those in need.

And so the refrain of the old song, So Long, Mary—How We Hate to See You Go, repeats itself as we bid good-bye to Jim Farley. There are and there should be no tears at his leaving. It is not farewell or another Good-bye, Mr. Chips. For his own purposes and betterment, and for the security of his family, he leaves the Post Office for private and more profitable employment. One would be less than human, however, under such circumstances not to offer some expression of regret at the severance of an association which has been so intimately pleasant. We called him the Big Boss—Big Brother would have been far more appropriate.

So long, Jim! If good wishes will help you in your new field of endeavor, you certainly carry them in abundance from the National Association of Postmasters. Without your inspiration and encouragement, we would not have reached the heights to which we have climbed. Your friendship and helping hand have, in more ways than one, lighted the weary way and lifted the heavy load. May the good that you have done return to you like the proverbial loaves and fishes multiplied a hundredfold. May your influence continue to inspire our devotion and loyalty to the Service and ourselves. May your friendship ever surround us as our affection follows you "while you roam." May the blessings of Providence be showered upon you and your loved ones in abundance. So long, Jim!

WILLIAM H. MCCARTHY.

A TRIBUTE TO JAMES ALOYSIUS FARLEY

Whereas the Honorable James Aloysius Farley has served with the highest distinction as Postmaster General of the United States; and

Whereas during the years of Mr. Farley's incumbency the Post Office Department reached a peak of efficiency and service to the American people; and

Whereas all of his contacts with the personnel of the Post Office Department have been distinguished by sympathy, understanding, and rare administrative ability and judgment; and

Whereas throughout this period Mr. Farley has never failed to give the most careful personal consideration to all matters brought to his attention by the United National Association of Post Office Clerks, the National Federation of Federal Employees, the National Rural Letter Carriers Association, and the National Association of Postal Supervisors, which organizations compose the National Legislative Council of Federal Employee Organizations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Legislative Council of Federal Employee Organizations present to Mr. Farley this evidence of their esteem, and extend to him every good wish for his future health, happiness, and success.

LUTHER C. STEWARD,
President, National Federation of Federal Employees.

[From the Post Office Clerk of September 1940]

JAMES A. FARLEY, A GREAT AMERICAN

Those things are best said which are spoken simply and from the heart.

Realizing this, we of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks say that James A. Farley leaves the Post Office Department with the love, the affection, the admiration of every man and woman in the Department.

In the years he has served as Postmaster General we have come to know Jim Farley well. We know that he spared no effort to insure the progress of the great Department given into his charge, and to enhance the well-being of its personnel. Because this is so, the Post Office Department has achieved a new peak of service to the American people, the cause of the merit system has been immensely advanced in the Department, and the whole tenor of personnel administration has been improved.

There have been many Postmasters General of the United States. It is a plain statement of fact that James A. Farley's name will be inscribed within that narrow circle reserved for the truly great leaders of the Department.

But over and beyond Jim Farley's tangible accomplishments as Postmaster General he will be remembered by the thousands of men and women of the Department, and especially by the officers and members of the United National Association of Post Office Clerks, for those intangible qualities which give to life its finest meaning.

His warmth and understanding, his quick sympathy, his firm and friendly handclasp, his unfailing courtesy, his genuine concern for the welfare of others—these will not be forgotten. Jim Farley combined administrative ability of the highest order with a humaneness which endeared him to the heart of every employee of the Department, from top to bottom.

The record made by James A. Farley as Postmaster General of the United States was brilliant, perhaps unparalleled in the long history of the Department. In that record he can, and surely does, take justifiable pride. But we know Jim Farley well enough to say that it means even more to him by far that he leaves the Department with the heartfelt good wishes and deep esteem of all who have served under him for the past 7 years.

Jim Farley is that kind of a man.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include excerpts from a booklet entitled, "The Truth About England."

These are articles which everyone should read, as they give real information on a subject which is vital to the interests of America. The book is published by the League to Save America First, box 307, Hollywood, Calif.

THE TRUTH ABOUT ENGLAND—FOREWORD

When, in October 1937, President Roosevelt startled America, and the world, with his declaration that the democratic nations must unite to suppress the aggressor nations, the declaration was quietly whispered throughout England and France, as proof, that in "due time" America would again join the Allies in a new war against Germany. When 4 months later, Secretary Harold Ickes broadcast throughout the British Empire (but not in America) the speech in which he promised in substance that should England again be involved in war America would come to her aid as we had done in 1917, the Ickes promise was quietly whispered throughout England and France, as further proof, that in "due time" America would join in another war to make the world safe for democracy.

When, 10 months later, Secretary Cordell Hull convened the Pan American Conference at Lima, Peru, it was quietly whispered in England and France that the purpose of the Lima conference was not as Secretary Hull had indicated—a conference to promote commerce between the United States and the 20 nations of Central and South America—but was instead, an attempt to destroy the commerce then existing between the 20 nations, and the aggressor states, Germany and Italy. So interpreted, the people of England and France regarded the Lima Conference as further evidence that America was aiding the Allies and weakening Germany, for the war soon to begin.

When a few months later, in his best-remembered speech, Mr. Roosevelt declared emphatically that in the present war, the entire resources of America should be pledged to the Allies, his pledge even when qualified by the phrase "short of war," was shouted throughout England and France as proof positive, that in "due time," American troops would fight for the Allies, as in 1917.

In the light of these events—and in view of the further fact that for months past our press and radio, pulpits and platforms have flooded the country with pro-English, prowar propaganda, it should now be evident to every thoughtful American that for more than 3 years, our Government has moved steadily and methodically toward another world war. From now on, we may expect an acceleration of war preparations and war propaganda. Again we will be told that England and America are one people blessed with the same laws, customs, language, and religion; again as in 1917 we will be told that "our interests are identical," that if England loses, we lose. That as England is fighting our battle, we should join in that battle and fight for England. Because we believed these things in 1917, and because there is some danger that we may believe them a second time, we set forth in this booklet conclusive evidence that such propaganda is wholly untrue.

Since "conclusive evidence" must always be founded on facts, we submit as a suitable foundation, the following historical sketch: Of the 340 years of English-American history, America has been free from English domination for exactly 40 years. From 1781 and the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, to 1791 and the founding of the Bank of the United States, we were free from English domination for a period of 10 years. From 1833, when Andrew Jackson destroyed the Bank of the United States, until 1863 when Congress passed the National Banking Act we enjoyed another 30 years of freedom from English domination.

Thus our history falls into two divisions, 40 years of economic freedom, and 300 years of economic and political servitude to English kings, bankers, merchants, and shipowners. Using this 300 years of English domination as a blackboard, we will inscribe in school-teacher fashion a series of dates and events that will reveal and prove the truth about England. * * *

CHAPTER I. THE PERIOD OF CONSTRUCTIVE SERVITUDE

From about 1600 to about 1750, the American Colonies enjoyed a continuing increase in population and prosperity despite an ever-present and increasing restraint imposed by Mother England.

In 1606 the English Crown granted the Colonies their first charter, under which they were permitted to establish a colonial government; and among the grants and privileges set forth in the charter, the concession of greatest importance was that contained in section X, which empowered the colonists to establish their own banking system, and issue and circulate their own colonial money. * * * Because this colonial banking system was free from any English interference, and because their money was issued by the Government and not by private bankers, the Colonies experienced an immediate expansion of commerce, both between the Colonies and with foreign nations. * * * As a result of this expansion in trade, the Colonies grew in population and prosperity until they were known and envied around the world. By 1750 the American Colonies, with a population of nearly 3,000,000 and with a growing commerce sailing the Seven Seas, began to be known in Europe as the American Utopia; but in England this American Utopia with its Colonies were growing too fast in population and wealth. * * * In another generation they would be relatively independent, with their own banks, their own industries, and their own commerce. So the English bankers and manufacturers said to the English Crown, "If the American Colonies attain economic independence they will soon demand political independence, and thus the Crown will lose its brightest jewel and we will lose our best market." Thus began between the Crown, the bankers, and merchants a conspiracy to prevent American independence—either economic or political.

As the first step in the conspiracy Parliament passed a law forbidding the colonies from trading with any nation except England, the Parliament expecting the law to have three specific results:

First, since American ships would no longer call in any ports except those of England, emigration to the colonies from other lands would be greatly restricted and the population of the colonies remain largely English. This result would benefit the Crown.

As a second result of the law the colonies would be compelled to sell their raw materials and farm products to English merchants and be compelled to buy their manufactured products from English merchants, and for such prices as the English merchants would dictate. This result would benefit the merchants and manufacturers.

Third. Since the balance of trade would always be in favor of England, and this trade balance must be paid in gold, the colonies, having no gold, would be compelled to borrow it in England. This result would benefit the bankers of England.

One need not be a financial expert to understand that this first step of the conspiracy would be a terrific blow to the colonies and their expanding commerce, and so it was. In a few years prosperity had given place to poverty, hardship succeeded happiness, and here and there were men who spoke of revolution. But here, as many times later, England had overreached herself, for the colonies, unable to buy or sell to advantage in England, began to solve their problem by building their own factories, and by so doing create a market for their raw materials, create the goods formerly purchased in England, and create employment for their workmen. So, fearing the success of this new threat to their domination, the bankers and merchants of England compelled Parliament to pass a second law, the Stamp Act of 1765.

Under the provisions of this law, no circular or pamphlet, no legal documents such as notes, mortgages, and bills of exchange could be circulated in the Colonies without first affixing thereto English stamps; the stamps ranging in cost from 1 penny to $50. As in the former case, three results were expected from this Stamp Act.

First, it would prevent the Colonies from attaining economic independence, and so benefit the Crown.

Second, it would place such a burden on business, that investments in colonial industry would be curtailed, and so benefit the merchants and manufacturers of England.

Third, since the stamps must be paid for in English money—gold—the Colonies would be forced to borrow from English bankers, thus bringing the bankers complete domination of colonial money.

But again, as in the former case, England had over-reached herself, for the act so completely destroyed colonial business, that there was an immediate and almost unanimous demand throughout the Colonies for revolution and independence. Aware of this threat of revolution, Parliament repealed the Stamp Act in 1766, but the damage was already done and could not be repaired.

For realizing that in the two laws just described, England was attempting to throttle the Colonies; and, realizing further that Colonial expansion could no longer proceed under English rule, the demand for revolution increased in scope and fury until 1776, when the Colonies issued the Declaration of Independence and began the war which ended in victory in 1781, with the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. So ended the 180-year period which we have called the period of constructive servitude—constructive because for 180 years England permitted the development of the Colonies; and servitude because that development proceeded under an increasing English restraint and was stopped when it threatened to expand into colonial economic independence. Had England possessed that spirit of humanity and democracy of which she has boasted, she would have foreseen the folly of her tyranny, but, lacking that spirit, she make the greatest mistake in history, forced America into war losing all the Colonies had become, and all they might have become.

From 1781 to 1791 the new American state was completely free from English domination. During these 10 years the Constitution was enacted as the sovereign law of the land, Washington became our first President, and the new Nation began its march toward world preeminence. But England was not through with us yet; what she had lost at Yorktown she now planned to regain in New York, what she had lost on the field of battle she now planned to recover in the field of finance. And so we come to another chapter in English-American history, a 120-year period of English tyranny, which we shall call

CHAPTER II. THE PERIOD OF DESTRUCTIVE SERVITUDE

While this period officially began in 1791, it actually began in 1778 at Valley Forge, in the darkest days of the Revolutionary War. With General Washington unable to procure funds to equip his dwindling army, it looked for a time as though the war for independence would be lost; but at the psychological moment a Philadelphia merchant, Robert Morris, came to Washington's rescue, and placed at his disposal more than $1,000,000. In those days $1,000,000 was a stupendous sum, and when from authentic records we discover that at the time of his gift Robert Morris was worth approximately $100,000, the question arises where did he get the million he gave to Washington? He got it from another Philadephia merchant, one Haym Solomon, who in turn had received it from a famous European banker. And it is well to remember in this connection, that this million dollars did more than save the revolutionary cause—it changed and crystalized the whole trend of American history.

AN ENGLISHMAN BECOMES OUR FIRST SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Soon after making his gift, Robert Morris suggested to General Washington that he appoint a young man named Alexander Hamilton as aide-de-camp, saying that as young Hamilton was an expert financier he could render invaluable services in handling the finances of the Army. Hamilton, who had been born a British subject and trained in British banking and business methods, soon won the confidence of General Washington, and when 11 years later the general had become the President he installed young Hamilton as our first Secretary of the Treasury. It was rumored that the appointment was made on the advice of Robert Morris and Haym Solomon, but be that as it may it is beyond question that Hamilton was better fitted for the office than any other man then available—as his later record revealed.

During his year as Secretary of the Treasury Hamilton placed the national credit on a sound financial basis, following as far as possible the plans and principles long since adopted by the Treasury Department of the English Government. But as later events revealed, Hamilton accomplished something of even greater importance during his year as Secretary of the Treasury—he formed substantial contacts and friendships with leading Members of Congress, who were later to repay his favors in a most substantial manner.

After a year in office and without a word of warning to President Washington, Hamilton resigned, announcing his intention to devote his energies to private business. Since Hamilton had planned the Treasury Department and was the only man in America who understood its intricacies, his sudden resignation precipitated and spread throughout the Nation a loss of confidence in the Government's financial security. Immediately Government finances became involved and Government credit impaired, and when leading bankers and businessmen annouced their loss of confidence, now that Hamilton was no longer in control, a wave of fear and uncertainty engulfed the Nation. Beyond question, this is exactly what Hamilton and his friends had planned and expected—to precipitate a break-down of the Nation's financial structure as the first step of a conspiracy to gain control of the Nation's banking.

About 1 year after his resignation, and with conditions growing from bad to worse, Hamilton petitioned Congress for a charter for a national bank, urging that by no other means could national confidence be restored and the Nation's financial structure preserved. When first made the request was refused, but later as conditions grew worse, and his friends in Congress had done their work, the petition was granted, and Hamilton was given a charter for "the Bank of the United States," the said charter to expire in 20 years. Concerning the internal organization of the new bank, the following may prove interesting: In form and power, it was a duplicate of the Bank of England. Much of its stock was bought by English bankers. The gold which sustained its credit had been brought from England. In brief, the original "Bank of the United States" was little other than a branch of the Bank of England, as Hamilton had planned it should be, from the day he took office as Secretary of the Treasury. Patterned after the Bank of England, financed with English gold, and with much of its stock owned in England, the bank began its operations—and how did it operate?

It operated as surgeons usually operate, by cutting out something; and in a few years, the bank had cut out the happiness and security of most the Americans in America. And this is how the bank operated:

It restricted its loans (1) to Englishmen who had lately arrived to get in on the ground floor and who at once bought a controlling interest in existing companies and, when this was not possible, started similar companies in competition; (2) made loans to those merchants who would make their foreign purchases in England; (3) made loans to those American Tories of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, who had opposed our War for Independence. * * * In brief, this Bank of the United States restricted its loans, as far as possible, to those English, and pro-English Americans, who could be counted on to aid in placing the American people under the financial tyranny of Mother England. * * * As the inevitable result of this concentration of money and control of credit, it was but a few years until this crew of pro-English pirates had captured the American ship of state, together with most of the wealth therein contained.

That such a result was inevitable was indicated many years later by Pope Pius XI. In his remarkable monograph, Forty Years After, published in 1931, Pope Pius XI said: "This power (concentrated economic domination) becomes particularly irresistible when exercised by those who, because they hold and control money, are able also to govern credit, and determine its allotment." It was the fact of "allotment" which made the tyranny of the Hamilton Bank "particularly irresistible." For the bank's loans were "allotted" mainly to the English and pro-English. This system of concentrated money and controlled credit Hamilton inaugurated in 1791, a system which in a few years had given a few men complete control of our banking, industry, and commerce, to the end that Englishmen and the pro-English Americans who had opposed the War of Independence received most of the Nation's profits, while those who had fought and won the War of Indepndence had been driven out of business and their properties foreclosed.

In brief, what England had lost at Yorktown and Saratoga, she had regained in New York and Washington: She had lost the battle with bullets, but won the battle with gold, and again the American people, as in the days of the Colonies, were the victims of English tyranny. True, they still retained their boasted liberties, the freedom of speech and assembly, but these were of no avail, for Hamilton could say with Rothschild, "Give me the power to control a nation's money, and I care not who makes its laws." But here again, as in 1765, Mother England had overreached herself—too many Americans had been victimized by her greed, too many merchants and manufacturers had been driven out of business, too many farmers had lost their land, and too many workmen were walking the streets, while newly arrived Englishmen possessed their jobs; indeed, conditions had grown so desperate that even the Congressmen controlled by this "Bank of the United States" were afraid for their lives and jobs. So it happened that in 1811, when the bank's charter was about to expire, and it was certain that Congress would refuse the petition for another 20-year charter, England, fearing the loss of her racket, repeated her trick of 1776 and forced America into war—the War of 1812.

WAR OF 1812

The reader is here cautioned to remember that this War of 1812 was a war of aggression, as was the war which later destroyed the Boer Republic in South Africa. True, the War of 1812 may somewhat contradict the English claim, that all their wars are fought in defense of democracy and Christianity, but be that as it may, the English won the War of 1812 even though our history books claim they lost it. It was a verification of the old statement, that "England never won a war, or lost a peace."

Thus, after burning Washington and parts of other cities, the battlefield was shifted to New Orleans, where Gen. Andrew Jackson easily defeated the English Army under General Packenham. The ease with which America "won" the war, and the nonchalance with which England accepted defeat, has long puzzled some students of history, but the explanation is both simple and obvious—England never expected to win the war, her only objective being—an objective she easily achieved—to bankrupt the American Government. As England had foreseen and planned, the cost of the war would bankrupt the Government, after which the "Bank of the United States" would refuse to circulate its money and renew its loans—then, after a few months of fear and suffering, the people would permit Congress to issue another 20-year charter to the "Bank of the United States." The plan worked out according to schedule, and in 1812 the new charter was issued, and England and the "Bank of the United States" were off for another 20 years of plunder. Twenty years in which the American people would again be victimized, American merchants again driven out of business, American farmers again robbed of their land, and again American workmen walk the streets—and all for a group of English stockholders and pro-English bankers, masquerading behind the title, "The Bank of the United States."

When after another 20 years of loss and suffering, poverty and foreclosure the bank's second charter was due to expire and the bank was preparing to petition for a third charter, Andrew Jackson who had defeated the English in 1812, decided to defeat them again in 1832, and so in this year he ran for the Presidency, promising if elected, that he would destroy the "Bank of the United States" forever. When elected by a tremendous majority he kept his promise, and destroyed the bank which for 40 years had served as the American branch of the Bank of England.

As a result he became, and remains, the most hated American in English history. He also became the most typical American in American history—but he had not destroyed the bank forever, for in 1872 the bank returned, in a new form but under the same control.

Speaks to National League of District Postmasters at Thirty-fifth Annual Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS G. BURCH

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 26, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. THOMAS G. BURCH, OF VIRGINIA

Mr. BURCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech which I made before the National Convention of Postmasters at New York City on September 19, 1940:

Mr. Chairman, President Moody, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, I appreciate the kind invitation to address the National League of District Postmasters at your thirty-fifth annual convention, and am happy to be with you today. It is an honor and a pleasure to be invited to address this organization of postal workers. It is fine to be here in the home city of our distinguished former Postmaster General, Hon. James A. Farley, who resigned his position, effective the first of this month. He was one of the most efficient and humane Postmaster Generals this country has ever known. Under his administration the Post Office Department made great strides in business efficiency and in friendly relationship with the more than 300,000 employees. That the Post Office Service is on a self-sustaining basis, that the employees are enjoying better working conditions, the public getting improved mail service, is in itself a real tribute to James A. Farley. During his term of office the work hours per week have been reduced from 44 to 40; the substitutes have become recognized employees of the Post Office Department; the Air Mail Service improved; R. F. D. Service extended to thousands of citizens not heretofore served; first-, second-, and third-class postmasters have been placed under civil service. Under his administration the receipts of the Department in the last fiscal year increased to $766,000,000, the largest in the history of the Post Office Department; and the Department has been placed on a self-sustaining basis with respect to that part of the service rendered to the public.

We welcome our new Postmaster General, Hon. Frank C. Walker, and are confident he will have a brilliant administration and do credit to himself and honor to the Post Office Department and this administration.

We are fortunate in having career men in the positions of Assistant Postmasters General. Hon. Ambrose O'Connell, Hon. Smith W. Purdum, Hon. Ramsey S. Black, and Hon. Walter Myers are rendering distinguished service in their responsible positions. You, the Committee on Post Office and Post Roads, and the public generally are fortunate in having such capable men to serve in this capacity.

I am delighted to be in the State represented by my good friend and former chairman of the House Post Office and Post Roads Committee, the junior Senator from New York, Hon. JAMES M. MEAD. I served with him on the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee for 8 years. He is well informed on postal legislation and has the interest of the personnel of the Post Office Service at heart. The members of the committee rejoiced in his promotion but regretted to lose him as one of our members.

The Post Office Department is one of the greatest business enterprises in the world, employing over 300,000 people who daily come in contact with our citizens in every walk of life. No institution has more loyal, capable, and conscientious employees than the Post Office Department and none holds a more important and responsible position with the Department than the postmasters to whom is entrusted the responsibility of seeing that the mails are promptly and safely dispatched, not only to all parts of this country, but to the people of every nation. In addition to your usual duties, you have performed outstanding services for other Government departments and agencies within recent years. You rendered valuable service in connection with the payment of the veterans' bonus. You are an important arm of the Government in the sale of United States Savings Bonds for the Treasury Department. You were called upon to aid in the census of unemployed, registration of workers under the social-security program, and are now engaged in aiding the Department of Justice in registering aliens. Many other duties have been placed upon you, and your assistance to the various governmental departments and agencies has always been prompt and capable.

In my opinion there can be found nowhere in this great Nation a more loyal and patriotic group of American citizens than is represented here in this convention. You men and women are gathered together here today as loyal American citizens and devoted public servants in the service of the Post Office Department and 130,000,000 American people.

There are about 44,000 postmasters in the United States, and in your deliberations here in convention and in your other activities you represent these 44,000 postmasters whether they are members or not, and I am sure any action you may take will be taken in the interest of all postmasters.

I congratulate you on having efficient men as your officials. Your president, John A. Moody, is a man who has your interest at heart, is thoroughly familiar with your needs and is well liked by the officials and legislators in Washington. Your legislative representative, Mr. E. A. Meeks, is always on the job, knows the postal laws from A to Z and you need have no fear but that you will get all that is coming to you if it is within his power to get it.

Organization and cooperation are essential in getting maximum efficiency in any of our efforts. It is through organization properly conducted that the best results are obtained by any group of people. Much credit is due to the representatives of your association in Washington for their assistance and cooperation with the Post Office Department and Post Office and Post Roads Committee in the continual improvement of the Postal Service.

I extend to you the greetings of the chairman of the House Post Office and Post Roads Committee, Hon. M. A. ROMJUE, and of the entire membership of that body. I think it appropriate that I call your attention to the work of this committee during the Seventy-sixth Congress. In the first session the Post Office Committee favorably reported some 15 bills, and during the present session has favorably reported 16 bills, all of them by unanimous report, and all have passed the House. We have considered all bills coming before us on their merits and never allowed politics to enter into our deliberations. A distinguished Member of Congress, who is not a member of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, made the statement on the floor of the House when we had a bill under consideration that the Members of the House could rest assured that any bill reported favorably to the House by that committee had been thoroughly considered.

I think our committee has an unusual record for the Seventy-sixth Congress. We have recommended, and the House passed, bills improving the status of practically every branch of the Postal Service, such as requiring the appointment of assistant postmasters in first- and second-class offices, additional clerical help in post offices of the third class, and amending the appropriation bill so third-class offices may be furnished equipment and fixtures by the Department. Legislation has been passed by the House helpful to star-route carriers, rural-mail carriers, railway-mail clerks, substitutes in the Postal Service; granting sick leave and other benefits not heretofore enjoyed, clarifying the status of special-delivery messengers, providing an 8-hour workday and payment for overtime of dispatchers and mechanics in charge of motor vehicles, and other legislation which, if passed by the Senate and enacted into law will be helpful to other branches of the Postal Service. We have reported and the House has passed other bills of a clarifying nature which will strengthen existing postal legislation.

The longevity bill is now being considered by a joint committee of the Senate and House, but on account of the defense program with the large appropriations necessary to make this program effective, no action has been taken although hearings have been held and valuable information obtained which can be used at the next session of Congress. I think I am safe in saying that the subcommittee to which this bill was referred is in sympathy with the object of this proposed legislation.

On May 28, 1940, I introduced a bill, H. R. 9923, placing postmasters of the fourth class on an annual salary and fixing their rate of pay, and providing allowance for rent, fuel, light, and equipment and fixing the rate thereof. A companion bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator MEAD. This bill was introduced after exhaustive and painstaking study by the Post Office Department, two of its most efficient and experienced inspectors having been assigned to a special investigation of the proposal, and representatives of the postmasters' associations and members of the Post Office Committee of the House having given it earnest thought and consideration. It is not claimed that this is a perfect bill, and in all probability it will be amended to some extent before reported by the committee to the House, but we believe it is a step in the right direction and will remedy a bad condition now existing in the Postal Service. After it has been enacted into law and given a fair trial, if it appears that amendments are necessary for its equitable administration, we can then give consideration to the enactment of such amendments.

Under this bill it is estimated the postmasters of the fourth class will be paid an additional $900,000 annually. About 22,022 will receive an increase in salary and about 4,401 will suffer a decrease in salary, the average decrease being about $50.87 per annum. The compensation of about 2,471 postmasters will remain as it is at present. The salary will be paid semimonthly. It has been thought by some that in case this bill is enacted into law the fourth-class postmasters would be denied the fee of 3 cents they are now allowed for issuing each postal money order. This is not the case, as it is specifically stated that this provision in the existing law is for clerical help and is in no way affected, but since the question has been raised, it is the intention of the committee to insert a clarifying amendment to the effect that section 717 of title 39 of the United States Code, authorizing the payment of fees on money orders issued at money-order post offices is not repealed. If it is found advisable other clarifying amendments will be made to the bill.

As stated, it is impossible to get a perfect law and one that pleases every member of any group of people, but this bill, if enacted into law, will definitely fix salaries of all fourth-class postmasters and eliminate the system of keeping cancelations; provide annual adjustment of salaries based on variations of business and does not take from the Postmaster General any of his legal rights to adjust compensation in unusual cases.

Section 133, title 39, United States Code, provides: "Where unusual business accrues at any post office, the Postmaster General shall make a special order allowing reasonable compensation for clerical service, and a proportionate increase of salary to the postmaster during the time of such extraordinary business."

This bill lifts the veil of suspicion, fixes definite allowance for rent, light, fuel, and equipment, simplifies the accounting work in every office. It provides fair and uniform method of adjusting salaries as in first-, second-, and third-class offices, does not repeal allowances for unusual conditions and removes any doubt as to what a postmaster's salary will be each month.

You are holding your convention in this great city of New York, the largest city in the Western Hemisphere, with its 7,000,000 people, at one of the most momentous and critical periods in the history in our country—I may say of the world.

Europe is engaged in one of the most, if not the most, brutal and disastrous wars the world has ever witnessed. Loss of life, ruin, and destruction is going on day by day with no relief in sight. We should rejoice that we live in a peace-loving country and have a blessed and priceless heritage which has been handed down to us through generations by our forefathers. Let us not surrender one iota of that heritage, nor surrender our right to live the American way. Let us build the greatest Navy on earth, have the most efficient and effective air force in the world, a great and unconquerable Army. Let us not grow passive for a moment.

In realizing our responsibilities to protect our country there is no room in America for "isms"; every foot of our land is dear to us. There is no place here for the aggressor. We want no dictator. We do not covet or desire additional territory but will defend every inch of soil in our possession and protect the rights of every American citizen. We are a peace-loving people and will not become entangled in the affairs of any foreign country. We will not tolerate an aggressor or permit an army of a foreign power on our soil or the navy of a hostile nation to reach our shores. I hope the people of this country may ever be able to say, "God Bless America, My Home Sweet Home."

Roosevelt's Free Radio Use for Alleged Political Talk Brings Assault by Lawrence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEONARD W. HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 26, 1940

ARTICLE BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence, published recently in the Washington Evening Star:

ROOSEVELT'S FREE RADIO USE FOR ALLEGED POLITICAL TALK BRINGS ASSAULT BY LAWRENCE

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON, September 23.—Although the three major broadcasting companies decided to give free time to President Roosevelt's radio address at the University of Pennsylvania, it was as transparently a political address as if it had been made by Senator GUFFEY who, together with other prominent New Deal Democrats, toured Philadelphia with the President in a manifest piece of political campaigning.

Mr. Roosevelt used his University of Pennsylvania speech to answer recent attacks by Wendell Willkie, Republican nominee. He had every right to do this and nobody can object to a President campaigning for himself. What is causing public criticism is the apparent effort to make a political speech under supposedly nonpolitical auspices and to gain the use of free radio time and thus save the democratic campaign funds for other purposes.

CREATES DISUNITY

The President's speech can be divided into paragraphs and set alongside Mr. Willkie's recent utterances. Mr. Roosevelt took issue with the Willkie charge that Roosevelt had lost faith in the people. The President chose to construe this charge to mean that Mr. Willkie wanted to accept the judgment of only a few people—the managers of business. The President constantly turns most of his campaigning into efforts to array class against class and to create disunity as between the employers and employees of industry.

What Willkie has been charging is that the President is ignoring the representatives of the people in taking important steps without asking for the approval of Congress. There is no reason to believe Congress would have withheld permission to send the 50 destroyers to England, but Mr. Roosevelt was afraid of the people's representatives and not only made an agreement with a foreign government of transcendent importance to the country, but actually ignored a statute passed by the representatives of the people in Congress.

The President endeavored also in his Philadelphia speech to meet the cry of dictatorship by insisting that as long as there are "free elections" no harm can come to America.

What he did not discuss was the fact that free elections no longer exist in the sense in which the term has been used for generations in America. It is estimated, for instance, that 10,000,000 families receive checks nowadays, or benefits of some kind, direct from the Federal Government.

Hence the willingness of a President to allow his own officeholders who disburse these funds to name him for a third term means the use of governmental power and the absence of freedom in a party convention. No more palpable evidence of dictatorship is needed than the way the nomination of Henry Wallace for Vice President was forced on the delegates at the Chicago convention.

Mr. Roosevelt, in his Philadelphia speech, made no reference to the fact that the W. P. A. rolls have been increased each election year and that the scandals over the W. P. A. and A. A. A. were so great in 1936 that the Hatch law had to be passed to try to prevent a recurrence.

Now the spirit and the letter of the Hatch law and the actual provisions of the Federal corrupt-practices act are violated by the President's own campaign committee which has collected upwards of $170,000 from the corporations whose judgment Mr. Roosevelt says he does not care to accept, but whose money looks good to the campaign manager named by his own personal appointment.

The President made quite a point of the difference between the point of view of Alexander Hamilton, founder of the present-day Republican Party, and Thomas Jefferson, acknowledged founder of the Democratic Party of today. This discussion of the two contrasting philosophies in American politics had in it plenty of implications which the listening voter in the midst of a political campaign could not fail to understand, but Mr. Roosevelt, after citing Jefferson as the champion of democracy, failed to quote the founder of the Democratic Party on the one thing that is really germane to the present campaign—the third term. Writing in 1809, after serving two terms, Jefferson said:

JEFFERSON QUOTED

"If the principle of rotation be a sound one, as I conscientiously believe it to be, with respect to this office, no pretext should ever be permitted to dispense with it, because there never will be a time when real difficulties will not exist, and furnish a plausible pretext for dispensation."

Then in 1821, long after his years of retirement gave him a chance to think deliberately and objectively about Presidential tenure, Jefferson wrote again:

"The example of four Presidents, voluntarily retiring at the end of their eighth year and the progress of public opinion that the principle is salutary, have given it in practice the force of a precedent and usage, insomuch that should a President consent to be a candidate for a third election, I trust he would be rejected on this demonstration of ambitious views."

Yet Mr. Roosevelt quoted Jefferson approvingly as the defender of free government and by implication took unto his bosom the Jeffersonian philosophy, when, as a matter of fact, the Democratic Party today is split wide open because Mr. Roosevelt chooses to ignore what Jefferson said and what every President of the United States has respected since the beginning of the Republic about a third term.

Epic of the Red Man's Trial in Tribal Court

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, one of the most interesting incidents that has come to my knowledge for many a day took place recently in the district which I have the honor to represent.

Under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting a description of this incident by Mr. Meigs O. Frost, a staff correspondent of the New Orleans Times-Picayune.

The matter referred to follows:

MACON, MISS., September 20, 1940.—At Treaty Ground, Dancing Rabbit Creek, Cameron Wesley, chief of a Choctaw Tribe of less than 50 members, stood acquitted here today by Choctaw tribal law as on August 28 he stood acquitted in the Noxubee County courthouse at Macon, Miss., for the fatal shooting of Evein Tubbee, another full-blooded Choctaw of that vanishing redskin race. Wesley at his own home slew Tubbee with a rifle June 16, 1940. Twice in 2 weeks his life had been in jeopardy, first by the paleface law, then by the law of the redmen. The white man's jury set him free on a plea of self-defense. His redskin tribesmen heard him plead his own case in Choctaw, and his defense was accident. For accident is the only defense against murder by Choctaw laws that stem from the code of ancient Egypt itself, say Indian legal authorities here.

More than 500 white men, women, and children traveled long miles of dusty country dirt roads, stood for hours under a blazing sun, to witness the strange Indian ceremonies.

STANDS BESIDE GRAVE

They saw a dusky wisp of a little man standing by the grave of the man he slew 3 months ago. Chief Cameron Wesley was clad in faded blue overalls far too big for him. They were rolled up several times at the bottoms over heavy work brogans thick with red and yellow dust. His shirt, home-made by his Indian wife, was white turned gray with many washings, its front marked with faded blue embroidery, its neck like that of a Russian blouse, buttoned down the back like the dress of a child. His hat was worn and battered black felt, grimed deep with red and yellow dust.

Wesley's hands were dark and work-hardened at his tasks as a tenant farmer. His face was weathered dark copper. His hair was unfathomable black.

There was a strange pathetic dignity about that scene. And menace of something sinister loomed darkly through the blazing sunlight. For Jennie Tubbee, widow of the slain man, was not there, nor were any of the less than a dozen Choctaws of Evein Tubbee's tribe, the accusers. To the Dancing Rabbit Creek Treaty Grounds had come an Indian boy, loping along the dusty back-country roads with a message. Chief Wesley told his tribe, told his white friends, the message that Indian boy brought.

ACCUSERS ABSENT

"Some white men," said Chief Cameron Wesley, and he named them, and his listeners nodded their heads understandingly, "they got their guns out and they wouldn't let Evein Tubbee's tribe come to the treaty grounds. They don't want me tried. They want me freed so I leave this place. But I do not leave. I stay and pick my cotton. My tribe, they go ahead and try me anyway."

So the tribe went ahead and tried him anyway. It was the same situation as if in a white man's court at a murder trial all the witnesses for the State suddenly vanished. There was nothing to do but quash the case.

And when they had quashed the case, the tribe elected Cameron Wesley chief for life, there in the open air amid the dust of the hard-trodden Treaty Grounds, and then they gave a celebration dance that set the dust to flying and filled the air with throbbing high shrill cadence of Indian whoops.

Sixteen full miles through thick dust clouds the paleface spectators had come to witness the scene, and they were there before the redskins.

JUDGE PRESENT

Among the first of the spectators to arrive was Judge John C. Stennis, of the sixteenth Mississippi judicial district, who drove from his home at DeKalb, Miss. Two weeks ago he presided in the Macon courthouse when Cameron Wesley was tried under white men's law.

"I am attending this Indian tribal trial," said Judge Stennis, "because it represents, in part, a trial of human rights under a system of jurisprudence used many centuries in the Old World; a system that has many aspects of Egyptian law, and which, of course, antedates by many centuries the common law of England, which is the foundation of the law of Mississippi.

"The laws of Mississippi, which have acquitted Cameron Wesley, the defendant at this tribal trial, will seek to make his acquittal valid by attempting to prevent any infliction of any bodily punishment on the defendant by his fellow Choctaws. Of course, any penalty of social ostracism that the Indians may choose to impose may be carried out as far as the law of the State of Mississippi is concerned."

There, too, was William B. Lucas, Macon attorney, who had defended Cameron Wesley successfully 2 weeks ago. And there was a force of quiet, armed deputies appointed by Sheriff Charles Fraley, of Macon, to make sure that whatever the outcome of the trial by the Indian tribe, no bodily harm should come to Cameron Wesley.

Fully 300 white spectators had gathered at the Dancing Rabbit treaty grounds before the first Indian appeared. They copied and snapshotted the massive granite marker on the grounds, placed there by the Daughters of the American Revolution. They copied its deep-graven inscription:

"Here on September 27, 1830, was signed by the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, by which the Choctaw Nation of Indians surrendered their lands to the United States and removed west of the Mississippi. Commissioners John Coffee and John H. Eaton. Choctaw chiefs, Greenwood Leflore, Mushulatubbee, Little Leader. Erected by Bernard Romans Chapter, D. A. R., Columbus, Miss."

Then, far away amid the trees, the beat of a tribal drum was heard. It was being beaten in slow, steady, marching cadence, the cadence by which the human heart pumps blood. Though the scene was sharp and clear in bright and blazing sunlight, men and women and children looked around, startled.

TRIBAL DRUM BEAT

Up the dusty road, between high clay banks, through a leafy tunnel of ragged trees, a small band of Indians was seen approaching. In the lead an Indian boy of 14 beat the drum. Behind him marched Indian men, carrying the sticks of their ball game, like Lacrosse sticks. Behind them marched the squaws. By the squaws trudged the papooses old enough to walk, their bare feet kicking up the dust. Some of the squaws carried nursing babies at their breasts.

Their faces were inscrutable. Not a muscle moved save the involuntary twitching of coppery eyelids. Up to the Dancing Rabbit Treaty Grounds they marched. Squarely beside the grave of Evein Tubbee, the man he slew, descendants of Mushulatubbee, whose name was carved on that monument as a Choctaw chief who signed the treaty, stood Cameron Wesley, the slayer. In one hand he carried a plant with a flower in bloom. He knelt at the head of the grave. He scooped a hole in the dusty earth with his dark work-hardened hands, and he placed the flower there. His hands patted the earth about the roots as one familiar with the earth and the things that grow upon its breast.

Then he rose and took two steps. He was close beside the grave, yet, but now he was squarely in front of the granite monument on the spot where his ancestors had traded away what today are 25 of Mississippi's 82 counties; traded them away for barrels of rum and home in the Indian Territory that is Oklahoma now.

CADENCE AND COLOR

Then while white spectators strained their ears, the voice of Chief Cameron Wesley rose upon the still, hot air. The cadence of Choctaw, the long-forgotten speech, the language of a dying race, rose and fell, rose and fell.

Paleface nerves were evident in the strained white faces of the spectators who crowded close. But never an emotion showed in the still dark faces of his tribe, standing in a semicircle before him. The group of some 30 Indian men, women, and children glowing with color like a rainbow, like a sunrise, like a sunset. Shrill green, flaming scarlet, vivid blue, bright golden yellow, their cotton and silken garb was slashed with embroideries of bright colored contrasting silk thread and beads of every color in the spectrum.

And this is what Chief Cameron Wesley told them in the Choctaw that has survived 110 years, intact against the English speech that surrounds it:

"Warriors, women, children of the Choctaw Nation, I am your chief, I stand before you here at the spot where our ancestors signed away our land to the white man. My life is in your hands. I have slain a man. If you do not know, thus was the slaying done."

Step by step he rehearsed the fatal day of that Sunday, June 16, 1940. He told how Evein Tubbee had come to his home from Tubbee's home 4 miles away. He said Tubbee had cursed him and his family, threatened them, hurled rocks through the doors and windows of their little home, and had danced the war dance around that home. From his own wood pile, Wesley said, the invader had seized a club, waved it like a war club, and threatened to kill them all.

CHIEF CHANTS STORY

"I did not want to kill. I did not mean to kill," Chief Cameron Wesley's voice rose and fell, rose and fell. The Choctaw cadence was like music on the air. He was not speaking. He was chanting.

"My wife fled, with her youngest baby at her breast," the chief's voice went on. "My sons fled. My daughters fled. We ran. We knew that the devil of drink was within Evein Tubbee. We knew that when the sun rose again he would be ashamed that he had made war talk to us, his friends.

"I picked up my gun and I fled," the chanting voice went on. "Evein Tubbee ran hard behind me. I could hear his feet upon the ground. I ran faster. I thought every step to feel his club upon my head. Then there was the fence, I knew that I could not leap over that fence. I knew that if I stopped to climb that fence he would kill me."

Dramatically the dark little wisp of a man paused. A Choctaw, graduate of American school, stood beside the Times-Picayune reporter, translating the chant word by word. The little group who listened felt their own muscles tighten at the drama of the chant, at the suspense of the pause.

GUN WENT OFF

"I thrust my gun back of me," went on Chief Cameron Wesley's voice. "I hoped it would make Evein Tubbee stop. So I thrust my gun around my side, with the muzzle pointing at him. And I looked over my shoulder. The gun went off. He fell. I did not mean to shoot him. I meant only to make him stop. But the gun went off. He fell. He was dead. The bullet was in his heart. I had killed him."

Another dramatic pause.

"Men of my Nation," Chief Cameron Wesley's voice rose in full chant again. "Women of my Nation. Children of my Nation. My life is in your hands. It was 110 years ago our ancestors signed the treaty with the white men on this top where my father sleeps in his grave beside the grave of the man I killed.

"I have been set free by the white man's law that could have hanged me like a dog. Now I stand before your law, which is my law. The treaty we signed with the white man said that we could live under our laws. I have lived under the Choctaw law. If you say I must die by the Choctaw law, give me the weapon and I will die here by my own hand. If you say that I am banished from my tribe, I will go away, with my cotton unpicked in my fields.

"Men and women are born and they die. But while the clouds come up in the sky, while the water runs, while the rain and sun bring crops out of the earth, the law goes on. I live under our law. I can die under it. It is for you to say.

"I have spoken."

The singing cadence of his voice died away. Silence fell on Dancing Rabbit. You could hear the swift intake of quick-drawn breaths there in the hard, hot sunlight.

CHIEF IMPASSIVE

Impassive, stoic, unflinching, the dark face of Chief Cameron Wesley, set with those black, fathomless eyes, looked steadily into the dark faces and the obsidian eyes that were centered on him. The little group of less than 50 Indians stood motionless for some 2 or 3 minutes that seemed like a year.

Then, out of the crescent ranks of them stepped Johnny Cotton, their overseer, elected by their own vote. He wore a flowered shirt that might have brought a chuckle from those who saw it. But there was that in his face this moment that would not even let a smile dare to be born of it.

Over the hot and dusty bare earth he strode three steps. His hand thrust out. It met and gripped the outthrusting hand of Chief Cameron Wesley.

"Hail, chief," he said, "I have heard. I believe. I speak to tell you that to me you are a free man and chief as before."

"IT IS WELL"

"It is well," said Chief Cameron Wesley.

Both faces might have been carved of some dark wood, for all the emotion they revealed. But that was the moment when a man stepped free of jeopardy.

Eunice Wallace, queen of the Choctaw Tribe, stepped forward.

Her dark hand thrust out; the chief gripped it. Then, one by one, men and women and children, they came to where their chief stood before the great granite marker. The same formula marked each one; the hand grip, the short, spoken phrase, the impassive face.

And there by the grave of the man he slew stood Cameron Wesley. He turned to his white friends.

"I have not all the English to tell you all we say in the Choctaw words," he said. "But they tell me I am their chief for all my life, and they want me to be chief of all the Choctaws in Mississippi."

SHRILL CRIES, DRUM BEATS

Then they danced a dance of celebration around the monument that marks the Dancing Rabbit Treaty Ground. High, shrill Indian yells throbbed through the air. The beat of the drum marked the cadence of leaping feet. The women and children, standing in two lines, facing each other, chanted a clear, musical call as the men circled about them. The lacrosse sticks of their ball game were waved high in air as tomahawks wave in the war dance.

And then Chief Wesley, descendant of warrior ancestors, approached Judge Stennis, the pale-face emblem of the pale-face law.

"You think," he said in a low and gentle voice, "maybe it help my people to pass the hat?"

Judge Stennis' half dollar spun through the air and into the dust-grimed, battered black felt. Scores of coins clinked musically on top of it.

"WAR DANCE TONIGHT"

"Big war dance tonight," announced the Indian chief.

All was "bobbishellie" with Chief Cameron Wesley and people. Everybody was friends once more.

Marshall Ford Dam

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. MANSFIELD

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 26, 1940

STATEMENT OF HON. JOSEPH J. MANSFIELD, OF TEXAS, BEFORE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement which I made recently before the Committee on Appropriations, Monday, September 9, 1940:

Mr. WOODRUM. Judge, we will be glad to hear you.

Mr. MANSFIELD. On the Marshall Ford Dam on the Colorado River, in Texas, the Government has expended $21,371,000. It is one of these multiple-purpose dams, a superdam—one dam on top of the other; the lower part for power and the upper part for flood protection—and two appropriations have heretofore been made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that on the main stream—the main Colorado River?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Not your Colorado River in Nevada and your State.

Mr. TABER. It is on the little Colorado?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes; but it is a large stream—800 miles long.

Mr. CANNON. Where does it have its source?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Right on the border of New Mexico, up in the Great Plains region of Texas, and it flows across the State and down into the Gulf of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Why is it called Colorado?

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is a Spanish name that means red, and the water is frequently of reddish color on account of the red soil in the upper reaches.

The estimated cost of that dam, to start with, was $24,991,000, and you have expended $21,371,000. The Budget has approved $2,500,000 more to complete it, and that will still be less than the estimated cost, to start with.

Mr. TABER. What did you say the estimated cost was?

Mr. MANSFIELD. $24,991,000.

Mr. TABER. And the appropriations to date are what?

Mr. MANSFIELD. $21,371,000.

Mr. TABER. Was there a limit of cost fixed?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. That was Mr. Buchanan's project, was it not?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes; it was in Mr. Buchanan's district.

The reason I am interested is that the main portion of the flood features are in my district. I have four counties through which this river flows, whereas LYNDON JOHNSON'S district, which was Mr. Buchanan's district, only has two through which it flows, and the flood damage in my district is far greater, because the valley widens out to 12 to 15 miles wide, and that overflows in all of the big floods. We had a tremendous flood last summer, about 3 months ago, and the damage from that was estimated at $5,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia. Will the completion of this dam take care of that destruction?

Mr. MANSFIELD. This will complete it.

Mr. JOHNSON of West Virginia. But will it take care of the flood damage?

Mr. MANSFIELD. It will practically eliminate all floods originating on the river above that point.

Mr. TABER. How long will it take this dam to silt up?

Mr. MANSFIELD. It will take, I guess, 100 years; I do not know; but the Chief Engineer estimated that it would probably take a hundred years.

Mr. TABER. I understand the Board of Engineers have estimated it will silt up in 6 or 7 years?

Mr. MANSFIELD. No. It will be many, many years, but the engineers can tell you that. The Buchanan Dam is above it, and that will catch the silt. This dam will last for many years longer than the Buchanan Dam, so far as silting up is concerned.

Now the Bureau of Reclamation engineers and also the engineers of the War Department have approved this project.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. We are going to have them in here on it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. And the flood-control bill is pending on the calendar. The President has notified the Speaker not to let it come up; that he had vetoed the rivers and harbors bill and did not want any money expended for these purposes now except where absolutely necessary, and Judge WHITTINGTON is not going to call up the flood-control bill. The bill provides $5,000,000 for levees from Austin to the mouth, or rather, from La Grange, about 60 miles below Austin, to the mouth. That will supplement this dam. The dam, of course, cannot catch the water that flows along the river below it, and there are one or two rather large tributaries that flow into the river below Austin, and the levees are intended to take care of the floods that come from those tributaries. But the main floods that flow down the river come from above this point. The Pedernales, the Llano, and the San Saba Rivers flow into the Colorado above this point, and the Concho, and those are where the main floods have come from.

The estimates of damage, through a period of 13 years, by the engineers of the War Department, are $64,500,000, and 61 lives have been lost during that 13 years. We have later reports on it than that of river floods. That was 8 or 10 years ago that that report was made.

I was county judge there for 20 years and had charge of all of the road and bridge work. There were four bridges in the county in which I lived and three railroad bridges that were washed out a number of times during that 20-year period, and the damage to the railroad was so great that the railway commission of Texas granted an extra charge on all freights crossing that river, as an extra tonnage tax, for having to replace their bridges and the damage that was done to them. That was the Southern Pacific.

I also had charge of the city of Columbus for 14 years, as receiver, when the corporation was abolished, and had charge of the running of the sewage system, the waterworks, and everything during that time, and they were all destroyed on two or three occasions during that time. The damage has been enormous.

Mr. WOODRUM. Well, we will go into it very carefully, judge, and are glad to have your statement on it. Mr. Johnson is coming in on it, and when your transcript comes back suppose you amplify it any way you want to, and put in any facts that you have not covered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Thank you every much. All I want is for you to get the facts before you. And it has been approved by the Budget.

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand you, your idea of this matter is that since we have spent $23,000,000 and $2,500,000 will complete that project, it will be bad business not to complete the project?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes, sir. And, another thing: The equipment will all be removed and it will entail considerable additional expense if the work is not completed continuously, and with this appropriation it will complete the thing before the flood season next summer, they tell me.

Flood protection on this Colorado River has been a major problem for several years. Some time prior to the Civil War the mouth of the river was blocked up by driftwood and other debris. This accumulated for a period of about 70 years, and it was commonly referred to as the raft. It completely filled the bed of the river for a distance of about 27 miles. About 15 years ago this raft was removed, at a cost of $1,225,000, paid by the State of Texas. That has greatly relieved the flood situation on the lower reaches of the river. The river at that time flowed into Matagorda Bay, and the debris from this raft was washed into the bay, filling it up for several miles, destroying the oyster industry.

The bay was separated from the Gulf of Mexico by the Matagorda Peninsula, and a few years ago a channel was cut across the peninsula so that the river now flows directly into the Gulf.

Congress has approved the river for navigation for about 21 miles inland from the Intracoastal Canal. All these improvements near the mouth of the river, made by Federal, State, and local authorities, aggregating about $2,000,000, have greatly relieved the flood situation on that section as well as providing navigation.

With the completion of the Marshall Ford Dam as contemplated by this appropriation, and with the levee system as embraced in the pending flood-control bill, it is believed that the flood situation will be as completely taken care of as it is possible to be done by such improvement.

I have served on the Committees on Flood Control and Rivers and Harbors for 24 years and have a degree of information in regard to nearly all of the rivers in the country. I know of no stream in the United States where flood damage has been more disastrous than it has been on this stream. The valley of the river for 200 miles from the mouth ranges from 1 to 15 miles in width of the most fertile lands in the State of Texas.

Cornerstone Laying of Post Office Building at Broad Ripple, Ind.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 23, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday was one of the most important days in the history of Broad Ripple, Ind.

With many citizens as witnesses, the cornerstone of a new post-office building was laid with impressive ceremonies.

It fell to my lot to be chosen as the permanent chairman of the meeting, an honor that was all the more appreciated because at Broad Ripple I was among old friends and neighbors.

The ceremonial of laying the cornerstone was performed by the Grand Lodge, F. & A. M., of the State of Indiana, with Right Worshipful Grand Master Claude M. Jacoby, of Logansport, presiding. It was carried out with all of the dignity and beauty of the Masonic ritual. The invocation was by Rev. A. H. Abplanalp, grand chaplain, and the Broad Ripple High School Band gave renditions of patriotic music that charmed all listeners. A feature of exceptional interest was a flag exercise by the Scout troops of Broad Ripple and Nora, Ind. The benediction was by Rev. Joseph V. Somes.

I was presented to the audience by Hon. Adolph Seidensticker, postmaster of Indianapolis, and my address was as follows:

Friends and neighbors of Broad Ripple and northern Indianapolis, it is not my intention on this felicitous occasion to test your powers of endurance by any extended speech of mine, but I will ask your indulgence of my weakness for reminiscences for just a few minutes. This occasion recalls some of my earliest and happiest recollections.

A few years ago I went to Smith W. Purdum, then the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and Admiral Christian J. Peoples, then the Chief of the Division of Procurement, and told them of a secret ambition which was rankling in my breast and which I was sure, from all of the unmistakable and clear-cut symptoms, would never cease to rankle, perhaps with ever increasing intensity, until it was fulfilled.

I had been accustomed to meeting these two splendid officials across the table in the Committee on Appropriations, where, as chairman of the subcommittee in charge of Post Office and Treasury Departments' appropriations, I had interrogated them on many an occasion. They were at that time the chairman of the two-headed interdepartmental committee, representing the Post Office and Treasury Departments, which makes allocations for specific building projects from lump sums voted by Congress.

The two officials listened attentatively while I drew out a rather long-spun yarn, reminding them that even Congressmen sometimes die, and then, again, Congressmen, when they stubbornly refuse to die, sometimes get tossed out on the political scrap heap, and that before either one of those dire fates overtook me I wanted to be helpful in securing a post-office building for my home community in Marion County, Ind., the thriving and growing town of Broad Ripple. I told them of a thousand hallowed memories that bind me in indissoluble bonds of affection to this settlement; that my wife and I own a tract of land out on the Dean Road where, when our ship comes in (if it ever does), we hope to build a home and settle down, and that in the years to come, whenever I mail a letter to Washington bawling out the Government, it will be mailed from this identical post office.

I could see that they were impressed and I thought I could detect a glint of moisture in the admiral's eye. When I had concluded my peroration they promised to send an inspector to Indianapolis to investigate, reminding me in a sort of veiled way that no amount of eloquence would put a project across unless it measured up to certain rules of eligibility as to postal receipts, etc., That was all I wanted to know, as I already had ascertained from Postmaster Seidensticker, whose zeal in favor of the plan was equal to mine, that Broad Ripple probably met the eligibility requirements. The investigation was made, and in due course the inspector's report came into the Department, and I was on hand to receive its contents. It gave the Broad Ripple post office a wide margin to the good over the rigid minimum requirements, holding that a new permanent post-office building ought to be constructed and owned by the Government in this thriving and growing center of population.

Under authority of the Construction Program Act approved June 21, 1938, an allotment of $86,000 was made to include cost of site, building, and administration. On May 20, 1940, this amount was increased $9,500, making the total limit of cost $95,500.

Sites were advertised for and after investigation selection was made on April 19, 1939, of property situated on the east side of Carrollton Avenue south of Sixty-third Street, submitted by Tinch & Grider, as the site on which to erect this building.

The building was designed by the office of the supervising architect, Public Buildings Administration, Federal Works Agency.

On May 29, 1940, the Federal Works Agency awarded the construction contract to John S. Gingrich, of Indianapolis, in the amount of $63,360, with a completion date of 240 calendar days from date of receipt of notice to proceed.

The building is being erected on an inside lot having a frontage of 135.66 feet on Carrollton Avenue and extending to the rear 144.7 feet. The building itself will be 80 feet across the front and will have a depth of 53 feet. It will have a ground floor and one story. The ground area will be 4,528 square feet and the content 133,178 cubic feet.

The building is to be of modern design with brick exterior walls, stone trim, and metal windows. Stone steps, cheek blocks and platform with railings and lamp standards will mark the front entrance.

We have met here today very appropriately to lay the cornerstone for this new and important postal unit, and as I stand in this presence, thinking of the past, what a flood of recollections sweeps over my mind. For months the golden strands of memory have been leading me here to this day and this occasion. When I came to Indianapolis from the deep brush of Fayette County 48 years ago, a green and penniless boy in a strange land, Broad Ripple was as far away from Indianapolis, relatively speaking, as Noblesville is today. There was a wide expanse of farm land between the original mile square and the Ripple, with only an occasional farm dwelling here and there.

Soon after my marriage in 1896 to Miss Katherine Huber, of the staff of the Indianapolis Sentinel, her father, Jonas F. Huber, moved from Irvington to a 70-acre farm on the Dean Road in Washington Township, at what is now Seventy-first Street. No better people ever lived than Mr. and Mrs. Huber. God bless their memory! There are still among us some of the older residents of our township who remember them affectionately. My wife and I own 46 acres of the original 70 acres of the Huber farm on the Dean Road and it is there that we fondly hope sometime to erect our lares and penates in a rose-trellised cottage.

In fact, now that I recall it, I am under a kind of congressional mandate to spend the evening of life there, due to the very extraordinary and peculiar verdict rendered by the Congressional Committee on Elections which found me entitled to a seat in Congress in 1928. After my first election, which occurred that year, my opponent, Mr. Updike, challenged my right to serve on residential grounds, citing that I had long been away from Indiana while pursuing my vocation of Washington newspaper correspondent, but after many legal brows had been corrugated with thought and many learned disquisitions had been prepared and delivered, the congressional committee evolved the theory that my home was where my heart was and where I expected sometime to die, and that erudite decision plunked me right squarely, thence and forevermore, in Washington Township, Marion County, Ind. The unanimous decision of the Republican committee was unanimously ratified by the Republican House of Representatives and I became the first and only person in the history of the Republic to be declared a Hoosier by act of Congress. A noted wit has since remarked:

"It did not require the imprimatur of Congress to brand LUDLOW a Hoosier. You can tell it by looking at him."

Among the vivid recollections of my early married life was a trip my bride and I made with her father in the big wagon from Irvington to his newly purchased farm on the Dean Road. The journey was made at night by way of the city, over a route which may now possibly be College Avenue, though I am not so sure of that. Anyhow it was a bad road with many rough places and the cushionless seat did not add anything to the pleasure of the journey. But being newly married I didn't mind it a bit. If the wagon had ridden over me I would have thought it was a little irregular, but not bad. Every time we hit a chuckhole my bride would cling to me closely for protection. To my way of thinking this privilege of being the strong protector of a lovely girl far more than offset the trials and inconveniences of the trip and my fervent prayer as we went along was for more chuckholes, although every time we struck a chuckhole I could visualize myself eating my meals in a standing posture for days to come. Finally, with a tremendous rattle and several loud bangs the wagon stopped. Something had broken. With half an hour's tinkering by light of the lantern my father-in-law salvaged the situation sufficiently to enable us to drive on. We were all night making that trip from Irvington to the place on the Dean Road. If my wife were here, she could add some embellishments to my description of this epochal trip. Unfortunately she could not come, but she asked me to give her love to everybody here. For some years, or until we began to accumulate a sizable family of our own, we lived with Mr. and Mrs. Huber on the Dean Road. I was a writer on the Indianapolis newspapers in those times and every evening my father-in-law would drive to the entrance of Broad Ripple Park to meet me and take me to his home.

My wife often speaks of the very trying period in her life as a young matron when our two oldest children, Margery and Blanche, attended the Broad Ripple School, riding to and from the Ripple with other children gathered from the four corners of the school district in a horse-drawn bus, or "jolt wagon," as the youngsters called it. This service required early rising, as the bus appeared in front of my father-in-law's house at 6:30 sharp every morning and there was a jerky ride of 22 miles over dusty roads from the time the children were picked up until they were delivered again, safe and sound but well shaken up, at the front gate. My wife often remarks that when the children came home at night it was difficult to recognize them for the dust that covered them from head to feet. We had good schools in Broad Ripple, even in those days. But of course they were not up to the standard set by Karl Ammerman, who is recognized as one of the best school men in the United States.

If it has seemed to you that there was overly much of the personal pronoun in this talk of mine I hope you will forgive me and that you will construe it as an indication, which it is, of my deep personal interest in and affection for this ceremony and all of its background.

I am glad to be here on the same platform with that brilliant and distinguished son of Indiana, Walter Myers, who in the few months he has served as Assistant Postmaster General already has established a record of high efficiency in that important office. I am pleased to have this opportunity to rub elbows with the postmaster of Indianapolis, Mr. Seidensticker, and to say that in the records of the Post Office Department at Washington he is officially recognized as being one of the very best postmasters in the United States and it is a great pleasure to me to be associated on this occasion with Mr. George Thompson, the very efficient manager of the Broad Ripple postal station, whose zeal in paving the way for this new post-office building has been attested by many a personal interview he has had with me and by many a communication on file in my office.

I cannot imagine any other occasion that would have enticed me away from Washington at this particular time when world conditions are so tragically upset and we are building so earnestly the defense and protection that is so necessary to save our own beloved country from involvement. It happens that I am a member of the small subcommittee on deficiencies through which all national-defense estimates are routed to be evaluated for inclusion in appropriation bills. I have voted for all of the estimates sent to us by the Army and Navy and in some instances I have voted to increase budgetary defense estimates where further investigation has shown that the original amount was not sufficient.

"Keep America out of the European war and keep the war out of America" is a motto which to my mind reflects the highest wisdom and patriotism in these trying times. To keep America safe with madmen at loose in the world, it is necessary that we shall make our national defenses so strong that no nation nor any combination of nations will dare to attack us. The task of American statesmanship in these tragic times is to make certain that our boys will not be sent to the slaughter pens of foreign wars and to strengthen our defenses so that war will never come to us. As your Representative, I conceive it to be my duty to work with might and main to make American defenses impregnable while striving with equal zeal and earnestness to keep America out of foreign entanglements. I cannot for long forsake the hourly obligations that are imposed upon me in this connection. Our subcommittee meets nearly every day, often several times a day, and when this ceremony here is over I shall return immediately to Washington to resume the discharge of my duty, as I see my duty.

A Federal building such as we are erecting in Broad Ripple is far more than a service institution. Great as is its value from the standpoint of service, its even greater value is as a symbol of the strength and dignity and majesty of the Government of the United States, the last citadel of freedom. Every time I visit a foreign country I say "Thank God for America." Last year I visited a country where the labor wage scale ranges from 3 cents to 5 cents an hour. What would our American workingmen think of a wage income around $2.50 and $3 a week? I wonder whether we who enjoy this land of freedom and opportunity can realize what it would mean to live in a country where freedom has been stamped out by the heel of totalitarian oppression and where the individual is directed and coerced and bullied at every turn. This structure should be a reminder not only to those of our era but to generations yet unborn of the blessings of free institutions and the obligation resting upon us and on posterity down to the remotest generation to keep the lanes of opportunity forever open. In the future when we pass this beautiful building and see the glorious ensign of the Republic floating above it, let us solemnly resolve once more "that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from this earth."

A high light of the afternoon was an address by Hon. Walter Myers, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, whose home is in Indianapolis, a short distance from Broad Ripple. In presenting him as the closing speaker, I reminded the listeners that Mr. Myers, who is an outstanding Hoosier orator, needed no introduction to any Indiana audience. Mr. Myers spoke in part as follows:

More than 30 years ago when I first came to Indianapolis, Broad Ripple was a little town out in the country. People went there in the summertime to get near the river and rest. It was reached largely by interurban and street cars.

There were few country roads paved then. Not too many city streets were paved. There were few automobiles. No tractors. No trailers. No trucks. No airplanes. No "blitzkriegs." No income tax. Billion was a term to measure the distance between the stars. Gold was the standard of hard money. There was no totalitarian government.

At that time everybody believed that Government guaranteed to each citizen certain inalienable rights. Each right carried with it a reciprocal duty or obligation such as to pay taxes for the upkeep of the Government and to bear arms in its defense.

How different things are today. Practically every country road is paved and almost every city street. There is practically an automobile for every three or four persons. The bray of the mule and the whinny of the horse have been replaced by the putt-putt of the tractor. Cattle and hogs are taken on a joy ride to the stockyards in trucks or trailers. We have income tax, both State and Federal, and they are getting higher through the necessity of defense. The possession of gold is as much of an offense as the possession of intoxicating liquor was during prohibition. The national debt is measured in tens of billions of dollars and the term billion is now applied to the measurement of money and the counting of germs. Practically all of Europe is under totalitarian government.

In totalitarian government endless duties are imposed on every citizen. It does not necessarily follow that the citizen of these countries is getting reciprocal rights. Each citizen takes what the man above him chooses to give or let him have, and this, according to totalitarian theory, should make him so happy that he is ready to throw his hat in the air and cheer whenever the cheer leader raises his arms or the dictator's name is mentioned. The citizen, according to this theory, is just a minute fraction of the state. The state is something more than the sum of all its parts, and the citizen is something less than a fractional part of the whole.

Rights are "total," duties are "total," and the dictators speak of war as "total," and "total" war means wholesale destruction of men, women, children, the aged, and the defenseless. The truth of the matter is that nothing is "total" in totalitarian governments except tyranny.

And tyranny is tyranny whether it is the tyranny of the autocrat, the tyranny of the mob, or the tyranny of a minority pressure group that in one way or another has obtained and holds the purse strings of the government in one hand and its armed forces in the other.

Our Constitution provides against the tyranny of the autocrat and the tyranny of the mob. It remains to be seen whether it provides sufficiently against the tyranny of the minority pressure group which in a roundabout way leads both to tyranny of autocrats and tyranny of mobs.

Our Government is run in the interest of all the people, and that means in the interest of the average man. It is not intended to make the rich richer or the poor poorer. It is intended to bring the greatest happiness to the greatest number.

So we lay this cornerstone on the principles of truth, justice, and freedom, the same principles upon which the cornerstone of our common country is laid. We lay it in the memory of the living and the dead who have made our country what it is. We lay it in the hope that those yet to come will preserve, protect, and defend it as their fathers did before them. There must be no totalitarian government in America, no "total" political leaders, no "total" political group. America must remain a free country for free men. Dictatorship must be resisted to the death, whether it is sought to be imposed from within or from without. We lay it in the belief that the building here to be erected will be dedicated to that fundamental tenet of our faith—the fullest good for each in the betterment of all.

The Airplane Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE HARTFORD (CONN.) TIMES

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting editorial which appeared in the Hartford Times on Thursday, September 19.

The editorial refers to our national-defense program—particularly in reference to the construction of plants—and emphatically to the program and problem of training pilots. Our air program—and pilot training—is a subject with which most of us are greatly concerned, and I am asking the insertion of this editorial only with the hope that it may lay some emphasis on this particular part of our national-defense effort and that it may be helpful.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Times of September 19, 1940]

THE AIRPLANE PROGRAM

Mr. Knudsen, of the National Defense Commission, said recently at Buffalo that the Army and Navy would have about 11,000 combat planes within 19 months. This figure is based upon a total production between now and May 1, 1942, of 33,000 planes, of which 14,000 are under contract to Great Britain and the remainder will be built for the United States. Of the latter, 60 percent will be combat ships.

Almost at the same time Washington dispatches told of the Army sending hurry-up letters to 21 private manufacturers "for immediate start of a vast program to build 14,394 fighting planes." This program was said to bring the total number of aircraft on order to 22,091.

With the various spokesmen offering figures so widely apart and with Washington talking about appropriations, orders, and programs it is not surprising if the people of the Nation are confused when they try to understand what is being done. It is too much to expect the average citizen to have any accurate knowledge of the actual aircraft program or, indeed, of the whole defense picture.

The Knudsen and Army statements are not in conflict. They do not deal with the same thing. Mr. Knudsen was discussing planes to be completed within a given period. The Army was discussing a larger program which includes that which Knudsen was talking about. But it is not easy for the casual reader to make such distinctions.

Judging from activities in this vicinity, with which Hartford is familiar, Mr. Knudsen's does not seem like an impossible estimate. There are however certain things to be said about it.

Of the 33,000 planes to be built, 14,000 are destined for Great Britain. For the remaining 19,000, which the United States will get, manufacturing facilities probably will have to be provided to a very large extent before there can be any actual building of planes or their power plants. Additional plant facilities must be built and equipped with machinery much of which also is still to be built.

An established and operating airplane or engine company cannot build such plant additions and put them into production in less than 8 months under the most favorable circumstances. For Henry Ford, who is going into the plane engine-building business de novo and whose output is included in the Army estimate, a full year probably will pass before his new plant is in quantity production.

Mr. Knudsen's 11,000 planes, which are to be ready by May 1, 1942, will require at least 25,000 trained pilots and more than twice that number of trained mechanics to service them. Such men are not trained in a moment, particularly pilots for such complicated ships.

Obviously there is as much need for a gigantic personnel-training program as for a program of plane building. Surely it will profit the Nation little to find itself possessed of 11,000 planes early in 1942 unless it likewise has the manpower to handle them.

It is pertinent to wonder what steps are being taken in that direction. It would be quite as assuring to learn that the Nation's plans in that respect are adequate as to be told in five-figure numbers of the planes which have been ordered.

If it is going to take 8 months, and in the case of Mr. Ford 12 months, to get into production the added plant facilities necessary to build training planes in considerable quantities, it seems apparent that we can hardly start to train fliers in sufficient numbers for at least that time.

On basis of present production of 900 planes a month, of which 80 percent is for the British, we certainly are not getting a horde of training planes now.

We obviously cannot cut down on the British production without lessening Britain's chance of winning, which is important for us.

This suggests that while the present construction program is heartening for the prospects it holds of the early acquisition of adequate air equipment, it does not seem equally reassuring of an early production of planes to train the men who should be ready by early 1942 to man the fighting planes which will be then available. There is a Gordian knot for official scrutiny and someone's cutting.

Involvement of the United States in the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Saturday Evening Post of September 7, 1940, entitled "While Yet There Is Time To Think."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of September 7, 1940]

WHILE YET THERE IS TIME TO THINK

In a kind of hypnosis, produced partly by propaganda designed for people who believed themselves to be cynical and immune, partly by a sincere crusading evangel carried on by those whose emotions, as we think, have overcome their reason, but mainly by a government whose foreign policy, to call it such, has been compounded of a spirit of moral grandeur, international heroics, delusions of a military power not in being, false premises, and panic, this country now goes where it does not look and looks where it does not go.

If it should come awake one morning to read in the newspaper headlines, or hear by the radio, that it had walked backward into war, it would take it no doubt as having been somehow inevitable from the first, and yet nobody would be able to say quite how or why it happened.

As the hagfish enters the body of its victim unawares and slowly displaces it by devouring it, so it is that ideas that were clear and virile in the beginning have been devoured by new meanings, with no change of the word shells, until now you may be called anti-American, a "fifth columnist" or an appeaser if you doubt that the only way to keep America out of the war is to get into it, that to save ourselves we have first to save the British Empire, or that our first line of defense is and always has been the English Channel.

The Post's position cannot be misunderstood. Before the blitzkrieg started, we said: "What we need for practical security is first of all a new word. The word is impregnability, or state of supreme defense. We need more than a bigger Navy. We need two, one for the Atlantic and one for the Pacific, each incomparable. We need an impervious antiaircraft wall. We need to be able to meet not any aggressor, but any combination of aggressors. Then we may be sure that the principle of free institutions as a basis of modern civilization shall have, beyond the solace of words, a time yet to live in this world."

And that is our position still.

Now the Congress has voted a 2-ocean Navy; for this proper sea power, for an approach to adequate air power, and for an Army of 2,000,000 men, it has voted in a few weeks extraordinary appropriations rising to $10,000,000,000. We are not interested in the sums. We shall have to spend a great deal more than ten billions to create a power of defense equal to the power of aggression that has made this all at once a pirate world without law, the lean and hungry nations, as Mussolini says, out to take what they can from the fat ones by force. That, too, we have said.

It is defense we are thinking about, not war. And what concerns us now is that this distinction is becoming blurred.

What are we preparing for—defense or war?

Either the executive government itself does not know or it is unwilling to clarify the situation with a few positive words. We suppose the reason why it cannot do this is that it is already too much involved in its own confusions. Pursuing the insidious formula of measures short of war, conceived, to begin with, on a gross underestimate of the aggressor's power, it was carried headlong into acts of physical intervention for the consequences and implications of which the country was in every way unprepared, to say nothing of the fact that it acted without the consent of Congress and beyond the awareness of the people.

In his message to France on June 15, the President said: "The Government of the United States has made it possible for allied armies to obtain, during the weeks that have just passed, airplanes, artillery, and munitions of many kinds, and * * * this Government, so long as the allied governments continue to resist, will redouble its efforts in this direction."

That was the United States Government speaking, acting, pledging itself to assist in the war against Hitler to the utmost, short only of an actual declaration of hostilities. It was already too late to save France. Moreover, nothing we had been able to send her, even our total military power, including the Navy, could have saved her, which was a trifling reality the Government was unable to comprehend.

Only 6 weeks later, the Secretary of War is saying to the House Committee on Military Affairs, in support of the conscription bill, that there is very grave danger of a direct attack upon the United States by Hitler. He is asked how long it will take to prepare a suitable defense. He says: "We will not have it in time to meet the first possibility of invasion."

The Secretary of War, of course, is speaking directly for the administration. He is saying what it thinks. The administration thinks there is very grave danger of an invasion of this country by Hitler before we can be ready to meet it. But this is the same administration that stripped the American defense of rifles, artillery, munitions, and airplanes and sent them to the Allies. It is the same administration that would have delivered to the British Admiralty the whole of our mosquito fleet in building if the Congress had not found a law to stop it. It is the same administration that has ever since been trying to find a way to deliver United States Navy destroyers to the British. If what it thinks is true—that there is grave danger of an invasion of this country by Hitler before we can get ready—then we have not a rifle, a gun, an airplane, or a rowboat to spare, nor any industrial capacity. On the day the Secretary of War was making his statement before the House committee, the New York newspapers carried pictures of National Guard men training with imaginary machine guns devised by plumbers out of gas pipe.

We can imagine circumstances in which the highest strategy would call for taking the war to the enemy. We cannot conceive of circumstances in which it is permitted in sanity to slap danger in the face before you are ready to meet it—to name an enemy who has not named you, to attack an enemy who has not yet attacked you, before you are ready to fight him.

Our enemies, the administration keeps telling the people, are Germany, Italy, and Japan, naming them. Not one of them has made a gesture of war toward us. For all we think and feel about Hitler, he has not attacked us. He says he does not intend to. We do not believe him. Nobody in the world now believes him. Very well. But the American Government has attacked Hitler, first by words, then by measures short of war, then by giving pledge to his enemies to assist them by all physical means to the utmost.

In June the American Government entered the war against Hitler by acts of physical intervention all the worse because they were futile.

In July that same Government is telling the people they are in grave danger of being attacked by Hitler before they can get ready to meet him. "Hitler does not wait," said the Secretary of War to the House Committee on Military Affairs—and the National Guard men in New York training with gas-pipe guns!

What a triumph for statecraft! What strategy!

What a face for a great nation!

These are the conditions under which there has been created in the country a war psychosis, misled by cries of "Stop Hitler now!" and "Defend America by aiding the Allies." We had nothing to stop Hitler with in Europe. A government that either did not know that, or made believe it was not so, now is saying that if he decided to invade the United States soon, as there is very grave danger that he may, we are not ready to stop him here. Nevertheless, it goes on to declare against him an economic war—a Pan-American economic bloc against his European bloc—for which also it is unprepared, not having thought it through, not having calculated the cost.

We do not believe that an invasion of the United States by Hitler is among the imminent possibilities. The word of the Government for it does not greatly impress us. A government that had been so wrong about his power to overcome in Europe and about the power of France to resist could very well be wrong again. Nor do we believe that 50 or 60 destroyers from the United States Navy would save the British Empire. That would be but another futile act of futile intervention, much more likely to infuriate an enemy we are not prepared to meet than to save a friend.

We are bound to be emotionally torn by the spectacle of the British Empire fighting for its life. That is a feeling that lies deep in us and is shared even by those who still can think in a realistic manner. The fall of the British Empire would be a mighty human disaster. Yet we part with those who say, or who believe, it would mean the end of American civilization, and part with them again when they would in any degree weaken the American defense to repair the weakness of Great Britain's, for which Great Britain, not we, are responsible. We add here two reflections—first, that Great Britain would be stronger if she had stood alone; second, the enemy is governed by logic, not emotion.

We stand, therefore, in our first position. Let us jealously mind our own defense in the great manner of a great people, resolved to be let alone. Let us build at any cost a dreadnought defense power such as no aggressor, nor any combination of aggressors, will dare to challenge. Thus we forfend war.

And meanwhile, for this will take some time, let us look very hard at a state of facts. The German thing has conquered Europe. That will be still true whether the British Empire stands or falls.

Who is going to put the German thing back? The British? They are not able.

Shall we do it? Unless we are willing to go to Europe and destroy it there, we may as well make up our minds now that we shall have to live in the same world with it, maybe for a long time, whether we like it or not. Nonetheless, for that reason, only all the more, we should, we must, create on this continent the incomparable power of defense. After that we shall see. For after that we shall be again as we once were, safe and free and dangerous.

Administration of Conscription Without "Fear or Favor"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, nothing more typical of the Rooseveltian view of the status of the President's family in this Nation has happened in the 8 years of the New Deal administration than the "sacrifice" which young Capt. Elliott Roosevelt has undertaken by accepting a commission in the Air Service as a "specialist" in procurement.

Gen. Hugh S. Johnson did the Nation a service when he pointed out that the President had said that the selective-service law must be administered "fairly and without fear or favor." That is what the President told the Governors, and that is the way the selective-service law should be administered. As General Johnson pointed out, if the plan is not fairly administered it not only will not work but could be used for politics or any other kind of "fear or favor," and would become one of the most hateful and un-American systems of oppression and injustice ever invented.

It was further very properly pointed out that not only must the administration of the Selective Draft Act be completely fair and equitable, but that it must be so far above suspicion that the whole Nation would be convinced of it. The poorest mother of the most humble son, as the columnist pointed out, must be secure in her confidence that her boy will be treated exactly the same as the son of the most powerful man in the Nation or of all other grades clear down to her own station in life.

It was a spectacle to sicken the heart of every American lover of fair play that on the very day the President was declaring that the Selective Draft Act must be administered "fairly and without fear or favor," his own son Elliott was being commissioned in the service as a captain in the Air Corps. Not as a flyer, because that takes work and training. Elliott goes in as what General Johnson says the airmen call a "kee-wee"—a bird without wings.

He did not apply to any recruiting office. The head of the Army Air Corps, General Arnold himself, assigned the new Captain Roosevelt from the "specialist Reserve" to the new job in "procurement," which has to do with buying supplies, a less hazardous assignment than which could scarcely be found. When asked what kind of a specialist Capt. Elliott Roosevelt was supposed to be, the officials are said to have replied that this information was "confidential."

As a captain, of course, Elliott Roosevelt will draw $200 a month, plus allowances possibly up to $116 a month, instead of ordinary Army pay of $30 a month.

Being 30 years of age, this boy would have been in the selective-draft pool. It is probable that, being married, he would not have been taken in the first draft. It is also true that his mother a few days ago held forth at some length on the theme that her boys, married though they are, should be ready to make the same "sacrifices" that other boys do because their families would be in no danger of want or privation. Of course, this job of being a captain in procurement, where there are no hazards of flying or fighting to be encountered, is a great and noble "sacrifice" on the part of young Elliott Roosevelt. Perhaps it is not rare or even unusual, however, because undoubtedly there are a good many American boys of 30 who would be willing to "sacrifice" themselves as captains in the procurement division of the air service. Indeed, some of them might even be persuaded to make the greater sacrifice of becoming a major or a colonel in the procurement service, provided their "specialist" qualifications were not made a matter of public information.

And thus again we find that the Roosevelt family, from the President down, is never ready to take any dose of the medicine they are so willing to prescribe for the rest of the citizens of this country.

Col. Henry Watterson Warns Against Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. ROBSION

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, September 24, 1940

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted I am including in my remarks a great editorial from the pen of one of America's greatest editors, Col. Henry Watterson, a great Democrat, and the former famous and brilliant editor of the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal. This editorial appeared in the Courier-Journal October 12, 1910, in the usual double-leaded Watterson style. The suggested candidacy for a third term of ex-President Theodore Roosevelt prompted these utterances.

The editorial of Colonel Watterson is as follows:

THE ONE-MAN POWER

The President of the United States has more and greater power than any sovereign in Europe. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He has the appointment of Federal officers at home and abroad. Through the Treasury Department he may control the rise and fall of prices. Through the Department of Commerce he may coerce the corporations; through the Interstate Commerce Commission, the railways. He is master of the Secret Service. It is his to forbid an act of Congress to become law.

In the hands of a strong, ambitious, and unscrupulous man nothing short of armed resistance could stand against such an array of forces; and armed resistance could nowhere organize itself against a President having the foresight to provide against it; able by a word to concentrate troops at any given point; by the touch of a button to order the arrest of the resistant at the farthest ends of the Republic.

There is no tyranny more unreasoning than that of majorities; no despotism so relentless as party despotism. Backed by these, while inventing a pretext, a President of the United States could do with impunity what a Czar of Russia or a Sultan of Turkey would never dare attempt. Thus throughout the ages have absolutism and arbitrary power done their perfect work. All that stands between the people and these is the time limit set upon Presidential elections, and the third-term tradition bequeathed us by Washington, which has for a period of 100 years restricted the individual occupancy of the Presidential chair to 8 years.

Lift this time limit and life tenure is the logical consequence. Life tenure means absolutism and arbitrary power. Under the title of President we would have an autocrat, having already an imperial republic under democratic forms and names.

Nor is there any less reason why we should not find such a ruler in some popular favorite than that England found one in Cromwell and that Mexico actually has one in Diaz, except that we guard the approaches to life tenure by preserving the third-term tradition, because the 4 years' requirement upon the Presidential election, as we have seen in Mexico, raises no bar against life tenure. The need of one date becomes the exigency of another date until self-perpetuation is not only easy but taken for granted by a people accustomed to usurpations of power. At last the revolution is accepted as a matter of course.

The plea that we are not as other nations, that what has happened elsewhere could not happen here, is a figment of self-love, heedless of the future and glorying in its ignorance.

Colonel Watterson points out in his editorial in 1910:

The President of the United States has more and greater power than any sovereign in Europe. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He has the appointment of Federal officers at home and abroad. Through the Treasury Department he may control the rise and fall of prices. Through the Department of Commerce he may coerce the corporations; through the Interstate Commerce Commission, the railways. He is master of the Secret Service. It is his to forbid an act of Congress to become law.

If the candidacy of ex-President Theodore Roosevelt for a third term was a threat to the Nation in 1910, how much greater threat is the candidacy of his cousin, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, in 1940? Theodore Roosevelt at that time was an ex-President with about 7 years and 4 months service. On March 4, 1909, he retired, and the mantle of this high office was placed on the shoulders of President Taft. He was stripped of the power of the Presidency. Most of the men he had given important offices with the Government had been supplanted by the appointees of President Taft.

In 1910 we had approximately 80,718 officers and men in the Army, 47,997 officers and men in the Navy, and 9,486 officers and men in the Marine Corps, but Theodore Roosevelt was merely the ex-Commander in Chief of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. Today President Franklin D. Roosevelt is the Commander in Chief of an Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of approximately a million men, consisting of the Regular Establishment, the National Guard, and Reserve. At his request the conscription law has been passed that places under his thumb 16,500,000 men ranging in ages from 21 to 36 years of age, and millions of boys who will become 21 years of age within the next 5 years. President Roosevelt can call these millions of men into the service at any time and under certain circumstances can hold them for any length of time, and this same law drafts the wealth of the Nation, industrial plants, and all other agencies that produce those things essential to national defense. That, of course, could include practically everything.

Congress appropriated for the Army and Navy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, a few hundred million dollars. Since January 3, 1940, at the request of President Roosevelt, Congress has appropriated and authorized and placed at his disposal for the Army and Navy and auxiliaries more than $12,000,000,000. In 1910 we had very few bureaus and commissions. Now we have over 60 powerful bureaus and commissions with hundreds of thousands of employees expending billions of dollars annually. In 1910 we had approximately 384,000 Federal officeholders—about two-thirds of these were under the classified civil service. President Roosevelt has under his control now more than a million Federal officeholders, and hundreds of thousands of these are not under civil service. The President has under his control nearly 2,000,000 W. P. A. workers, 300,000 C. C. C. enrollees, a hundred thousand of N. Y. A. workers, and millions of men and women who receive some sort of relief or bounty from the Government distributed by the appointees of the President.

The records of the Treasury Department show that there was expended by this Government for all purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, $693,917,000. That was mere pin money. The present Congress, at the behest of President Roosevelt, has appropriated and authorized to be appropriated and expended by the President and his aides, nearly $23,000,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941. That is a sum nearly forty times as much as was expended under the administration of President Taft for the year ending June 30, 1910.

And what about the control and rise and fall of prices under President Roosevelt as compared with 1910? What about the power to coerce the corporations in 1940 as compared with 1910? President Roosevelt has regimented agriculture, labor, industry, and commerce.

Colonel Watterson continues in describing the tremendous power that the President of the United States had in 1910:

In the hands of a strong, ambitious, and unscrupulous man, nothing short of armed resistance could stand against such an array of forces; and armed resistance could nowhere organize itself against a President having the foresight to provide against it; able by a word to concentrate troops at any given point; by the touch of a button to order the arrest of the resistant at the farthest ends of the Republic.

No one denies that the President is politically ambitious. He is the only President in our country's history that has sought a third consecutive term and defied the good example of George Washington, and the advice of Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party, and the warning of Andrew Jackson, the patron saint of the Democratic Party. His cousin, Theodore Roosevelt, after having surrendered the office sought the Republican nomination in 1912, but this was refused him by the Republican Party and then it was that Theodore Roosevelt accepted the nomination of the Progressive Party when the third term was denied him by the American people.

Mr. Roosevelt has a subservient Congress that has granted him more dictatorial and extraordinary powers than have been granted to all of our Presidents in peacetime. He has placed a majority of those who follow his political and economic philosophy on the Supreme Court. He has untold billions at his disposal. He has an army of more than a million Federal officeholders. He has millions of others who are subject to the bounty of his hands, and now he has the manpower and the wealth of the Nation at his disposal. He is the most powerful ruler in the world today and has more power than any ruler in all history. How puny were the powers of the President in 1910 compared with the power today of President Roosevelt. Yet, Colonel Watterson said of the Presidency in 1910, the then powers in the hands of a strong, ambitious, and unscrupulous President, nothing could stand against him short of armed resistance, and armed resistance could nowhere organize itself against a President having the foresight to provide against it as he would be able to prepare against it by concentrating his troops at any given point, and by the touch of a button could order the arrest of any resistant at the farthest ends of the Republic.

Colonel Watterson further comments:

There is no tyranny more unreasoning than that of majorities; no despotism so relentless as party despotism. Backed by these, while inventing a pretext, a President of the United States could do with impunity what a Czar of Russia or a Sultan of Turkey would never dare attempt. Thus throughout the ages have absolutism and arbitrary power done their perfect work. All that stands between the people and these is the time limit set upon Presidential elections, and the third-term tradition bequeathed us by Washington, which has for a period of 100 years restricted the individual occupancy of the Presidential chair to 8 years.

Colonel Watterson warns:

Lift this time limit, and life tenure is the logical consequence. Life tenure means absolutism and arbitrary power. Under the title of president we would have an autocrat, having already an imperial republic under democratic forms and names.

President Roosevelt made a failure as a lawyer and in business. He bankrupted the State of New York as Governor, and has bankrupted this country, and when war threatens we find ourselves unprepared and defenseless, but he now insists that he is the "indispensable man." Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, and others were not indispensable in the trying days of this Republic—they were successful, they were not failures. If it is argued that Mr. Roosevelt is indispensable for a third term, by the same logic he would be more indispensable for the fourth term and for life. Hitler and Mussolini insist that they are indispensable men. Napoleon was an indispensable man. He left his country broken, torn, and bleeding, as will Hitler and Mussolini leave their countries in the end, and Mr. Roosevelt, if given time, will complete the devastation and wrecking of this Nation.

President Wilson declared most emphatically that there is no "indispensable man" in this country. This Nation must be bankrupt indeed in intelligence, courage, patriotism, and ability if we now find ourselves with only one man that can direct the affairs of this Nation. We are then no longer a great democracy. We are a totalitarian state with one man only possessing the intelligence, experience, and power to direct the destinies of this great people. But some say that we cannot lose our liberties. The indispensable man can take away the liberties of people of Germany or Italy or Russia but it will not happen in the United States. Colonel Watterson says that if we accept the formula that we must elect a man for a third term or a fourth term and then for life, "at the last the revolution is accepted as a matter of course." And as a final warning he points out:

> The plea that we are not as other nations, that what has happened elsewhere could not happen here, is a figment of self-love, heedless of the future, and glorying in its ignorance.

Mr. Roosevelt is not indispensable. Agriculture, industry, and unemployment problems are as far from solution as when he took office March 4, 1933. Taxes, deficits, and the national debt grow by leaps and bounds. It is now said that there are 45,000,000 undernourished people in this country. Class hatred is fanned. We continue to meddle and muddle in the affairs of the nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and this indispensable man before he is through will very likely involve us in another bloody, costly world war. This will mean a complete bankruptcy of this Republic, tremendous loss of life, the lowering of our standard of living, a complete upset of our economic, social, and political life, and worst of all the loss of most, if not all, of our cherished liberties.

Other great Democrats like the great Watterson have warned the American people. Will they heed it or pay through the nose in regrets throughout the years?

We have had ample evidence of the tremendous power now wielded by the President. He forced Congress into submission. He stacked the Supreme Court. With this power and the aid of the great political machines in New York and Chicago and New Jersey cities and other places, he silenced great Democratic leaders and beat his party into submission and brought together a lot of "yes men" as delegates, who gave him the nomination for the third term, and forced them to accept his candidate for the Vice Presidency. We see this tremendous power again being used to force him on the American people for a third term.

Tribute to Senator Ashurst

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, September 18), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ALEXANDRIA (VA.) GAZETTE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Alexandria Gazette, America's oldest daily newspaper, in which a deserved and most proper tribute is paid to my dear friend and colleague the Senator from Arizona, the Honorable HENRY F. ASHURST.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Alexandria (Va.) Gazette of September 19, 1940]

A DISTINGUISHED SENATOR RETIRES

The title of Carrie Jacobs Bond's beautiful song, The End of a Perfect Day, might well be paraphrased as "the end of a perfect service" in the case of the Honorable HENRY F. ASHURST, the retiring Democratic Senator from Arizona. The sentiment is expressive, too, of that service which has been rounded, complete, and satisfying. It has been given to the Nation and his State in such a manner as to make him the outstanding figure and best beloved Member of that august body, the United States Senate.

His popularity began from the moment he took the oath of office 28 years ago, and it has never been dimmed. Instead it has greatly increased as his capabilities and his display of them were exhibited.

Since the days of Daniel Webster the Senate has not heard so polished, so brilliant, and so forceful an orator. In debate he was the past master of wit, repartee, and rejoinder, but in his verbal combats with his colleagues his rapier was always tipped with a rose. Its thrust was clean-cut and left no poison in the wound. In learning no Senator was comparable with him, except the late John Sharp Williams; even the erudite and scholarly Henry Cabot Lodge did not surpass him. He drank deep at the fountain of knowledge. In courtesy and chivalry he was the peer of James Hamilton Lewis.

His remarks on the most prosaic subjects were classics, and Senate and galleries sat entranced with his eloquence as he spoke. With equal ease and readiness he could discourse at length on literature, art, music, science, philosophy, and the drama. His wide vocabulary has never been equaled in the Senate, and each word uttered fitted like a mosaic in the picture he drew. All of HENRY F. ASHURST'S many attainments might be described by using the superlative, without exaggeration. Even his faults, if he had any, were of the best. His departure causes greater regret to his associates and friends than to himself, for it has been the philosophy of his life to accept fate with a smile.

His defeat for renomination must be found in causes other than himself.
